IV. But there is a Fourth Thing that makes the Way of Transgressors Hard, and that is 'The Loss of the Soul'.—It is quite possible for any transgressor to save his soul and get to heaven. The greatest transgressor that ever trod the earth, if he will only repent and believe in Jesus, may find his way to heaven. We know very well that—when Jesus had overcome the sharpness of death, he opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers'. But when we go into the way of transgressors we do not know that we shall ever have an opportunity of repenting and believing in Jesus. And then, no matter what part of the transgressors' way we may have walked in, we shall find it a hard way, because it will be sure to bring the loss of heaven to us. And if we lose heaven, the only thing that can remain for us will be—everlasting punishment. And that must be a hard way to walk in, which is likely to lead to such an end as this.

In a seaport town on the west coast of England, some years ago, notice was given of a sermon to be preached one Sunday evening on the proper observance of the Sabbath. The minister who was to preach on this occasion was very eloquent, and a large congregation met to hear him. After the usual service was over, and the hymn sung, the minister gave out his text, and was about to begin his sermon, when he suddenly paused, leaned his head on his hand, rested his elbow on the pulpit, and remained silent for a few moments. Some of his friends were afraid that he was feeling unwell. But he soon straightened himself up, and looking round on the congregation, he said: 'My friends, before beginning my sermon, I ask your kind indulgence while I relate to you a short anecdote.

'It is now fifteen years since I was last within this place of worship. The minister who preached on that occasion was the beloved and venerable man who was then the pastor of this church. The subject of the discourse that night was the same that has brought us together this evening—the proper observance of the Sabbath. Among those who came to the church that evening were three young men. They were wild, ungodly, drinking men, who were already far gone in the way of transgressors, and who came that night, not only for the purpose of insulting and mocking the venerable pastor, but with stones in their pockets to throw at him as he stood in this pulpit.

'The minister had not gone on very far with his sermon when one of the young men said to his companions, "What's the use of listening to the old fool any longer? Let's throw now." But the second one stopped him, saying, "Let's see first what he is going to make out of the point of the sermon which he has just begun". But the young man's curiosity was soon satisfied, and he said: "Oh, confound him! it's all nonsense, just as I expected. Let's throw now!" But the third one of their company then said: "Boys, I think we had better give up altogether the bad intention which brought us here". On hearing this his companions were greatly offended, and immediately left the church, while he remained till the close of the service. Those two young men went on in the way of transgressors, while their companion made up his mind to stop, and not walk in that way any longer.

'And now, my friends,' continued the minister, with great feeling, 'Let me tell you about the after history of those three young men. Of the two who left the church that night one was hanged several years ago at Tyburn, for the crime of forgery; the other was lately hung for murder. They died with the burden of their sins still upon them, and thus they lost their souls; the third'—and here the speaker's voice failed. He was greatly agitated, and paused awhile to wipe away the big tear-drops from his face—'the third is he who is now about to address you—listen to him.'

Let us all ask God to give us grace to keep out of the transgressor's way.—RICHARD NEWTON, Bible Warnings, Addresses to Children, p. 91.

AT THE PARTING OF THE WAYS

PROVERBS XIV. 12.

I was one day sitting in a railway car which I expected to take me to a little town called Newburgh, and we came to a parting of the ways called the Ladybank Junction. At this point, as I learned afterwards, the train divided, and one portion went on to Dundee—the other, by Newburgh to Perth. I heard the guards cry out quite plainly, 'Change here for Dundee'; but I did not hear 'Change for Newburgh and Perth'. I said to a gentleman beside me, 'Are we right?' 'All right, sir; I'm going your way too.' And the train moved on.

The next station on the right road should have been Collessie. The station we actually stopped at was called Springfield. 'This is not Collessie,' I said to my fellow-passenger, the man who was going my way too. 'Oh, it's all right—Springfield and Collessie—two names for the same place,' said he.

After Collessie we should have come to Newburgh, the little town at which I was due. Instead of that I saw a great spreading town, with towers and church spires rising above the roofs. The man beside me was now fairly roused; and he cried in a very loud voice, 'We're wrong, sir, we're in the wrong train. We should have changed carriages at Ladybank. This is Cupar, on the road to Dundee.'

And here I was—within an hour or two of the time I should have been at Newburgh—a good twelve miles away from it, and no train back for three hours to come!

But while I lounged about the station and sat in the waiting room, I began to think of mistakes on journeys, of wrong roads, of the hardships and losses of taking wrong roads, and of the need which there is of looking well after right roads. I remembered the Bible proverb which says, 'There is a way which seemeth right unto a man; but the end thereof are the ways of death'. I thought of the great journey of life, and of roads on that journey which seem to be right, but are wrong. And it came into my mind, that my thoughts, sad though they were at the time, might, if I could put them into words, be very useful words of warning to children.

The road I went that day, in my journey to Newburgh, seemed to be the right one, but was not. I want to tell you of roads on a far greater journey—the journey of life—which seem to be right roads but are not. And I want to show you, besides, the need of watching—where I that day failed to watch—at the parting of the ways.

I. There is one road which it is very natural for both young and old to travel, which we all like to travel, and to travel often. This is the road to pleasure. And it is a road God means us to travel. For He has placed us in a bright and beautiful world; and He has given us the power of being happy in His world. Youth is just the beginning of our journey on this road. And I do not know any sight more delightful than the sight of young people moving forward on innocent, natural pleasures. But on this path, as on every other we enter, there are breaks and partings of the way, and great need of watchfulness in consequence, that in our pursuit of happiness we do not go astray.

My first word to you this morning, therefore, will be—'Beware, in life's journey, of the places where pleasure parts from Christian companionship!' What can be sadder than the contrast between the happiness sought after, by the same young heart often, at ten and at twenty! At both ages there is an earnest, eager pursuit of joy. But it is a joy mixed with the smiles and love of innocent companions at the one period, and destitute of them at the other. And the sorrowful thing is that young people pass into the new bad way of seeking happiness, often without knowing that it is bad. It is a way which seems right to them at the time, but the end of it is death.

In a certain northern city once there lived a family of boys. They were as happy as the day was long. They had a happy home. They were happy in a good mother and father. They were happy at school and at play. And the secret was this: their mother had learned to live in the smile of Christ. And she made that smile shine on everything and everybody round about her. Her children began the day with Christ, and ended it with Christ. Their mother managed it so, that there was nothing gloomy in prayer, in family worship, or in going to church. The boys were taught to understand that Christ's eye was resting on them, and following them wherever they went, and that it was a friendly eye—the eye of a brother. In a real sense Christ was a friend and companion to them. Many a time on the Sabbath evening, when they were singing hymns at their mother's knee, the thought passed through their minds that nobody could be happier than they.

By and by the young boys had become young men. But they did not all walk in the path in which their early happiness had been found. They no longer cared to have Christ, or their Christian mother, for their companions. Two of them struck out for themselves on strange new paths, with strange new companions, and strange new joys. They attended low casinos, vile dog-fighting saloons, horse-races, and gambling houses. They knew the way to the wine shops. And they forgot the church, and the hymns they used to sing, and their mother's saintly counsels, and all good ways.

Their happiness now was to follow evildoers and evil ways. It was no use speaking to them. Others went these ways; and why not they? They were not going to be tied to their boyish ways for ever. They would seek happiness in their own way. And they sought it for years in that way, and never found it. And all the sweetness died out of their life; and all the early innocence; and all the reverence for their parents; and all reverence for God. And they became hard, and narrow, and vile, and hateful. The happiness they followed after was Christless. And at last it ceased to be happiness. The end of it was death.

II. There is another road we all like to travel. I shall name it the road beautiful. Old and young of us, we are all fond of beauty, and we desire to be beautiful ourselves. It is not a wrong desire. God has put it deep down in every heart. It is a joy to Him when we grow up beautiful.

And He has laid down a great line of way—the line of loving-heartedness—on which the most heavenly beauty may be reached. But there are side-lines not made by God, where beauty parts from that which makes it beauty.

My second warning, therefore, is—'Beware, in life's journey, of those breaks where Beauty parts from Loving-heartedness'.

Here is the right road, where beauty and the loving heart go together—Christ's road. There is the wrong one, where beauty turns away from love. On the one, love makes heart and face beautiful with Divine beauty. It fills the heart with sweetness, and purity, and humility. And these are the great and best beautifiers. On the other, beauty goes the wrong way, the way where love is not. And the heart is filled with pride, and scorn, and envy, and hate. And at the end of this way the beauty is all dead and gone.

There was, about thirty years ago, a very beautiful child living in the same city I referred to before. Everybody said of her when a child, 'How beautiful she looks!' And she looked very beautiful. At school the other girls were struck with her beauty. She was all over beautiful, and had beautiful hair, beautiful eyes, a beautiful face and figure. Her very feet were beautiful. But although the loving Christ had made this beauty, the beautiful girl would not travel on the same line with Christ's love. She turned aside on a line of her own. She would go where pride, and vanity, and scorn of others were. As she grew into womanhood there grew up in her heart pride in her own beauty. She said to herself, 'I am more beautiful than Jane or Mary or Margaret by my side'. She ceased to love Jane and Mary and Margaret. She did not care to remember that Christ might love them very dearly. She cared neither for Christ nor them. She cared only for herself. It was herself she admired and worshipped. As she looked at herself in the glass, she said, 'I am more beautiful than my sister, more beautiful than ever my mother was'. As she said such things, love for her sister and her mother took flight and left her heart. She could no longer love mother, sisters, or school companions. The poor, vain, empty soul of her loved only herself. Her beauty was her snare, and took her away first from Christ, and then from human love. But then came God's wrath upon her wickedness. She became a fine lady, had a fine house, a coach, many servants, had the same hair, the same eyes, the same face and figure. But somehow the beauty had all departed. She was no longer beautiful. Mary, Jane, and Margaret, and all her sisters had grown up to be very beautiful. There was a quiet harvest-evening-like beauty still resting on the face of her mother. But nobody thought the proud daughter beautiful. People spoke of her as haughty, unfeeling, and hard, but never more as beautiful. The path she chose to travel on seemed good to herself; but the end of it was death. For want of a loving heart in it, her beauty had died. And as for admiration or love, she had neither the one nor the other from man or woman, from angels or God.

III. My third warning is this—'Beware of the places, in life's journey, where Cleverness parts from Goodness!' A good child may be very clever; but there are clever children who have no goodness at all.

God would have the two in company, cleverness and goodness together, the two always moving along the same path. But the road to cleverness is one on which there are many partings of the way; and many and many a poor young soul turns aside and takes the path of cleverness without goodness.

That was the case with a school companion of mine. His story is so sad in itself, and so painful to tell, that I am almost sorry I require to tell it. He was one of the cleverest boys I ever knew, and he was as obliging as he was clever; and he was very comely. I think I see him still, tall, well made, with long, waving, yellow hair, and the bluest and happiest-looking eyes. Everything he did was cleverly done; everything he said was clever. He was far and away the cleverest boy at school. He took all the first prizes; and every boy in the school thought he deserved to take them. When he went to the university he took the same first place in almost all the classes. In the medical classes, to which he next went, he had the highest marks. And his career in these classes for two or three years was so bright with excellence that both professors and students were proud of him.

But long before the time I am describing, this bright and clever boy had turned aside from goodness; he scoffed at goodness. He went aside—trusting to his mere cleverness—to bad ways, to bad companions. He went to vile places and spent his cleverness on sin. Then he forgot his books, got careless in his classes—still trusting to his cleverness—and was actually turned back at the end. Then he took his cleverness into wild society, and became drunken. Then he got into debt, and took money which was not his own. Then, as many bad people do when they get into trouble, he blamed others for his troubles, and sent a letter to an uncle, in which he threatened to kill his uncle unless money was sent to him. Then he was hunted out and arrested by the police, and shut up in gaol and tried and banished. And oh, me! then, in his far banishment, he became worse and worse, and at last was put to death for his crimes.

He parted from Christ's goodness. It seemed to him at the time that that was a right movement to make. He did not believe in Christ. The badness of his life made it impossible for him to believe in Christ. He was clever; and he knew it, and trusted to it, and entered on a path where cleverness was not the servant of Christ. The way seemed right to him no doubt; but the end of it was death. His very cleverness died out of him. He himself died, while he was still young, the bitter, shameful death I have named, in Norfolk Island, over the sea.

IV. By and by all the boys I am addressing will be looking out for an opening into a well-frequented road—the road to business and money-making. Now that is not a bad road to travel. God made business and money too. And He has laid down straight lines along which business people may move forward with good hope and cheer. God means us all to be busy, and He helps some business people to become rich. But there is one thing which should never be forgotten. His blessing on that road, as on every other, rests only where Christ is. And where Christ is not, in business, or money-making, or anything else, the thing of God which is most real is His wrath.

My next warning, therefore, is—'Beware when Business and Money-making part from Christ!'

Honesty and fair dealing are ways of Christ. And nobleness and service to mankind are possible to those who travel by these ways. With Christ in it, business moves along just those lines of honesty, fair dealing, nobleness, and service to mankind.

People may be very busy and be honest in all they do. They may also be very busy and have no honesty at all. And there are plenty of people who will tell you that business and honesty cannot go together in this world, and other people who deliberately put honesty aside. It is a way which seems right to them; but the end of it is death.

I knew a young lad who had been a very excellent Sunday school teacher, and was intended for the ministry; but some circumstance connected with his family caused him to enter into business. He was very well fitted in some respects to do business; but in one respect, as it turned out, he was not fitted at all. He looked on business life as a different kind of life from Sabbath school life, or Church life. He said, 'Things must be done in business which would not bear to be spoken of on Sunday'. And when he had once gone a little way in this fatal error, he went greedily and madly further and further, and parted from Christ utterly in his whole business career.

One night he was alone in his office. The office windows looked out upon the sea. The sea breeze came gently up over the sleeping town in which he lived. The town lamps were shining in every street. His young wife was waiting for him, wondering at his lateness, in her new parlour. He had been sitting three hours with the pen in his hand, wishing to do what by and by he did, but without the bad courage to do it. At last, between eleven and twelve, he did it. Sitting all alone there he did what he had been meditating to do. It was a little thing he did. To look at, it was as insignificant as the turning aside of the train to a branch line of the railway. He wrote down on a bank bill a name that was not his own; that was all. It was that which made the sweat come hot and cold on his brow, and hands, a dozen times that night as he sat alone. Did not other people do it? It was done every day, he said; it is only the discovery which is bad. This would not be discovered for six weeks; and in five weeks he would get back the bill and destroy it. He did not want to rob the man whose name he used: he only wanted to use it for his own ends. He made himself believe that it was a right way to take, to get out of a difficulty. But the end of it was death. By that one little bit of writing he had committed the crime of forgery. It was a criminal who came home late, and pale, and cold that night to the poor young creature to whom he was so recently married. It was a criminal's terror which hung over him for the five weeks which followed. And on the sixth week he was in a criminal's cell for forgery.

The way he took killed his good name and his happiness. And the happiness of his young wife was blasted. And he was sent for ten long years to the hulks, to toil among felons as a slave.

But I must not leave you to suppose that it is only when people do dishonest things that they take wrong roads in business and money-making. There are hundreds of business men who would put their right hand in the fire rather than do a dishonest thing, who are yet on wrong roads in all their money-making.

It was only the other year—many will remember the story—that a well-known member of Parliament suddenly disappeared, and for several days no tidings could be heard of him.

He was a money-maker; and he had made so much that he was thought the richest man but one in London. Money-making was his life, his joy, his hope, his god. He had gone to Parliament, just because that would help him to make more money. And, as it happened, our terrible Crimean War had just begun, and this man watched the turnings and shiftings of the war, and went in to make such a fortune as no other man could match. But some way or other things did not turn out on one occasion as he expected; and instead of making a new fortune, he lost all he had made before! He had not one shilling left. In one hour the riches he had been gathering for a lifetime took wings and flew away.

A godly money-maker would have known that everything was not lost, though his money was. He would have God's help and mercy to go back upon. He would have stayed up his soul on the Rock of Ages, and hidden in its clefts until the storm went past. And he would have said, 'God is better to me than thousands of gold and silver!'

But this man had no Rock of Ages to go back upon, nor any green clefts to hide in. Riches had been his god; and they took wings and flew away.

He felt himself thrust back into utter darkness and want and poverty. So he left the House of Commons one evening and took a bottle of poison, and went out of London, out to a lonely heath, out alone in the darkness of that night, out from all life and all human joy, and drank the poison there, under the stars of God—and died.

His way seemed right to him, no doubt, once. But you see the end of it, since Christ was not in it, was death.

These are very sad stories I have been telling you ; but if they help you to see that there is no happiness, nor beauty, nor cleverness, nor right money-making unless Christ and His life and ways be at the heart of them, the stories will not have been told in vain. —ALEXANDER MACLEOD, Talking to the Children, p. 3.

THE CHILDREN'S CITY OF REFUGE

'In the fear of the Lord is strong confidence, and His children shall have a place of refuge.' —PROVERBS XIV. 26.

IN a beautiful verse of one of the Psalms when the writer speaks about 'telling the towers, and marking the bulwarks' of the city, he adds, 'Consider her palaces' (Ps. XLVIII. 13). The walls and bulwarks, the towers and arsenal and armoury, are all for defence ; but let us enter now for a little her 'Palace,' the abode of the King.

There are many objects of interest which meet our eye there. Let me select one or two.

I. There is the Banqueting-hall. This is the Royal chamber where the King entertains His guests. The provisions with which He there supplies His people are the Promises of the Gospel ; spiritual food — better far than the fabled ambrosial fruits and nectar of the heathen gods. He says of these promises that they are all in Christ, 'yea and Amen' to them that believe (2 Cor. i. 20). 'That is to say, they are every one of them quite true : we may be certain they will not fail us. They are for the young as well as for the old : the weak as well as the strong may partake of the royal dainties.

Perhaps you can repeat to me some words from the Prophet Isaiah, which strikingly describe this Gospel feast : with its special peculiarity that it is to be for all ?

Yes, 'In this mountain shall the Lord of Hosts make unto all people a feast of fat things, of fat things, full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined' (Is. xxv. 6). How hearty and kind is the King's welcome ! His words to every guest seated at His table are, 'Eat, O friends, drink, yea drink abundantly, O beloved' (Sol. Song v. 1).

II. Let me conduct you to another room in the Palace. It is the Royal Library. You know what a library is ? You have seen your father's again and again. I dare say some of you like, at one time to take out the old big folios ; at another, the more modern books locked up within glass doors.

God's Palace Library is filled with volumes. I cannot venture to speak of them all. There are the venerable volumes of the Divine Faithfulness, with their ancient bindings ; volumes which God has been writing for 6000 years. On their title page are the words, 'Yea, I have loved you with an everlasting love.'

There are the volumes of the Divine Justice ; their frontispiece represents a figure, with balances, weighing out what is righteous and unerring.

There are the volumes of Divine Providence. These are various. Some are bound in white and gold, beautifully illuminated ; others are of sombre hue, with black edges and black lettering. But all are written by the same loving hand ; all bear the same loving motto, 'Your Father knoweth that ye have need of these things'.

There is the volume of Divine Love, with its bright picturings. Its frontispiece is that of a shepherd who has rescued a lamb from the thorny thicket, and is bearing the wanderer on his shoulders home.

There are large volumes full of gracious sayings for the aged ; and there is a bookcase full of little volumes with special sayings for the young. In these, the words, in gilded letters, are inscribed above : 'They that seek Me early shall find Me'.

III. Finally, ere we quit the Palace, let us follow a spiral staircase which leads up to the Belfry ; with a clock-tower rising high above the other buildings ; high above walls, and bulwarks, and arsenal. Its bell is heard far and near.

Hear it ! it is even now sounding. It is morning. The mist is still brooding over the river, the early fires are just lighted ; for you see the first coil of blue smoke rising from the housetops in the clear crisp air. As the bell ceases, the clock strikes. We listen ! and its little tongue of iron counts over the number six. The King's servants all begin forthwith their work. Some are building walls ; some are strengthening defences ; some are employed in the royal gardens ; some are carrying pitchers of water from the fountain ; but all are busy.

It is to you I specially refer when I speak of the clock of time thus striking the hour of six. 'That is about the age, I think, of the youngest of you here. Six o'clock! It is time for you to go and enter the King's service ; to begin to love and serve Him, and in your own lowly way to work for Him. Take the words which were once upon the lips of the King's Divine Son, and make them your own. Let their sound ring in your ears all your life long : 'I must work the works of Him that sent Me while it is day, the night cometh when no man can work' (John ix. 4).

And I would add, not only while it is day, but 'while it is yet early day'. Do you remember what Jesus, another time, said to His disciples about 'a place of refuge' ? He spoke to them of a city called Pella on the other side of the Jordan, to which they were to flee in the hour of danger, and the advice and command He gave them, He repeats in another, truer, higher sense to you, 'Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter' (Matt. xxiv. 20). Do not put off repairing to Him till the winter of old age overtake you. That is a bad time, the worst of all times to flee for safety, when the snow is falling, and the icicles are on the rocks, and the storms are sweeping over the mountains. Flee, not even in the summer of life if you can help it ; for the sun is then hot, and the steep dusty road to the city will not be easy to climb in the burning noontide. But go in spring; go in that sweet season of early life, when the air is balmy, and the birds are singing, and the young limbs are strong and nimble for the journey. Now is the best time: now is the accepted time: now may be the only time.—J. R. MACDUFF, Hosannas of the Children, p. 326.

THE PLACE OF REFUGE

'His children shall have a place of refuge.'—PROVERBS XIV. 26.

I wish you (and God also wishes you) to feel quite safe. Perhaps you say, 'I do feel quite safe.' But some time or other you will not feel quite safe. But God wishes you always to feel quite safe, and therefore He says what I have read that 'His children shall have a place of refuge,' that they may be quite safe.

Do you know what 'refuge' means? What is 'a refuge'?

A few weeks ago I went to Portland. At Portland there is what is called 'a harbour of refuge'—a beautiful place—I should like you all to see it. There runs out into the sea, between one and two miles in length, a strong wall of such very big stones—so strong that a railway goes along it. I think it has been built within the last two or three years, to make a 'harbour of refuge'.

One side, as you go along, it is such smooth water—on the left, as you go out, it is all quite smooth; on the other side it is very rough sometimes; but, however rough the sea may be on the right side, it is always smooth on the left.

In London there are a great many places called 'refuges'. Did you ever hear of them? They are for very poor people. There are many boys and girls—and men and women too—who have no home, no place to go to bed at night. But in the long, long, winter nights, when bitterly cold, they may go, if they like, to these 'refuges'; there is a warm fire, and a roof over their heads, and some bread given them at night, and also in the morning. These places are called 'refuges'.

I should like to tell you about a boy, or rather a young man of eighteen years of age, who went into one of these 'homes' or 'refuges,' where there were hundreds in the house. He became very good by going into the 'refuge'. I will tell you how it began.

The superintendent said to him, 'What is your name?' He quickly replied, 'Thomas Smith.' The superintendent was quite sure that was not true; he was so accustomed to look into people's faces that he generally could detect when truth was spoken. He was sure this was a lie.

So what do you think he said to him? 'My boy, have you a mother?' 'Yes, a long way off.' 'Does your mother know about your being here, and your bad ways?' He said, 'No, I hope not.' 'Do you love your mother! and ever think of her?' He answered: 'When I was a little boy I had a rabbit, and my mother used to love it; and when I had my rabbit in my arms my mother would come and stroke it and praise it, and say, "Pretty rabbit"; and her soft hand, when stroking it, would come over mine. Oh! I remember her soft hand. I wish her soft hand were on me now?' 'What is your name, my boy?' 'Richard Bevering, sir!'

He thought of his mother's soft hand, and he could not tell a lie again. Oh, children, think of your dear mother! That man afterwards became a pious man; but that is the way it began. There ought to be no mothers present; but if there are, O that you would remember the power of 'a mother's soft hand!'

And now in the Bible let us think of 'refuges'. Can you think of any? I think you will find that God never sent any trouble upon the world till He had first made 'a refuge' where His own children could go.

Now, when the flood came, God did not let a drop of rain fall till the ark was built, and everybody who liked might go in and escape; and all who loved God did go in.

We read when God destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah there was little 'Zoar,' where Lot went and his daughters; and God did not let any brimstone come down till Lot was safe in 'Zoar'.

And when God destroyed Jerusalem, He did just the same. Do you remember the twenty-fourth of Matthew? Christ told His disciples that all Christians were to 'fly to the mountains' when Jerusalem was besieged.

Titus, the Roman emperor, brought his army around Jerusalem, and the Christians could not escape. How could they flee 'to the mountains'? They could not. When all of a sudden—no one could tell why, and no one has been able to guess why—Titus commanded his troops to go back; and, during that day, the Christians escaped to a place called Pellu, in the hills. It was 'a place of refuge'. His people will have 'a place of refuge'. God will take care of them.

And I dare say you remember in the thirty-fifth of Numbers there is an account of the six 'cities of refuge'. It was a very strange thing—those 'cities of refuge'. God appointed that there should be six cities in the land of the Jews, that if anybody killed a person by accident, if he ran to and got within the 'city of refuge,' he should be safe: if not, the nearest relation to the person killed, called 'the avenger of blood,' should kill him.

And God took care to put these 'cities of refuge' so accessible to every part of the land that they might be easier reached. So that if a person was unfortunate enough to kill anybody the law enabled him to flee there, and the roads thereto were very good—kept even better than others; and if the man escaping should come to two roads, and be uncertain which to take, there was a post directing him; and when he arrived at 'the city of refuge,' he was to knock, and he would be admitted, and be quite safe.

Now I am going to think what is our 'place of refuge'. Has God any 'place of refuge' for us? I wonder whether you have thought of the same as I have? I have thought of two very near together—the bosom of Jesus, and the wounds of Jesus.

These are our two 'places of refuge'. We'll think a little about them; and you can never have any trouble in all the world in your body or your soul, by night or by day, outward or inward, but you can find your 'refuge,' your safe hiding-place, if you go to the bosom of Jesus, or to the wounds of Jesus.

I. First, the bosom of Jesus. Who lay upon His bosom? Who lay upon Jesus' bosom? Do you remember? John. And how safe John must have felt when lying there. I don't think, when John was lying there, he would care for all the trouble in the world. How little mattered his troubles, or the laughs of men, if he could lie there!

And I am sure it is your 'place of refuge'; for it is said, 'He shall carry the lambs in His bosom'. And you are 'the lambs'. He says so particularly.

Do you remember when Jesus called the little children to Him? Have you ever thought very accurately about it? How do you think He took the little children up? I think He took them up by one arm: lifted them very close to His bosom; then with the other hand He blessed them; for it says, 'He took them up in His arms, and blessed them'. One hand must have been under them, the other over them. One to support them, the other to bless them.

I should like to tell you a very sweet thing which a little Chinese boy said. It was very simple; he was a very little boy, I think about four or five years old. He had been brought up as a heathen, but had heard of Jesus Christ, and wished to be baptised. His father said, 'Oh no! you are not old enough to be baptised'. He replied, 'Father, I don't think so—because Jesus said that He would "carry little children in His bosom"; and now I am so very little, it would be easier for Jesus to carry me.'

Jesus, of course, can carry anybody; but I think it is a pretty thought—'Now I am so very little, it will be easier for Jesus to carry me!'

II. The other 'place of refuge' is the wounds of Jesus. How many wounds had He? Five. I remember once telling you about a beautiful hymn by Herbert, called 'The Post Bag': a bag in which everything is to go, and that bag is the wounds of Jesus. You can put anything into that bag, and He will take it to heaven. If you have not read that poem, I should advise you to do so; for it is very nice.

Now, how are we to go to our 'refuge'?—you remember what it is—the bosom of Jesus, and the wounds of Jesus. Now what do you think will make us go to Jesus? What have we to flee from?

The first thing I should say is trouble. When we have any trouble—I hope you have not much trouble, but you have some troubles, haven't you? and when you have trouble—be it pain, or when anybody is unkind to you, or you are anxious about anything, or you are disappointed, remember your 'refuge'; and your 'refuge' where you are to go is to the bosom of Jesus, when you are in trouble.

Supposing a lion were running after you, wouldn't you run up a tree? wouldn't you be glad of a 'refuge' from it? I am going to think how we shall find a safe place when any dreadful things come after us.

We will turn to Isaiah xxxii. 2, we'll read it together: 'And a man (observe that word) shall be as a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest'. Which is the worst—'wind' or 'tempest'? 'Tempest' is the worst. Then He 'shall be as a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest'—cover you all over; the worse it is, the more He will cover you over: 'As rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.'

I will tell you about a poor blind girl, of whom I have been reading in that very interesting book called The Denied Sense, by Dr. Bull; and Dr. Bull has often been to our children's service. This blind girl learned to read the Bible from embossed letters—i.e. raised letters—she learned to read very nicely with her fingers. But it pleased God to paralyse her—she lost all feeling with her fingers.

Oh, she was very unhappy when this happened! and as she thought she could no more read her Bible, she wondered what she should do. But as she took her Bible to say 'Farewell' to it, she kissed it, and in doing so, she found her lips would do to read it by, as they were not paralysed; and so she learnt to read her Bible with her lips, through kissing it, and all the rest of her life she continued to read it with her lips. So God gave her a 'refuge'.

Whatever trouble you have, take my advice—go and tell Jesus, go to His bosom and whisper it to Him. Remember it through life. Sometimes you are away from your friends—no one to feel with you, no one to tell your secrets to—go and tell Jesus. You remember the disciples did this. It is said, 'They went and told Jesus everything' when any trouble happened to them.

Now I want to mention another thing from which we want a 'refuge,' as well as trouble. I am going to mention four things. What shall we have next? Temptation. We are all tempted. Turn to 1 Corinthians x. 13, 'There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man; but God is faithful who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it'—i.e. 'a place of refuge'.

You will always find when tempted to do anything wrong, if you run to God, God will either take away the temptation, or give you more strength and grace to overcome it. I don't know which He will do, but I know which is best—not for Him to take away the temptation, but to give grace to bear it. But He will always do one or the other.

I should like to tell you of a Norwegian boy of thirteen years of age. His parents were gone away to America. One day he was going through the fields to drive some cows home, it being part of his duty; and in doing so he had to cross a river, as he came near which, he met some idle boys who said to him, 'We want you to go and steal some apples in that orchard for us'. He replied, 'I will not do so for anybody'. They said, 'We'll make you'. Again he said, 'I won't do it'. They said, 'If you won't we'll duck you in the river'. 'I will not steal,' he replied.

Then these cruel boys—cowardly fellows—took hold of this one boy to drag him down to the river, and notwithstanding all his cries to spare him, they put him into the river and ducked him. And when they had kept on doing this for some time, they said to him, 'Will you do so now?' 'No!' he said. 'Then we'll conquer you'; and they ducked him in the water again and again. And every time he came up they said, 'Will you steal the apples now?' and he said repeatedly, 'No!' And at last they drowned him!

They did not intend to do it, but they did it. And that boy died a martyr, because he would not do what he knew to be wrong. That is the way God delivered him out of temptation.

Again, we need a 'place of refuge' when we have done anything wicked, and feel very uncomfortable, and have a troubled conscience. I think we all know what that is. When we have done something to grieve God we feel unhappy about it; and what are we to do? Fly to the wounds of Jesus! There is no other place to go to. Whenever you feel getting naughty, go at once to Him.

Now there is one more thing—death. We must all die. It is a happy thing for a Christian to die. It is the happiest thing that ever happened to such a one to die, because there is 'a refuge'. There will be the wounds of Jesus, and the bosom of Jesus, both for us when we die.

I heard of a person dying who thus spoke: 'I am too sick to live, and I am too wicked to die'. Sad words! I hope you and I shall not say so when we are on our death-beds.

Now I will read to you the other side—what a little dying child wrote, I believe, on her death-bed:—

Put your arm around me, mother,
Draw your chair beside my bed;
Let me lean upon your bosom,
This poor, weary, aching head.

Once I thought I could not leave you,
Once I was afraid to die;
Now I feel 'tis Jesus calls me—
To His mansion in the sky!

Why should you be grieving, mother,
That your child is going home,
To that land, where sin and sorrow,
Pain and weakness, no more come?

She had her 'refuge'.

Now, just before I finish, I will tell you about a little boy who had his 'refuge' too. The story is called, 'Willie's To-morrow'.

It was in a very miserably poor room, and it was night. In the grate there was a poor little fire—not little bright flames, but blue flames—almost going out, and one poor rushlight candle upon the table. In this wretched room, far on in the night, a mother was at her hard work, to be ready to take home the next morning, to get some money to buy bread; and near this wretched fire was a poor little boy—'Willie'—on his dying bed.

This poor boy lifted up his little pale face, looking so old, though he was young (poverty made him so) and said, 'I am very hungry, mother!' His mother said to him, 'To-morrow, dear Willie, we'll have some bread'. Little Willie said, 'To-morrow! To-morrow! Didn't I pray to God this morning, "Give me, this day, my daily bread?" Has God forgotten me? Why to-morrow? Didn't He say, this day? and I said, "Give me, this day, my daily bread".'

Then little Willie lay very still a little while. Eleven o'clock was striking, and little Willie looked up and said, 'Is it to-morrow?' His mother could not speak, but took little Willie in her arms to soothe him. She had no bread to give. Little Willie soon became very much worse, and his thoughts wandered; he thought of all kinds of strange things, but every now and then he said, 'To-morrow! to-morrow!'

Presently he was silent; and his mother saw a smile on his lips, as if he was recognising or seeing somebody he knew; this she afterwards called 'the bright spirit' in his eyes. She knew that he was dying. He just said to her, 'To-morrow! to-morrow, mother!' and he died.

Just then the cathedral clock struck twelve; and the mother counted it. God had given him that day his 'daily bread'. Oh what bread! what a feast! He was gone before to-morrow, where 'they hunger no more, neither thirst any more'. He had found his 'place of refuge'.

'The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms'. Look! 'the eternal God is thy refuge,' and underneath are the wings to bear thee over every trouble here, and waft thee, like little Willie, into the bliss of heaven. 'The eternal God is thy refuge; and underneath are the everlasting arms.'—JAMES VAUGHAN.

GOOD AND BAD TEMPER

PROVERBS XV. 18.

I. The Effects of Good and Bad Temper upon Ourselves.—

1. The ill-tempered man is not comfortable. An angry man can never feel comfortable. Anger in our hearts or minds is like a storm at sea. That storm, while it lasts, disturbs everything. It interferes with everybody's comfort; the passengers are sea-sick, the crew are anxious and over-worked, the officers are restless and worried, everything on board is topsyturvy, and the word comfort is almost a mockery. So it is always and everywhere with the irritable and ill-tempered person.

2. The ill-tempered person is not safe. Old Thomas Adams, the Puritan, compared him to a 'ship sent into the sea which hath the devil for its pilot'. A more pitiable object than a man exposing and ultimately destroying himself by yielding the sceptre of self-government to a thing he despises, even God cannot see! Some time ago in India two little children were asleep in a bungalow when a tiger came out of a jungle for something to eat. He scented the children and entered into the bungalow. But the first thing the tiger saw was a looking-glass, and in the looking-glass another tiger, as he thought. In two seconds he went for his supposed rival with all his might. He injured himself so much with broken glass while attacking his reflection that he soon died of his wounds.

3. The ill-tempered person is not wise. This is almost a truism, but it is still necessary both to state and to prove it. A man is never at his best when he is in a temper. Whatever the cause he advocates, if he loses his temper while advocating it, it is almost sure to suffer. A sharp-witted boy at Leyden, who used to attend the disputations held at the Academy, was asked if he understood Latin. 'Not much,' he replied, 'but I know who is wrong in the argument.' 'How?' 'By seeing who is angry first.' If you are identified with a cause upon the clear and able advocacy of which a great deal depends, be sure never to entrust it to an angry man, for as certain as he takes it he'll lose it, either by too freely abusing the plaintiff's attorney or by making a mean exhibition of himself otherwise. As Professor Drummond well puts it in that choice book published after his death: 'A quick temper really incapacitates for sound judgment. Decisions are struck out at white heat without time to collect grounds or hear explanations,' and thus persons who in calm moments and when under complete self-control are regarded as wise, able, and powerful, become mere feeble, laughing-stocks, and even ciphers through allowing their tempers to get the upper hand of them. Let us remember that we have been created in the image of God, that the Divine likeness we bear is a sacred trust committed to our charge, and that every time we allow it to be debased and degraded by the folly of ill-temper we insult Him in the most flagrant way it is in our power to do. 'The greatest reflection on Almighty power,' said one daring sceptic, 'is a fool.' If there is anything in that, what must be the terrible responsibility of the person who voluntarily becomes a fool through ill-temper. May God spare us from having to personally solve the problem.

4. Ill-temper incapacitates a person for discharging his duty. This is very easily demonstrated, as only half the man is available when he is a slave of temper. Naturalists tell us that when the lion is irritated he flogs his sides with his tail and shakes his mane. If, therefore, a traveller finds himself unexpectedly in the presence of a lion he may know the animal's intentions and take precautions accordingly. The lion thus, by the manifestations of his anger, deprives himself of a good opportunity of stealing a march upon his enemy. He loses ground and gives you vantage by the exhibition of his temper. Thus, anger manages everything badly. It always incapacitates those who indulge in it to discharge their duties efficiently, and reduces even the most resourceful to absolute impotence.

II. The Effect of Good and Bad Temper upon Others.—As Dr. Horton says, 'An angry man or woman spreads a pervading sense of irritation in the house or in the workshop, and all the other occupants of the place are as if they dwelt in a country subject to earthquakes. Life to them is divided between anxiety to avoid the explosion and a painful effort to repair its devastation.' However peaceful and happy a home may be, if a person with an ungovernable temper becomes an inmate of it, its peace is over, its sense of rest is gone, its music is thoroughly destroyed, and life, even with the resources provided by wealth and fortune, becomes a weary burden. What a number of homes there are in our country to-day thus struck and blasted by the lightnings of angry passions. Think of the sufferings endured by those who are condemned to spend their whole lives in such homes. Think of the innocent little children who are the helpless and constant victims of these degrading and disgusting exhibitions of humanity at its worst.

III. Ill-Temper in its Effects upon Morality and Religion.—Take it all in all, it is one of the biggest enemies they have. One great author has even gone so far as to say that 'no form of vice, not worldliness, not greed of gold, not drunkenness itself, does more to unchristianise society than evil temper'. It is very strong language, but not one whit too strong, when all is considered. Now we can easily imagine some one asking: 'Are we, then, who are Christians, never to show indignation? Are we never to resist when we are trampled upon? Are we always to submit and say "Thank you" when an unscrupulous person desires to put his foot upon our neck?' Nothing of the kind. Turning the other cheek to the fist of the aggressor does not mean that you are to turn the one struck first to him the second time. Before you make up your mind to disagree with such a doctrine, think of the Christ's indignation in the face of wrong. Can you hear the ring of scorn in His voice when He called the Pharisees whited sepulchres? Can you see the curl on His lip when He denounced His deceitful countrymen as a generation of vipers? Yea, can you see the flame on His cheek when He whips the howling mob of thieves and desecrators out of His Father's house? No, my brethren, neither by word nor by example does Christianity say that you must not wax indignant in the face of wrong. Not only so, but you are a coward in the estimation of Christ if you remain silent and inactive when shams are flourishing and wrongs are growing apace.

But indignation is not ill-temper. To be indignant in the face of sin is a duty. To denounce in the strongest language the hypocrisies, and the shams, and the meannesses of life, is a call from God which no Christian can neglect. You must not, therefore, confuse ill-temper and its ill-bred crew of associates with this element. They have nothing in common. One is a child of light; the other is a child of darkness.—H. ELWYN THOMAS, Pulpit Talks to Young People, p. 27.

SELF-VICTORY

‘He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city.’—PROVERBS XVI. 32.

I AM only going to preach about the last half of this verse. Now I want to talk to you about conquering ourselves. In one word, we will call it ‘Self-Victory,’ and all the sermon will be about Self-Victory, i.e. conquering yourself.

Do not people often say to us, ‘conquer yourself’? I am not sure that that is quite right. Can anybody conquer himself? I do not think he can. God can conquer him! but if anybody sets down to say, ‘I will conquer myself,’ I do not think that person can do it. Therefore, speaking quite truly, quite strictly, it is not right to say, ‘Conquer yourself’.

There is a very important verse about that (1 Cor. xv. 10), where St. Paul says, ‘Not I, but the grace of God which was with me’. Look also at Revelation xn. 11. Do you know, heaven is full of conquerors? Everybody in heaven is a conqueror. Now this verse tells us how they conquered. ‘They overcame him by the blood of the Lamb’—by Christ. Therefore nobody can conquer himself excepting by Christ.

Let us read the text again: ‘He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city’.

‘Better’—what does ‘better’ mean? I think it means three things. ‘Better.’ Why is a person who conquers himself better than a great general who takes a city? For three reasons. I will say a little about them.

First, he is a greater hero; he does a more difficult thing—a nobler deed. Perhaps somebody in this church says, ‘I do not think so’. You have never tried then; because if you ever have tried to conquer yourself in anything, you will find how difficult it is. I have known some children try very hard indeed not to bite their nails—not to suck their thumbs—not to stand in a particular way—not to pout their lips. It is difficult to conquer yourself. I feel for you. I know it is very difficult to conquer yourself; and if anybody treats it as an easy thing I say they know nothing about it.

Shall I tell you why it is so difficult? Because God meant it to be difficult. Now I must ask you to think with me about something. When Adam and Eve ate the forbidden fruit they were friends with the devil. But God said, in great mercy, ‘You shall not always be friends. I will put enmity between you.’ And when boys or girls begin to try to conquer themselves, they find the ‘enmity’; they find what a hard thing it is to fight against their sins. I am so glad when anybody begins to find it difficult to be good, because I know then God has begun to put the ‘enmity’. God is keeping His promise, and has begun a good work in that boy’s or girl’s heart. Before they felt any difficulty they were friends with the devil.

And the reason why it is so difficult to conquer any bad habit is because there are all sorts of powers fighting with that fault against you. The devil is there, the powers of darkness are there, so that you are not only fighting against your wicked heart, but against all sorts of wicked powers. Oh, it is so difficult!

You would think it a difficult thing if a soldier had to charge up a hill guarded by the enemy, if he was the first person to scale the walls of a fortress, these would be brave things to do. To lead a forlorn hope is a great thing, to stand by a breach is a great thing, to plant the Queen’s flag on the top of the enemy’s fortress is a brave thing; but all these are as nothing compared to a man conquering his pride, his indulgences, his lying—anything that is wrong.

I should like to tell you of a very brave man, one of the bravest men I ever heard of. I never read of it till the other day, but you may, perhaps, have heard it before. I must shorten the story, for it is a very long one.

It was in the month of November that a Russian nobleman was returning from a tour in Europe, accompanied by his baroness and their little daughter, Eleanora; their servant was sitting on the low dicky. They drove up to an inn for change of horses; the landlord begged them not to proceed, as it was getting dark; much snow had fallen, and the wolves were very hungry. The baron said he was not afraid, and he must go on. He ordered refreshment, they partook of mulled wine, etc. He gave some to his servant, Erric. They drove on. It became exceedingly dark and cold. Poor little Eleanora began to get frightened; her mother, a Christian, tried to comfort her, telling her ‘God was as much with them there as in their own home’.

They passed a dreary moor, where the snow lay thick. Presently they came to a huge forest (there are plenty of such in Russia); the baroness saw Erric look at something very closely. At that moment they heard a long, low, melancholy howl; and the baron said to his servant in front, ‘What is that?’ He replied, ‘A pack of wolves in the distance, they are coming!’ The baron said, ‘What must we do?’ The servant said, ‘You must do this: you must unload your pistols of bullets, and load them with swan shot, and fire at them if they come’. The baron took down his pistols from the top of his carriage, drew the charge, and loaded them with swan shot. Poor little Eleanora was much frightened. ‘What shall we do?’ she exclaimed. Her mother’s answer to her was, ‘He that delivered David out of the paw of the lion and the bear, He can deliver us, if He choose, from these wolves’.

The baron had no sooner loaded his pistols than the wolves came on their track—quite two hundred of them, a large pack—all running, as wolves do, with their tongues hanging out, and tails stretched quite straight, and howling fiercely. The first wolf—an old grey wolf—led the pack. He came up and seized upon one of the leaders; as he did so, Eric fired and sent a shot through him, and killed him. Turning round to the baron, he said, 'Lend me a string'. He took the string, and tied the dead wolf to the carriage, saying, 'When they see that, the rest will think there is something wrong'. The wolves kept back afraid of the string; but gradually they saw it was a trick, and got courage again, and came rushing after the carriage.

'There is only one thing to be done,' said the servant to the postilion, 'cut the traces of the off horse: let him loose.' He cut the traces, and the horse galloped into the wood, and all the wolves after him in a minute: there remained not one near the carriage. The baroness thought they were safe. The poor horse presently gave a horrible cry—the most horrible cry in nature, when he does scream, is the cry of a dying horse. The postilion galloped on with the horses remaining, as fast as he could; but the snow was deep, and they could not make much way.

Presently the wolves, having eaten the dead horse, came again furiously after them. 'There is yet one thing to be done,' said Eric, 'give them the other leader.' It was done, the wolves galloping after this as after the other. They were now within two miles of the town to which they were going; the lights of the town were in view, but the snow was deep, and they could not make much way.

The wolves were again close upon them; Eric turned round to his master, and said, 'I have served you and my lady faithfully, I trust, for twenty years; but I have never done you the service I am now about to perform. Take care of my wife and child; I am going to jump off, and keep the wolves at bay with my pistols, as long as I can; and when they overcome, they will devour me, but you will have time to get into the town!' The baron said, 'No, Eric, such a thing must not be'. The man was determined. 'Fire your pistols both at once,' said he; 'while I get down—fire!' The baron fired—Eric jumped off. They drove on as fast as they could. They heard a shot—then they heard another shot—and another, a third—and all was silent!

They reached the inn just as the wolves were coming on them again; but the light blazing at the bar frightened the wolves back. The baron, baroness, and Eleanora were safe. The baron and servants went out to search for Eric, but not an atom of him could be found—only his pistols. They supposed, in firing the last shot, the wolves seized on him and devoured him. They raised a monument on the spot, and this was written on it—'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends'. There was courage! There was an act of self-devotion! There was a noble deed!

Now I must go on to the next thing. It is not only a braver but a happier thing to conquer one's self than to 'take a city'. I wonder whether you have ever felt the happiness. Do you know what a very happy thing it is to conquer some naughty thing in your heart? for, if you do not, I do not hesitate to say, whatever happiness you have enjoyed in life, you do not know what real happiness is. There is happiness in one's conscience, if one succeeds in conquering something that is naughty; and there is no happiness like it in the world.

If you take cities it will not make you happy. When a man took nearly all the cities in the world (Alexander the Great), he sat down crying, because he could not find more worlds to take. But if you try to do good, and gradually conquer your own besetting sin, you will feel within such a peace as no words can describe!

There was a little girl whose name was Betty; her grandmother told her 'those that tried to be good were always on the sunny side of everything'. One day poor little Betty had a bad toothache. She said, 'Grandmother! you said there was a sunny side to everything—I do not think there is a sunny side to this'. Her grandmother said, 'I know it is very bad; but if you never had a bad tooth that gave you pain, you would not know what a pleasant thing it is to have one that does not pain you. Besides, you would not be able to feel for other people. And if you bear it patiently, the pain will not be so great.' Betty confessed that it had 'a sunny side,' for she felt happiness in conquering herself, and bearing it patiently.

Betty, some time afterwards, found her grandmother had lost her spectacles. 'Is there a sunny side to that?' she asked. 'Oh yes, there is; I will tell you what it is. The sunny side is I have a little girl, and she has a pair of black eyes, and will bring them to me. That is the sunny side.'

There is always something happy in everything; and you will find it far happier to conquer yourself than if you were a king and conquered the world.

Now, there is another thing—it is not only braver and happier, but something better still—it pleases God. That must be best. I hope you will always think, whenever you want to know which is the best of all things, to ask yourself, 'Which will please God most?' Now the reason why it pleases God so much for you to conquer your sins, is because you will be growing like Jesus Christ. The more you conquer sin the more you will be growing like Christ. When God sees anybody like Christ He is pleased. We have all done that which is worth living for if we please God. The great end of life is to please God.

So there are three things why it is 'better' to rule your own spirit than to take a city. Because it is more difficult, braver; because it leaves a happier feeling behind; and because it pleases God.

I wonder whether there is anybody in this church who is passionate. Do you think there is? Anybody who has a bad temper, who gets cross at times? To you, then, I want to speak. I know it is very difficult. I can quite feel for you. I know what it is. All of us, grown-up people, know what it is. We have all great struggles. Do not think it is only you. We have all some sin that is a plague to us. I can feel for you from my heart. I know it is a great work.

I will tell you, you may succeed. It is very difficult. Peter the Great found it very difficult. He made a law that 'if anybody ever struck his servant, he should be treated as if he were a madman'. Not long after making this law Peter was walking in his garden, and his gardener did or said something that offended Peter, and he struck his gardener a hard blow. He exclaimed, 'I can conquer cities, but I cannot conquer myself'.

Is there an account of anybody in the Bible very proud, but who became humble? I will tell you of one who conquered himself very quickly. Naaman. He would not wash in Jordan to be cured. 'Why does not the prophet do some great thing? Why does he not treat me with distinction? and not send me to wash in that filthy Jordan, which is not half so good as our own rivers? I, forsooth! a great captain like me, to bathe there.' But when his servant spoke to him so wisely, the great captain took his servant's rebuke, as he ought to do; for it was true what the servant said. So he conquered his pride.

Perhaps there are some who are selfish, always greedy, trying to get the best for themselves, taking the nicest things, taking the best place in the room, wanting to be always first. Oh! how unlike are such to Christ! A dreadful sin is selfishness!

Is there anybody in the Bible who was selfish and cured it? I think Jacob did. When he was young he was selfish, for when Esau came in hungry, he sold him a cup of broth for his birthright. And then how selfish in Jacob to try and deceive his old father, and get the blessing. It was dreadfully selfish, and God sent him for twenty-one years to be a servant to conquer himself, and when he came back he acted generously to his brother, he humbled himself to him; he had learned enough by selfishness. However selfish you may be, you may conquer yourself of that dreadful sin.

Two pieces of advice I will give you. Offer up a little prayer in your heart when you feel your sin rising up, 'Lord, help me'. 'Give me grace to conquer it.'

Secondly, make a great effort, nothing is done without effort.—JAMES VAUGHAN.

CASTLE SURE

'The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous runneth into it, and is safe.'—PROVERBS XVIII. 10.

PROBABLY you have not travelled very far. You have never been up the Rhine, or roamed among the Highlands of Bavaria, or wandered amongst the mountains of Palestine, which are all foreign parts very far abroad—and so are the Scotch Highlands, though they are foreign parts not quite so far abroad.

But you have seen pictures of most of these places, and there has been always one thing standing high in every picture—it has been a castle or tower perched like an eagle's nest on the top of some lofty crag, and commanding a view of all the country underneath. And this is why they built these towers so high up; that they might be able to see far, and know what was coming, and so prepare to receive a friend or resist an enemy. These towers were very safe places. As you came near to one of them you would find that, just where the crag began to get steep and very difficult to climb, there was a narrow passage that went winding round and round, and up and up, and only one or two people could go abreast. That was made narrow on purpose, for if an enemy was coming up that steep way it was very easy to roll rocks down upon him, or shoot at him from the windows of the tower, and so nobody could get up unless those inside the castle were willing; and on the very top there was a great gate with bars of iron and sharp spikes, and when that gate was closed it was useless to try to get in—the people inside were quite safe from any harm that could come to them from people outside.

And again and again people had to make use of the strong tower in that way; for when the enemy came into the land to slay the people, or when robbers came there to steal the cattle, the people drove their flocks up behind the tower, and went into the tower themselves with all their valuables, and then they were safe while the soldiers marched out and fought the enemy or drove off the robbers. Whenever there was trouble honest people ran into the strong tower and were safe.

And that was why good people came to speak about God's name as a strong tower. Whenever trouble came on them, and they were at their wits' end and did not know what to do, then one good man would say to another, 'Ah, well! the name of the Lord is a strong tower, and the righteous runneth into it, and is safe'. Then the troubled one would look more hopeful, and a brighter light would come into his eye, and he would lift his head a little higher and say, 'That's true; I will put my trust in the Lord; no one was ever harmed yet who did that! And this is what you and I have to learn to do—to make the name of the Lord our strong tower.'

But how can a name ever become a strong tower? Oh! easy enough, easy enough! You harken and learn.

There is a country far away called Bolivia. It is very hot there, and being so hot, the people from time to time catch fevers which they call insurrections; and when these fevers are on them they grow very excited, and fight with one another, for the only way to cool these fevers is by letting out blood! Well, some years ago, when they had these fevers very badly indeed, they seized an English captain, and without trying him at all to find out whether he was a righteous man or a wicked one, they dragged him into the market-place, and bandaged his eyes, and were getting ready to shoot him. But the captain had had time to send a friend off to tell the English Consul—he is the man who stands for the Queen in foreign parts—and the Consul mounted his horse and rode away like an angry gust of wind to the market-place; and when he got there the men had their rifles up ready to shoot the poor captain, but they never got shooting. No! for the Consul rode between them and the prisoner, and cried out, 'In the Queen's name!' Then they did not dare to shoot, for if they had harmed the captain when he had put his trust in our Queen's name, the Queen would have sent soldiers and sailors out there, and most likely those who shot the captain would have been shot themselves. And so he was saved, and was afterwards found to have been innocent of what they had blamed him for, and came back to this country again a free man—for the name of the Queen had been as a strong tower into which he had run and found safety.

Now it is the same with the name of God. It means God's power, and His faithfulness, and His love—everything by which God can protect and take care of those that put their trust in Him. When the Consul spoke of the Queen's name he meant the Queen's power; her name was short for her armies and her navies, and their strength is very great; and the name of the Lord means the Lord's power, and that is greater still. No one was ever put to shame who trusted in the name of the Lord.

Now, do you think of this when you are tempted. Think of God and the temptation will break up and vanish away, you cannot tell how, like clouds scattered in the wind, and not till they are gone will you find how the Lord has been your Protector.

And think of it when you have got something to do that is right, but is hard to be done. Abraham did that once. God wanted to try him, to see if he really would do what He commanded him or not, so He told him to sacrifice his one son—Abraham felt that a hard commandment, but he put his trust in the name of the Lord. And he found the Lord to be good—as everybody finds Him to be when he trusts Him—for just when he was about to slay his son, the Lord stopped him, and gave him a ram to sacrifice instead. Do you remember the name Abraham gave to God then? It was Jehovah-Jireh, which means, 'The Lord will provide'.

And that is the name you must trust to when you are at the right thing, and find it hard to do. Trust in the Lord, take shelter in His name—the faithful, the loving, the fatherly God; and when things seem at their worst you will find they are at their best, for God will open a way of escape for you right through the rock, and He will make a path for you right through the river, and He will turn stones into bread and enemies into friends, for He has promised He will provide. So trust Him, trust Him always; keep always in the shelter of His name, as people take shelter in a strong tower, and you will find that the peace of God that passeth all understanding will keep your heart and mind as a garrison keeps safe all who are in it.—*J. ## THE TONGUE

'Death and life are in the power of the tongue.'—PROVERBS XVIII. 21.

1. The Tongue is like a Steed (James III. 3).—You have seen a man sitting on the back of a fiery horse. It had a bit in its mouth and a bridle on its neck; and he had to hold it fast and sit upright, bringing all his strength to bear on it, and pressing its sides with his knees. If he had let it go for a moment, it would have dashed away, and perhaps killed both its rider and itself. Now the tongue is like that steed. And, you know, young horses are generally worst to manage; and so are young tongues. Let me tell you when the tongue is like a steed.

1. When it speaks too much.—I dare say some of you speak too much. You let your tongue go on chattering sometimes when it should be silent. You must take special care of this when you are in the company of people older than yourselves. It is very unseemly to talk too much then. I remember hearing a man tell that, when he was about the size of some of you older boys, he had a very dear friend who was twice as old as himself. The younger used to teach the elder Latin and Greek, and was repaid by being told his faults. And very good pay that was. One day his friend told him that it was one of his faults that he talked too much. It was a very hard lesson—far harder than the Greek verbs he was teaching his reprovor. But he never forgot it, and said that, looking back, he counted that among the five or six best turns ever done him in his lifetime. Now, some of you may just need the same lesson. It is well to learn it when young. Do you know what you will be called if you grow up without learning it? You will be called a bore. That is what a man who speaks too much, and does not allow others to have their fair share of conversation, is called by his friends. Very few people are able to talk a great deal and at the same time talk well. So it is better to talk a little well, than a great deal badly. Speech is silver, silence is golden; speech is human, silence is divine.

2. When it is boasting.—Try not to talk much about yourselves. It is time to pull the horse up whenever this begins. It is very hard for some people not to speak about themselves. And if you feel the tendency to do it, you have a horse that requires the bridle. 'Let another praise thee, and not thou thyself.' There are some who have a clever way of boasting; they make other people speak their praises by throwing out suggestions in certain directions. This is called 'fishing for compliments'. But it is always found out; and it is a very mean thing, whether it is found out or not.

3. When it is angry.—It is a good rule never to speak when you are angry. It would be almost better to bite your tongue off than to speak then. But it is hard work to be silent. Anger always wants to speak. Some people have very quick tempers; they are easily betrayed into anger. It is a great misfortune for them. They are very sorry for it afterwards, and resolve not to do it again. But such persons should make another resolution—never to speak one word while the fit of temper lasts. For it is quite impossible to speak then without doing harm. You may do as much evil in two minutes as you will do good in two years. It is all sin, every word that comes out then. Keep the steed tight when you are angry.

II. The Tongue is like a Sword (Ps. LVII. 4).—It is not very long ago since in this country every gentleman wore a sword. The country was then so disturbed, and life so precarious, that it was necessary to do so. If a man was suddenly attacked by a person who desired to rob or murder him, he instantly whipped out his sword from the scabbard, and smote his assailant. But it was a most dangerous custom; for many a time, when men were heated with debate or with wine, their hands grasped, by a sort of instinct, the sword's hilt, and blades gleamed and blood flowed without any just cause. It is far better that this old custom has gone out.

But some people still carry about a sword—not by their side but in their mouth. The sword-tongue is the sarcastic tongue. This is sometimes a very useful weapon, if it is used in self-defence, and for striking the right objects. If you are rudely and unjustly assailed by another's tongue, it is a very good thing, sometimes, to be able to silence him by a witty remark. Or if you see a boy ill-using one who is younger and weaker than himself, you may turn attention away from his victim, and fix it on himself, by a sarcastic word. If you hear a boy speaking wickedly and profanely, it is a very good thing to make a laughing-stock of him by some ludicrous suggestion. But, like the old sword, it is a dangerous weapon. He that has a bitter, jeering tongue will make many enemies; and he that jokes against other people would require to be very free from animosity. There are two cases at least in which this sword should never be drawn:—

1. Against the weak and helpless.—It is just against such that it is easiest to say funny and sarcastic things. But it is very mean. Do you know what a man or a boy is called who does so? He is called a bully. It is a very bad name. Yes, but it is a very bad thing, and deserves a bad name. I would have you to be generous always to the weak. If you know anyone with a deformity in his person or a defect in his speech, or who is extremely poor, be very kind and gentle to him. If you are tempted to make a cutting remark, close your lips. If a crowd of children is swarming round the poor victim, do something to divert them away. Ah! you do not know how deep the sword cuts, and what exquisite pain even a touch on the sore place produces.

2. Against sacred things and holy persons.—It is very easy and very common to make a mock of holy things and persons. It would be better for a man to have his tongue wrenched out than to do that. For instance, many children would make a mock of a child who prayed or became religious. Take care! your sword may cut the bands that are binding a soul to God. Let me mention one other thing here—making jokes out of the Bible. This is often very amusing, and it is difficult to resist the temptation. But it should be resisted. Do not desecrate that holy Book by putting it to such a use.

III. The Tongue is like a Serpent (Ps. CXL. 3).—I do not know which animal you dislike most; but I think I dislike the serpent most. And I will tell you why. It is such a sneak. If a man is attacked by a bear or a lion, he has at least a chance. He can strike, or shoot, or at least run away, and perhaps escape. But the serpent sneaks up through the grass, or rushes unseen and gives its blow in the dark, and then glides off again. Now, the tongue is like the serpent—

1. When it slanders.—You know what slander is. It is speaking evil of a person behind his back. The boy who does that is a sneak. It is a mean thing. And it is not much better to repeat slander when you hear it, even if you have not originated it. Many people delight both to hear and to tell bad things about others. But a truly generous mind will not repeat even a true story against another without some good cause. If you delight in hearing evil of others, this is just as bad as speaking it. I have read of a noble knight, 'who spake no slander,—no, nor listened to it'; and I think we should all try to be like him. Three-fourths of the evil reports about people are untrue; and this should keep us from either listening to them or repeating them.

2. When it flatters.—This is also poison. Flattery is sweet poison, and slander is bitter poison; but both come from the serpent. Many think it a very clever thing to be able to flatter adroitly, and then turn round and laugh at the fool who has believed their sugared lies. Yes, the flattering tongue and the slandering tongue are often the same. It is the tongue that flatters you to your face with honeyed falsehoods that, behind your back, will assail you with words steeped in gall. 'God will cut off all flattering lips.'

IV. The Tongue is like Fire (James III. 6).—You have heard of Greek fire. It used to be employed in war before gunpowder was invented. It was scattered about by instruments not unlike cannons. Whatever it touched it set on fire; and it is said to have burned even under water. Sometimes it set whole towns on fire; for, you know, even a spark can kindle a forest.

Now, the tongue is like fire when it speaks profane or foul words in the hearing of others! because those who hear them speak them again, and so the evil spreads and spreads. Many people throughout the country are getting alarmed just now at the terrible prevalence of this sin. I am very sorry to think that it is impossible for you to go through the streets without hearing such language. But remember it is fire. Keep it far from you. And if ever you are tempted to use such words, remember you are kindling fire which may consume souls. I think if profane swearers reflected on this, they would cease from their sin. I often wonder when I hear respectable-looking men swearing even in the public streets, though there are children around to hear—ay, and to learn. It would be better for a man to have a millstone tied round about his neck, and to be cast into the sea, than to teach little ones to blaspheme.

I would have you mark the boys and men who indulge in this sin, and set them down as those you will avoid. And I wish every one of you would do more—resolve not only to avoid all such language yourselves, but to put it down wherever you meet it. It would not be difficult, for the swearer is a coward; he quails when a brave man challenges him.—JAMES STALKER, The New Song, p. 24.

BUYING THE TRUTH

'Buy the truth, and sell it not.'—PROVERBS XXIII. 23.

The first question that comes into one's mind when one reads this verse, is that very question which Pilate asked, but of which he never waited to hear the answer, 'What is truth?' But our Lord gives you the answer Himself: 'I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life'.

I. Our Lord Jesus Christ is Himself the Truth; and Solomon tells us here that we are to buy Him. How can that be? We know that in many places we are told how He gives Himself to us: how He gave Himself on the cross, to be the payment for our sins; how He gives Himself on the altar, to be the food that keeps our souls alive, just as the meat that we eat keeps our bodies alive. It is very true, He does give Himself to us, and yet we are to buy Him. It is just what is written in Isaiah: 'Yea, come; buy wine and milk without money and without price'. And it means this: that, though He does thus give us Himself, yet it is not without our doing what we can on our parts, without our obeying what He commands us. When we talk about buying and selling, we mean that what we give is worth what we receive. But what have we, or can we have, that is worth the truth here—that is worth, if I may say so, God Himself? When we speak about buying the Truth, we mean that we must give something for it; and the question is, 'What is that something?' You know the parable of the merchantman seeking goodly pearls. And when he had found one pearl of great price, he gave what for it? He went and sold all that he had, and bought that pearl. So now here is the plain truth. If the Holy Ghost had not said it, I should not venture to say so myself. But He has; and therefore I may say it too, what you want is—it is the only thing worth wanting in this world, it is the only thing worth trying for, that our Lord Jesus Christ should belong to you, should belong to you as something that is your own. Only it must be on one condition. You must give Him all you have. Now the utmost we can give to anyone is ourselves, that is, all the power of our souls and of our bodies: not sometimes only; not for some hours in the day only; but always—wherever you are, and whatever you are doing. This is the price you have to pay for that pearl. And see how much it costs. When you are doing your lessons, it means that you should work as diligently as you can for His sake; when you are at play you should be as kind as you can to your playfellows for His sake also. It means that the first thing in the morning you should try to remember you are little Christians, having your Lord and God, Himself once a baby, to please: having a dear angel to help you to please Him; having the devil to fight against, who is your enemy as well as His. It means that when you lie down at night, you should be afraid to go to sleep, if you know that you have one sin in your mind that you have not been sorry for; much more if there is one sin that you mean to be guilty of, if ever you should have the opportunity. It means that, whether you eat or drink, you should do it, as St. Paul says, to the glory of God: that then you should remember who has taken you, like poor little lambs, out of a great wide, wild waste common, and put you in here into a fold, where you are safe from so much danger and sin. It means that when you dress and undress, you should remember that as you then put off and put on your clothes, so some day you will have to put off this body that you now have, and that it depends on how you have been living here, whether you put it on again, far more glorious and beautiful than ever it was; or whether you wake up at the judgment-day to that which Daniel calls shame and everlasting contempt; to that which our Lord speaks of as the resurrection of damnation.

It is no easy thing to anyone to buy the Truth. But then, remember, that the easier God's goodness has made it to you, the more He will expect from you.

II. Well, but this is only half the text. 'Buy the truth, and sell it not.' What does that mean, selling the truth? It means giving up that which we know to be right for some pleasure or advantage in this world. It was because they would not sell the Truth that the martyrs of whom you have heard so much laid down their lives. They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword; they wandered about in sheep-skins and goat-skins; being destitute, afflicted, tormented; of whom the world was not worthy. Now it is not likely that any of you will ever be tempted thus to sell the Truth. But I will tell you a story that I heard the other day when I was away from you. I was being shown over a very large school; and among other places I was being taken to see was the great bedroom—dormitory, as they call it—where as many as eighty boys sleep, in beds side by side, like yours. Now it is the custom that before they go to bed they should all kneel down and say their prayers; and it is a rule that there should be silence kept for a certain time in order that they may. But, about twenty years ago, out of all those eighty boys not one ever said any prayers. They were ashamed to seem to have any religion, and so they used to go to bed every night as heathens might have done. But about that time there went to that school a boy, not more than eleven or twelve years old, not strong in his health, and rather backward in his learning. The first night he slept in this room he looked round to see if anyone were going to say their prayers or not; and he found that first one and then another got into bed without any thought of them. Then it came into his head that after all he might just as well say them in bed too; that if one prays with all one's heart it does not matter whether we kneel down or no. But then again he remembered what our Lord says, 'Whosoever therefore shall deny Me before men, him will I also deny before My Father which is in heaven'. And so, after a great struggle with himself, he took courage and knelt down. Then there arose such a noise and outcry, such a hooting and howling, as might well have frightened a brave man, much more a poor weak boy. And so it went on night after night; as soon as he knelt down there was the same noise, shoes and slippers, and everything that the others could lay their hands on were thrown at him; and wherever he went he was mocked and reviled. But by degrees, first one and then another of the better sort of boys began to think that there must be something in it; began to take his part and defend him; and at last began to follow his example and kneel down themselves. And so it came to pass by degrees, that the truth in this one boy overcame a whole schoolful of iniquity. He had bought the Truth at home, and he would not sell it when he came to school. He did not live very long; and I saw his monument in the chapel of that school. But this I am very sure of, that of all things that are called glorious now, great victories, great conquests, great overcoming difficulties, this is one of the most truly glorious. And something of this kind anyone of you may have to do by and by. If you go out to service, and the first night you are in your new place find that the fellow-servant with whom you have to sleep has no thought of such a thing as prayers, I wonder if you would be ashamed of yourself kneeling down, whether you were laughed at or not? If you should be, then I hope that God will give you grace to think of what I have said now, and to determine that you will not sell the Truth, because of ridicule.

Buy the Truth, and sell it not.—Every temptation is only a persuasion to sell it. The devil says, 'If you will give me up this or that good habit or good resolution, I will give you this or that pleasure. And you remember how St. Paul sets forth Moses, when he was come to years, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt. And I can wish nothing better for you all than that; that you should esteem the reproach of Christ—that is, the reproaches which others cast at you for the sake of Christ—greater riches than anything which this world can offer you. Buy the Truth, and sell it not; and then, some day, if you persevere, you will be taken to the house of Him who is the perfect Truth, and where there is nothing but truth and beauty.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons for Children, p. 1.

THE HEART DEMANDED

'My son, give Me thine heart.'—PROVERBS XXIII. 26.

I. THE Reason for this demand.—When anyone makes a demand upon you for a thing, especially if it is something valuable, you very naturally ask, 'Why is this demand made? what is the reason of it?' And when the Lord Jesus demands the best you have to give, you are quite entitled to ask a reason for it, and you may be sure He has a good reason to give. If I were to lay my hand upon the best thing you have, the thing which you prize most, and were to say, 'I want this,' I am almost certain you would answer me in one or other of two ways. You would either say No, or you would say Why? And when Jesus makes His demand for the heart, that is just what many people, both old and young, say to Him. Many say No right out, and many ask the reason why—'Why should we?' Now, there are three reasons that might be given for complying with Christ's demand:—

1. It is a right thing to give the heart to Christ—it is your duty. Christ has a right to what He asks. If you have made a thing, you think you have a right to it. If you have bought a thing, you think you have a right to it. In the case of either, you say, 'It is mine by right'. If it were a bicycle, for instance, which you had contrived by your own wisdom, made with your own hands, or bought with your own money, you might indeed give it to another, or lend it to another; but if others took it from you, and were always using it, and you could never get the use of it, even when most you wished it or needed it, would you not have the feeling that a wrong had been done to you? You might say, 'I have made it or bought it for myself, and yet it is all one as if I had nothing to do with it'.

I dare say you have seen the picture of a sparrow in a swallow's nest. I have such a picture, neatly drawn by one of our young Sabbath scholars. The swallow, after having spent the cold winter in a warmer country, came with other swallow-friends to spend the summer in this land. It began to build its nest in the corner of a window, taking great pains with it, working late and early to prepare a comfortable home for its little ones, and when it was all complete, I suppose it would be glad its labour was over, and would admire its handiwork and think (after its own fashion) what a comfortable house it had made ready, first for the eggs, and then for the little birds that would come out of them. But one day when it had gone out to get some food, or to have a little pleasant exercise, darting through the air, or flying round the steeple with some of its friends, a sparrow that had been looking out for a house, saw this one, peeped in, found it all nice and cosy, and said to itself, 'Well, I need not trouble to build a nest for myself when this one is ready made, and is as snug as a nest can be'; so without more ado it took possession, and when the swallow came back it found its house occupied by a stranger who set it at defiance, and like a thief and a robber, stole and kept what belonged to another. Now when the swallow came back and said, 'Give me my house,' if the sparrow had asked the reason why, the answer might have been, 'Because I have a right to it'. You would say at once, 'Surely the swallow should get it, because it is right'. Would you not?

Or let me suppose that instead of a swallow it was yourself who had built a house, that you had papered and painted and furnished it, laying out the little garden round it, planting it with the flowers you like best, and making it, as you would say, a 'darling little house'. But when you come home one day a stranger opens the door, looks at you as if you were an intruder, asks what you want, tells you to begone, shuts the door in your face, turns the key in the lock, draws the bar and fastens the chain, as much as to say, 'You shall never get in here!' What would you think? What would you say? 'Give me my house.' Why? 'Because no one has a right to it but myself.'

And it is just so with the Lord Jesus. He made your heart for Himself. He wants it for Himself. He wants to occupy it, to make it His dwelling-place. He says, 'Behold I stand at the door and knock. Let Me in. Give Me thine heart.' And if you ask a reason, He might say just like yourself, 'Because I have a right to it. I made it, made it for Myself, and it is right that I should have it.'

2. It is a safe thing to give the heart to Christ—it is your interest. It is important to have our 'valuables,' as we call them, in a place of safety. Many people who live in town go to the country for the summer. You see windows covered with brown paper, and the door 'brasses' uncleaned, and the grass growing on the street, telling that the houses are unoccupied. And what if thieves should break into the unoccupied houses? What of the silver-plate and other precious things which are there in winter? They are all out of the reach of danger, in the great 'safes' of the bank. The banker, as it were, says, 'Send them to me, and they will be safe in my keeping'.

When I was in Holland lately notices were hung up in the bedrooms of the hotels, in three languages—Dutch, German, and French—saying that all 'valuables' were to be handed over to the keeping of the owner of the hotel. He, as it were, said to each of us, 'Commit them to me, and so they will be safe'.

Now, the most precious thing you have is your heart. I do not mean the heart which you feel beating in your breast, though that is so important that your life depends on it. I mean the heart as the seat of the affections—that which trusts and loves and desires and enjoys. The heart is, to each of us, what the mainspring is to the watch; everything depends on it. If the heart is right, all is right; if the heart is wrong, all is wrong. Hence Jesus says of it, 'Out of it are the issues of life'. What an important thing, then, a heart must be!

A party of us left the Victoria Station in London one night, a little while ago, 'booked' our luggage for Amsterdam, and handed it over to the keeping of the railway company. We got on board the steamer at Queenborough, we sailed across the sea to Flushing, travelled to Utrecht, went away in another direction altogether and spent the day, and got into Amsterdam late at night. When we arrived our luggage was nowhere to be seen, but the station-master said, 'You may be sure it is all right, and will be at your hotel before you are up in the morning'. And accordingly, early in the morning, a loud knock awoke me, I jumped up, opened the door, and there was a Dutch porter, with my portmanteau in his hand, all safe. If it had been in my own keeping no saying what might have become of it. It was in better hands, and came all right.

So with your heart. 'Give it to Me,' says Jesus, 'and all the way through, and at the end, you will find it safe.' Many have tried other ways of it, but these have always turned out ill. Sometimes there was a lost heart. Sometimes there was a broken heart. The heart is safe in the keeping of Jesus, and nowhere else.

3. It is a happy thing to give the heart to Christ—it is your blessed privilege. It is strange the notion some people have about the religion of Jesus. You ask a boy or a young man if he would not like to be a Christian, and a cloud comes over his brow at once. You ask a girl if she will not give her heart to Christ, and she looks almost as if you were threatening to do her some harm. When I was walking along the street one day a nun passed by, and I heard a boy say, 'I would not like to live with these gowned people!' And that is just what some people think about deciding for Christ. They say it is like leaving the sunshine to go into a gloomy prison—it is like bidding farewell to all that is bright and joyous, and exchanging it for mourning—it is like giving up the liberty that is life, and becoming a slave.

I say No. The Bible says No. Every one who has tried it says No. There never was a greater mistake. Those who have given their hearts to Christ are of all people the happiest. It must be so. It is a happy thing to do what is right. You cannot do what is right, however hard and trying it may be, without a feeling of gladness filling your heart.

Conscience approves. God approves. All the right-hearted approve. And if it is right to give the heart to Christ, you cannot do so without being happy in the very act. Otherwise, it is like keeping something that belongs to another. It is a burden every time you think of it. What a relief it is to have it out of your hands.

II. The Manner of the demand.—Sometimes you have demands made upon you roughly, threateningly; and even where the thing itself is right, the manner of the demand turns your heart against it. But it is far otherwise with Jesus. He puts it so gently and kindly that you would think it could hardly fail to win. He says, 'My son'. It is just as if your father or your mother were to come to you to make some request, and putting the hand upon your shoulder were tenderly to say, 'My son—will you?' Who could have the heart to say No? Thus it was that the wise king made his request long ago. Thus it is that the Heavenly King sends His message to you now. What shall your answer be?

Take my heart, it is Thine own,
It shall be Thy royal throne.

THE WARNING AGAINST INTEMPERANCE

'At last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder.'—
PROVERBS XXIII. 32.

Our sermon to-day is about the warning against intemperance.

This is the most dangerous of all serpents. And there are three things about the sting of this serpent which should lead us to mind the warning here given.

I. In the First Place, we should Mind this Warning against the Serpent of Intemperance because its Sting is 'A Costly Sting'.—If you are bitten by some other serpent, it may give you pain for a little while, but you can soon get medicine to cure the bite, and that will be the end of it. But it is very different with this serpent of intemperance. Oh, how much the bite of this serpent costs!

One day a gentleman in London was taking his favourite walk near Regent's Park. As he went on his way he saw an old man sitting to rest under the shadow of a tree by the roadside. He knew, from his dress, that he was one of the inmates of the neighbouring almshouse. The gentleman stopped to talk with him, when the following conversation took place between them:—

'What a pity it is, my friend,' said the gentleman, 'that a man of your age should have to spend the rest of your days in the poorhouse. May I ask how old you are?'

'Close on to eighty years, sir.'

'What was your trade?'

'I was a carpenter, sir.'

'Well, that's a good trade to get a living by. Now let me ask you plainly, were you in the habit of taking intoxicating liquors?'

'No, sir; that is, I only took my beer, three times a day, as the rest of the men did. But I never was a drunkard, if that's what you mean.'

'No, I don't mean that; but I should like to know how much a day your beer cost you?'

'Well, I suppose it was about sixpence a day.'

'And how long, speaking freely, do you suppose you continued to drink it, in that moderate way?'

'Why, I suppose, about sixty years.'

Then the gentleman took out his pencil, while the old man went on talking about his temperate habits and the misfortunes that had overtaken him. When the gentleman had worked out his sum, he said to the old man:—

'My friend, temperate as you say your habits have been, let me tell you that your sixpence a day, for sixty years, at compound interest, has cost you the sum of three thousand two hundred and twenty-six pounds sterling. (That would be sixteen thousand, one hundred and thirty dollars of our money.) And if instead of spending that money for drink, you had laid it aside for your old age, you might now, in place of living in a poorhouse, and being dressed as a pauper, have an income of one hundred and fifty pounds, or seven hundred and fifty dollars a year. That would give you three pounds, or fifteen dollars a week for your support.' Surely that old man found the sting of this serpent a costly sting!

A little boy had attended a temperance meeting one night. When he came home his father said to him, 'Well, my son, have you learned anything to-night?'

'Yes, I have, father.'

'Well, what is it you have learned?'

'Why, I have learned never to put any strong drink to my lips; for they say that intemperance is killing half a million of persons every year, and how do I know but it may kill me? so I have made up my mind to have nothing to do with it.' That is a good lesson for any boy or girl to learn.

II. In the Second Place, we should Mind this Warning against the Serpent of Intemperance because its Sting is 'An Injurious Sting'.—The bite of a serpent is never pleasant. It will often cause pain and inflammation, but these effects can generally be removed. They are not always injurious. But how different it is with the terrible serpent of intemperance! Who can tell all the fearful injury that is done by its sting?

A gentleman was travelling from Boston to Albany in the cars. At one of the stations a fine-looking young man entered the car and sat down by his side. They soon got into conversation together, and talked on a variety of subjects. It seemed that the young man was a theological student and was about to enter the ministry. Something was said about the drinking customs of the day. This caused the young man to say to his companion:—

'Sir, I am only twenty-five years old; and yet you can't tell me anything new about intemperance. I know it, all through, to my sorrow.'

'Please tell me your story,' said the gentleman.

And then he gave the following account of his experience: 'When I was eighteen years of age I went to Boston, to have charge of the books in a large mercantile house. At my boarding-house I became acquainted with four young men, who were clerks like myself. They were in the habit of drinking beer and ale, but nothing stronger then. They invited me to join them in drinking, but I declined. They pressed their invitations very earnestly. I said, "I have never drunk a glass of liquor in my life, and I do not intend to begin now. It would not be just to my temperate parents, nor to my Christian home."

'Now it happened so that one of those young men had a great turn for fun and ridicule. He said things that made the others laugh at me. This was more than I could stand. I finally yielded and drank the first glass of intoxicating liquor that had ever crossed my lips. The habit grew upon me. I soon became a drunkard, and lost my situation. In two years I had an attack of delirium tremens, and found myself standing on the very brink of a drunkard's grave, and of a drunkard's hell. I was greatly alarmed. Then I resolved, by the help of God, to break away from that terrible slavery. I solemnly vowed never again to taste a drop of intoxicating liquor. God helped me in that struggle. I became a sober man and a Christian. And here I am to-day, a brand plucked from the burning, and soon to go forth and preach the glorious gospel of the Son of God.'

III. But then the Sting of this Serpent is 'A Disgraceful Sting'—and this is the Third Reason why we should Mind this Warning against it.—We never think of such a thing as disgrace in connection with the bite of any other serpent. It may cause us pain and uneasiness. We may consider ourselves as unfortunate to be so bitten; but the idea of disgrace, or dishonour, in connection with any stings we may happen to have, never enters our minds. But it is very different with the sting of this terrible serpent of intemperance. Those who are bitten by it, are all the time doing things that are foolish and disgraceful.

Let us look at some illustrations of the different ways in which this is done. Our first incident may be called 'playing drunk'.

This story is told of a physician who had been very successful in his profession and had quite a large practice. But he had allowed himself to get into the habit of drinking, and would often go staggering home quite drunk. One day after dinner he was lying on the sofa, and his two little boys were playing in the same room. As he lay there, not asleep, but with his eyes half-closed, he heard his boys talking together in their play.

One of them said to the other, 'Come, let's play drunk, and stagger about as papa does when he comes home'.

Then the elder boy began the play. He went reeling and staggering about the room, rolling his head from shoulder to shoulder, speaking in a thick, rough voice, and imitating his father's drunken ways.

As the father lay there, seeing and hearing all this, his eyes filled with tears, and his heart with grief. 'Is it possible,' he said to himself, 'that I, an educated and intelligent man, and occupying so important a place in society, should allow myself to act in a way so perfectly ridiculous and disgraceful before my family and friends? My boys shall never see me act so foolishly again. From this day forward, as long as I live, by the help of God, I'll never take another drink of intoxicating liquor.' And he was true to his promise. It was a profitable play which those little boys had that afternoon, in showing their father the disgrace of intemperance.

Our next story is one that was told by a prominent Methodist clergyman in England. We may call it, 'Only once drunk'.

'I never shall forget,' says this good minister, 'the end of one with whom I was acquainted, and who was for years a member of my church. He had been a moderate drinker all his days, but had never been known to be intoxicated. On one occasion he had some important business with a merchant from another city, who was accustomed to drink very freely. He invited my friend to spend the evening with him at the hotel, and attend to their business. They were drinking from time to time, all through the evening. For the first time in his life my friend became intoxicated. At the close of the evening he went home drunk, and excited by liquor, not knowing what he did, he struck his wife a severe blow, which caused her death. He was arrested and put in prison. When the trial came on he was found guilty, and the sentence of death was pronounced against him. I visited him in his cell,' says his minister. 'I went with him to the scaffold, offered the last prayer with him, and stood by to see him executed; and there, within sight of the church of which he had been for more than twenty years a member, he was hung like a dog! I never shall forget that scene.' Here we see how disgraceful the sting of this serpent is!—RICHARD NEWTON, Bible Warnings, Addresses to Children, p. 60.

APPLES OF GOLD.

'A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in baskets of silver.'

—PROVERBS XXV. 11 (R.V.).

'Words,' says the poet, 'fitly spoken,' are like golden fruit in a silver basket. What words could be mean?

1. Words which are fit in themselves—right words.

We may be quite sure that there are many words that are not like this, and have no silver basket.

Slang may be like the crab-apple, but it is not the golden apple. How out of place 'crabs' would be in a silver basket.

2. But the text means also right words said in a right way.

It matters much what we say, and much also how we say it. Kind words may be so roughly spoken that they lose all their kindness, and severe words may be so gently spoken that they do not sting over-much.

When a black boy was asked by the missionary, 'Who are the meek?' his reply was, 'Those who give soft answers to rough questions.'

We so often spoil words by speaking them wrongly. A boy went to apply for a situation.

'Can you write a good hand?' the governor asked.

'Yaas.'

'Good at figures?'

'Yaas.'

'Know the city well?'

'Yaas.'

'That will do. I don't want you,' answered the merchant.

'But,' said a friend when the boy had gone, 'I know the lad to be an honest, industrious boy; why don't you give him a chance?'

'Because he hasn't learned to say "Yes, sir," and "No, sir"'. If he answers me as he did when applying for a situation, how will he answer customers after being here a month?'

So he lost the first situation he applied for because he hadn't learned about the worth of a word 'fity spoken'.

Thus our text, with its beautiful picture of the golden fruit in silver baskets, teaches us the great worth of our words, when good themselves and when well said.

There is a short prayer which we should all pray: 'Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth; keep the door of my lips.'

Mind your words and God will help you.

'Sir,' said a lad coming down to one of the wharves in Boston, and addressing a well-known merchant, 'Sir, have you any berth on your ship? I want to earn something.'

'What can you do?' asked the gentleman.

'I can try my best to do whatever I am put to do,' answered the boy.

'What have you done?'

'I have sawn and split all mother's wood for nigh on two years.'

'What have you not done?' asked the gentleman, who was a queer sort of questioner.

'Well, sir,' answered the boy, after a moment's pause, 'I have not whispered in school once for a whole year.'

'That's enough,' said the gentleman; 'you may ship aboard this vessel, and I hope to see you the master of her some day. A boy who can master a wood-pile and bridle his tongue must be made of good stuff.'

We could master the wood-pile; let us try also to master our tongue.

Will Carleton says in his First Settler's Story:—

Boys flying kites haul in their white-winged birds;

You can't do that way when you're flying words;

Things that we think may sometimes fall back dead;

But God Himself can't kill them when they're said.

'Kind words never die.' And every word fity spoken is like an apple of gold in a basket of silver.—F. B. COWL, Digging Ditches, p. 113.

HINDRANCES

'There is a lion in the way.'—PROVERBS XXVI. 13.

THE man who says this has got two names, but he doesn't like to be called by either of them.

At one time he is called the 'slothful man,' at another time the 'sluggard'. You know what a sloth is? It is a creature as big as a bear, and so lazy! I very much doubt if it ever saw its own tail, it could not turn round quickly enough to look at it! And I think you know what a slug is—a lazy little creepy-crawly thing that is always munching, munching—and can't get along for eating. It is always dinner-time with the slug—unless it is bed-time.

And this man is both a sloth and a slug—a lazy fellow. And that is why he sees a lion in the way. There is always a lion in the way of lazy folk. Sometimes there are two or more—a whole menagerie if they are particularly lazy. For, a lion means a difficulty, and whenever you ask a lazy man to do anything difficulties always spring up in his way—like lions—terrible to look at for their glaring eyes, awful to listen to for their fearful roaring.

Don't you be afraid of lions; don't be afraid of them. A good many of them are only stuffed, and their roar is done by machinery. And a good many of them don't exist at all except in your own mind; when you walk boldly up to what you thought was a lion you will often find it is only a skittish lamb!

But of course there are lions in the world; sometimes there are real difficulties in the way. Very well, when these are there, don't you be like the slug or the sloth—don't run away from them, but go straight to them.

For lions, you know, always protect hid treasure. You like to read tales of brave young knights going forth, so fair and free, with sword in hand to deliver young princesses from enchanters' castles, and to fight their way to the caverns where the walls flash with diamonds, and where the old sea-kings had hidden their chests of gold and silver. Ah, these are histories well worth reading. I am very fond of them myself, just because they are all so real and true—one way. Well, now, did ever any of these brave young knights get to the princess or get to the treasure without having first to meet with a lion in the way? No, never once. A lion or a dragon, or something else that was very fearful to behold, was always there keeping guard. But these young knights always make small account of difficulties like these; somehow or other when they go up to them boldly, they always get safely past.

And you can do the same, if you are of the mind for it, and the best way to help you to do this is by always remembering that just behind the lion there is sure to be something well worth having. The lion would not be there if there was not something behind him well worth keeping.

Do you remember how it was with Christian in the Pilgrim's Progress? He was very weary, and very sad, for he had slept when he should have been awake, and there was darkness round about him and he could not see his way. Then he heard the lions roar—the very lions that had turned back two friends of his of the name of Mistrust and Timorous, who had started to go with Christian. And now the lions were on his own way, and he wondered if he would have to go back too. But just then the darkness lifted a bit, and he saw a stately palace rising before him—the Palace Beautiful. Oh, it was such a lovely sight! he did so wish to enter. But there were two lions before him, right in his way. He would not go back, however; he would go on, and he boldly went up to the lions and passed safely between them. Their roar was like thunder, but their teeth could not reach him, for when he had got quite near them he found that the lions were chained, and there was room between them for him to pass, and so he entered the Palace Beautiful.

That's always and always the way. Difficulties are always like lions, to threaten us away if they can from something good or something great that we would like to have, or to learn, or to do. Don't you be afraid of them; go up to them boldly whenever you see them, and you will find that they are either stuffed with machinery to make them roar, or else they are chained and can't do any harm.

That's the way with Satan, the biggest lion of all. He is always going about, going about, but only as far as his chain will let him. He is chained, and as long as you keep on the right road—Christ's road—his chain can't let him reach you. He never deviously anybody yet till they had gone off the right road.

So, whenever you see a lion in the way, whenever any big difficulty roars and threatens you, have you just one question to ask—are you, or are you not, on the right road? If you are, then go boldly on; the lion may frighten but it can't hurt. You will get past safely, and always, always, just beyond the lion, you will find something well worth having; something to make you good, and glad, and strong. Win for yourself a good name; not Sloth, not Slug, not Timorous, not Mistrust, but Christian, and a Christian never turns back from lions in the way. But never will you become a Christian—Christ's very own—till you learn to overcome the hindrances that are sure to be put in the way of your following Jesus.—J. REID HOWATT, The Children's Pew, p. 154.

DISOBEDIENT CHILDREN

'The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it.'—PROVERBS XXX. 17.

NINE miles from the cathedral city of Lichfield is the little town of Uttoxeter; the grey steeple of the church rising among red-tiled roofs and a few scattered trees.

It was in the market-place of Uttoxeter that the great Samuel Johnson once stood for an hour in the pelting rain, to punish himself for an act of disobedience to his father, of which he had been guilty many years before.

The father of Dr. Johnson was a bookseller in Lichfield; and it was his custom, for a long while, to attend Uttoxeter market, and to open a stall there for the sale of a portion of his stock-in-trade. On one occasion, being too sick to leave home, he asked his son Samuel to go and attend to the business for him; but the lad was too proud to do it, and refused. His shame and remorse punished him well for it.

Fifty years afterwards, when the tall grass waved above the grave of the old bookseller, and the disobedient son had become one of the most distinguished men in the literary world, the remembrance of the sin of his boyhood was still fresh in his memory. Being on a visit to some friends in a neighbouring town he hired a carriage, without explaining his purpose to anyone, and told the driver to take him to Uttoxeter. When he reached the market-place, in spite of wind and rain, he got out and stood for an hour, bareheaded, in the open square, much to the astonishment of the villagers to whom he was a stranger, and who thought, very likely, that he was some poor crazy man who did not know what he was about. He did know, however, for he was enduring agonies of mind for his ingratitude and disobedience to his father. May none of you have to suffer for a like cause!

In the fifth commandment, as you will remember, the Lord promises a special blessing to those who honour their parents, while in the text He threatens the disobedient with a curse. 'The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out and the young eagles shall eat it.'

Here, you will observe, it is not only said that God will punish rude and disrespectful words spoken to parents, but even the scornful look. Many wretched culprits, in their dying confessions, have testified that their downward course to ruin began with the sin of disobedience to their father and mother; and the bodies of such criminals were usually left unburied, exposed to beasts and birds of prey.

I need not tell you the fearful story of Hophni and Phinehas, sons of old Eli, the priest, weltering in their blood on the battle-field; nor of disobedient Absalom, hanging by his long hair from the bough of a tree, pierced through with Joab's darts, cast into a pit, and covered with a heap of stones.

Even when wicked children escape such signal vengeance, they are often punished by being cursed with thankless sons and daughters of their own.

St. Paul, in his frightful picture of heathenism, places 'disobedience to parents' in the foreground of it; and, again, in one of his later Epistles, he speaks of it as one of the signs that the end of the world is near.

The Jewish law punished this sin with death, and the Hindoos deprive a child of his inheritance who is guilty of it.

Do you ask, Why is it so wrong to disobey one's parents?

I answer:—

I. It is a sin to disobey them, Because we Owe so Much to Them.—As soon as the cries of the helpless infant are heard, the heart of the mother yearns towards it with the tenderest affection. With what ceaseless and unwearied self-devotion does she study to promote its comfort and welfare! What toil, and weariness, and watchings, and care, and pain, does she endure!

A good man, who treasures up grateful memories of all this, has thus expressed himself in well-chosen words:—

My mother! manhood's anxious brow
And sterner cares have long been mine;
Yet turn I to thee fondly now,
As when upon thy bosom's shrine
My infant griefs were gently hushed to rest,
And thy low whispered prayers my slumber blessed.

I referred to the debt of gratitude which is due to a mother. And has your father done nothing to call forth your love and reverence? How hard and uncomplainingly has he laboured that you might be fed, and clothed, and educated! Gratitude ought to make a child ashamed of being disobedient or disrespectful. Never can you show too much care and attention to your father. Joseph, when viceroy of Egypt, took pleasure in leading the plain old shepherd, his father, into the royal court, and introducing him to the king.

One shows real manliness in his strict obedience to parental rule. When Antipater wrote to his friend, Alexander the Great, making many complaints against the monarch's mother, he answered with the spirit of a devoted son, 'Knowest thou not that one tear of my mother will blot out a thousand such letters?'

II. Another reason why it is wrong to be disobedient to parents is, Because God Commands us to Honour and Obey Them.—They are not even to be regarded by their children as ordinary men and women, but as those to whom the Almighty has given certain rights, which they have no excuse for disregarding. In loving, honouring, and obeying them, children are loving, honouring, and obeying God. The Lord commands children to do this, and He rewards them for it.

You have all heard of boys and girls who came to harm because they set at naught God's will in this particular.

The little fellow whose mother had cautioned him against going into the river to bathe more than once a day, and then only for a short time, but who slipped away unnoticed and went in several times, and got the typhoid fever by it—he was one example that you will remember.

That boy with one leg, who hobbles about on a crutch, came to grief for the same sin of disobedience. He had been told not to go near the cannon which the men were firing on the Fourth of July, but he did not choose to mind, and when the gun exploded it made him a cripple for life.

It is true that all disobedient children do not fare as badly, but I believe there are very few of them who escape the stings of conscience and the pangs of remorse, as in the case of Dr. Johnson, of which I have already told you.

A little boy who had a kind, good father came from school one day and found him very sick. His mother was also confined to the bed, and there was nobody but the boy's two sisters to wait upon them.

The father continued to grow worse, and several physicians were called in to consult about his case. They had agreed as to the mode of treatment which should be pursued, and had prescribed the proper remedies. After they had left the house the sick man called his son and said, 'My little boy, I am very ill, and I wish you to take that paper on the stand and run to the apothecary's shop, and get me the medicine written on it!'

The apothecary's shop was about half a mile off, and the little fellow set off briskly on his errand, as he had often done before.

He found the shop shut, the apothecary having gone to his house which was a short distance beyond. Had the little boy done his duty he would have hastened there, and made known his business; but feeling somewhat weary he returned to his sick father without the medicine. As soon as he entered the room he saw that the poor sufferer was in great agony, and the disobedient child felt self-condemned when his father said, 'I hope my little boy has brought me the medicine, for I am in dreadful pain!'

The boy hung his head and muttered out a lie: 'No, sir, the apothecary has got none!'

'Has got none! Is this possible?' asked the sick man. He cast a keen glance on his son, and suspecting that he had told him a falsehood, he said, with a deep sigh, 'My little boy will see his father suffer great pain for the want of that medicine!'

The boy rushed out of the room and cried bitterly, but he was soon called back. He found the whole family standing around the bed, and the dying father about to give his parting counsels.

Speaking to each in turn, he came at last to the little disobedient boy, the youngest of them all. 'The sick man laid his trembling hand upon his head, and gently reminded him that in a few hours he would have no father. 'You must make God your father, my dear boy,' he said, 'and love and obey Him, and always tell the truth.'

The child felt so guilty and so wretched that he could not look his father in the face, but sobbing aloud he rushed from the bedside, and wished, in the agony of remorse, that he could die. How much he would have given, at that moment, if he had not so cruelly disobeyed his dying father! He crept back to the room again and heard the minister praying by the sick-bed. Snatching up his hat, he ran with all speed to the apothecary's and got the medicine, and, returning with equal haste, he was rushing in with it to give it to his father, when some one caught him by the arm and whispered, 'He is dead!'

The boy was stupefied and confounded. When he was somewhat recovered he gazed upon the pale, cold face of his dear father, and his soul was pierced with acutest agony as he recalled the words, 'My little boy will see his father suffer great pain for want of that medicine!'

In a day or two after the father's remains were laid in the grave. Some of those who attended the funeral, observing how much distressed the youngest child was, did their best to comfort him. The more kindly, however, that they spoke to him, the more deeply did he feel his own wickedness in having treated his dying parent with such cruelty.

Twelve years later, when the little boy had grown to be a stout lad of eighteen, and was a student in college, he visited his father's grave. As he read the inscription on the humble tombstone, the pale, reproachful face rose up before his mind's eye, and he thought he would be willing to give worlds, if he had them, to have been able to make his father, then in paradise, hear his piteous lament, while he craved his forgiveness.

Whenever any of you are disposed to be disobedient to your parents, think of this touching story, and take warning by it.—JOHN N. NORTON, Milk and Honey, p. 208.

ECCLESIASTES

A THREEFOLD CORD

‘A threefold cord is not quickly broken.’—ECCLESIASTES IV. 12.

SOME people cry at the word ‘broken,’ and there are some things which, when they are broken, it would almost, if it were possible, make an angel cry.

There is a very sad account about some things being broken in the eleventh chapter of Zechariah, but before we look at it I will tell you something about it, and then you will understand it better.

There were the people of Israel and the people of Judah, and they loved God; and when they loved God they loved one another too. And one day the prophet Zechariah took two sticks, and he called one stick ‘Beauty,’ and he called the other stick ‘Bands’; and he said the stick ‘Beauty’ meant that Israel and Judah loved God; and the stick ‘Bands’ meant that Judah loved Israel, and Israel loved Judah; and when the people of Israel and Judah did not love God, then the prophet broke the stick ‘Beauty’; as soon as that was broken, and they did not love God any more, then Israel did not love Judah, and Judah did not love Israel.

Now look at Zechariah xi. 7, ‘And I took unto me two staves (i.e. two sticks): the one I called Beauty, and the other I called Bands’. Now look at the tenth verse, ‘And I took my staff, even Beauty, and cut it asunder, that I might break my covenant which I had made with all the people’. Then look at the fourteenth verse: ‘Then I cut asunder mine other staff, even Bands, that I might break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel’.

Do you understand it? The stick ‘Beauty’ showed that Israel and Judah loved God, and the stick ‘Bands’ showed that they loved one another; so when the stick ‘Beauty’ was broken, then ‘Bands’ was also broken. There were three beings: God, Israel, and Judah. When Judah and Israel loved God it was all right; but as soon as stick ‘Beauty’ was broken, ‘Bands’ was broken. But ‘a threefold cord is not quickly broken’.

Now we will see a little more about that. We say, ‘Three times one are three’; but in the Bible three times one are more than three. I mean this. Three together are more than three separate ones. If you were to take three little separate threads and pull them, they would not be nearly so strong as if you were to put them together and make them one. They would be stronger together than separate. ‘A threefold cord’—three things all plaited together—twined into one another—‘is not quickly broken’.

I. I wonder what it means. ‘A threefold cord!’ Do you understand, do you think you quite understand that word ‘Trinity’? Will you think? ‘Trinity’ means that there are three persons who make the one great God. We can all say that; I wonder who understands it? No one, no one in the world understands it. We say it, we believe it; because it is in the Bible. We cannot understand it.

A great many years ago, in the fourth century after Christ, there was a very good and wise man, and he was very much troubled because he could not understand about God—how there could be three persons, and they make one God; and he was very much distressed about it: and they tell this story about him. It is a fable. When his mind was very much distressed because he could not understand about God, he one day went down to the seashore; and by the seaside he saw an angel, and the angel was emptying the sea into a little shell—taking up the sea and pouring it into a shell. ‘What are you doing?’ said the man to the angel. ‘I am emptying the sea into the shell,’ was the reply. The man smiled—‘What! emptying the sea into a shell!’ ‘Oh, yes,’ said the angel, ‘that is easy work compared with what you are trying to do, for you are trying to get the great God into your little mind.’

Therefore we cannot so easily understand about ‘the Trinity,’ as we could put the sea into a little shell; and that would be an impossibility. I wish you to be very attentive for this is very important. Some people say it is very difficult; but I do not think it is. Do try. It is very solemn what I am going to say.

You know there is God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, and those three are the one God. If anybody were to ask you how many Gods there are you must not say three, that would not be right, but one; and in that one God there is God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost.

God the Father loved us: He always loved us: He loves us now: I cannot tell you how much God loves us! and He wanted us all to come to Him and be happy, and live with Him for ever. But do you know between us and God there was a great mountain—so that we could not come to God—and that mountain was made up of all sins—our sins!

God the Son said, ‘I am going to take away that mountain’. So He came down from heaven to take that mountain—the mountain of the sins of all the world. Oh, it was such a weight! When it was upon Him it made the blood come out through His pores. It made Him sweat blood. That great mountain was such a load, and He carried it all away that we might all come to God when the mountain was gone.

And did we then come to God? Oh, no; we did not wish to come—we had not in our hearts to come to Him. Then the Holy Ghost said, 'I will go and make them willing'. So the Holy Ghost came, and He put it into our hearts to wish to come to God, and to make us able to come to God, and teach us how to come to God. And then—when the Holy Ghost put it into our hearts to be willing to come, and the mountain was removed—then we were willing to come.

And were we then fit to come to God? No, not at all. So Jesus Christ said, 'I will make them fit'. So He put upon every one of us the robe of His righteousness—beautiful robe! more beautiful than any wedding robe—and made us fit to come to God. Then we could come.

When Jesus had removed the mountain, and the Holy Ghost had made us willing, and Jesus Christ had put on us the robe, then we could come to God and be happy for ever. So God gave us to Christ and He washed us from our sins, and the Holy Ghost made us willing and then gave us back to Christ to be clothed, and Christ gave us back to the Father.

That is 'the Trinity'. That is what God the Father does; what God the Son does; what God the Holy Ghost does. Do you understand that? Do try. It is so beautiful—so comforting. How we are saved—how it is all done—how the Trinity does it—God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost.

Now I will tell you another thing about God. Do listen. Sometimes it happens with us that persons do not know what they ought to do; and sometimes persons know what they ought to do, but they cannot do it, they have not the power to do it; and some persons know, but have not the will. Now God has all three. God has infinite knowledge—He knows everything; and infinite power—He can do everything; and infinite love—He wills everything. Now there is 'a threefold cord'—God's wisdom—God's power—God's love; and these hold us on to the throne of God in heaven. If one of these 'cords' were 'broken' no one could be saved. If God were not infinitely wise—strong—loving—nobody could be saved; but God's wisdom, God's power, and God's love make the 'threefold cord'.

Now just look at the tenth of John and the twenty-ninth verse. What fasten you so strongly to God? God's wisdom, God's power, God's love. 'None shall pluck them out of My Father's hand.' Why? because we are tied so fast—God's wisdom, God's power, God's love are the 'threefold cord' that fastens us to the throne of God.

II. And now I will not speak any more about 'the Trinity,' but now I am going to speak to you about other 'threefold cords,' and I think I can tell you about some 'threefold cords' for you. And, first, about one I wish you to have in your bedroom, before you come downstairs in the morning, or go to bed at night. I am going to give you 'a threefold cord' in your bedroom; and then a 'threefold cord' when you come downstairs.

First, 'a threefold cord' in your bedroom. What do you think it is? Can you think about it? Nobody should come downstairs till he has this 'threefold cord'; and it is this: a promise—a prayer—and something to do.

I will tell you how I mean. Now I am preaching and you are listening—let us see if we can find about that (about teaching, being taught) a promise, a prayer, and a duty—making 'a threefold cord' which we must join together, plait together, and make it strong. Now there is the promise—Jesus Christ said in the fourteenth of John that the Holy Spirit should 'teach us all things'. There is a promise—we shall all be taught. Look at Psalm xxv. 4—there is a beautiful prayer, we should all ask God to teach us, 'Show me Thy ways, O Lord; teach me Thy paths'. Then look at Psalm xxxiv. 11, 'Come, ye children, hearken unto Me; I will teach you the fear of the Lord'. So there I have the promise that God will teach us all, the prayer to Him to do so, and the duty—hearken, be attentive, listen. We must put the three together. The promise is of no use without the prayer, or the prayer without the duty; but if we string them altogether, very tight—have the prayer, the promise, and the duty—then it will be 'a threefold cord,' which 'cannot be quickly broken'.

There was a little girl, and as she was going along the street, I am sorry to tell you, she met with a very bad accident, for there were some boys flinging stones and one went into her eye and hurt her very dreadfully. She had to be carried home; her father sent for a surgeon who said she must undergo a dreadful operation. She sat on her father's knee, and he asked her if she was ready to submit to the operation. 'Not quite, father,' she replied; 'I should like to wait a minute; I have not prayed to God yet.' This was her prayer, 'O God, forgive the little boy who hurt me, and help me to bear the pain well, and may Jesus be with me'. She then said, 'Father, I am ready now'; and she bore it without a cry, and so patient was she that all the people who stood by said, 'How God can help a little girl to bear pain!' See what the grace of God can do! Now there was a 'threefold cord' which that little girl had—she prayed to God, she rested on the promise, she obeyed a commandment. So she was strong in her 'threefold cord,' and could bear pain without murmuring.

I will tell you about another little girl. There was a gentleman who lived in Austria, who did not love God or the Bible, in fact he did not believe the Scriptures. One day he was walking out, and he saw standing in the front of a little cottage upon the door-step a little girl, and she was reading her Bible, and tears were rolling down her cheeks. The gentleman went up to her, and said very kindly, 'My dear, what is the matter? Are you unhappy? What do you cry for?' She said, 'I am not at all unhappy, sir; I am very happy'. 'But you are crying,' he said. 'Oh, they are not tears of sorrow,' she replied, 'but of joy. I am very happy.' 'What makes you so happy?' 'Oh, I have been reading about Jesus Christ, and it makes me so happy to read about Him, because He is so kind to me.' The gentleman said, 'But Jesus Christ is dead.' She said, 'Oh, no, sir; He is not dead, He lives up in heaven, and He loves me so much.' And he said, 'If Jesus Christ loves you, why have you such poor clothes, because He could send you money to buy better ones?' She said, 'I care not about money, He makes me happy, and I'm going to Him when I die.' He said, 'I suppose some one has told you that?' 'No, sir; this book tells me—and it's all true, and it makes me so glad.' And he said, 'How do you know it is true?' She said, 'Oh, I know it is true—it's all true; indeed it's all true; and it makes me so glad and happy, it must be true'. That was the little girl's way of reasoning. 'It must be true, because it makes me so happy.'

Do you know the gentleman could not forget it. He went away and thought, 'This Bible makes that little girl so happy. I do not feel it. Perhaps if I go to church I shall feel it too.' And he went to church, and he did begin to feel it, and that gentleman became a very holy minister; and he used to go then, and say to others, just as that little girl said to him, 'I know it's all true in the Bible, because it makes me so happy. God promises it, and God does it—I am sure it's all true.' It was 'the threefold cord,' and it could not be 'broken'—promises, and duties.

Will you never go downstairs (unless you are called), never leave your bedroom in the morning, till you have your 'cord'? and take care you have the three 'cords' of it well plaited together—a promise, a prayer, and something to do: don't begin to do anything without the prayer and the promise, but twine them altogether, and 'a threefold cord' will last you all the day.

III. Now we'll come downstairs and I will give you 'a threefold cord'. I look at you, and I think—what are you made of? You have a body—that we can see; and inside your body you have a soul; and inside your soul I hope and believe you have God's Spirit. Then you are body, soul, and spirit. Now I have my three threads. I am going to make a 'cord'. The Spirit must rule the soul, and the soul must rule the body. I know some boys and girls where the body rules the soul. That is not the way to plait it; but the spirit must rule the soul, and the soul must rule the body. If it is so, then your 'threefold cord' is right. Every one of you have body, soul, and spirit—all tied together—so that the spirit should rule the soul, and the soul rule the body.

Now, having these, I must tell you that there are three things we have to do every day. Just think what they are. The first thing is, we have to take care of our own souls—to wash them: do you know how? To keep them: do you know how? To keep them: do you know how? Wash your souls in the right fountain; dress them in the right garment; keep them in the right way.

Now, recollect these. We have to be happy. There are two heaps in the world—a heap of trouble and a heap of happiness. Never think a day has been well spent unless you have decreased the heap of trouble, and increased the heap of joy. Take some, if even a very little bit, off the heap of trouble, and add it to the heap of joy. We have to do good to others, to be useful; and one other thing we have to do is to glorify God; to honour God. A very little child can honour God. A baby can honour God. Whenever a person conquers himself, or herself, God is honoured. We have three things to do—to take care of our own souls, to be useful to those about us, and to glorify God, then we have a 'threefold cord' which is 'not quickly broken'.

Now I will tell you about a sailor boy who, I think, did it. A ship called the 'Cornelia' was on her way to the West Indies, and as she crossed the Atlantic she encountered several severe storms. A gentleman on board relates that during one storm he was standing on deck by the mate of the ship; the sea was boiling, the ship tossing dreadfully, when some rigging on the top of the mainmast was misplaced. The mate saw the danger in a moment; he called a boy from the forepart of the ship: the boy stood before him with his cap in his hand. 'Go up to the royals and right that rigging.' The boy looked a moment; he knew the danger; the ship was pitching dreadfully; but he saw the mate meant what he said; and he bolted off, ran forward, pitched down the fore-castle, disappeared a minute, then came out again; mounted the rigging like a squirrel; was about fifteen minutes putting it to rights; when he had done it, down he came, drew himself straight upright, not ashamed to see anybody. The mate patted him on the head, and said nothing.

Presently the gentleman spoke to him. 'My boy, why did you hesitate when the mate told you to go up, and why did you go down the fore-castle?' The boy replied, 'I thought it would be no harm if for one minute I asked God to take care of me; and I just said a prayer'. 'Who told you to do that?' said the gentleman. 'My mother told me it would be no time lost to pray to God.' The gentleman said, 'I thought I saw something in your pocket—what was it?' 'My Bible, sir; I thought I should be safer if I had my Bible in my pocket. I thought if tossed into the sea, I should like my Bible with me. I had no fear while I had my Bible with me; and could pray to God; and therefore I did it, sir.' He had something stronger than the ropes of the rigging—something greater than man's grasp, hadn't he? He had 'a threefold cord'—just what he ought to have: he had the spirit ruling his soul, and his soul ruling his body—true courage! and he had God's word. 'A threefold cord.' He was himself serving God; he was doing good to his fellow-creatures, and honouring God by the way in which he did it.

Now I'm going to tell you another 'threefold cord'. Sometimes boys and girls make great friendships one with another; girls make great friendships, but their friendships don't last very long: and why? because it was a twofold cord, and not a 'threefold'.

If you were to go to Portsmouth (I know it was so some years ago, I am not sure whether it is so now, I think it is), in the dockyards, where they make the queen's ropes, you would see a little red thread running along the centre of the rope: the rope is made like any other rope, with the exception of a red thread—which marks a royal cable. Always have a little red thread—showing your royalty—that you love the King of kings, the Son of God—Jesus Christ. It is a good colour—red: and it is the red blood of Christ that makes everything good. Therefore take care there is Christ in your 'cords'. Let Christ be the third party. When boys with boys make friendships, let Christ be in the friendships. When people marry, let Christ be in the marriage. If Christ is not there it will split or break, it will not hold; but if Christ be there, 'a threefold cord is not quickly broken'.

Once more, the greatest of all: there is the 'threefold cord' of real life. What is real life? To live for evermore. And how are we to live for evermore? to be happy for evermore?

I will tell you. There was a little boy, eleven years old; he was dying: a minister went to see him; he was looking very pale and weak. He said to him, 'My dear boy, you look very weary'. The little boy said, 'I trust Jesus—I love Jesus—I am going to follow Jesus. Jesus loves me—I love Jesus, I am strong in Jesus.' Harken to that little voice: see that 'threefold cord'—'I trust Jesus—I love Jesus—I am following Jesus'. Therefore he said, 'I am strong'—for he had the 'threefold cord'. This is the 'cord' of eternal life. To trust Jesus—that is life in Jesus; to love Jesus—that is life with Jesus; to follow Jesus, that is life to Jesus: and life in Jesus, and life with Jesus, and life to Jesus is the 'threefold cord' which shall hold on to life for evermore; nothing shall ever rend it. If you have got that 'cord,' you will never die.

Now in this rough life you want a good anchor—you have it—it is the Lord Jesus Christ: but the anchor must have good cable—let it be the 'threefold cord'—'I trust Jesus, I love Jesus, I follow Jesus,' and 'a threefold cord is not quickly broken'.—JAMES VAUGHAN.

THE BLUE-BELL (HYACINTH)

'A good name is better than precious ointment.'—ECCLESIASTES VII. 1.

BLUE-BELL, a good name—matches the flower—we like the flower and so we like the name. Why do we like the flower?

I. Not because of the Name.—Blue, i.e. really the colour made by a blow—and Bell, much the same as bellow, the noise a beast makes when you give him a blow. So the name, by itself, may mean no more than 'Cry out when you're hurt'; very sensible advice, but as commonplace as sensible. The flower makes the name good, not the name the flower. Judas (Praise) had a good name, but it did not make him a good man. Our Lord's mother was called 'Mary,' she made the name good, though it meant bitterness.

II. Not the Family History.—Botanists call our blue-bell 'the hyacinth without writing'. Some people prize their name because it tells of noble ancestry. In this case rather a sad name than a good name. [Tell the story. Apollo and Zephyr both wanted to have Hyacinth, a pretty boy, for their own special friend. Hyacinth liked Apollo best. So one day, when they were all playing at quoits, Zephyr, in a fit of jealousy, blew Apollo's quoit aside so that it hit and killed Hyacinth. Flowers said to have sprung up out of his blood, and on the leaves strange letters which meant woe! woe!] A child's character need not be spoiled though his father's memory is written with sad records!

III. Not because of its Relations.—Squills—Garlic, etc., all belong to the same family. Judged by them any of their relations would hardly be admitted into respectable society. Apply to the case of children with disreputable connections—we must not let the misconduct of their friends prejudice us against receiving them.

IV. Because of its own Character.—How beautiful it is! How gain such beauty? Instead of displaying its leaves when young it makes a bulb and saves up its strength—so is able to put forth and nourish the flower. If we want a good name, let us work for it when young that we may win it.—C. A. GOODHART, Hints and Outlines for Children's Services, p. 89.

THOROUGH

'Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might.'—ECCLESIASTES IX. 10.

THAT means, does it not, that whatever you have got to do you should do it at once? You should.

There is a great big word you may have heard—may have heard others use it, but I fancy it is too big for your size. It is the word pro-cras-ti-na-tion! Do you know what it means? It means the lazy man's hard-working day. For procrastination means putting off till to-morrow, and to-morrow is always the lazy man's day for hard work. He always intends doing something great to-morrow, and when to-morrow comes he finds he meant the to-morrow after that, and the one after it, and so on; it is always to-morrow. A right man's work-day is always now; when a thing should be done, it is there and then he does it. Learn to do the same. Procrastination is like the rainbow—it is always just a little way ahead, but then nobody has ever been able to come up with it; and if you get into the habit of putting off and putting off, you will find that things also get into the habit of going off and going off, so that you will never be able to get right hold of them. Whatever your hand finds to do, do it forthwith.

But doesn't the text also mean this: Whenever you have anything to do, begin with the part that is nearest you?

When you have a skein of silk that has got all in a tangle, and you want to straighten it out, there are two ways you can do it. You can do it by turning the skein over and over, and looking at it in and out till you have got hold of the proper end of the thread; but if you do that you will often lose as much time as would have straightened out most of it. The other way is the best way; begin anywhere, begin with the part that is nearest you. Get that out of the loop next it; you will find it easier to get it out of the next and the next; and so you will go on till by and by the right end will come to your fingers, and come as if it was ashamed for being so long a-coming. Meanwhile half your work is done!

And it is the same with everything. Have you lessons to learn? It does not matter very much with which you begin, so that you do begin. Have you a lot of things to do? Well, they may look tangled a bit, but what is the best way to deal with a tangle? It is by beginning with what is nearest, and the rest will soon get straight. Get a beginning anyhow, and go on at once.

To help you to do that, I want you to think of this: that which you ought to do is very sacred.

Don't you wonder sometimes why you were born at this time, and not a thousand years ago, or a thousand years to come? And don't you wonder sometimes why you were born in such a place, instead of ten thousand miles away from it? and often wonder too why you should be living here, and going to school here, and making acquaintances here, instead of living away where the sun sets or the wild jungles are? These things are all wonderful, but do they not show that God has got a hand in it all? God wants you to do something now, and where you are, and as you are, or else He would have created you at another time and put you in another place. And how can we know what God wants of us except by what He lays to our hands to do? Whenever there is anything we ought to do, we may be sure God's hand is just on the other side of it, and therefore it is very sacred. It may seem very trifling in itself, but if it is what we ought to do, it will be found at last to have been very important.

Take one instance. About the beginning of the year 1885 England was very nearly going to war with Russia. Oh! that would have been a big, big war if it had broken out! It would have been like burning oil upon water, nobody could guess where the flames would spread to; and who do you think helped to rouse up the angry feelings of this country? It was a man and a boy away in the great deserts of Persia. For the telegraph wire that should have carried to us quickly the news which would make us decide for peace or war, was a wire that stretched across these deserts from Meshed to Teheran, and in many places the wire got slack, and camels and sheep and oxen strayed over it and sometimes broke it; and when it was found to be broken a man and a boy were sent off to have it mended. But they were in no hurry; they didn't do what they had to do with all their might; they took their leisure, chatting with friends and enjoying themselves, and so were two or three days doing what could have been done in a few hours; and all this time angry people in the House of Commons were demanding why we had not got news, and were hinting very unpleasantly about people wilfully keeping back information; yet the delay was owing to the man and the boy who thought there was no need for being in a hurry about mending a mere wire! They knew nothing about the messages the wire was to carry; they knew nothing about the House of Commons. I don't believe they had ever heard of the Lord Mayor even! but yet through their carelessness about doing what was waiting to be done, they were nearly plunging this nation into a great and terrible war! Learn to look on whatever you have to do as something sacred, just because it is what you ought to do, and therefore God's hand is on the other side of it. There is nothing really trifling in the world; one thing is joined to another; whatever ought to be done, do it well and promptly.

And do it with your might.

There are some children who never think they are doing anything with their might unless they are doing it with a great deal of fuss and noise and roughness. That is not might, that is weakness; true strength bridle itself and works quietly. One day a ship got aground on the river. A big tug-boat was sent for, and was fastened to the ship, and tugged and tugged, and churned the water with its paddles; but the ship would not move. They then tried another tug-boat, not nearly so large as the first; and round went its paddles, and the rope was strained more and more, and at last the ship was seen to move, and was soon floating down the river after the little tug-boat. Why could the little tug-boat do what the big tug-boat could not? Because the big tug was wasting its steam, letting a great deal escape by the side-holes; but the little tug didn't waste an ounce of steam, it knew how to use it all, and so worked with a quiet might. Learn you to do the same; whatever you have to do, do it with your might; and that does not mean noise and clatter, it means quiet, determined earnestness. If you have to play, play heartily; if you have to work, work with your heart in what you have to do.—J. REID HOWATT, The Churchette, p. 187.

FLIES

'Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to smell badly; so doth a little mischief mar a whole life.'—ECCLESIASTES X. 1.

This is the fly season; wherever you are you have some fly or another with its ten thousand eyes upon you. They are the commonest of creatures, indeed too common—if flies will forgive the remark! And yet, although they are so common, there are certain questions about a fly which you would find difficult to answer. How does a fly walk on the ceiling? Why do you so often find dead flies on the window-panes? Why do some flies buzz and others not buzz? Can flies see in the dark? When you try to catch them, why is it they see your hand so quickly? What do they eat? Are little flies children of the big flies?

You know the fly belongs to the largest family in the world—Insects. Insects are so called because they look as if they were 'cut into,' as it were. They have no neck to speak of; they are in three parts, just held together by a thread, first the head by itself, then the chest with the six legs, and then the rest of the body. When a fly is born a fly, he is born full-grown; and he never grows any more! 'Oh!' you say, 'that is strange.' But no more strange than that some full-grown people should be bigger than other full-grown people. A fly has babies, but they are not at all like their parents—not a bit! So that not even the greatest flatterer could say, 'How like his father!' Like a moth or daddy-long-legs the fly lays eggs which hatch out into small worms, very much like those little grubs that you see in cheese and in nuts. Indeed cheese-mites are first cousins to the tiny fly-grubs. Their great business is to eat and grow; and they grow so fast, and eat so much that at last their coats are too small for them. When your coat is too small, your mother puts the buttons forward a little; the fly's mother cannot do that. So when he has eaten too much the only thing is for him to stop eating. And inside his coat there is a larger coat, all crinkly and folded up. Then the old coat cracks off and the new coat remains; but it is many sizes too big for him! So he blows it out with air, which he sucks in through his tubes; and then he goes to sleep again.

But the most wonderful changes are going on, until at last one day in the sunshine out comes a fly. How does it get out? When you open a matchbox you touch the spring and open flies the box. Only he is inside, and like a chicken in the egg he hammers away with his head until out he comes. Then he unpacks his trunk and his six legs and his feelers and wings, and off he flies. And he is just as big then as on the day of his death. Live he ever so long he will never grow.

Flies are very light, for they have air-bags underneath their stomachs. And they buzz and paddle about in the air very quickly, their wings beating 600 times to a second. A fly can beat a race-horse. A fly, I suppose, talks, just as an ant talks! He has the same sort of feelers as an ant has; and ants, when they meet in the road, very often cross their feelers and talk to one another. I should very much like to hear what an ant says, but we have not discovered the cipher of their language yet! We shall find the 'Rosetta-stone' of that one day, I dare say. Every now and then you see flies buzzing around one another and stopping for a chat in the air. What do they talk about?

Do you know what the trunk of a fly is? It is a long thin tube for sucking up juices, for flies eat up things that are going rotten. Do you know where the fly's eyes are? Three of them are on the top of the head, but his whole head is one mass of eyes, so that the fly can look at once nearly all round. I cannot describe it: you must look for yourself through a microscope, and at the same time you should look at the fly's foot; it has claws which fit into the smallest crevices, and two pads covered with long hairs, and each hair has sticky fluid on it. So it is that a fly can walk on the ceiling upside down.

I heard the other day one little child say to another, 'You haven't the heart of a fly, or you would not do that'. I thought to myself, that is rather unfair to a fly, because a fly has a very big heart, for a fly. A heart that reaches all over his body, from end to end; and a plucky little creature a fly is.

I am always very sorry for flies, though I cannot say that I love them: for I am glad that as we get cleaner in our habits and in our houses, the flies get scarcer. Why? Because fly's eggs are laid in dirt: and wherever there are many flies there is sure to be much dirt. Thirty years ago there were many more flies than now. But I am always very sorry for flies, because in the autumn they die of a terrible disease. I don't mean the spiders. When we come down in the morning and look at the window-panes, we say, 'Ah! there are six dead flies on the window-panes'. And there is a kind of white stuff about them adhering to the glass. A few years ago in France they found that the silkworms were dying of a terrible disease, and they sent men into the district to find out about it. And those men were so clever that they stopped the disease. It was very much the same disease that a fly dies of. But there is no M. Pasteur to look into the illnesses of flies, still less to cure them. A mould eats into them, eats them hollow, so that only the case is left. A fly weighs very little, a couple of thousand of them go to an ounce; but a dead fly is pathetically lighter still. The wise man of olden days said that dead flies in the sweetest perfume will cause it to rot and smell horribly. And, said he, in exactly the same way, one foolish deed will work mischief throughout a whole life. How many sad stories of men's lives there are which can be summed up in those sad lines of the poet:—

The little rift within the lute

That by and by will make the music mute.

Be careful to keep your life sweet and clean. One meanness, one falsehood may mar so much. The Crimean War, with all its fearful pain and trouble, arose from a miserable quarrel whether a Greek priest or a Latin priest should keep the key of the door of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem. So much harm is made by one 'dead fly in the ointment,' one bad thing that gets into the mind and heart, and stays there.—BERNARD J. SNELL, The Good God, p. 95.

THE WARNING NOT TO FORGET GOD

'Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth.'—
ECCLESIASTES XII. 1.

I. In the First Place, we ought to Mind this Warning for 'The Lord's Sake'.—Our first illustration may be called—minding God.

'I wish I could mind God as my little dog minds me,' said a little boy, looking thoughtfully at his shaggy friend; 'he always seems so pleased to mind, and I don't.'

That little dog obeyed his young master for his master's sake. He really loved him, and tried to show his love by the cheerful, ready way in which he obeyed him. This was the right thing for him to do; and it is just what God expects us to do. When He says, 'Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth,' He means that we should do this for His sake, to show our love to Him; just as that little dog showed his love to his master, by doing gladly and cheerfully whatsoever he told him to do.

Our next illustration may be called—the one gift.

There is one gift which we may all make to God, and which He will value more than anything else we can possibly offer to Him. It is that to which He refers when He says, 'My son, give me thine heart'. If we had millions of money, and we should offer it all to God, it would be worth nothing to Him, unless we first gave Him our hearts.

A little Sabbath school girl brought a present to her teacher of a bouquet of beautiful flowers.

'And why do you bring me these?' asked her teacher.

'Because I love you,' was her quick reply.

'And do you bring anything to Jesus?' asked the teacher.

'Oh, yes,' was her reply, 'I have given my heart to Jesus.' That was a beautiful answer. And that is just what Jesus expects each one of us to do. He wants us to remember Him in our youth, and to give Him our hearts, as this little girl had done. And He wants us to do this for His own sake, and out of love to Him. And then everything we do for Him, and everything we give to Him, will be pleasing and acceptable to Him.

II. The Second Reason why we should do this is 'For Our Own Sake.'—When we really begin to remember God and to keep His commandments God says to each of us, as He said to the Israelites in old times, 'From this day will I bless you'. And God's blessing is worth more to us than all the world beside. If the wealth of all the rich men in the world were ours, it would do us no good without God's blessing. But that blessing can make us happy, without any of the gold and silver which men prize so much. When the good poet Cowper was speaking on this point, he looked up to his God and Saviour and said:—

Give what Thou wilt, without Thee we are poor,
But with Thee rich, take what Thou wilt away.

And this is true. If we only have God with us, He can supply the place of all other things; but there is nothing else that can supply His place. And so we see how important it is for our own sakes that we should 'remember our Creator in the days of our youth'. Our peace, our safety, our usefulness, our happiness, our everything, depends upon it.

Now let us look at some illustrations of this part of our subject. The first incident shows us the evil that must follow, if we do not remember our Creator, when He calls upon us to do so. We may call it—not yet.

'Remember now thy Creator' was once said to a little boy.

'Not yet,' said the boy, as he busied himself with his bat and ball; 'when I grow older I will think about it.'

The little boy grew to be a young man.

'Remember now thy Creator,' his conscience said to him.

'Not yet,' said the young man; 'I am now about to begin my trade; when I see my business prosper, I shall have more time than I can command now.'

His business did prosper.

'Remember now thy Creator,' conscience whispered to him.

'Not yet,' said the man of business; 'my children must now have my care; when they are settled in life I shall be better able to attend to the claims of religion.'

He lived to be a grey-headed old man.

'Remember now thy Creator,' was the voice which conscience once more addressed to him.

'Not yet,' was still his cry; 'I shall soon retire from business, and then I shall have nothing else to do but read and pray.'

Soon after this he died without becoming a Christian. He put off to another time what he should have attended to when young, and that caused the loss of his soul. Those two little words—Not yet—were his ruin.

Our next story may be called Jessie's six cents.

Some time ago a pale-faced little girl walked hastily into a book-store in Boston, and said to the man who was serving at the counter:—

'Please, sir, I want a book that's got "Suffer little children to come unto Me," in it, and how much is it, sir? and I am in a great hurry.'

The shopkeeper looked kindly at her for a moment, and said, 'Well, suppose I haven't got the book you want, what then, my dear?'

'Oh, sir, I shall be very sorry; I want it so much,' and her little voice trembled at the thought of a disappointment.

The kind shopkeeper took her little hand in his, and said, 'Will you be so very sad without the book, and why are you in such a hurry?'

'Well, sir, you see, I went to Sunday school one Sunday, when Mrs. West, who takes care of me, was away; and the teacher read about a Good Shepherd, who spoke those words; and I want to go where He is. I'm so tired of being where there's nobody to care for a little girl like me, only Mrs. West, who is always saying I'd better be dead than alive.'

'But why are you in such a hurry?' asked the bookseller.

'Why, you see, sir, my cough is getting bad, and I want to know all about this "Good Shepherd" before I die; it would be so strange to see Him in heaven and not know Him. Besides, sir, if Mrs. West knew I was here, she'd take away the six cents I've saved by running errands, to buy the book, so I'm in a hurry to get served.'

This touched the bookseller's heart very much, and filled his eyes with tears. Then he took off his spectacles and wiped them; and lifting a book down from the shelf, he said, 'I'll find the words you want, my dear child; come and listen while I read them'. Then he turned to the fifteenth verse of the eighteenth chapter of St. Luke, and read these words: 'But Jesus called them'—i.e. the infants—'unto Him, and said, "Suffer little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God"'. Then the good man told how this blessed Saviour has prepared a glorious home in heaven—a home of rest, and peace, and joy, and happiness, and where He will take all who love and serve Him to live with Him for ever.

'Oh! how lovely that is!' exclaimed the dear child in her eagerness. 'He says "Come". I'll go to Him. How long do you think it will be, sir, before I shall see Him?'

'Not long, perhaps,' said the bookseller, turning aside his head, and wiping away the tears. 'You may keep your six cents, and come here every day, and I will read to you more about this good Friend and Saviour of little children.'

Then she thanked him very heartily and hurried away. The next day came, and another, and another, but that little girl never returned to hear about Jesus.

One day, about two weeks after this, a coarse-looking woman, with a loud voice, ran into the book-store, saying, 'Jessie's dead! She died talking about the Good Shepherd, and she said you was to have these six cents for the mission box at school. And as I don't like to keep dead people's money, here it is.' And throwing the money down on the counter, she ran out of the shop.

The six cents went into the missionary box, and when the story of Jessie was told, so many people followed her example in making offerings to the good cause, that by the end of the year, 'Jessie's cents,' as they were called, were found sufficient to send out a missionary to China, to help in bringing lost sheep to the Good Shepherd.

Here we see how Jessie remembered her Creator, as soon as she heard of Him. And it was for her own sake she did it. She had no friend, no help, no comfort in the world, but she found everything she needed in Jesus. She never said, 'Not yet,' like the last person spoken of. But as soon as she heard of Jesus, she said 'Now'—and came to Him at once. And this has made her happy for ever.

III. And then there is a Third Reason why we should Mind the Warning of the Text, or 'Remember our Creator in the Days of our Youth,' and that is 'For the Sake of Others.'—God's promise to Abraham, when he began to serve Him, was that he should be a blessing. And God says the same thing to all His people. When Jesus was on earth we are told that 'He went about doing good'. And He desires that all who love and serve Him, should follow His example in this respect, and 'tread in the blessed steps of His most holy life'. And in doing this, we can make ourselves real blessings to those who are about us. We can help to lead them to Jesus, if they do not know Him already. And if they do know Him, we can speak words of comfort and encouragement to them. And not only by our words, but by our actions, and by our prayers, we may be doing good, all the time, to those about us.

When Joseph lived in the house of Potiphar, in Egypt, God blessed all that household for his sake. And when David, the King of Israel, came back from one of his warlike expeditions, we read that 'he returned to bless his household'. And this will be the case with us if we 'remember our Creator in the days of our youth,' and become real earnest Christians. Then we shall be blessings wherever we go. Let us look now at an illustration of the way in which this may be done.

Grandpa was sick, and little Fannie loved to be with him, and to read to him. She would sit down by his bedside and say, 'Shall I read my story, grandpa?'

And the story to which she referred was that in the New Testament, which begins with 'Now when Jesus was born in Bethlehem, there came wise men from the east to Jerusalem'. She called it 'my story,' because she liked it so much, and she never got tired of reading it. One day, when she had finished reading, she said:—

'Grandpa, you are a wise man, but you didn't have to take a long journey to find Jesus, like the wise men I was reading about, did you?'

'What makes you think I didn't?' asked grandpa, with a trembling voice.

'Because, grandpa, Jesus stays right by us, all the time; so we've only got to whisper to Him, and He hears us.'

The days went on, and one evening not long after this, all the family gathered round grandpa's bed to say 'good-bye' to him before he died.

When he came to speak to little Fannie, he laid his hand gently on her head and said, 'Good-bye, my darling. When I get to heaven, the beautiful city, I will tell the blessed Saviour that you were my star.'

'Oh, grandpa, why?' asked Fannie, as the tears streamed down her cheeks.

'Because, darling, you led me to Jesus, just as the star you have often read about led the wise men to Him. And your light shone so steadily that I could not lose my way.' And here we see how remembering her Creator in the days of her youth made little Fannie a blessing to her grandpa.—RICHARD NEWTON, Bible Warnings: Addresses to Children, p. 9.

THE GOLDEN BOWL

'Or ever the golden bowl be broken.'—ECCLESIASTES XII. 6.

What does the preacher intend to represent by this golden bowl? It is perfectly clear that it is human life. God, the great Artist, made human life the noblest thing in the universe. The human type is the highest type of created being, and no higher type or pattern can ever appear. God made it in His own image. His image must be a perfect image, and therefore the copy of it in man must be as perfect as a copy can be. He made it a golden bowl of exquisite workmanship, fearfully and wonderfully framed, into which He could pour His glory. It is not the spirit alone that bears the image of God; it is the body and the spirit combined. The body is not the mere garment of the soul: it is an essential part of our humanity, moulded from within, expressing in outward form the vital activity of the soul, as the leaves and flowers express the life of a plant. Being what we are we could have no other body. Body and soul together make the individual person. It is a true union: the twain are one flesh. What an honour did God confer upon this complex human nature when He chose it for the manifestation of Himself to His creatures in the person of His Son Jesus Christ! How amazingly did He exalt it when He set the glorified humanity of our Lord at His own right hand on the everlasting throne!

I. Human life is not a golden bowl that is wonderfully fashioned in this manner only to remain empty and useless; nor is it enough merely to clean, polish, and decorate the outside of the cup; to carry the culture of the body to the fitness and completeness of the Greek standard. It is meant to be filled with God. Of all God's creatures on earth, man alone can comprehend God and hold communion with Him. The golden bowl of human nature was made for the very purpose of receiving God, and holding Him as no other receptacle can. For this purpose it has a large capacity: a wide open mouth, able to take in all heaven and all eternity. And if it was so made, then there must be a God to fill it, to justify its making. Our reason tells us that no part or organ of man was made in vain. Whatever capacities you have, there are things existing to satisfy them. There is bread for your hunger, water for your thirst, light for your eye to see with, sound for your ear to hear with. If, therefore, the soul of man longs for God, then there is a God to satisfy that longing. Because you are made for God, and because you can trust in Him and live for Him, for that very reason, if there was no other, you can believe that He is, and that He is the rewarder of all them that diligently seek Him.

II. The love of God is the greatest, most satisfying, and most lasting good in the universe. It is the first love of your nature, and you only return to it from the love of idols when you give your heart to God. That love of God is a most wonderful thing! How much is included in it! The gift of God's own Son, His life and death, resurrection and ascension, your own sorrow for sin, your own faith in Jesus Christ, your own trust in God's promises—the sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit. The golden bowl of your nature was fashioned to receive and keep all this. And it is because the love of God in Christ Jesus is so precious that the vessel has been made so precious to receive it. Nothing but a golden bowl wonderfully constructed could worthily contain such glory. You feel, therefore, with what force the great lesson which the preacher draws from it comes home to you, 'Or ever the golden bowl is broken, remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth'. Before this wonderful being of yours, so richly endowed with all these capacities of knowing God and holding high communion with Him, of turning from sin and selfishness and worldliness to serve Him with all your heart—before this wonderful complex being of yours is broken into its component parts and the wine of life spilt irrevocably upon the ground, remember your Creator. Remember Him in the days of your youth, when you are in full health and vigour and are most fitted to love and serve Him. Remember Him when the golden bowl is most beautiful, and its lustre and rich carving are undimmed by the breath of the world, and its shape is not battered by rough usage, before you have filled it with other inferior perishing things which exclude God and preoccupy your heart, and cannot truly satisfy you. Now your golden bowl is comparatively empty: the world has not yet filled it. It is fresh from the workmanship of God. You can receive now with the greatest ease the experience of His love, and you can keep it at its sweetest and best.

III. It is upon the golden bowl as it is now, as it is fashioned and used in this world, that this great future of its destiny depends. It depends upon how you use it here how you shall enjoy it hereafter. It is in this life only that the golden bowl can be filled with God's love and turned to God's service. The changes of the grave will not restore the opportunities that have been lost, will not make up for neglect and misuse now. Who knows when the golden bowl is once broken—when the body is reduced to dust and ashes, and the spirit set free from its earthly tabernacle, like the lamps of Gideon when the pitchers that contained them were broken—who knows whether in this divided state a human being is capable of receiving the grace of God that bringeth salvation? The body moulding in the dust is not the human being; the spirit in its disembodied condition is not the human being. It needs both to be united to form the human personality. It follows therefore that when they are separated there can be no more probation. Only when body, soul, and spirit exist in their present wonderful combination are you sure that you can be a golden bowl capable of receiving and loving and serving God. Before this golden bowl is broken, remember then your Creator. Let Him come into your heart and life now. And though the golden bowl be broken by death, the scent of the noble use you have made of it will cling imperishably to it when reconstructed for most enduring service in heaven.—HUGH MACMILLAN, The Spring of the Day, p. 337.

SONG OF SOLOMON

LILIES AND THORNS

'The lily among thorns.'—SONG OF SOLOMON II. 2.

THAT is hardly where you would expect to find a lily—growing among thorns. It doesn't matter what kind of a lily you think about, they are all fair and beautiful, and delicate and sweet, not at all like the bold, hard, sharp, and piercing thorns. There is no flower in all the world that is so pleasant in itself or so sweet in its perfume, as the lily of the valley. Modest and pure, it meekly hangs its slender bells and sways them gently to and fro when the warm, kind breath of the summer breathes upon them, and I think the angels must hear the music they make—music to them as precious as a prayer. Think of a gentle, sweet, modest little flower like that growing up in a coarse furze-bush or a thorny brake! Why, it is like thinking of a dove among vultures.

And there's the white lily, spotless and polished as the purest alabaster. What a stranger it looks among the black-bunched thorns! It is like a snow-white lamb among cruel sharp-toothed wolves.

Yes, but that is just what a Christian boy or Christian girl, a Christian man or a Christian woman, has to be in this world: like a 'lily among thorns'.

Let us think about this for a little.

I. Don't forget, then, how beautiful the lily is. I don't think you are likely to forget that, but I fear all of us forget too often how beautiful a Christian boy or girl is in the eyes of Jesus. You see we haven't a mirror to show us exactly what we are like as Jesus sees us. The only mirror that could show us that is Jesus Himself. For, just as you look in the mirror and see what like you are, so when we love Jesus and He loves us, as we look up to Him we see what we shall one day come to be ourselves. For every one who loves Jesus shall come to be like Him. Isn't Jesus beautiful? Ah, yes, He is very, very beautiful. He is 'the chief among ten thousand and the altogether lovely'. There is never a flower on the earth that can compare with Him for loveliness. It is the delight of all in heaven to gaze on Him, and you must make it your delight too. You may think you are very plain when you look in the glass mirror, and other people may fail to see anything very beautiful about you either; but when Jesus looks on any one who loves Him, in His eyes that one is very, very lovely indeed—with a loveliness that shall grow and grow till it comes to be like that of the King Himself in His beauty.

If you love Jesus, never forget what He thinks of you; it will help you many and many a time when you would be cast down, for it always does us good to know we are good in the eyes of those who are good. The lily is very beautiful; even Solomon in all his glory was not so glorious in the eyes of men as every Christian boy or girl is in the eyes of Jesus.

But in this world of ours these lilies of the Lord always grow among thorns. I think you are beginning now to guess what that means. Sometimes there is a very wicked family; the father swears, and the mother drinks, and the brothers and sisters are very, very sinful in all their ways; but there is one little child in that family who does love Jesus. Oh, how that little one must be like a lily among thorns! How pained that little heart must often be at what it has to see and what it has to hear! Yes, yes, it must often have to be wounded in spirit by the wickedness round about it, just as the fair and beautiful lily must often be wounded by the thorns when the wind comes shaking the bush.

II. Now let me speak about the thorns that are round about God's lilies.

Thorns don't hurt one another; oh, no! but thorns easily wound the lilies. There are people who are never troubled at all about the sinful things that are round about them; they hardly notice them, never think of them, never feel them. No; that is because they are thorns themselves, and thorns don't feel the pricking of thorns. But the lily feels it; and the more you want to love Jesus, and to keep pure, and to do the things that please Him, the more you will often feel pained and sad by the sinful things that are round you. Well, be glad that you get sad about these things. It shows that you are not a thorn; you are a lily. If you were a thorn you wouldn't feel the thorns; but because you are a lily, you do feel them, and feel them very much. Never let yourself get accustomed to sin, for the more you feel it, the more you tremble at it, the more it hurts you, the better you are keeping off it, and the fairer you will grow, like the lily.

You wouldn't think it at first, perhaps, but yet it is the case; we can learn a great deal of wisdom from the thorns. If you see a lily growing among them you will notice how it learns to twine its stem and turn its flowers this way or that, so as to get the widest and safest openings among the thorns that it can; to get most sunshine and fewest stings. And that is what we have to learn—how to live among those who don't love the Lord, and yet avoid all we can having our souls injured by them. When there is a sharp thorn just in the way of the lily, it doesn't thrust itself upon it and push against it, so as to drive away the thorn. It couldn't do that—it would only wound itself; so when it sees the thorn in its way, it quietly turns aside from it and passes it by. That is what you must learn to do. Don't answer the angry word with the angry one; a soft answer turneth away wrath, and you are better to turn it away, or to turn away from it, than let it wound you, as it would do if you tried to meet anger with anger. The meekness of the lily wins the day in the end, for it allows it to grow up beautiful, and all men love it; and Jesus says, 'Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth'. Yes, when the thorns are burnt, the lilies are kept; they are made welcome to the crown as their rightful inheritance. The lily learns how to grow among the thorns, and still keep growing like a lily, and that is what you must seek to learn too. Jesus can teach you how. He says that if anyone wants wisdom, let him ask of Him, and He will teach him. So, whenever you would know what you should do, ask Jesus.

And here is another thing you mightn't have thought about—we need the thorns sometimes to keep us right with God. Their woundings make us watchful; and we would soon grow careless about God if things didn't happen sometimes to make us remember Him.

But the thorns also keep off from us much that would do us harm. If the lily grew alone in the forest it would soon be trampled down; but when the thorns are round about it, the hardest hoofs don't care to go too near. And that is sometimes why God lets trouble come upon us. Trouble is very thorny, and we don't like it; but God knows what we need, and He sees the danger that would come upon us, and so He sends the thorns round about. The canary in the cage may think it hard that it cannot have its liberty like other birds. It doesn't know that the same cage that is shutting it in is shutting out many dangers that other birds are exposed to; for while it is in the cage it is taken care of, winter and summer it has both its food and its protection. And sometimes people who do love Jesus are cast upon beds of sickness, and the pain is like thorns to them; and they often wonder why it should be so. One day they will learn that Jesus was keeping them in a cage, as it were, in order to keep them from danger into which otherwise they would surely have fallen.

At the last the lilies are transplanted; the gardener comes and takes the beautiful flower and bears it lovingly to his own garden, but the thorns one day he cuts down. It is not easy to transplant the lilies that grow among thorns, the hand that would do it must be scratched and wounded. But that is just what the hand of Jesus has been for us—it has been wounded that we might be transplanted into the garden above. Trust that loving hand, and even among thorns, for Christ's sake, grow up as the lilies.—J. REID HOWATT, The Children's Pew, p. 141.

SPRING

(Eastertide)

'Lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone. The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come.—SONG OF SOLOMON II. 11, 12.

If we did not know that heaven will be far more beautiful than anything we can dream of here, we might almost fancy that there could be nothing more beautiful than the first burst of spring. It is one of the great blessings of living in the country to be allowed to see the wonderful beauty of God's works as the seasons come and go. But of all the seasons spring seems the fairest and the sweetest. Does it not make every one happy to say, 'Lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone. The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come'? Well, perhaps not every one; but I am very sorry for those who are not made happy by the beauty and sweetness of the spring. I can remember well the unspeakable delight it was to me, when I was quite a child, to see the little green points of the crocus leaves breaking through the soil. It told me spring was coming, and the flowers were going to appear on the earth. My heart used to be brimful of praise to God, in those old days long ago, at many a little token of His love, which I fear I think much less of now, perhaps (I hope it is so) because I have greater things to take up my attention. Yet I hope God will let me love the flowers and the singing of the birds as long as I live here, and that I shall not quite forget to thank Him for the joy they bring year by year.

There was a great man once, who thought it so good for everybody to see and love God's beautiful gift of flowers that he used to say, 'If you have money enough to buy two loaves, by one loaf and a bunch of flowers'.

I hope you love flowers, but still more that you love Him who made the flowers. You like to see the hedge-banks studded all over with primroses and violets, or, still better, to go into the copse and see all the ground as blue as the sky with thousands of bluebells. It makes your heart glad. I wonder whether it ever makes your heart thankful. I wonder whether, when you see how beautiful God's world is, you ever lift up your heart to Him secretly in a little act of praise, and say something of this sort, 'O God, how beautiful Thy works are! I thank Thee for Thy goodness'?

And now I want you to think whether the spring-time, with the flowers appearing on the earth, has anything to tell you about another world. God writes parables all about the world. Jesus Christ shows us how to find them. When He saw flowers, or trees, or the sowing of corn, or the setting of the sun, He knew what each had got to tell. Supposing He had walked with His disciples in the early spring, and seen the flowers just bursting from the ground, do you think He could have found a parable in it? I think so. Shall I try to find one, and tell you what I think God teaches us in the spring-time? Perhaps it is something like this; see, the winter is past, and the flowers appear on the earth; they have lain dead and buried for months under the cold ground, but now they are breaking through on every side; the warm sun is waking them up to new life: behold how fair they are in their new clothing of many colours. The flowers are the children of God: the winter is death. Now you can finish the meaning yourselves. When will be the spring-time for these flowers? [At the Resurrection of the Last Day.] And who will be like the sun, calling them up from their long sleep in the earth? [Jesus Christ.] Yes, you remember that He is called the 'Sun of righteousness'. So I think the lesson of the spring-time is a lesson of Resurrection—an Easter lesson. It tells us how the bodies of those who sleep in Jesus will rise, all bright and beautiful and glorious, like the flowers from their wintry grave. It tells us that there will be a new Easter for us all, when we shall rise, even as Jesus Himself rose at blessed Eastertide. It tells us of a new spring-time for those who are sown in the cold earth, like the seeds in autumn—a beautiful endless spring-time. It tells us of the 'new heavens' and the 'new earth' which God will create, 'wherein dwelleth righteousness'. So spring is full of hope, for God has set in our hearts a 'lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead,' and the flowers and the trees and the birds all echo the same glad hope, and say, 'The dead shall rise again'; and we take up the happy truth in our Creeds and say, I believe in the Resurrection of 'the dead'.

I think this is what is meant by a line in one of our beautiful Easter hymns—a hymn sung in Greek by the Christians in Greece, and translated into English by Dr. Neale, who gave us so many other of our favourite hymns in the same way—'Tis the spring of souls to-day'. Our souls are full of the bright happiness and the glorious hopes of spring-time.

I like to see snowdrops planted on graves. In our churchyard there are snowdrops on a great many of the graves; and I like to see it, not because it is so pretty, but because of what the snowdrops have to tell us. For a person must be very dull who cannot hear the sweet lesson the snowdrops whisper to us year by year, as they come out in their snowy purity, almost the very first flowers of the spring. 'Even thus,' they seem to say, 'as fair and as pure as we are, shall the dead in Christ arise, when their long winter of death is past, and the everlasting spring is come.'

I remember a very dear little child being buried once in the spring. It was a bright warm day and all the ground was gay with flowers. The blue Veronica was in bloom, and the hawthorns were all white with May (as you call the hawthorn blossom), so it was not quite the early spring. And four little girls, all dressed in white, carried the little coffin, and the father and mother were crying sadly, for it seemed very hard to them that their dear child should be taken away from a world so sweet and so fair, and in which she would have been (as they thought) so happy. Ah! but they had forgotten in their grief the beautiful garden of Paradise, a thousand times more lovely than anything here, where their little one was gone. And they had forgotten the new spring-time that is to come, when that little form they loved so well, and were hiding in the dark grave, would blossom like the spring flowers, and rise in heavenly beauty. Perhaps, if they planted flowers on her little grave, and came again the next spring, and saw them blooming there, they might think of these things and be comforted. Let us hope so.—BISHOP WALSHAM HOW, Plain Words to Children, p. 58.

LITTLE FOXES SPOIL THE VINES

'Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines: for our vines have tender grapes.'—SONG OF SOLOMON II. 15.

WHAT are 'the vines'? What are 'the grapes'? What are 'the foxes'?

First, what are 'vines'? Let us look at John xv. 5. Jesus Christ there speaks of Himself as 'the vine'. But everybody who loves Him—who gives his heart to Him—is joined to Jesus Christ, just like a branch is joined to a tree, and so becomes part of the vine. Jesus is 'the True Vine'. When you love Him and give your hearts to Him, then your hearts are joined to Jesus Christ, and your hearts become the Vine. Then, our hearts are 'the vines'.

What are 'the grapes'? The grapes are the fruit of the vine. And what do 'grapes' mean? Our religion. What is religion? To love God—to try to please Him. These are 'grapes'. To love God and to try to delight Him, to believe in Him—these are 'grapes'. There can be no 'grapes' till we have given our hearts to Christ. Because we can't be vines till we are joined to the grape vine. Jesus is 'the True Vine'; and when our hearts are joined to Jesus, we become 'vines,' and then we can have 'grapes'. We can love God by trying to please Him.

Now, what are 'the foxes'? Foxes are very sly and cunning things. I will tell you three things which 'the fox' is very sly about.

One thing is, the way he makes his home. You know that foxes live in burrows in the earth. A rabbit burrows in the ground; but there is a great difference between the burrow of a rabbit and that of a fox. The burrow of a rabbit has one opening, sometimes two, though very seldom; but the fox's burrow has a great many, so that he gets in and out all sorts of sly ways; and when the dogs are hunting him at one hole, he can run out at another.

Another thing the fox is very cunning in is this, he very seldom runs straight: he runs zigzag—up and down—sideways. What is good always goes straight. Truth goes straight. A good little girl or boy goes straight. A fox does not. He is like something else which does not always go straight.

Another cunning thing the fox does is to pretend to be dead when he is not dead. Sometimes when the dogs are running after him he pretends this.

Something else pretends to be dead when not dead. Do you know what it is? What is it which has such funny ways of coming in and out of our hearts, and seems dead, when quite alive? What is it? I think you know. If you do, you will understand about these 'foxes'.

There were a great many 'foxes' in the Holy Land. Samson once caught three hundred, and tied them up together and drove them into fields of corn. Travellers say there are a great many now, though not so many as there used to be. 'Foxes' come into the vineyards, but they are 'little' ones; they don't jump over the hedge, but get in through their holes.

And they do two bad things; one is, that they suck 'the grapes,' and get all the sweetness out; and the next is, they trample on them, bruise, spoil, and knock them off.

Do you know the worst thing that sin does? Can you think? It destroys God's grace in our hearts. It is a dreadful thing to tell a lie; or to be proud; or to do anything that's wicked. This destroys religion in your hearts. When sin enters it drives out good thoughts—destroys good things in your hearts. 'Little foxes' destroy 'the grapes'.

Let us read the text again. 'Take us the foxes, the little foxes that spoil the vines: for our vines have tender grapes.' The 'grapes' are very 'tender'. Good thoughts are often very weak, and very soon go away. If you have a garden now, I dare say you have some buds on the trees; but they are so tender that anything will kill them. If we had some sharp frosts, they would kill the buds; but the tenderest bud on the rose or gooseberry bush is not half so 'tender' as your little thoughts. Beware of 'the foxes,' or your buds will be in danger.

I. And now, think with me about some of the things which these 'little foxes' take out of our hearts; that, when we try to be good, make us naughty; prevent us from being what we wish to be.

I wonder, if you were preaching the sermon, if you could think anything about 'the foxes'. Can you think? Mind it says—'little foxes': therefore you must expect to find them 'little' things. Perhaps you are thinking about great things; 'little' things do all the mischief. I have always found this so—haven't you? Great things keep 'foxes' out—don't they?

If any boys or girls were to get up in the morning and not say their prayers—not really pray—that would make a hole, and a 'fox' would come in. If they did not read their Bible in the morning it would make a hole, and the 'fox' would come in. Some sin would come in.

You may say, 'Oh! it is a very little thing'; but don't let in the 'little' things, or presently some great thing will come in, and destroy all the good.

I will tell you what I have read in the history of Holland. Now Holland is a very flat country—lower than the level of the sea—and because it is lower than the sea, the inhabitants are obliged to make great dykes along the shore to keep out the water; it is a very dreadful thing for a leak to come in the dyke, as the water would come through, and flood the country for miles.

It is mentioned in the history of Holland that once a little boy, one evening, was walking by the side of one of the dykes, and he saw a little hole in one; and though he was but a little boy, he had heard what a dangerous thing it was for a hole to be in the dyke; and so, instead of running home as most little boys would have done, and let the water come through, he put his own hand against the little hole to prevent the water coming through, hoping somebody would come past and relieve him. Night came on, and it was very cold, and miserable, and dark, and there that little boy stood all night with his little hand against the hole, to keep the water from coming in.

Early next morning the minister coming by, saw this noble, heroic, brave little boy, who thought only of others' good, and had remained all night there to keep the water from coming through that little hole. What a wise boy he was! So, you see, a little hole will often cause (if unstopped) great mischief.

In Matthew v. 18, our Saviour said, 'One jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled'. Do you know what 'jots and tittles' are? Boys who understand Greek will know. One means a little dot above the word, and the other a little dot under it. Do you care about the 'jots and tittles'? Are they but very 'little' things?

I will tell you a very wonderful thing that happened some time ago in North America. I think it will surprise you. A swarm of flies stopped a train—a long train, with heavy carriages, going at the rate of twenty miles per hour. I will tell you how it happened, and you must promise me to think what it means.

In some of the railway carriages in North America they put the grease in a box over the wheel; the friction of the wheel's movements causes the grease to melt, and enables the wheel to go round nicely. If the grease does not come down, the wheel will get hot, and will set the carriage on fire.

One day the engineer saw one of the wheels was getting hot—red hot; he stopped the train to examine the cause; and he found a number of flies had got into the grease box, and prevented it running down the wheel; so you see the flies stopped the train.

'Little' things, like flies, stop things more important than trains: they stop the course of a Christian. 'Little foxes'—little things—little thoughts, come and stop you.

Now I will tell you of other things which will do you a great deal of harm if you let them come in your heart. Sometimes, when you kneel down to say your prayers, you find a great many silly, wandering thoughts come into your mind. You wish to think about God, and pray; but your thoughts wander about so much, you think of one thing, that leads to another; and then your thoughts go anywhere, to the end of the world. Don't you know anything about these wandering thoughts, these sad 'little foxes' which spoil many a prayer?

Perhaps some of you now are having wandering thoughts. I wonder whether you are. I dare say somebody is thinking about something very different to my sermon. These are 'little foxes'.

II. Now, how shall we catch these 'foxes'? How can we check these silly thoughts? Shall I give you a little advice? It is not an easy matter.

Whenever you find a wandering thought, stop in a minute, put your hands up, keep your thoughts from wandering.

Again. If you get up from your knees, and know that it has not been a real prayer, kneel down again; if it happens so the next time, do it again; if it happens six times, do it six times, till you conquer; and if you have done it several times and conquered, you won't be beaten so easily next time, because the habit will be formed in you. Do not mind how many times you kneel down daily, but say your prayers till you have conquered.

I remember an old man telling me he had said the Lord's Prayer seven times running before he could say it as he wished. That is the way to do it. And then pray to God to help you. It is a very good thing before you kneel down sometimes to say, 'How am I going to pray? What shall I say?' If you think a little before, it will help you to think without wandering thoughts, and so you will catch the 'foxes'. Therefore, if you are going to be religious and serve God, you must bring your whole mind to Him. You must do it in right earnest. St. Paul said, 'This one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus'. He was in earnest about it.

There was once a young man (of course I won't mention names) who went to church one evening. He was not in the habit of doing this, because he was very gay and wild. He liked the sermon very much indeed; and he thought, 'Now I will go straight home from this church to my own room, and pray to God,' a thing which he had not been in the habit of doing. But he did not pray at once where he was. It would have been better if he had uttered a prayer there; but he did not: I wish he had. If you think rightly in a church, pray in a moment, 'Lord, keep this good thought in my heart'. This young man said, 'I will go home and pray'.

However, when he left the church, and had gone out into the street, two of his young friends met him, and said, 'We are going to a party; come with us'. The young man replied very faintly, 'No, I think not to-night'. They looked in his face, and thought there was rather a different expression there than usual, and said, 'What, are you turned religious?' He could not stand that, and laughed outright—'Oh, no! oh, no! of course I am not: I will go with you'.

That young man never returned to his own room again—he died suddenly that night. Oh! can you manage to keep out these 'little foxes'? There was a good thought; religion was beginning, but the 'fox' came in.

I will tell you another thing. There is a 'little fox' that spoils a great many 'grapes', and his name is 'To-morrow'. Do you understand? 'I will do it to-morrow!' 'Oh, yes,' you say, 'I mean to be very religious; I am going to be very good to-morrow, or next Sunday, or Monday.' 'To-morrow!' Take care! That is a sly temptation—'to-morrow!' 'I will begin by and by: not just now: I have a little more to think of, and to do first: I will be religious to-morrow.'

Do you remember who said something very much like that? Will you turn to Acts xxiv., and you will see a man there who had tender 'grapes'—just beginning to have them—and that 'fox' came and destroyed them all. Verse 25, 'And as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled, and answered, "Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season I will call for thee".'

Do you remember who it was that, on being told to do a very hard thing, got up very early in the morning and went and did it? I think if he had delayed, he would not have done it.

I will now tell you of another dangerous 'fox' that does great harm in the world: perhaps he is in this church now—I mean pride, that spoils many 'grapes'. Will you look at 1 Timothy ii. 6. Before I read it, let me ask you, Which do you think most likely to be proud—a very old Christian, or a very young one? I think the youngest. Now, St. Paul says, respecting Timothy, 'Not a novice, lest being lifted up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil'. 'Novice' means a person new at anything; pride makes 'novices'. Now take care.

Do you remember a young man spoken of in St. Matthew, who had some 'tender grapes'? He came to Christ to know what he must do to be saved; and he was a very rich young man, and Christ told him to 'sell all that he had, and give to the poor'; and his pride came and said, 'I, a young man of fortune, I, to give it all up? No, no, I can't'—and he went away in 'sorrow'.

Do you remember another young man, who, when he was going to be made a great man, went and hid himself; but when he was made a king, he became very proud? Pride 'spoiled' the 'tender grapes'.

I wonder whether you have ever felt like this. You have said your prayers, and you have said them better than usual; and you have thought when rising from your knees, 'How well I said my prayers!' If you have ever done so, then you have 'spoiled' that prayer. Pride has come in, and spoiled the 'tender grape'. Pride 'spoils' anything.

It is said in St. Matthew that the disciples went and 'told Jesus everything'. But it is not only to God I wish you to be open, but be open to man. Don't have secrets—bad secrets. Don't render shame and hide it. I know it requires an effort, but you will be so happy after you have told it.

I should like to tell you about little Nancy. Her nurse put on her a white frock, and when she went down to her dinner, left her alone in the nursery. Now little Nancy crept downstairs to the drawing-room, admiring the many pretty things there; and among them a silver inkstand, which her mother had strictly forbidden her to touch. But poor Nancy was so tempted that she took up the pen, and dipped it in the ink; but thinking she heard some one coming, she shook the pen to try to get off the ink, and a large spot came upon her dress.

Poor Nancy then was terribly frightened. She ought to have gone direct to her mother and acknowledged her fault; she did not, but went up into the nursery, and tried to remove the spot with soap and water, but the more she washed it, the blacker it looked. At this she began to cry very much.

Soon her mamma came up, and said, 'My dear, what is the matter?' She told her mother all about it, and expressed her great sorrow. Her mother then said she should not punish, but forgive her.

Little Nancy was then desirous to get the dress clean, and her mother took out a little box with white powder, and painted the spot; it became yellow, then white, and the spot was removed. 'Now,' said her mother, 'just as I have washed out that spot, Christ's blood will wash out your sin, and then you may run about as happy as the day is long.'

So now you see, when at first she was not open the 'fox' came and 'spoilt' the 'tender grapes'; when she became open, all was made good. Try to catch these 'foxes'. You can stop them. Try! Try!

Listen to one more thing. Supposing you were to see from that ceiling a little thread come down; and suppose it were to touch you, and a voice said, 'That thread is from God,' you would not put it away from you—you would not break it, would you? You would be very careful of it. Perhaps some of you wish to be better. That is a little thread from God to you. Don't put it away, think of it; and that little thread will get stronger and stronger, until it becomes a golden chain and draws you up to God.—
JAMES VAUGHAN.

LITTLE FOXES

SONG OF SOLOMON II. 15.

THE subject which I wish to bring before you now is little sins. Strictly speaking, no sins are little. They are all great in the sight of God. But I use the word in the sense in which it is common to use it, as describing sins of a less glaring and flagrant kind. I do not need so much to warn you of the evil and danger of big sins, as people reckon them. You can hardly mistake them. You can hardly be deceived by them. You can hardly but be startled and alarmed when they come in your way. But little sins you do not think so much about; you are not so much afraid of. Like other little things, you either despise them, or look on them with a kindly and indulgent eye. You think there is no occasion to trouble yourself much about them, and so they get in and do serious damage before ever you know what they are about.

Now to what shall we compare them? Not to such terrible beasts of prey as the lion and the tiger, of which everybody is afraid; but to the fox, which is so cunning and mischievous. The very mention of the name calls up these ideas. The fox starts up at most unexpected times and places. Its ingenuity and adroitness are proverbial. It leaves sad traces of its presence wherever it has been. Turn to the Song of Solomon ii. 15: 'Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines: for our vines have tender grapes'.

We may regard the Lord Jesus as speaking here. He is speaking to His Church and people. Sometimes these are spoken of as the vineyard, sometimes as the keepers of the vineyard. He wished His people to be like Himself, to be beautiful and fruitful, so that He might go among them and look upon them with joy, and gather from them those fruits that were pleasing in His sight. He knew that they would not admit great sins, all at once, which would vex and grieve Him, and seem to indicate that they belonged to Satan rather than to Him. But He saw little faults, little errors, things that seemed trifling in themselves, creeping in among them, almost without being noticed—injuring them, cooling their love to Him, robbing them of their strength, blighting and destroying what was promising; and as a Husbandman who was concerned about and took delight in His vineyard, He called attention to this danger, and called to duty in connection with it: 'Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines'.

Let us look at the little foxes of which our text speaks—What they are, What they do, and How to catch and kill them.

I. What the Little Foxes are—what we are to understand as represented by them. In one view of the matter, you are in the vineyard, and inasmuch as there is much that is pleasing and promising about you, as still in early youth, it may be said, 'our vines have tender grapes,' easily injured, easily destroyed, and if injured now, scarcely getting the better of it in after life. Big sins, which might be represented by lions and tigers, and other beasts of prey, are meanwhile not so likely to attack you. Little sins are what you are most in danger of suffering from. And they are compared to little foxes because they are so insignificant and innocent-looking, and yet are so cunning and can do so much harm. They, as it were, say, 'You need not be afraid of us: we are so little, what harm can we do? Keep out the big foxes and other big beasts; but, surely, you need not meddle with us.'

There are a great many of these 'little foxes'. They do not all frequent the same vineyard. Different vineyards have different kinds of them—sometimes one in particular, sometimes two or three. I cannot describe them all in detail. I cannot even name them all. We shall get hold of a few, and look at them.

The first little fox we shall look at is a little lie. Not a great, black, ugly lie, enough to make conscience cry out, and to startle yourself and everybody that knows of it, but a little untruth that does not hurt and need not frighten anybody. You said you saw a dozen of soldiers riding along the street, when there were only four. You said you had been two hours at your lessons, when you were only one. You said you had done some piece of work yourself, when it was partly done by another. Or you deceived a little. You were not quite straightforward. You pretended to be what you were not. I fear there are a great many little foxes of this kind.

A second little fox is a little theft. It was only a penny or halfpenny or farthing—only a bit of pencil or a bit of ribbon—only a sweetmeat or a pin. It was only some little unfairness in the class or in the game, that got you a place or credit that did not belong to you.

A third little fox is a little outburst of temper. You were provoked, and flew into a passion, and you looked or spoke or acted your anger. You struck your brother or neighbour or friend. Or you were cross, sullen, sulky, and would not do either one thing or another. I heard lately of a boy who used to take turns of this kind, and run away under the sideboard, saying, 'the black dog is on me'.

A fourth little fox is a little act of disobedience, refusing to do, or putting off doing, or not doing pleasantly and cheerfully, what a parent asked you to do. You say you must do something else first. You require to be told two or three times. You disregard your mother's word, because she is a widow, or because your father is from home.

A fifth is a little oath, or slang expression, or low bad word.

A sixth is a little act of selfishness.

A seventh is a little yielding to indolence, laziness.

An eighth is a little breaking of the Sabbath.

A ninth is a little omission of prayer.

A tenth is a little yielding to envy or jealousy.

I might mention many more, but these may serve to show what I mean—things that are wrong, but that do not seem very important: not great sins, but little ones, if any can be called so.

II. The Harm the Little Foxes do.—'If they are so little, what great wrong can there be in them? Why make so much ado about them? Why not just let them alone? Is it worth while to trouble ourselves or other people in connection with them?' There are three things to be said about them.

1. Little sins are real sins.—A little fox is a real fox. A little tiger is a real tiger. A little serpent is a real serpent. The smallness of it does not alter its nature. You would never think of saying, 'that is not a tiger, it is only a tiger's cub'; or, 'that is not a serpent, it is only a little serpent'; 'that is not a fox, it is only a little fox'. The little one is as really a fox as the big one. It has the same nature. It is the same kind of animal. And so a little sin is sin, as much as a great one. A little lie is a real lie. A little theft, however trifling it may be, is a real theft. And if sin is bad at all, then a little sin is necessarily bad. It breaks God's law. It displeases God. It deserves hell. A little sin is a real sin. Remember that.

2. Little sins are apt to be little thought of.—That is one great part of their danger. You say 'it is only a little fault. Who would think anything of that?' It is only a little fox, what harm can it do?' If you steal a penny, it is not much, it is not like stealing a pound. If you have played truant at school for an hour, it does not matter much, it is not like staying from school for a day or a week. If you speak some untruthful or unbecoming word, it is only in joke. You mean no ill by it. The little sin does not ruffle your conscience, or make you unhappy, or make other people think much the worse of you for it. That is the worst of the whole case. That is one of the strongest reasons why you should be afraid of it.

3. Little sins prepare the way for big ones, and form habits of sin.—I never heard of a boy becoming a drunkard, or a thief, or a swearer, or a liar, or a profligate, or a criminal, all at once. It was gradually, by little and little, that he became such. It was first one little sin, and then another, and another, and at length the way was opened for the big ones. The little lie paves the way for the big one, and the little theft for the big one, and the little fault or evil of any kind for the great one.

A few weeks ago, I went with some friends for a country drive. We passed through a quiet farm steading. Everything was delightfully country-like. The dog was rolling on the grass, the hens were feeding, the ducks swimming in the pond, the cows getting home to the byre. In fifteen minutes more the whole stackyard was in a blaze. I fancy it may have been some thoughtless boy, playing with a lucifer match and lighting a straw, which kindled another and another, till from a spark which one might have crushed between his fingers or have trampled out in a moment, one stack of corn after another was consumed, and hundreds of pounds were lost.

The little things lead to and prepare the way for the bigger things. An old writer on this text compares this to what thieves sometimes do, when they go to rob a house. The men are too big to get in, so they let in the boys—get them through the barred windows, or let them down the chimney, and then they open the door to the big men, and the house is robbed.

Now these little sins answer to all the descriptions I have been giving. It is the little thing that prepares for the greater, either in the way of good or evil. If some one wanted to teach you any bad habit, he would begin by littles, and he could do it. He could make you drunkards, by giving you little drops of wine or other drink. He could make you thieves, by accustoming you to little acts of dishonesty and pilfering, getting you to take pence and half-pence, and things of no value. He could make you liars, by getting you to tell little untruths, and then leading you on to greater. He could lead you into any vice, just by getting you accustomed to the beginnings of it. Let him get you to commit the little sins, and you will soon be ready for the big ones. I could tell you the history of many a promising boy, well educated, clever, with every chance of getting on in the world, but he began to tamper with the 'little foxes,' thinking they could not do much harm: he began to give way to little sins, and they led to worse, and were his ruin. I am not so much afraid of the big sins. They may almost be left to themselves. They are so ugly, one would be almost sure to keep them at arm's length. None of you would ever think of being a murderer, or a forger, or a gambler, or a burglar, or a sot. You say at once, 'I never could be anything like that! Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?' I do not believe one of you could be tempted just now by what are called the big sins. But there is not one of you for whom I would not fear are in danger from the little ones.

What harm can the little foxes do? They 'spoil the vines'. That is what the little sins do. They spoil the conscience. They take off the fine edge from it. They drug it. They silence it—make it such that it ceases to warn any longer; and when the conscience is 'spoiled,' one is ready for anything. They spoil the heart. They blunt all its finer feelings. They take away its sensibility. They wither it up. They harden it. And when one's heart is spoiled, alas for him! They spoil the life. They rob it of its strength and beauty. They derange all the springs of it. It is like the rough handling of a moth or butterfly, or of a bunch of grapes—it destroys the bloom and beauty which can never be restored. I cannot tell all the harm done by the little sins.

And besides being evil in themselves, they tell of an evil state of things. We speak of a straw or a feather being enough to show the way the wind is blowing. And so it may be said of a little sin, that it shows how the heart is inclined. You may learn, and others may learn, from your little sins, about the health of your souls. Just as the doctor looks at your tongue or feels your pulse, and gathers from that what the state of your bodily health is, so your little sins tell the state of your spiritual health.

All that has been said applies especially to young people. The blossom of spring is easily injured. The newly formed fruit is easily hurt. And 'our vines have tender grapes'. It is spring-time with them. A mother was one day walking with her boys, when a humble man who was passing, said, 'they are bonnie bairns'. 'Ah, but,' said the mother, 'we don't know how they may turn out, what they may come to.' 'Well,' said the man, 'but they are bonnie blossoms.' That is often all that can be said of them. When the trees are white with blossom in spring, are you not sorry when a storm comes on, or a frost sets in, and blights what was so beautiful? And so when our dear children, who promised so well, who were so anxious and earnest, so deeply impressed, so desirous to be Christians, so near the kingdom of heaven, begin to meddle with and yield to 'little sins,' and the vines with the tender grapes are spoiled, what a bitter disappointment it is! Let us catch the foxes while they are little, and not wait till they are old and big.

Foxes often feign themselves asleep or dead. The Arctic foxes do this; and then, when the birds come, they start up and seize them and devour them. Let us not be too easily persuaded that the foxes are dead. And when they are once caught, let us make sure that we do not let them loose again. Mr. White of the British Museum, in his Heads and Tails, tells of a fox that had been trapped and had got his leg broken, having it set by a fox-hunting surgeon. The fox recovered and was soon at large, and had a whole pack of hounds following in his track! Let us not treat our 'little foxes' so.

I said we might hear the voice of Jesus in our text, saying, 'Take us the foxes'. He says, 'Take them for us'. We are to take them for Him. We are to take them to Him. None can destroy them—none can kill them but He. Let us take them to Him, and He will do what we cannot. He will wash our sins away in His precious blood; and then He will break the power of them, and deliver us from them. He will give us new hearts and fill them with His love. He will give us supplies of grace. He will dwell in us. He does not send us on this work alone. He goes with us. He works with us, and for us, and in us, by His Holy Spirit.—J. H. WILSON, The King's Message, p. 147.

ISAIAH

THE GARDEN OF THE SOUL

'A garden enclosed is my sister, my spouse.'—SOLOMON'S SONG
IV. 12; V. 1; VI. 2.

'My well-beloved hath a vineyard in a very fruitful hill.'—
ISAIAH V. 1-7.

'Ye are God's husbandry.'—I CORINTHIANS III. 9.

SOLOMON likens the soul to a garden, Isaiah to a vineyard, and Paul to a cultivated field. Adam and the earth were blessed together, and afterwards cursed at the same time, from the same cause, and in a similar way. There is thus a deep foundation for this image, which runs through the whole Bible. As man's two gardens—the one within and the other around him—have had the same fate, they illustrate each other in countless ways. Your soul is, or should be, the Beloved's vineyard, God's fruitful field, God's garden and your own. The history of this garden of gardens falls into four chapters:—

I. The common ground.

II. The ground cultivated, or the garden.

III. The garden neglected.

IV. The garden well-kept.

I. The Common Ground.—That beautiful garden was once a bit of heath or moorland, over which the beasts ranged. In its natural state it was worthless. About one hundred years ago the finest garden in the world was the palace-garden of Versailles. But when the French king chose the spot it was a marshy moor. It cost twenty-five years of toil and forty millions of money to change it into the royal garden. And every garden was a waste till the busy hand of cultivation clothed it with various beauties. And are not greater wonders wrought in the soul reclaimed from the out-field of the world? Here is a piece of common earth, full of thorns and weeds. But show it favour, fence it off, break up and clean the soil, scatter good seeds in it, let the genial sun warm it by day, and the kindly dews of heaven fall upon it by night; and soon all the colours of the rainbow will spring out of its clods, and the passer-by, seeing the gay and fruitful garden, may well exclaim, 'Lo! what hath man wrought!' And here is a rude sinner, whose soul was overrun with the rank weeds of hell; but the hard soil was broken up, and the good seed was sown in it. The Sun of righteousness darted His quickening beams upon it, and now a rich and fragrant garden gives joy to the angels and to the God of the angels. When we think of such a life as Bunyan's or John Newton's, we catch ourselves saying, 'What hath God wrought?'

II. The Ground Cultivated, or the Garden.—It must first be enclosed. 'A garden enclosed is my spouse,' says Solomon. Of every Christian soul we may say, as Satan said of Job, 'Thou hast made a hedge about him'. No country had more gardens than ancient Palestine; and every garden there was fenced either by a wall—as was Gethsemane—or by a prickly hedge. To separate the chosen plot from the open field, and shield it from harm, was always the gardener's first care.

We are a garden walled around,
Chosen and made peculiar ground,
A little spot enclosed by grace,
Out of the world's wide wilderness.

The soil must next be broken up. What hard and rough work is the digging, the trenching, and the uprooting! The deep ploughshare must be driven right across the fallow ground, making many a deep gash in its bosom. It leaves a scene of ruin and confusion. And when youth has been spent without God, when the soul has long lain fallow, conversion is often attended with many wrenchings and overturnings. But as the confusion in our gardens in spring does not discourage us, so we should not be discouraged by those sorrows that belong to the cultivation of the soul.

Then without wise sowing all the gardener's pains would be lost. One of his chief cares is to stock his garden with the best seeds. By the hand of parents, pastors, and teachers God is always sowing His good seed in your heart. But both for this world and the next youth is the sowing-time. Skillful sowers rise early, and cast the seed into the soil wetted by the dews of night, ere the mid-day sun has parched the clod. And so, in the morning of life, while drenched with the heavenly dew, open your heart to receive the precious seed. Fill mind and memory with the delightful truths of the Bible, and let them sink deep that, seed-like, they may swell, and sprout, and bring forth fruits and flowers of choicest perfume and colour. And you must be ever tending them, for to let your garden alone is to spoil all. Coleridge, the philosopher, was once visited by Thelwall, a sceptic. Thelwall maintained that children should not be taught religion: it was interfering with their freedom, and filling their minds with prejudices; they should be allowed to grow up naturally, and then choose for themselves. The two sauntered into his garden. Coleridge loved his books more than his plants, and his garden was a mass of weeds; but Thelwall was fond of gardening. 'I wonder,' said he, 'Mr. Coleridge, that your garden is in such a state. Why don't you weed it and plant flowers?' 'Oh,' replied Coleridge with a smile, 'I want my garden to grow naturally. I won't fill it with prejudices.' Your soul resembles your garden in this, that evil seeds lurk within, and good seeds must be planted in their place. To let it alone is to give it over to utter waste. Near some farmhouses there used to be a corner called 'the devil's neuk'. The superstitious idea was that by giving one spot over to the evil one, he would be propitiated, and would not injure the rest of the farm. The 'neuk' was simply left to itself, and thus became a wilderness at the corner of a beautiful field. Any human heart, if left without Christian training, might soon be overrun with all the foul growths of evil.

The gardener's utmost art would be in vain without the sunshine, the shower, and the quickening breath of spring. The hope of any garden lies not within its walls, but in the overshadowing heaven that pours its bounties down. That philosopher, famed for his contentment, was right, who, when asked by a friend to show him the splendid garden of which he was always boasting, led him into a bare, rocky space behind his house. 'Where is your garden?' the friend asked. 'Look up,' said the philosopher, 'heaven is a part of my garden.' Every good gift in the garden really comes from above; for should God command the clouds to rain no rain, the earth would soon be as iron. Heaven shields, broods over, and enriches every fruitful sod. It is a great truth that Paul planteth and Apollos watereth, but God giveth the increase. Turn, then, your whole being fairly towards the sunshine of God's grace, and pray that the garden of your soul may always be as ready to receive heavenly blessing as is the garden around your dwelling.

One famed spot in Norway is called Gudvangen, that is, God's garden or field. It is a little patch of life and fertility in a district which ruin has claimed for its own, and it is enclosed with awful rocks which seem to fill earth and reach to the skies. And in earth's most wicked corners we have found a soul gladly given up to the Heavenly Husbandman. Lo, it was God's garden, a living miracle of grace amid moral desolations. As Mungo Park, when about to perish in the African desert, was revived by the sight of a tuft of green moss, so the meanest flower on the roadside may give you bright and helpful suggestions of the love of your Heavenly Father.

From gazing on the tender flower,
We lift our eyes to Him whose power
Hath all its beauty given;
Who, in this atmosphere of death,
Hath given it life, and form, and breath,
And brilliant hues of heaven.

III. The Garden Neglected.—Every child of Adam, like Adam in Eden, has a garden to keep and dress, of which God is the Owner and he the tenant. The keeping of this garden is the chief work of the beggar and the king. But there are many spiritual sluggards whose garden is a shameful ruin, and, saddest of all, some of them once had their garden well kept. A neglected garden is one of the completest pictures of desolation in the world; it is desolation's throne in the deserted village. The flowers have sunk into the earth, and the weeds in that richer soil are ranker than in the neighbouring wood or common. The briars and nettles overtop the dyke, and shelter foul things, dead and living. And you cannot help contrasting what it now is with what it was and what it should be. Once an oasis in the desert, now it is a desert in the oasis. The scene is judgment-like. That deserted highland garden is an emblem of the backslider's soul; for the worst of curses is a blessing abused, and they are the most sinful who sin against the clearest light.

IV. The Garden Well-kept.—Solomon gives a picture of what your soul should be, and Isaiah of what it should not be. Everything had been done for the Beloved's vineyard, and in return He received only wild grapes (Isa. v.). But the garden in the song was stocked with all rich and beautiful things. It gave pleasure to every sense: its fine forms and colours gladdened the eye, its ripe fruits gratified the palate, its exquisite perfumes gave delight, and its leaves yielded an additional joy by their agreeable shade. A holy soul is compared to such a garden. It is the most beautiful thing in the world, a paradise of heaven on earth. We may say that good deeds are the fruits, and gracious feelings the flowers, in this garden of God. What an idea a well-kept garden gives us of God's bounty! And can you believe that He does not desire at least an equal abundance and beauty in His garden of the soul? For we know that He delights in His garden, and often visits it, and calls it His own, and His inheritance. But this is a thought above mortal mind. This at least is certain, that by grace you may do those things that are well pleasing to God. Your offerings may be as an odour of a sweet smell, like rich flowers from which perfume flows through every pore. And surely the soul of a young disciple is specially pleasing to God. It is so far like the garden of Eden, for it has not been wasted or profaned with the thorns and thistles of habitual sinfulness.—JAMES WELLS, Bible Images, p. 239.

GRAPES AND WILD GRAPES

'My Well-beloved hath a vineyard in a very fruitful hill; and He fenced it, and gathered out the stones thereof, and planted it with the choicest vine, and built a tower in the midst of it, and also made a winepress therein; and He looked that it should bring forth grapes, and it brought forth wild grapes.'—ISAIAH V. 1, 2.

In this parable of Isaiah, it says that the Lord of the vineyard fenced it, and gathered out the stones thereof, and planted it with the choicest vine. I have in my mind one vineyard at this time, which I will tell you of, because it will help you to understand the whole matter. This vineyard is one of the best in Europe. It stands on the sloping side of the Rhine, facing the southern sun, and is called the Côte Rôtie, that is, the Roasted Side, because that sun has such great power, darting down all its rays upon the place.

I dare say you think that very choice vines grow in a very good rich soil? No: never. They grow in a very poor sandy soil, where nothing else but weeds will grow. And to prevent the roots from striking deeply down, and trying to find better earth, the vine-dressers put tiles underneath them, so that they can only run down a little way.

I. Now, if you are compared to God's vineyard, what kind of ground, so to speak, are your hearts? Are they good by nature? Are they apt to bear much fruit? You know better: how, of themselves, they are quite barren: how they can neither do nor think anything that is good. Is not, then, this like the bad ground of the vineyard? And just as when the roots of the vines seem to be going too far into the earth, the wise husbandman puts something under them that prevents them striking downward: so when any of God's servants are growing too fond of this world, what does He do? He sends them something which takes away all their pleasure in it.

II. But what makes these vineyards so choice? Because they get so much of the heat of the sun. The ground is never cool. By day the earth is like an oven, and even by night it has not time to lose its heat. Therefore the precious juice of the vine works, as they say, by day and night, ripening, sweetening, being perfected, always.

And what is it that makes Christians what they are? Is it not the Sun of Righteousness, their dear Lord? The more He shines on them, the more they look to Him, are they not the better? Do they not bring forth more fruit?

Again, something else. Perhaps you think that these vineyards are beautiful to look at. Not at all. The vines are like poor, stunted gooseberry bushes. Our Lord, you know, calls Himself the True Vine; and yet it is said of Him in Isaiah that He hath neither form nor comeliness (that is, as far as the world judges); and when we shall see Him there is no beauty that we should desire Him. The best vines are what those who know nothing of the matter would call the ugliest. Sometimes God's best vines, His dearest children, are just those that we are most ready to pass over too!

III. These vineyards must be fenced. Why? First, to keep out thieves. Every one, going by, stretches out his hand for grapes. Then dogs, when they have once tasted them, devour a great number. So do fowls: hens, and the like. And there are spoilers that no fence can keep out. Lizards, little weak things as they seem, eat up a third part of all the grapes. And are there not many and many evil beings who try to spoil all that a Christian does? If any one of you determine, this once, this day, or week, or month, now to be in earnest, now to serve God better than before, do you not know how many enemies rise up against you?—J. M. NEALE, Sermons for Children, p. 120.

THE LORD'S VINEYARD

'What could have been done more to My vineyard that I have not done in it.'—ISAIAH V. 4.

A fox is a very handsome animal with beautiful fur and a beautiful tail, so it is all the more temptation when we see them coming into the vineyard not to drive them away; it is a great temptation to let them come into the vineyard and take no notice of them until they have done so much harm to the vines that they make them only able to bring forth the wildest and most poisonous grapes, rather than the kind of grapes Jesus expects to see growing in His vineyard. But if you pray to God He will help you, for His dear Son's sake, not to give way to these little foxes, but to drive them away and not let them come into the vineyard. If you ask Him, He will give you 'power and strength to have victory,' and to 'triumph' over them.

I. Well, the first of these 'little foxes that spoil the vines' is Unprayerfulness, when we either forget to say our prayers at all or else just say them through, longing to get them over, without thinking of what we say, or thinking all the time about something else. Your friends may tell you to say your prayers, and they may take care you do say them, but they cannot even then make you pray; for even when we say our prayers we don't pray unless we think about what we are saying. To say our prayers through without thinking of what we are saying, is no more praying than if those same words were said by parrots, which can be taught to say words but have no idea of what those words mean.

I will tell you a story showing how difficult it is to really pray, even when we say our prayers, and I want you to ask God to help you to pray better than the man I am going to tell you about.

This is the story.

Long ago there lived a holy man called St. Bernard, and he was once travelling over some mountains in Switzerland, called the Alps, when a robber came to him and told him to give him his horse, so St. Bernard promised to give his horse to the robber if the robber would first do something for him. The robber asked what it was, and St. Bernard told him to say the Lord's Prayer through without thinking of anything else while he said it. The robber thought that was a very easy thing to do, and began to say the Lord's Prayer; but he was not able even to say that one short prayer to the end without thinking of other things while he said it, for he stopped in the middle of it and asked St. Bernard if he would give him the harness as well as the horse.

So you see Unprayerfulness is the name of one of 'the little foxes that spoil the vines,' and you must ask God to help you to overcome this little fox, or you will not be able to overcome any of the others, for none of the others can be overcome until Unprayerfulness has first of all been overcome. It is only by prayer that God will give us strength to overcome the others. We cannot overcome them in our own strength, but 'We can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth us'.

II. Then another of 'the little foxes that spoil the vines' is called Disobedience, and Disobediencence comes at once from Unprayerfulness. For if we find it difficult to be obedient, we shall never learn to obey cheerfully, promptly, and lovingly, as Jesus obeyed, unless we keep on praying to God to help us, for Jesus' sake, to be obedient.

III. The name of another of these little foxes is Sulky Temper, and this one, like Disobedience, can only be overcome by prayer to God for strength to overcome it. We shall never be like the child Jesus, until we have overcome Sulky Temper.

IV. We will think of one more little fox, whose name is Untruthfulness. This is one of the most mischievous of them all, and does a great deal of harm to the vines, worse harm than even Disobedience and Sulky Temper can do, and like them, it can only be overcome by prayer.

Unless we pray to God, and go on praying to Him, to help us, the vines cannot by any possible means bear the grapes Jesus looks for, but only the wildest and most poisonous grapes; but if we go on praying to God, He will help us to conquer our sins; and it will help you to conquer Untruthfulness, if, when you are tempted to give way to it, you think of what those words mean I have told you before—'Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth, and keep the door of my lips'. If you pray to God and persevere, you will be able to conquer Untruthfulness.—J. L. SMITH-DAMPIER, Christ's Little Citizens, p. 67.

IN THE TEMPLE

'Also I heard the voice of the Lord, saying, Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? Then said I, Here am I, send me.'—ISAIAH VI, 8, 9.

I. What Isaiah Saw.—He says that he saw the Lord sitting on a throne. The King Uzziah was dead, but the eternal King never dies. He was on His throne, high and lifted up, and the glory of His garments filled the Temple, so great and glorious was He. And then Isaiah heard angels singing, 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of Hosts, the whole earth is full of His glory'.

If you went into a great picture gallery you would probably come to one room which would be called the 'Rubens room,' where all the pictures would be by Rubens; then in another part of the gallery you would come to the 'Turner room,' and all the pictures in that would be Turner's, the great English painter; and so on through room after room. And if you went into a library, on one shelf you would find the works of Shakespeare, on another the works of Bacon, on another the works of Milton. But with regard to God, the angels say you may go up and down the world, and everywhere you go you will find every room, every shelf, filled with the glory of the same One. The whole earth is filled with the glory of One, and that one is God. Now, why does God say that to Isaiah? In order to teach Isaiah reverence; to teach him to fear God—not to be afraid, but to teach him to honour God. Uzziah had  dared God, as it were. Uzziah had forgotten the greatness of God, and so the first thing God did with the boy was to stamp upon his mind that he must be reverent.

II. What Isaiah Felt.—The first thing he felt was that, in the midst of all that glory, he himself was unclean—he felt that he had sinned, he had done wrong. He knew that Uzziah had done wrong; and God taught him that, young as he was, he too had sinned, and so he cried out, 'Woe is me, I am unclean'. He felt that he had sinned, and then lest his heart should be broken with sorrow God made him feel that He, the God against whom he had sinned, could pardon and cleanse him. Now, we shall never get to be anything much in this life until we feel that we have sinned. I don't know whether you boys and girls get any good from these services, but I am sure you get no good at all unless it comes home to you that you too have done wrong. It is a grand moment when you find fault with yourselves. That is the finest thing a boy can do, to stand up and, as it were, pitch right into himself, find fault with himself, feeling that he has done wrong. Have you felt that—felt that you too have sinned? But if you have sinned it isn't hopeless, for God can take your sin away. Ask Him for pardon, ask Him for power not to sin.

III. What Isaiah Heard.—He heard God asking for somebody to carry a message for Him and do work for Him. 'Whom shall I send? Who will go for us?' Well, but you say, 'We never heard God say that'. No, you never heard Him in so many words, but if you know how to listen for God's call, you can hear Him calling every day. How does God call? God calls by putting a need before you. When anything wants doing that is God's call to somebody. You know people beg in many ways. Some come up to you and whine and talk, and keep you a long time describing their poverty. But I saw a little boy in Finsbury Park the other day, who begged in a most wonderful way. He did not utter a single word. It was a bleak cold day—and there he was, badly clothed, and he looked very pale and very sad; his cheeks were pinched with hunger, his lips blue with the cold; he looked at me—he didn't say a word, but oh, how he begged! Dear me, how that child begged! God was shouting—shouting aloud for somebody to help that boy. He didn't say a word, but he begged all the same. And so, whenever we see things that want doing, we may be sure that we are listening to God's call; God is saying, 'Who will go and do this for me?'

IV. What Isaiah Said.—'Here am I: send me.' 'Here am I.' He didn't look about and say, 'Who is there that will go?' No; he said, 'Here am I, send me,' and God did not refuse him.

You know that in arranging their play the bigger boys choose who shall be on their side, and they always choose the best boys; the poor little fellows who can't play well are left for the other side. They are always so anxious to be called; but are always passed by, or left to the very last. God doesn't do that; He doesn't say, 'Oh no, no, I want somebody else'. He says, 'Come, Whosoever will let him come'. And now, do you, whenever God calls you—whenever you see a thing needing to be done, and you can do it—hold out your hand and say, 'Here am I, send me,' and God will send you, and help you, and bless you to the end.—J. MORGAN GIBBON, In the Days of Truth, p. 39.

THE JOY OF HARVEST

(For Harvest Festival)

'They joy before Thee according to the joy in harvest.'—ISAIAH IX. 3.

Why glad to-day? Flowers, fruit, decorations. Cf. Jews at their Feast of Tabernacles [Deut. xvi. 13-15; cf. Rev. vii. 9, 10] called 'The Feast of the Jews' because so much the most joyful. Such joy 'the joy of harvest'. See:—

I. What the Joy is.—Natural to be glad of a good harvest. Why? Because an end is gained for which there has been long waiting, labour, anxiety.

[Illustration.—Remember when you started to win that prize! So many marks to be gained, some few each Sunday. You were ill, perhaps, and missed some for attendance. Often you were all but late—it took a good deal of exertion and some self-denial to get you to school in time—then the lessons, etc.; but, little by little, the marks added up, and at last you found you had right number. The prize yours, and you glad—'rejoiced according to the joy of harvest'.]

So with farmer—getting soil ready—ploughing, then sowing, etc. How often the weather seemed to backen the crops! What care required to watch and guard them! What fears that, in spite of all, some misfortune would prevent the gaining of the prize. Now at last the harvest is come. Natural to be joyful.

II. Why should we Rejoice?—Natural for farmers, but we have not had much anxiety! Why should we be joyful? Well,

1. From sympathy.

Cf. St. Paul. 'Rejoice with them that do rejoice.' Easy and natural to do this. If we don't get a prize ourselves we yet feel some gladness to see some one else glad—anyway we ought to! [Sometimes children say, 'No prize—won't come to prize-giving'. Is not that rather selfish? They lose by it too, for joy is joy, whether we rejoice with others or for ourselves. Silly to lose 'a good time' by sulking!]

2. From gratitude.

If not had the anxiety, yet share the benefit. Food cheaper. Money will go farther. Parents better able to get you clothes, etc. A good harvest does us all good, and if we have not had the trouble all the more should we be grateful for an unearned blessing.

III. Other Joys like Harvest Joys.—E.g. the harvest of a successful life. It is reached little by little, step by step, no leaping to results. Just like

'first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn'. When it comes, what a satisfaction! What a reward for patient painstaking! Five, ten, fifteen years hence, who of us will be reaping?—and what?

And another life beyond this; other harvests in the world to come—still reached little by little—little acts of kindness—little self-denials, etc. Yet what rejoicing when Christ's true servants rejoice before Him 'according to the joy in harvest' [cf. Rev. vii. 9, 10].

Conclusion.—Harvests are not always joyful. [Illustration]. The farmer cannot always secure a good harvest. But we may, for God will help us; own fault if our harvest be not glad. Remember, 'as a man soweth so shall he also reap' [cf. also Gal. vi. 8]. Now is our sowing time: are we sowing good seed or bad?—C. A. GOODHART, Hints and Outlines for Children's Services, p. 72.

WONDERFUL NAME

'And His name shall be called wonderful.'—ISAIAH IX. 6.

OLD Testament names are full of meaning, and generally express some feature of the character, life, or service of the persons who bear them. There is a name which is above every name, and that one is Jesus; but there is another very precious name of His, and that is Wonderful. He has—

1. A Wonderful eye to see us—His Sympathy.
2. A Wonderful ear to hear us—His Solitude.
3. A Wonderful heart to love us—His Salvation.
4. A Wonderful hand to hold us—His Strength.
5. A Wonderful word to cheer us—His Support.
6. A Wonderful spirit to guide us—His Spirit.
7. A Wonderful home to receive us—His Satisfaction.

I witnessed something most interesting many years ago in the Belle Vue Gardens, Manchester. A little dog was lying very comfortably in the lions' den, and they took no notice of it. The visitors were indeed surprised, and there were numerous inquiries for an explanation. The story was a very touching one. The keeper said that some little time before our visit a man came into the gardens with a dog. It vexed him in some way: so to get rid of it, as he thought, he threw it into the lions' den; but to everybody's surprise the lions did not touch the dog. After awhile the man's temper cooled down, and he went to the keeper and asked for his dog. 'Well,' said the keeper, 'go in and fetch it out!' But the man dared not do that. The dog was in perfect safety now. So all who put their trust in Jesus, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, are perfectly safe, and none shall be able to pluck them from His hand. It is indeed a wonderful hand to hold us!—C. EDWARDS, Tin Tacks for Tiny Folks, p. 100.

POWER GIVEN TO CHILDREN TO SERVE CHRIST

'A little child shall lead them.'—ISAIAH XI. 6.

By little things great deeds can be done. It was the children who cried Hosanna. That was a little thing in itself. But it was Hosanna to Jesus, and great because He is great, and as long as the world lasts it will be told.

To show what even one voice could do, I will tell you of a German musician who, many years ago, left his native land for America.

Arrived in New York he could not speak English, but he had a great hunger for music, and one Lord's Day, passing a place of worship, he went in to enjoy the praise.

Now this was a church where very little attention was given to music; every one sang in his own way, and the singing was to his ear so unskilful and even rude that it nearly drove him out of the place; but just then his quick ear, in the midst of all the harsh discordant sounds, heard a young female voice, sweet and clear, but not loud, singing in perfect tune, and gradually, one after another, all the congregation caught the tune from her, and followed till the discord ceased, and the whole congregation were singing in perfect harmony.

Another instance of power given to children to serve Christ is told of a very rich Count of Silesia. It is said that somehow he hated Christ and hated the Bible and hated the Church. It is said, indeed, that he made a mock of God and heaven and eternity. Now this rich and evil man had churches on his estate, and, strange to say, he had to appoint the ministers to those churches. And at the time I am telling of he had to appoint one to a church near his own castle. And so bad and unfaithful a man was he that he appointed a man who also hated God and the Bible, and made a mock of heaven and eternity.

And the two men would sit at the Count's table scoffing at all holy things. And at the church there was no one to teach the people about Christ.

Now on the Count's estate at that time lived a pious Christian schoolmaster. And when everything in the place was against Christ, he and his household were thinking more of Him and clinging closer to Him. In the evenings passers-by heard hymns of Jesus sung in his house, sweetly sung, in which his children joined.

One evening, as the Count was passing this house, he heard a child singing in the garden. She was alone, and her voice was so sweet that the Count stopped to listen. As he listened he found it was a hymn to Christ the child was singing. Then the singing stopped, and the Count, looking over the hedge, saw that though she was smiling she was in tears. Then he asked why she was crying, and she said, 'I am crying for joy'.

'Joy! for what?' said the Count.

'For Christ's love,' she quickly replied.

The Count said, 'But Christ is dead'.

'No,' said the little girl, 'He is not dead. He died, but He rose from the dead, and He is alive again, and lives for evermore, to send blessings and to save.'

The child seemed so sure, so bright, and so glad, that her words fixed themselves in the Count's mind. Silent and thoughtful he went on his way.

A week after business called him to take a journey to the borders of Austria, to a village gnaden-frey, where was a Moravian settlement. The chapel bells were ringing, and inquiring why, he was told it was the children's festival. For the sake of hearing the children's singing he turned into the chapel. The preacher gave out for the text, 'Have ye never heard, Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings Thou hast perfected praise?' Remembering the little voice he had heard in his own village, the hard heart of the Count was touched. His wicked pride was brought low, and, as he told afterwards, he found himself shedding tears.

The children had called on him to follow Christ, and the children had won him to obey. He could no longer scoff; he could no longer withhold his heart from his Lord. The words of Paul came to his lips. In sorrow, in sincerity, and joy, he cried, 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?' He found himself at the feet of Christ. And now the Count of Silesia joins with the schoolmaster's family in his village, is a loyal soldier in Christ's army, and marches under His banner. It was a child that began the first change, and Jesus was glad. And it is true now, and here, and everywhere, and always, that a little child can lead a man to Jesus. The greatest things are often done by little means.

One gentle word that I may speak,

Or one kind, loving deed

By me, a child both small and weak,

May produce a tiny seed;

And who can tell what good may spring

From such a very little thing?

Perhaps it would fix this lesson better in your minds if I told you a story about a Norwegian fisher girl, who once in her life did not do all she could. She lived in a cottage by the sea, and she had no mother.

Her father one day, going out to fish, said to her: 'When night comes on, light the lamp and put it in the window as mother did, and when the darkness falls I'll see where to land'.

The little girl—she was very little and all alone—fell fast asleep as night came on, and so the lamp was not lit, and that night her father, not seeing any light, came ashore at the wrong place and was drowned. But the poor child could never forgive herself, and she said, 'All my life long I will keep the lamp burning for others'. And she lived in that cottage till she was an old woman. She sat up spinning all night and slept by day.

Many a sailor's life she saved.

By failing once she learned for evermore to do what she could.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 53.

CHILD-LEADING

'And a little child shall lead them.'—ISAIAH XI. 6.

THESE words, when looked at in connection with the passage in which they occur, suggest this thought—the power for good of a little child.

1. We may Apply Them to the Child Jesus.—

How wonderful it is to think of the Son of God and the Son of Man—the King of angels and the Saviour of the world—as being a little Child! Yet so He was. But He was a great power even when He lay in the manger-cradle, and while He sojourned—an unconscious Babe—in Bethlehem.

II. We may Apply these Words to All Children, and especially to Good Children.—What a stir the presence even of one little child makes in a house! When a babe is born, its appearance at once influences all the family arrangements, and its own interests require to be constantly consulted. There the little thing is, lying in its mother's arms, very tiny and feeble, yet great even in its smallness, and strong because of its weakness. The mother is fully occupied with it; the father, even when at business, cannot long forget it. The elder children combine to protect and cherish it. That gentle presence warms and softens all hearts within the household.

Only a tender flower
Sent us to rear;
Only a life to love
While we are here;
Only a baby small,
Never at rest;
Small, but how dear to us
God knoweth best.

Of father and mother and brothers and sisters and friends, we may say that 'the little child leads them'.

III. We may Apply these Words to All People who have the Child-Spirit.—Childlikeness is the symbol of spiritual excellence and power. The Lord Jesus once set this truth very impressively before His disciples by means of an object lesson. They had been contending who should be the greatest, and had asked their Master about it. And how did He answer their ugly and troublesome question? He looked about in the house, or on the wayside, for a very little boy. He called one to Him, and the little fellow came, open-eyed and wondering. Jesus set him in the midst of the tall, bearded disciples, and told them that, if they would be great, they must become like him. He also took the child up in His arms, as if to show that true greatness meant loving nearness to His own heart of love. The little child was to lead the great Apostles up to their supereminent thrones. They must be humble and docile, like him, if they would receive the tongue of fire and the power of the keys.—CHARLES JERDAN, Messages to the Children, p. 1.

BREAKING THE SPELL

'The great trumpet shall be blown.'—ISAIAH XXVII. 13.

MOST of you have read, I dare say, the fine story of the Sleeping Beauty and the Enchanted Palace. It is long since I read it, but it is one of those stories that, once read, can never again be altogether forgotten. There was the great palace, with its far-stretching garden and its thick, shaggy woods; with its soldiers and serving-men, the little page-boys and the ladies-in-waiting. But it was all like a picture:

nothing was moving; the same watchman had stood on the tower through frost and heat, as if he were a statue; the sentinel had leaned on his spear at the great gateway night and day through winter and summer, as if he had been carved out of stone; and there, in the heart of the palace, the beautiful princess and her maidens had slept and slept, while the dust of the years was falling everywhere; it was all like the grounds and the palace of a dream!

You know why a wicked Enchanter had thrown a spell over all, and no one could lift hand or foot, or see or speak, until that spell was broken. But it could be broken if some one with faith and courage would do it. You remember how? Outside, on a tree of the enchanted wood where no fruit grew, a horn or trumpet was hung up, and beside it was a sword. Whoever would break the magic spell and awaken the sleepers, and bring all the stir and songfulness of life into that palace and these grounds again, must dare to enter the darkness of the wood, draw that sword from its scabbard, and blow a clear, loud, ringing blast on the trumpet.

And so it proved to be. A brave young knight, who had given his life for God and for all that was good, groped his way through the wood, and, in spite of all the sounds and sights that threatened him, he made his way to the tree, and drew the sword, and blew the trumpet—and then there was such a stir! The stream began to flow, the gates swung back, everybody in the palace began to move, the princess and her maidens awoke, and all the brightness and the music of life were restored.

That is a nice story, is it not? It is, and it is something more than a story; it is a parable: it only puts some big, big truths in a nice and pleasing way. For they are not palaces and gardens only that have had the spell of enchantment cast on them: whole nations have had it, and some have been under its power for hundreds and hundreds of years. They have made no progress in that time: they have had no life in them; what they were hundreds of years ago they still continued to be. The Enchanter that bound them was Superstition. But bold knights came—knights of the Cross—from the days of William Carey and John Williams, and they drew the sword, which is the Word of God, and with the breath of faith they blew the trumpet of the Gospel, and the heathen world that had long been slumbering began to awake into new life.

Oh, the great changes that have taken place within a few years, since first the knights of the Cross began to enter the darkness of heathenism! Within the memory of living men, lands that are larger than our own, and that were sunk in the deep sleep of idolatry, have cast their idols to the ground, and to-day they are as Christian as we are. Within the memory of living men, Africa was like a gloomy forest, but David Livingstone dared to enter it, and with only God's Word for a sword, but with the breath of faith with which to sound the Gospel message, he brought light and life to the Dark Continent, and now, point after point and place after place, Christian Missions are spreading all over it.

Ah! that is a fine story about the Enchanted Palace and the Sleeping Princess; but it is a still finer story that is being worked out to-day in every part of the world. For the knights of the Cross are going everywhere, and everywhere the stir of a new life is going with them. When we think of what has been done in a hundred years, and then think of our steamships, and trains, and telegraphs, and printing-press, there is, I think, little need to wonder that before fifty years have fled the knowledge of Jesus the Redeemer will be brought to the whole world.

You must help; you can help. Faith first; you can pray. Pray, then, and put your heart into your prayer that Christ's kingdom may come, and that the heathen may speedily be given Him for an inheritance. Your faith, going with your prayers, will be like the very breath of life to awake the slumbering. But there is the sword, too—the Word of God; make use of that. You have your missionary boxes—do not neglect them; they are the scabbard of the sword the missionaries have to use. Be knights of the Cross to help God's work where you are and as you are; it may be that some of you will yet yourselves go to the foreign field and be the Lord's knights there. May He grant that it shall be so! When the great victory comes—as come it must—when Christ shall be crowned King over all, look to it that this may then be your reward—that you did not hold back, but rather did what you could and as you could, to help forward the merciful work of the Lord.—J. REID HOWATT, The Children's Preacher, p. 42.

THE LIVING STONE

ISAIAH XXVIII. 16, 17.

1. The Selected Stone.—To save us (1 Peter ii. 4).
2. The Foundation Stone.—To bear us (1 Cor. iii. 11).
3. The Tried Stone.—To hold us (1 Peter ii. 6).
4. The Corner Stone.—To unite us (Eph. ii. 20).
5. The Sure Stone.—To keep us (1 Peter ii. 5).

THE FITCHES, THE CUMMIN, AND THE WHEAT

'Doth the ploughman plough all day to sow? doth he open and break the clods of his ground? When he hath made plain the face thereof, doth he not cast abroad the fitches, and scatter the cummin, and cast in the principal wheat, and the appointed barley, and the rye, in their place? For his God doth instruct him to discretion, and doth teach him. For the fitches are not threshed with a threshing instrument, neither is a cart wheel turned about upon the cummin; but the fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod. Bread-corn is bruised; because he will not ever be threshing it, nor break it with the wheel of his cart, nor bruise it with his horsemen.'—ISAIAH XXVIII. 24-28.

I SHOULD not wonder if you had never noticed these verses before; and now that I have read them to you, you perhaps think that they are very difficult to understand, and that they are not at all interesting. We shall see presently: but in the first place, notice something else. You know how often it pleased our dear Lord to teach the people by country sights and country business. How He told them to consider the lilies; how He spoke of the grass which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven; how He told the parable of the Sower, of the Tares, of the Seed that was cast into the ground and sprung and grew up, men knew not how: of the fields that were white already to harvest. And what the Lord did, His disciples learnt from Him to do, as you may see in the Epistles. Here, in the Old Testament, we have an example of the same thing. You remember what St. Mark says: 'After this He appeared in another shape unto two of them, as they walked, and went into the country'. And so, in your country walks there are plenty of things which He is ready to teach you, if you will only learn. The crops, the flowers, the rocks, they each have their lesson—they are each a kind of standing parable, if He will only give you eyes to see what its meaning is.

Now what is Isaiah speaking of in these verses? He is telling us of the different ways in which different crops are cultivated; how they are sown at first, how they are brought to the mill at last. And more particularly he tells you of fitches, and cummin, and wheat.

What are fitches? We generally call them vetches; I dare say some of you know the bright little boat-shaped flowers of that name. Here in Sussex we do not cultivate them much: but in many parts of England they do, and so they did in Judea, as food for cattle. Cummin is a plant that is sown on account of its little spiky seed. You know what caraway seeds are, which they put in sugar plums: cummin seeds are not unlike them. A very little seed: inasmuch that you may remember when our Lord was finding fault with the Pharisees for neglecting great things, while they pretended to be so very careful about little matters, He tells them that they tithe mint and anise and cummin, and neglect the weightier matters of the Law.

It begins: 'Doth the ploughman plough all day to sow? When he hath made plain the face thereof, doth he not cart abroad the fitches, and scatter the cummin?' That is, doth he plough and tear up the earth for the sake of ploughing and tearing it, and, as it were, putting it to pain? No, he doth it for a particular reason; that it may be fit to bear different plants set in it; and when it has been prepared for that, then he leaves it alone; then the plough is drawn away to the little green strip at the end of the field, or to the shed in the farmyard, and there it lies by till the next year. Now what does St. Paul tell us? 'Ye are God's husbandry: ye are God's building.' Well, then, what an earthly husbandman does to the ground, God, who is the Heavenly Husbandman, does to us. Our hearts are so cold and hard and careless, that they have to be ploughed up, as it were, by sorrow; or they never would be fit to bear any fruit. David says, 'Before I was troubled I went wrong; but now have I kept Thy word': there is nothing that all through the Bible is read oftener than this. You have this ploughing as well as every one: you have not the same sorrow, the same affliction, the same grief that grown-up people have; but you have your own little sorrows, which are not little to you. To the holy angels, I dare say, all are easier, and griefs seem alike little; but they care for all, and try to help us through all.

Well, but these same verses tell us that God does not try the weak so much as He does the strong. 'The fitches are not threshed with a threshing instrument, neither is a cart-wheel turned about upon the cummin; but the fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod.' If we were to put such poor little things as fitches and cummin into the same mill in which we grind corn, we should utterly destroy them. So they are treated in a much gentler way. In order that the fruit may be separated from the husk, they are also beaten, but it is with a staff or rod—not ground between two heavy stones. 'But,'—he goes on—'bread corn is bruised.' Wheat has so much hard trial to go through: but when it has gone through it, how much more valuable it is! Poor little weak things are much less tried, but then they are less worth: the most valuable of all seeds, wheat, is bruised most severely, and thence comes bread, the staff of life.

Now see what Isaiah says in another place. 'In measure, when it shooteth forth, Thou wilt debate with it: He stayeth the rough wind in the days of the east wind.' That is, in early spring, when the young leaves begin to shoot forth, God debates with them, that is, tries them, in measure as they are able to bear: if He allows the east wind, which is the worst and most dangerous wind, then He does not allow it to blow hard; if He sends a rough wind, then it is not an east wind.

And this is the way that God deals with you. While you are young and tender, He shelters you from temptation—He keeps you safe in the fold here. By and by your temptations will become greater; but then you will have more strength. You will first have been confirmed, which is the very sacrament of strength and then you will receive that which one of the prophets calls 'Corn of the Mighty,' namely, the Body of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is strength Himself. This is trying you by measure, giving you strength, before He calls you to use it. If you are poor little fitches, then you need not be afraid that you will be ground in a mill, like stronger things. The Scotch have a very pretty proverb, though it requires to be explained, to the same effect. They say, 'The worst blast of the three borrowing days never hurts the one poor little hogget.' 'The borrowing days' are the three last days of March, which March borrows, as they say, from April: and the lambs of that spring just born, they call hoggets. The month of March is the time of the fiercest winds, when the sleet drives most blindly over the mountains and on the moors, where the sheep pasture: the proverb therefore means that the very worst of all storms is not allowed to hurt the very weakest of all creatures. You know what a helpless creature a very young lamb is—how it seems hardly able to stand on its tall trembling legs—how it looks too heavy for itself, but you do not know what a mountain storm is in Scotland. Well, then, if you are in the one fold, I am sure that the worst blast of temptation will not really be allowed to hurt our poor little hoggets.

Then you must remember that, though we have no right to wish for temptations, because we know and feel how weak we are, much less to run into them, when our Lord has taught us to pray, 'Lead us not into temptation,' yet, when He does send them, we ought not to be frightened, we ought not to be sorry, we ought rather to rejoice. If He allows them to come, it is in order that we may be able to do Him the more honour by means of them. St. James says, 'Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life'. It is not only that the more we are tried here, the brighter crown we shall have by and by; but the more we are tried here, the happier even here we shall be, because we shall learn more of God's strength, and of God's love and care for us, and how many wonderful ways He has of delivering us, which we should never have thought of.

You know that among the martyrs of Christ St. Ignatius was one of the most famous. In writing one of the Epistles just before his death, he says, 'I am the corn of Christ: I know that I must be ground by the teeth of the lions as in a mill, that I may be presented like fine flour to my Lord'. Could there be a more terrible grinding than that? and yet, do you think that St. Ignatius would, for any joy set before him, have not suffered it?

Now look through the text once more, and you will find five kinds of threshing mentioned: by the staff; by the rod; by the treading out under the feet of oxen or horses; by the threshing instrument—which was also called a drag, a kind of harrow made with bushes and weighted with stones; and the waggon, which not only threshed out the corn, but cut up the straw as fodder for the cattle, for the Jews never used hay. All this means to show us how many ways God has of trying us, from the staff and rod, down to the dreadful way in which bread-corn was bruised. Our dear Lord was tried by all; one after another, all, from the time that He came into this world in the cold winter, and in the poor manger, to the time that He went out of it on Mount Calvary. Neither I nor any one can say what God has in store for you: but this I know, that if, as you grow up, you grow up His true servants, some trials you will have. 'If ye be without chastisement, then are ye bastards and not sons.' You do not know much about temptations yet; but you must try to keep in your mind that come they must—come they will—so that you may not be taken unawares. If you ever mean to conquer great ones, you must be in the habit of conquering the little ones you have here. Little temptations: not to speak the exact truth; to be unkind to your companions; to be passionate; to be envious, if you see one of your playmates do something or get something which you cannot do, and have not had given yourself. Above all things, be obedient. Before they send soldiers to fight with the enemy, what do they do to them? They send them out to encamp on commons and hills here at home. They get used to cold and wet and storm and wind, they learn how to manage for themselves in time of peace; and then all these things will not be new to them in time of war. So they have reviews—that is, pretence battles: they are taught how to meet soldiers pretending to be the enemy, that when they come to face a real enemy, they may feel that it is not altogether a strange thing. What is said of our Lord? He went forth conquering and to conquer; and so must you. If you are not conquering as you go on, now, you cannot hope that you will go out to conquer by and by.

Try to think of these things: try to pray over them: and then, when the great fierce temptation really comes, you will be able to say, this I knew that I must expect; then I must not be afraid of it; 'forewarned, forearmed'.

And then, when the wheat has grown up from the earth and has been cut down, and threshed, and separated from the chaff, then the King will say to the reapers, that is the angels, 'Gather the wheat into My barn'.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons for Children, p. 131.

FLYING BIRDS

'As birds flying, so will the Lord of hosts defend Jerusalem.'
—ISAIAH XXXI. 5.

THE Bible has much to say about birds. It seldom, however, mentions their migratory habits. The above passage from Isaiah is perhaps the clearest in this reference to migration. (Ask for a definition of the word 'migration' or 'migratory'. If none is given, state your own.)

Understanding what this long word means, we can properly read Isaiah's words as if he had said, 'As birds migrate, so will the Lord defend Jerusalem'.

What can this mean? For answer, we turn to the flying bird itself, finding first of all that when a bird migrates it is always from a colder to a warmer country.

I. It hurries away from a land of snow and ice and desolation to the land of flowers and warmth and beauty.

So, the Lord, in 'defending Jerusalem,' His beloved Church, delivers her from the land of sin, where all is desolation and death, seeking by His grace to bring her, upon the pinions of faith and prayer, to that heavenly summer-land where all is joy and life for evermore. The bird flying towards the south, though the journey may be a long one, comes daily nearer to its beautiful home, so bright with glad sunshine. For you and me the journey to heaven may be a long and oftentimes dreary journey; yet every day the promise to the Church of her future rest grows more and more glorious. Yes, the many hard, weary experiences of this earthly life, with all its strange, unexpected changes, are rapidly passing; and some day, amid the splendours of heaven, we will forget all about these troubles.

II. Then, again; whenever a bird flies toward the warmer, happier country, it follows a line through the air which for generations birds have used. This line always leads to the southland, and is called the 'known line of migration'.

Now God, in defending (delivering) His children from sin, bringing them by His love, day by day, to heaven, bids them make this journey by a long-used, well-known Way, which Way is Christ. But this Way is sometimes apparently much divided, because we have so many denominations of Christians. Methodists, Baptists, Episcopalians, Lutherans, Presbyterians—all follow the lines of their own denominations. Happily, however, God is guiding them all by the power of His truth, through Jesus the Saviour, who is for ever the one only true Way to heaven. In Him all the lesser lines are included, just as heaven's great expanse includes all 'known lines of migration' throughout the world. God has given us all enough for our guidance to heaven, whether we belong to one denomination or another. The revelations of His Word are ample, and these are made still clearer to us by the help of the Holy Spirit, and by the growth of our own experience. As truly as the bird flying southward pursues the air-line followed by past generations of his kind, so God holds us all to the principles which were known to the earliest believer.

III. Again; birds, in migrating, fly at great heights above the earth—from one to even three miles. So in pursuing our heavenly way we must rise high above the things of earth, if we would insure our souls absolute safety from all dangers. Fly high above sin with its temptations. So will you have broad, clear views of the grandest and best in life about you, and so alone will you secure uninterrupted, cloudless glimpses of the land before us.

IV. Once more; birds are gifted with very keen sight and sharp hearing. At night they are guided as readily by sound as they are by sight in the daytime. Thus they follow the lines of flight with un-failing precision. Added to this well-balanced, twofold power, the bird possesses what may be known in other creatures as the 'sense of direction'. So, by a far-viewing faith and unerring obedience, keen for every hint of God's will, with a soul sensible to every call to effort, the Christian is safely guided till he reaches his heavenly home. The bird seldom fails to reach his journey's end. Accidents, of course, are likely to happen; but these for the most part occur to careless birds—to those curious to stop and investigate any unusual, harmful object by the way, and to those birds, generally among the younger ones, who disregard the careful, watchful parent birds, who do not cease to warn them of all danger.

Finally, God delivers Jerusalem by directing what is kindly and helpful among Christians. Even a word of cheer, like an encouraging birdnote, given on the heavenly journey, may be of instant, recognised value in gaining a soul's salvation.—G. V. REICHEL, What Shall I Tell the Children, p. 49.

IN SHELTER

'Parva sub ingenti.'

'The shadow of a great rock.'—ISAIAH XXXII. 2.

THESE words form the motto of Prince Edward Island, one of our possessions in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, constituting part of the province of Canada, and situated close to Nova Scotia.

The arms of the island show a little tree under the shelter of a big one, whereby it is protected from the rough winds that sweep across the exposed land. This denotes the protection afforded to the small island by the large country of which it forms a part.

The words of the motto imply this consciousness of weakness and the need of clinging to the stronger power, but they also express, I imagine, something more, the pride, namely, of forming part of a great empire. If it is only a small island, yet it is as truly part of the British Empire as is the largest of all her colonies. The inhabitants have their rights and privileges as imperial citizens, and can claim the protection of all the laws, safeguards, and honours that belong to the subjects of that world-wide dominion.

These two ideas I wish to apply to our relation to Jesus Christ.

I. First of all, we are little and weak, and in ourselves helpless, but if we belong to Him we are made sharers in all His mighty power. We are like the little tree under the shelter of the big one, the rough blasts bend and toss about, but they cannot touch us. Sometimes, near the seashore, you may see whole extents of woodland, and all the trees are bent in one direction. Those nearest to the sea are short and stunted. The trees increase gradually in height, and the whole wood looks as if it had been cut with a knife, until at last, far inland, the trees attain their normal height, for the outside belt exposed to the sea breezes has suffered in its efforts to shelter its more favoured sisters. They only grow tall, straight, and well proportioned at the expense of the others which have borne the brunt of the storm, and lost their own beauty in consequence. Thus was it with Jesus, He came into the world and suffered at the hands of men all kinds of shame and mockery. As the prophet said in his wonderful, poetical description, 'He was as a root out of a dry ground, He had no form or comeliness, there was no beauty that we should desire Him. He was despised as one from whom men hid their face, He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was upon Him, and with His stripes we are healed.' All this Christ bore that we might not have to bear it, He stands between us and the might of temptation, He protects us from the sirocco (that dry desert wind) of sin.

He tempers the fierce blasts of persecution, and saves His little ones from many difficulties and dangers. To be in the hands of Christ means to be in the safest of shelters!

II. The other side of the truth of this motto lies in the fact that, because we belong to Christ, we are sharers in His power and dignity. It does not matter how young a prince of the royal house is, dignity and honour are rendered to him even if he be but a child, and from his earliest years he is taught to respect the traditions of the court. All the glory and honour of long generations are part of his inheritance, and because of them, as well as for his own sake, these forms and ceremonies are observed: child as he is, he soon learns that much depends upon his actions.

I dare say you have all heard the touching story of the late Queen Victoria, how one day her governess let her know she was the next heir to the throne. When the meaning of the statement dawned upon the girl, she threw her arms round her teacher's neck and said eagerly and with great earnestness, 'Oh, I will be good!' Often before she had rebelled against the drudgery of certain tasks that to her seemed useless, but when she realised all that depended upon her becoming worthy of the great dignity and trust that lay before her, she resolved with God's help to render herself fitted for it; so we, when we understand that we belong to the kingdom of heaven, may be encouraged to think how all its rules and resources are ready to our hand, as well as solemnised by the recollection of how great are the demands that may be made upon us. There are words of a very wise man which I remember hearing years ago, and have never forgotten. The writer of them is Pascal—the great French thinker and scholar. He says: 'Do small things as if they were great, because of the majesty of Jesus Christ, who works them in us, and who lives our life; and great things as if they were small and easy, because of His omnipotence'.—G. CURRIE MARTIN, Great Mottoes with Great Lessons, p. 129.

THE KING IN HIS BEAUTY

'Thine eyes shall see the king in his beauty.'—ISAIAH XXXIII. 17.

THE King here spoken of is Jesus. This promise refers to heaven. There will be many glorious things for us to see when we get to heaven. But the grandest, and the most beautiful of all, will be to see Jesus Himself. The Apostle Paul says that there 'we shall see Him as He is'. It must have been a blessed thing to have seen Jesus when He was on earth; but that was nothing compared to what it will be to see Him in heaven. When Jesus was here, in this world, we have no reason to suppose that He was remarkable for the beauty of His appearance. We are not told, indeed, by the good men who wrote His life in the Gospels, how He looked. The Prophet Isaiah is the only one of the sacred writers who has given any particular account of His appearance 'when Jesus was seen among men'. And he speaks of Him as 'a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; with no form, nor comeliness, and with no beauty that we should desire Him' (Isa. LIII. 2, 3).

But it will be very different when we come to see Jesus in heaven. There will be wonderful beauty and glory about Him there. And those who love and serve Him here, will see all this beauty and glory there. Jesus prayed for this very thing when He was here on earth. In the seventeenth chapter of St. John's Gospel, we have written out for us the great prayer which Jesus offered for His people, just before He went to be crucified. In the twenty-fourth verse of that chapter, we have these wonderful words, 'Father, I will that they also whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am; that they may behold My glory, which Thou hast given Me'. These words of Jesus, in His prayer, give us the best explanation we can have of the meaning of the Prophet Isaiah, when he wrote the sweet promise contained in our present text, 'Thine eyes shall see the King in His beauty'. If you ask me to tell you what this promise means, I would answer the question by turning to these words of Jesus in His prayer, 'Father, I will that they also whom Thou hast given Me, be with Me where I am; that they may behold My glory'. The King spoken of in one of these passages is Jesus, who is speaking Himself in the other passage. The 'beauty' that Isaiah speaks of is the same thing as the 'glory' that Jesus prays about. Isaiah calls it 'The King's beauty'. Jesus calls it 'My glory'. Isaiah does not tell us where this beauty was to be seen; but Jesus tells us. He says it will be 'where I am'. And we know very well where Jesus is. Jesus is in heaven. And every one who loves Jesus can look up to Him and say—

'Tis where Thou art is heaven to me,
And heaven without Thee cannot be.

And so these words of Isaiah lead our thoughts up to heaven, 'Thine eyes shall see the King in His beauty'. We all hope to go to heaven when we die. If we really love and serve Jesus, we certainly shall go there. And so we should be interested in hearing of what we are to see when we get there. God has not told us much concerning heaven. We should try to understand all that He has told us. The Apostle Paul was taken to heaven before he died, and then came back again to earth. He saw 'the King in His beauty' there; but he never told about it. He said he was not allowed to tell what he had seen (2 Cor. xii. 4).

And so we can only learn about heaven by studying what God has told us of it in His blessed Word. This passage in Isaiah is one of the places in which it is spoken of. 'Thine eyes shall see the King in His beauty.'

And when we come to think of the beauty, or glory, of Jesus in heaven, there are three things with which that glory will be connected, and which we must speak of, in order to understand this subject properly.

I. The First of these is 'the Place' where Jesus will be when we see Him in His Beauty.—We call this place heaven. In the Bible it is compared to different things. Sometimes it is spoken of as a paradise, or garden, full of all bright and beautiful things. When Adam and Eve were first created, you know that God put them in such a garden, or paradise. In that garden, we are told that God made to grow 'every tree that was pleasant to the eye and good for food'. And we know they would have been perfectly happy there if they had only minded what God told them. But Satan got in there, in the form of a serpent, and tempted them to eat of the tree of which God had said they must not eat. And then they were driven out. In this way that Paradise was lost. But Jesus came to restore it to us. And heaven is compared to a garden, because it will be a place in some respects like the garden of Eden. It will be a 'Paradise Restored'. But it will be better than the first Paradise, because Satan will never be allowed to get into it to tempt us. And we shall never sin, and never be put out of it. Heaven is spoken of as a Paradise in 2 Corinthians xii. 2, 4, and Revelations ii. 7.

A little girl was gazing up at the starry sky one clear night. She seemed to be very much occupied in thinking about something. Her mother said to her, 'What are you thinking about, my dear?'

'Oh, mamma!' she said, 'I was thinking if the outside of heaven is so beautiful, how very beautiful it must be inside!'

A very sweet thought, indeed, and one we may often consider ourselves when we look up at the sky on a clear, bright night, and see how it sparkles in its loveliness. That is the outside of heaven.

Sometimes when people are dying the heavenly land, where Jesus is, comes very near them, so that they can see it before they die.

The land beyond the mountains.—A little boy lay dying. His father and mother were sitting on one side of his little bed, and the doctor was waiting and watching near. He had been silent for some time, and appeared to sleep. They thought he might pass away as he slept. But suddenly his blue eyes opened, wide and clear, and a sweet smile broke over his face. He looked upwards very earnestly, and then turning to his mother said, 'Mother, what is that beautiful land that I see there, beyond the mountains?'

'I don't see any mountains, my dear,' said the mother.

'Look there, mother dear,' he said, pointing up.

'They are very near now: so large and high; and the country beyond them seems so beautiful! The people are so happy; and there are no sick children there. Is that the heavenly land I see?'

'Yes, my child,' his mother sobbed, 'that is the heavenly land where Jesus dwells.'

'Oh, mother!—Oh, father! don't be sorry for me; but come after me to that beautiful land. Good-bye, mother dear, I'm going now; and Jesus has sent His angel to carry me over the mountains.'

These were his last words. He died in his mother's arms. The angel carried him over the mountains to 'see the King in his beauty'. But he had caught a glimpse of its brightness before he went away. The beauty of the place is one of the things that will help to make up the glory, or beauty, that we shall see in Jesus when we go to heaven.

II. The Second Thing will be 'the Company' about Jesus when we see Him in His Beauty.—However beautiful the place may be, which is to be our heaven, we never could be satisfied with that alone. Jewelled walls, and pearly gates, and golden streets are all very well. They must be wondrously beautiful. But these, of themselves, could never make us happy. When we go to the house we live in, and which we call home, what is it that makes it feel so sweet and pleasant to us? It is not the walls of the building. It is not the furniture of the rooms—the tables, the chairs, the carpets on the floor, or the pictures that hang on the walls. It is not these things that make that place home to us; but it is the presence there of a dear father or mother, of brothers and sisters, of those whom we love, and who, we know, love us. And so it will be with heaven. The place will have something to do with the beauty we shall see, and the happiness we shall enjoy there; but the company will have much more to do with it.

And now let us talk a little about the company we shall meet in heaven. Who will make up this company? Well, to begin with, the angels will form a part of this company. We are told in the Bible that there will be in heaven 'an innumerable company of angels' (Heb. xii. 22). I never saw an angel. You never saw an angel. No doubt that any of us would feel frightened if we should see one come into the room where we were. But we know, from what the Bible tells us, that the angels are very beautiful. They are always spoken of as clothed in white. They are sometimes spoken of as having wings, but not always. Sometimes they have appeared in the form of men or women, but without any wings. We are not told how they looked; but we know that they must be very beautiful in their appearance. And to see such a beautiful place as heaven is, filled with such beautiful beings as angels are, must help to make heaven very beautiful.

But now, I think I hear one of you say, 'Ah! yes; the angels, I dare say, are very beautiful. But then I don't know them; and they don't know me. I should be afraid of them. I don't think I could feel at home, or happy with them.'

This is very natural. And if there were to be none but angels in the company of heaven, it would not feel very much like home to us. But then there will be others in heaven besides the angels. All the good people that we read about in the Bible will be there. Abraham will be there; and so will Joseph, and David, and Daniel, and Peter, and John, and Paul. And all the good people who have died since will be there too.

But then the company of heaven comes nearer to us even than this. I suppose there is not one person who will read these pages but has some friend, or relation, in heaven. Have you lost a beloved father, or mother, or uncle, or aunt, who loved Jesus? You will find them in heaven. Have you lost a dear brother, or sister, old enough to love and serve Jesus? You will find them in heaven.

The stranger not a stranger.—In the early settlement of the city of Cincinnati, there was only one way for persons to get there, and that was by means of the flat-boats that passed up and down the Ohio river.

On one occasion a boat landed there. It had come down the river from Pittsburgh. There was a company of people on board that boat who were going to Cincinnati to live there. Their friends were expecting their arrival, and had met, down by the side of the river, to welcome them. As they left the boat their friends gathered around them to shake hands with them, and give them the warmest kind of a welcome.

But in that company who had just arrived, there was one who was a stranger. He had no friends, or anyone that knew him in Cincinnati. There was no one there to shake hands with him, or bid him welcome to the place. He had been feeling lonely before, he felt ten times more so now.

The crowd was beginning to scatter, leaving that stranger alone on the boat. Leaning over the railing of the boat he called after them, saying—

'Friends, if there are any of you who love the Lord Jesus Christ, I am your brother.'

In a moment half a dozen of them were at his side. They shook him warmly by the hand, and bade him welcome to their homes.

How different Cincinnati seemed to that stranger now from what it did a moment before! The place indeed was the same; but oh, how different the company seemed! He was among friends now, and that made him feel at home.

And so it will be with us when we get to heaven. Jesus will know and love every one who enters there. He will introduce us to those who are there, and they will all love us, because we love Jesus. Angels and Christians, old and young, men, women, and children, will all make one great happy family.

'Thine eyes shall see the King in His beauty.' There will be beauty in the place, and beauty in the company.

III. But there is a Third Thing that will have more to do with the Beauty of Heaven than either the Place or the Company—and that is ‘The Person and Presence of Jesus’.—There was a celebrated painter once, who was making a picture of Jesus in the midst of his twelve Apostles. In arranging the picture he concluded to paint the Apostles first, and not begin with their Master till he had finished them. As he went on with the picture he tried to do the very best he could with each of the Apostles. He took the greatest pains with their figures, their positions, their dress, and their faces. As he went on with his work he was very well pleased with it. After finishing the Apostles he began with the person of Jesus. He got on very well with this till he came to the head and face of our blessed Lord. Then he laid down his brush and paused. He felt that the face of Jesus ought to be made to appear as much more beautiful than His disciples, as the sun is more glorious than the stars. But how could he do this? He had tried so hard to make the disciples look well that he felt he had no power left to make their Master appear as much superior to them as He ought to appear. And so he finished the person of Jesus all but the head, and then painted Him with a white mantle thrown over His head. He thought that when persons came to look at his painting, they could imagine what the face of Jesus ought to be better than he could represent it by painting.

And I feel very much as that painter did, when I come to speak about the person and presence of Jesus in heaven. All who love Jesus here on earth agree in saying that from what they know of Him now, He is ‘the chief among ten thousand, and altogether lovely’. Then how will He appear when our eyes come to ‘see the King in His beauty,’ in heaven? Just look for a moment at what some good Christian men have said about Jesus, from what they knew of Him here in this world.

While John Newton was thinking of Him, he said:—

How sweet the name of Jesus sounds
In a believer’s ear!
It soothes his sorrows, heals his wounds,
And drives away his fear.

A good Roman Catholic, who lived more than 600 years ago, expressed his feelings thus:—

Jesus, the very thought of Thee,
With sweetness fills my breast,
But sweeter far Thy face to see,
And in Thy bosom rest.
Nor voice can sing, nor heart can frame,
Nor can the memory find
A sweeter sound than Thy blest name,
O Saviour of mankind.

When Dr. Doddridge was thinking about Him he said:—

Jesus, I love Thy charming name,
‘Tis music to my ear;
Fain would I sound it out so loud
That earth and heaven might hear.
All my capacious powers can wish
In Thee doth richly meet,
Not to my eyes is light so dear,
Nor friendship half so sweet.

And Charles Wesley when thinking about Him burst out thus:—

Oh, for a thousand tongues to sing
My great Redeemer’s praise!
The glories of my God and King,
The triumphs of His grace!

Jesus! the name that calms our fears,
That bids our sorrows cease;
‘Tis music in the sinner’s ears,
‘Tis life, and health, and peace.

When such men get to heaven it will not be the riches that adorn the place, nor the perfection of the company there, that will make up its chief beauty to them. No, but it will be the person and presence of Jesus there that will constitute the charm, the glory, the fullness of heaven’s joy to their souls. And this is just what Dr. Muhlenberg speaks of in that beautiful hymn of his, in which heaven is spoken of as a place:—

Where the saints of all ages in harmony meet,
Their Saviour and brethren transported to greet,
While the anthems of rapture unceasingly roll,
And the smile of the Lord is the feast of the soul.

The person and presence of Jesus, and ‘the smile of the Lord,’ both mean the same thing.

A Sunday-school teacher was visiting one of her scholars who was soon to die. The sick child was a Christian. She expressed an earnest desire to go to heaven.

‘Why do you wish so much to go there, Mary?’ asked her teacher.

‘Because Jesus is there, and I long so to see Him.’

‘But suppose, Mary, that when you get there, you should find that Jesus was going out of heaven, what would you do?’

‘I would go out with Him,’ was her quick reply. She felt that there could be no heaven to her without Jesus.

‘Thine eyes shall see the King in His beauty.’ Remember, there are three things with which this beauty will be connected. These are: the place—the company—and the person and presence of Jesus.

There is one very important lesson we should learn from this subject; it is this: we must learn to love Jesus here, or else His presence in heaven will not make us happy.

We see this lesson illustrated in the Hindu fable about the crane. The fable says that one day a crane was contentedly eating snails in a marsh. As she was thus engaged a bird flew down from the sky and lighted near her. ‘Where do you come from?’ asked the crane. ‘From heaven,’ was the answer.

‘What have you seen in heaven?’ asked the crane. ‘Everything that can make people happy.’ And then the bird went on and described some of the joys of that blessed place.

‘Have they any snails in heaven?’ asked the crane, as much as to say—‘I don’t care to be in any place where there are no snails’.

‘You vulgar, low-bred creature!’ said the bird, and flew away offended.

Now suppose that this crane had been taken to heaven; would it have been happy there? Not at all. It would have been longing all the time for the marsh where it used to wade and catch snails. We must be prepared for heaven if we hope to be happy there. And there is only one true preparation. This is—learning to know and love Jesus. If we really love Him, we shall be perfectly happy to be where He is. And when our 'eyes see the King in His beauty,' that will satisfy us for ever. We shall want nothing else. That will be a perfect heaven to us.—RICHARD NEWTON, The Beauty of the King, p. 3.

A ROAD FOR GOD

(Advent)

'A highway for our God.'—ISAIAH XL. 3.

'A HIGHWAY'—a road—a path for God! How very strange this sounds. God is a Spirit. How can He want a road, or how can there be a path for Him to walk in? We shall see.

But I want you first to try to remember three things in your Bible.

1. The first thing is this—that the great prophet Isaiah, more than 700 years before Jesus Christ was born, spoke about 'the Voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare ye the way of the Lord: make straight in the desert a highway for our God'. Now we know from the Gospels that this 'Voice' means St. John the Baptist. It was he who was to cry out this about making a road for God.

2. The second thing is this—that another prophet called Malachi, about 400 years before Jesus Christ was born, wrote down what God told him, and one thing he wrote was this, 'Behold I will send My messenger, and he shall prepare My way before Me'. We know again from the Gospels that this messenger means St. John the Baptist. He was himself to prepare the way—which is the same thing as making a road—for God.

3. The third thing I want you to remember is this—that when St. John the Baptist was born, about six months before Jesus Christ was, his father, the good old priest Zacharias, made a beautiful hymn of thanks and praise. You know it very well, for you often sing it in Church. It begins, 'Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, for He hath visited and redeemed His people'. In one part of that hymn Zacharias speaks to his own little child, who was only eight days old, and he says, 'Thou, child, shalt be called the Prophet of the Highest, for thou shalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare His ways'. Mark these words, 'to prepare His ways'. Zacharias knew his Bible. He knew what the Holy Spirit of God had taught the prophets to say, and he knew his own little son was the 'Voice' and the 'Messenger' they spoke of. He knew that that little child, when he grew up, would have to prepare the way of the Lord—that is, to make a road for God.

Now you want to know how a road can be made for God. But I want you first to know who God is.

And I will ask you a question which I am sure you can all answer:—

Whose forerunner was John the Baptist? [Jesus Christ's.] Yes, it was for Jesus Christ that he had to prepare the way. And now you see that Jesus Christ is called God. 'A highway for our God' means a highway for Jesus Christ.

Now we must think of these two things: (1) Where the highway was to be made; and (2) How it was to be made.

1. Where? 'In the desert,' the prophet says. 'The desert': that is a barren, desolate place—all dry, hot sand stretching for miles and miles, or else all rocks and hills, where nobody lives and nobody tills the ground. There are deserts of that sort far away in the East, and it is very hard to travel through them. But it cannot be that sort of a desert which is meant. No, it is not a real desert through which a road has to be made for Jesus. Yet it is a place very like a desert too. Shall I tell you where it is? It is in the North, and in the South, and in the East, and in the West. It is in England. It is in this church. Now can you guess? Or shall I tell you that it is the heart of man? That is the desert. Is it not like one? It ought to be like a beautiful garden, all full of sweet flowers and fruits. But I think in most of our hearts there is at least some little part—some out-of-the-way corner, if no more, so dry and hard and barren, or so tangled with ugly useless weeds, that it is more like a desert than a garden. Yes, and there—right through these hearts of ours—that road has to be made for our God!

But why? What does He want it for? He wants it that He may come to you, and bring you all sorts of wonderful blessings. He has got more good things and more beautiful things and more wonderful things ready for you than you can think of. And He loves you very greatly, and longs to find a way into your hearts. Will you make Him a way that He may come? Will you try if you can make a road fit for Him to walk along?

2. Ah! but this brings us to my second question. How is the road to be made?

Now, we will look again into our Bibles and see if they tell us anything about it. Why, here is the very thing described for us. When the prophet Isaiah tells us about the highway to be made for God, he goes on at once, 'Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low: and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain'. That is exactly the way anybody would make a road anywhere. Did you ever see a new railway being made? What did they do with the valleys or hollows? [Filled them up.] Yes; they had to be 'exalted'—lifted up. And the mountains and hills? [Cut them down.] Yes; they were 'made low'. And the crooked places were—? [Made straight.] And the rough—? [Made smooth.] To be sure. Now it is just the same when we want a road made in our hearts. Do you think you could tell me what all these things mean? Try and think.

The valleys or hollows—don't you think they are a very good likeness of all the things we have left undone which we ought to have done—of all our past idleness, and neglect, and carelessness? These have to be filled up. Yes, indeed, you must set to work. Your loving Saviour cannot come to you so long as there is that great hole in the road. Set to work and fill it up. Throw into it all the pains, and care, and diligence, and activity you can. There must be no more sloth and idleness.

Then there are the mountains and hills. And I dare say you could tell me of a good many things which stand up before your souls so as to hinder Jesus from coming to you. What do you think of pride? or self-will? or obstinacy? I am quite sure He won't climb over these to come to you. You must get them out of the way. They must be brought low.

Then the crooked places—I suppose they would mean all crooked ways of lying and deceit and untruthfulness. You know we call a truthful person straightforward, because he does not turn about to this side or to that in what he says, but goes straight to the truth. Well; whatever is not straightforward is crooked, and the crooked path is one which Jesus loves not. It must be made straight.

Once more—there are rough places. What do they picture to us? I think rough tempers, and rough words, and rough manners. They speak to us of such feelings as anger, and spite, and ill-nature, and revenge, and unkindness of all sorts; of cutting and cruel words, and of quarrelling and fighting. Such rough places must be made plain—i.e. smooth, if the road is to be one fit for the meek and gentle Jesus to walk upon.

Now, this road-making is hard work, and you are very weak, and you feel as if you could not do much. Well; answer me this question: When they are making a new road or railway, and have a high hill to cut down or a great hollow to fill up, how much soil can one man take away from the hill or throw into the hollow at one time? [Only a spadeful.] Only a spadeful! And what is the use of that? One spadeful makes no difference. Nay, but it does. And a great many spadefuls make a great difference. Now I want you to begin just with one spadeful. Ask God to show you some one little thing you can go and do for Him, or some one little sin you can begin to cut down for Him, and set to work.—BISHOP WALSHAM HOW, Plain Sermons to Children, p. 1.

A ROAD FOR GOD

* Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God. Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low, and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain.' ISAIAH XL. 3, 4.

I. LET us think, first, where the road for Jesus is to be made. Isaiah says it is to be made in the desert—'make straight in the desert a highway for our God'—you know, I expect, what a desert is. A desert is a dry, hot place—all sand and rocks, where the heat of the sun pours down in a way you never feel it in England, even on the hottest days. It is all dry hot sand and rocks, stretching for miles and miles, and nobody can live there. Far away in the East there are deserts of this kind; and it is very hard to travel across them because the heat is so great, and there is no water there. But it was not in a desert like this that St. John the Baptist was to make 'a highway for our God'. No, this is not the kind of desert through which a road is to be made for Jesus, though it is very much like a desert—in fact, it is a desert of another kind.

Our hearts are the desert through which a road is to be made for Jesus. And is not our heart like a desert?

It ought not to be like a desert, I know. It ought to be like a beautiful garden, full of sweet flowers and fruit. It ought to be like a fruitful vineyard bringing forth beautiful grapes. But I am afraid that in all our hearts there is at least some little spot, even if it is only some out-of-the-way corner, which is so dry and barren and so full of ugly weeds that it is more like a desert than a garden full of sweet flowers, or a vineyard full of beautiful grapes. And that is the part of the vineyard which has been attacked and spoilt by 'the little foxes that spoil the vines,' and instead of bringing forth the good grapes Jesus looks for it only brings forth 'wild grapes,' like untruthfulness and disobedience and sulky tempers.

But it is right across these hearts of ours which are so like a desert in God's sight that we have to make that road for God.

It was by telling people of their sins, and to love Jesus, that St. John the Baptist was to be Christ's messenger, and prepare a way before Him; and so it is by repenting of our sins, and giving them up, that we are to make a road for God in our hearts.

And why does God want a road made for Him in our hearts?

Well, He wants this road made for Him so that He may come to us along it, and bring us His wonderful blessings. He has more blessings for us than we can think of. The Bible tells us, 'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him'. He longs to find His way into your hearts, for He loves you so much that He wants to come and bring you all these blessings; so I hope you will ask God to help you to make a road in your hearts for Him to come to you.

II. We have thought now where the road for Jesus is to be made, and we see that it is to be made in our hearts. Now we come to the second question—how this road is to be made.

The prophet Isaiah, who tells us about the highway St. John the Baptist was to make for Jesus, also tells us how it was to be made. He says, 'Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low, and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain'.

And this is just how people make roads in these days. You can see it especially in the way railways are made.

There must be a level line for the trains to run along, as they would not be able to go down a steep hill-side into a valley and then up another hill, so they must have a straight road made for them to go along. And to make this straight road the valleys are filled up, and the hills have to be levelled down or a tunnel made through them. All this has to be done for the trains to have a straight line to run along.

And just in the same way we have to make a road for Jesus in our hearts. Let us think how we are to make it.

'Every valley shall be exalted.' These valleys remind us of the things we have left undone in our past idleness and neglect and carelessness.

They remind us of such things as idleness at school, or over any particular work that God has given us to do. They remind us of the opportunities of doing right that we have lost.

So in making this road for God into our hearts, we must first of all with His help, fill up these valleys by overcoming our idleness and neglect of duty. Your Saviour who loves you so much cannot come to you while there are these great holes in the road; so you must set to work to fill them up, for 'every valley shall be exalted'. You must pray to God to help you to put all the care and diligence and activity you can into this work of filling up the valleys by overcoming idleness and carelessness.

Then there are the mountains and hills.

The second thing in making the road is that 'every mountain and hill shall be made low'. I am afraid that with all of us there are many mountains and hills that come between Jesus and our souls, and prevent Him from coming to us. For instance, one of them may be pride, which says I won't do this thing I am told—I am not accustomed to being told to do such things. I am above it.

But if we are told to do things we consider beneath us, this is an opportunity for us to overcome our pride, and to be like Jesus who was 'meek and lowly in heart'.

Another mountain to be brought low may be disobedience; so when we are told to do something we don't like, we must still remember the example of Jesus, and we must just ask Him to help us to be as obedient as He was, instead of refusing to obey, and getting very sulky when we are told to do something we don't like, remembering that when He was found in the Temple, by His Blessed Mother and St. Joseph, He obeyed them at once, and without stopping to ask any questions, for 'He went down with them, and came to Nazareth, and was subject unto them'.

Pride and disobedience and other sins like them are the mountains and hills that stand on the road, between Jesus and our souls, and they must be made low, for Jesus will not climb over these hills to come to us.

Then, the next thing in making this road is that 'the crooked places shall be made straight'. These crooked places are deceit and untruthfulness. You know we call a truthful person straightforward—that is the opposite of crooked—because he does not turn about to this side or that, in what he says, or when asked a question, but he tells the truth at once. Well, whatever is not straightforward is crooked; and Jesus, 'who did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth,' does not like crooked paths, and will not come along them to us, so we must make the crooked paths straight for Him to walk along. Then, one more thing we have to do in making the road is to make the rough places plain. The rough places in the road are our bad sulky tempers, and unkind words, and angry feelings, and spite, and ill-nature. When we make our road for Jesus, all these rough places must be made smooth.—J. L. SMITH-DAMPIER, Christ's Little Citizens, p. 105.

MOUNTING AS WITH EAGLES' WINGS

'But they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint.'—ISAIAH XL, 31.

Did you ever see an eagle? A noble bird, the king of the birds, the eagle. I want you to think a little about the eagle. I will tell you something more. I want you to be like an eagle. I want everybody in this church to be like an eagle.

I will tell you about the eagle's nest. The eagle makes a nest of thorns, and over the thorns the eagle puts some very soft things—some wool or some down over the thorns. And there the eagle lays its eggs, and when the eggs are hatched the little eagles come out into the nest, and there they stay. And when it is time for the little eagles to fly, what do you think the old eagle does? With his great talons he scratches off the soft wool and the down, and then the thorns prick the little birds and they must fly because the thorns prick them. And so they fly away, and fly away because the thorns prick them. And what do you think the old eagle does then? He is such a kind old bird. He comes and puts his great wings under the wings of the little birds and helps them to fly; and so the young eaglets can fly very high, because their father, the old eagle, helps them with his great wings to fly away. And then they go up, and up very high; and if you have ever seen a great bird—a great hawk, or a kite, or an eagle, as I have seen an eagle, it is very beautiful to see how it flies. It goes up very high, and it makes great circles round and round, and goes very fast, and yet you hardly see it move its wings. It seems almost to go without flapping its wings. It is so grand, so large a circle, and it does it so quietly, so quietly, up very high and round and round. The eagle has got a very little eye. It has a very small eye; but with that little eye the eagle looks straight at the sun. You dare not look at the sun; you would have to shut your eyes: but the eagle looks straight at the sun.

Will you remember about the nest what makes the little eaglets fly, what the old eagle does with his wings, and his little eye looking at the sun? I want you to be like that, all of you. Think how you are to be like that.

Have you got a nest? Young eagles, what is your nest? Is it your nice comfortable bed? Is it your home? Is that your nest—all so pleasant and soft? Do you think troubles will never come into your nest? The thorns will prick. Have they ever come yet? Have you ever had any troubles, any thorns in the nest? I do not know whether you have yet; I think you will sometime; and when the thorns come, the troubles, what is it you have to do? To fly; get up higher—get up higher. You may not stay in your comfortable nest always. Fly away where God chooses you to be. Get up nearer heaven. Can you, can you fly up? Yes, if the Great Eagle puts His wings underneath. If God your Father helps you to fly, then you can fly ever so high. Because God helps you you will be able to fly; and you will be very quiet, just like the eagle's quiet life. You will go a great way, and will have great thoughts, and you will be high up, and looking down upon everything. You will be calm and quiet like the eagle. Your little eye—not this eye—the eye of your mind, the eye of your soul—you have got an eye in here—the eye of your mind will look at the Sun. What Sun? The Lord Jesus Christ. That is His name in the Bible. He is called 'the Sun of Righteousness' (Mal. iv. 2). You will be able to think about Jesus as if you saw Him. He will be so near to you and kind to you. You will love Him so that you will always like to see Him.

You will find that what I have told you about the eagle is in the Bible. Will you turn to the Book of Deuteronomy? Perhaps you have never thought of it, but you will see what I have told you is in the Bible. Will you look at Deuteronomy—the thirty-second chapter and the eleventh verse? There it all is. 'As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them'—taketh the young—'beareth them on her wings.' You see what an eagle does. 'The eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, taketh them, beareth them on her wings'. That is what God will do with you young eagles.

Now I want you to go up very high. I want you to 'mount up with wings as eagles'. Is it right to be ambitious? Is it right to wish to get up very high? Is it right? I think it is. I think we ought to get up very high in everything—in everything. I think we ought to wish to be at the top of the class. I think we ought to wish to get up to a higher class; to get to the top of the school. I think we ought to wish to be the cleverest people—the cleverest people in Brighton. To know more than anybody else; to be very strong; to run very quick; to leap very high; to play a very good game of cricket; to be at the top of everything—in all your games, all your books, and all your studies. I would not give much for the boy or girl who was not ambitious.

Do you remember two young men once came to Jesus with their mother; and the mother said, and the young men said, 'Let us be high in heaven; give us to sit one on the right hand and the other on the left'. Was Jesus angry with them? Did He blame them? Not a bit. He said, 'You don't know what you ask. You will have to go through a great deal.' He never told them they were wrong. They were right to be ambitious. I do not mean to be ambitious for worldly pleasures and worldly things, which will all pass away.

I do not know whether it is so now, but I should like to tell you what was done some time ago, when the great Pope was crowned, the Pope of Italy. Perhaps it is done now. There was a great procession, and the Pope walked in the procession, and before him there walked a man who carried in one hand a lighted taper, and in the other some flax, and as he went along he took some of the flax and lighted it with the lighted taper. The flax burnt, and the ashes that fell off it dropped just at the feet of the Pope as he walked along, just where he was going to tread, and as he did so the clergyman—the priest—who was walking by said, 'Holy Father, thus passes away the glory of this world'. This was to remind the Pope when he was going to be crowned that just as that flax was all burnt up, and only a black cinder left, so the glory of this world would perish. I want that kind of ambition which is true ambition.

A great painter was in company with another painter, and the other painter said to the great painter, 'How is it that you paint so very well? You paint so few pictures, while I paint so many pictures.' Said the great painter, 'You paint for time, I paint for eternity'. That means, 'Your painting is for a little time, but I paint what shall last. I am painting for eternity.' I am learning my lessons for eternity. I am doing all for eternity. I am making my friendships for eternity. That is the good ambition. Something which will last for ever. I work for eternity, I go up high. I wish to be great, wise, powerful, because I wish it for eternity.

Now, I call each of you an eagle, but I will tell you what I am afraid you are; what I don't like to see. What do you think it is? An eagle in a cage. I don't like to see an eagle in a cage. That noble bird, meant to soar and fly away, will knock himself about and not be happy in a cage. And I am afraid some of you are as an eagle in a cage, that you ought to fly high, and you don't fly high. You ought to be doing good, but you are in a cage. Your thoughts are shut up. I think perhaps your body is the cage, and your soul is the eagle. Your soul is in your body, and your body is like a cage to your soul, and shuts it up. Perhaps it is some naughty thing, some naughty temper, some wrong feeling, idleness, perhaps, and that is the cage. You are a lazy boy, you are a lazy girl, you are in a cage, and the eagle cannot fly, because you are shut up in a cage.

Now I want you not to be shut up in a cage, but to 'mount up with wings as eagles'. Mount up! That means I want you to get higher up in all your thoughts, higher up in your prayers, higher up in your reading, higher up in your feelings. High up, high up, nearer heaven, nearer heaven, high up. I want you to get so high up that you shall look down on a great many things. You shall be like a person on the top of a mountain. How little these things must look to an eagle when he is high up. Get up that you may see these things. St. Paul says, 'None of these things'—the troubles—'move me'. He was above them. Get up above. Have you any boys at school unkind to you? Have you any girls at school unkind to you? Have you any trouble at school? Have you any troubles at home? Have you? Are they bad? Have you got to do something that is very disagreeable? Get higher up, look down at it. You will be astonished to see how easy it is when you get up. Think about grand things and great things, and then these things will be so small. I suppose there is no one in the church but what has some trouble. I have, and I find the best way is to get up high. Have 'the wings of eagles'; look down on it all, and then you know we shall not care much about it.

The eagle sometimes is weak. Will you look at a passage which I will show you in which it says so? It says it in my text, but it is also in the 103rd Psalm and the fifth verse, 'Thy youth is renewed like the eagle's'. 'They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength' (Isa. xi. 31). You know this, that every bird moults. Every horse some time in the year loses his coat. His hair drops off. Every bird loses his feathers. He gets weak and moults. Now at times we get very weak; sometimes you feel so out of spirits you feel very weak, too weak to bear anything. You are like the eagle. The eagle moults, and you moults. If any boy or girl is cross, and cannot bear some things, you are moulting, you are moulting. But there is a promise which I shall look at presently, there is a promise that 'those who wait upon the Lord' shall get over their moulting, and go on again in new strength. Do you think you are moulting? Last week did you feel very much out of temper, very uncomfortable? You could not get any victory over yourself. Well, then, you have been moulting. Be an eagle, and you will 'renew your strength,' and trouble will look so small, and you will say, 'Why was I so cross about that? It is nothing. I am quite unworthy of it. I am quite ashamed of myself.' And so you will 'renew your strength,' and you will go on again to do better.

Now I want to say a little more, for it says in the text, 'But they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint'. Which is best—'running' or 'walking'? Which did you do first when you were a little child, a baby? Which did you do first, run first or walk? The child runs first; it runs before it walks. It is easier to run than to walk. I have seen a little child when it is left alone. It makes a little rush at its mother. It cannot walk quite steadily and quietly yet. Which do you do, run or walk? Some boys and girls like running best, and some like walking best. Some are always running. Some in this church are the running ones, and some the walking ones. It is a good thing to do both. You see if you run you may get tired, and if you walk you may get faint. But here God says, 'They shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint'.

Did you ever hear of a great mathematician who lived a long while ago? He was one of the greatest mathematicians, and knew about the stars. He was an astronomer, and was a very learned man. And he has written his life, and he says what happened to him when a boy. He says when a boy he got tired of mathematics, and he was going to give it all up. I suppose he was moulting. He said, 'I shall give it up, I shall never be a clever man'. Well, very strangely, as he was thinking that, he saw a piece of paper on the cover of his book, and somehow or other, he could never tell why, he thought he should like to have it, and he got some water and damped it, and then got this piece of paper off, and on it was written, 'Go on, sir; go on, sir'. And he said afterwards, 'That was my master. I had no other master; that bit of paper was my master. I went on—I went on, I would not give it up, and all through my life that has been my master, and to it I owe everything. It has taught me all my mathematics. It has taught me to "Go on, sir; go on, sir"'. I wish you to bear that in mind. Go on. Don't think that you have got to the top. Go on. Don't be discouraged. Go on. You don't get a victory. Go on. You cannot master that sum. Go on, go on. 'Go on, sir; go on, sir,' let that be your master. If you take that as your master I think you will 'run and not be weary'. You will go on and on.

There were two little girls. They were each carrying a heavy basket, and one little girl could not manage her basket at all. She was very angry about its being so heavy. She said to the other girl, 'How do you manage to carry your basket so well?' The other girl said, 'When I loaded my basket I put in something. I always do put something in my basket.' What do you think it was? 'I always put patience in. I am careful to put in patience, and so I can carry it, and I don't get tired.' Now always put patience in your basket, and then you 'will run, and not be weary; and walk, and not faint'. And all the while the great wings of the Great Eagle will be under you. You cannot do anything without the great wings. Shall I tell you what these 'wings' are? What should you think are the wings to fly to heaven? Are they God's promises? I should say they are God's promises. You may find the promises; then fly with the promises. 'Where am I to fly?' Oh! higher and higher. 'They shall run, and not be weary; they shall walk, and not faint.'

Now all this is a promise—this is the last thing I want to speak to you about—all this is a promise to those who 'wait upon the Lord'. What is it to 'wait upon the Lord'? 'They that wait upon the Lord'—though they moult—'they shall renew their strength. They shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint.' I should like to tell you what I think it is.

The first thing is we must pray. Wait in prayer. Wait and pray. That I say is the first thing—to pray. And then wait for the answer. Wait, wait for the answer. Did you ever shoot an arrow up into the sky very high? Didn't you watch to see where it came down? Do that with your prayers. Send up your prayer and watch to see where it comes down. It may not come where you expected, but it will come somewhere. Whenever you send up a true prayer there will come down the answer somewhere. Wait for it. It may come that day, or a long time afterwards, but it will come at some time. Every real prayer brings the answer. It won't always look the same arrow that you sent up, but some good thing will come back. Wait for it, wait for it.

The next thing I would advise you to do is to pray about your duties. Pray about everything you have to do. If you have any difficulty, pray about it, and wait for the answer. Nothing is too little to pray to God about. If you have a difficult sum to do, if you have a difficult problem to construe, if you have a difficult thing to write, pray to God about it.

There was a great man; he was a poor monk at first, but he rose to be a great man. It was a long time ago; and when he was King of Spain, governing a great part of Spain, his lords and nobles and all the great people assembled one day in his hall, and wanted him to go as king and do something. They waited some time, and at last the door opened. Inside the door was a poor miserable room, with nothing in the room but a place to kneel at. And there was the king kneeling in this little room by himself. When they all seemed surprised he said, 'To pray is to govern.' 'To pray is to govern.' Five words. That is the way to govern—to pray. I should advise every master and mistress, and every king and queen, if I could tell them, that to pray is to govern. If you 'wait upon the Lord,' and get the promise, 'you shall renew your strength; and mount up with wings as eagles'.

Let me advise you another thing when waiting—keep your eye upon God. Think about God. Look at the 123rd Psalm, that tells exactly how we are to do it. The second verse: 'Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress; so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God, until that He have mercy upon us'. What does it mean? 'But they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint.' Think, what does it mean? Supposing I was learning to be a shoemaker, and I wanted to make a shoe, I should look to see how my master made it. Supposing I was a woman, and I had to sew, and my mistress was sewing, I should look at her in order to sew. In the same way that you look to the hand of your master and mistress, you should look to God. Let your eye be fixed upon God. Think about God, and how He wishes you to do things. Then you 'wait upon the Lord'.

One thing more I will tell you about waiting. Every day wait and think, perhaps Jesus will come to-day! He is sure to come some day. A little boy used to jump out of bed every morning and go to the window and look to the east to see whether Jesus was coming. He expected Him every morning. Wait for Him; wait in prayer, wait for the answer, wait by watching what is God's will; wait for Jesus. If you will do that you will 'mount up with wings as eagles'.—JAMES VAUGHAN.

NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND

ISAIAH XLII. 18.

IN the city of London, about sixty years ago, lived a man who, like the youth in the painter's story, had been forgetting God. But he was like him in little else. He had to work for his bread. He had not spent his wages in gambling, nor in attending horse-races, nor in any evil way. The evil in his life was only this: he had ceased to remember God.

God was not in all his thoughts. He went out; he came in; he lay down; he rose up, and never asked God to be with him, or to watch over him, or to bless him. He tried to live and be a husband, father, and workman without God.

But although he had forgotten God, God had not forgotten him. In mercy He sent forth His storm to smite him, and he was smitten; and days came to him in which he had no pleasure; and work failed him; and poverty descended on him; and his home was broken up. Everything had to be sold for bread; and still there came no work. They went to a poorer house; then to a house poorer still. At last, one evening, they found themselves in a miserable cellar, without fire or food, with nothing even to sit upon except a block of wood. The children were crying for bread. 'Bread, father!' they cried in their hunger—and there was no bread. The cry went into the soul of the man, and filled him with despair. And an evil thought came to him on the wings of the despair; and, yielding to that evil thought, he said to himself, as the young man in the painter's story had said: 'It is more than I can bear; in the morning I shall hide myself from these cries and from this poverty which does not end in the friendly depths of the river'. And in the morning he left his home with that evil thought in his soul. He turned from his wife and children, and set his face towards the river.

It was Sunday. The streets were full of people going to morning service. He turned into a side street to escape them, but there were churchgoers there also; and in a back court in that street a church. Perhaps it was the memory of days when he also went to church; perhaps it was the thought, 'I am going into the presence of God, I will worship with His people once more before I go'. He never could tell how it came about; but, ill-dressed and unwashed though he was, and with this evil thought in his heart, he turned with the stream of worshippers into that back court, and into the church there, and sat down in a corner, in the shadow, where he could hear without being seen.

Mr. Parsons, of Leeds, was to preach that day; and this happened to be his text: 'When the poor and the needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I the Lord will hear them, I the God of Israel will not forsake them. I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys. I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water.' And from that text he preached a sermon on deserts, and on putting the God of Israel to the test for the springs in the desert. And among other things he said—and the poor man in the corner thought he looked straight at him as he spoke: 'Oh, my poor brother, thou also art in a desert, in the bleak, bitter desert of poverty. Thou findest it hard to be without money, or work, or bread. Thou thinkest, perhaps, in thy heart, God has set me here for ever; there is no way of escape. Hast thou ever put the God of Israel to the test? What if thou art also in a worse desert—in the desert where the soul has forgotten God? And what if thy poverty be sent to thee to bring God back to thy remembrance, and thyself back to God? Put the God of Israel to the test. Prove Him and see whether He will not turn thy wilderness into a pool, and thy dry land into springs of water.'

It was as if God had spoken. The words of the preacher came into the down-crushed heart of the man, and a good thought began to battle with the evil thought in that heart; and when he came out he turned his back to the river, and set his face once more to his home.

At home there was still the hunger; the cries for bread were there just as before. But the evil thought was gone from the heart of the father, and his soul was groping along the way to God. Taking courage from what he had heard, he said to his wife, 'Liza, suppose we read a bit together?' That brought the tears to her eyes. The Bible he had given her on their wedding day had long since been sold for bread; but there happened to be, on some shelf in that cellar, some leaves of the Old Testament left by those who lived there before; and in these they read. Then, in a little while, when he had found more courage, he said, 'Suppose we try to pray?' and the mother and children knelt down beside him, and he prayed. Out of the depths he cried unto God, 'O God, my father's God, God of my childhood, hear my cry. I have forgotten Thee; and Thou hast brought my children, and my wife, and myself into this wilderness, where there is neither work nor bread. O God, for Jesus' sake, have mercy upon us; and for Thy mercy's sake cause springs to arise in this desert.' Then they all rose from their knees. They were still hungry, but they began to feel that a little gleam of heaven had shone in upon them. And by and by night came, and blessed sleep, and the cries for bread were stilled.

On the very morning after this poor man had put the God of Israel to the test, and when his soul had turned from all evil thoughts, and from forgetting God, he received a letter from a friend. 'There is a great order,' the letter said, 'come to such a shop. If you go there before ten o'clock you are sure of work.' And in a corner of the letter a half-sovereign was folded up.

And from that moment the heavens grew clear for him and his. Just as Jesus stilled the black, howling tempest on Galilee, and made a calm for the fishermen of old, so He stilled the tempest and made peace and joy for this poor man and his house. The money brought bread to the children; and before the hour named in the letter he was engaged, in the shop it told him of, for a long spell of work. And happiness came back to the home. And by and by it was with that home as in days long past, and God was remembered in it, and God blest His servant at its head; and work came to him without stint, and favour of masters along with the work. More wonderful still, the workman became manager; the manager became master; and—better than all—he and his wife and his children became true servants of God.

'It is never too late to mend.' In whatever wilderness men lose themselves, the way out of it is to remember God. Remember God if days should ever come to thee in which thou hast no pleasure, and He will come to thy help. Remember God if evil thoughts have already come into thy heart, and He will send thoughts of heaven in their stead. Pray to Jesus and He will come into your life and still the tempest and turn trouble into joy.

Better still, let those to whom evil days of the kind I have been describing have never yet come, while it is still morning in your life, remember God. Remembering God will keep evil days away from you for ever. It will keep you young and innocent to the end of your years. And by the mercy of God, it will open the door of heaven for you when your years here have come to an end.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Gentle Heart, p. 201.

THE BRUISED REED

'A bruised reed shall He not break, and the smoking flax shall He not quench. And in His name shall the Gentiles trust.'—ISAIAH XLII. 3; MATTHEW XII. 20.

I. The Young Seeker.—Our Saviour is most merciful to all seekers, no matter how bad they may have been before they began seeking. Was there ever a more bruised reed than the thief on the cross, or the prodigal son? How kindly the Divine hand lifted them up and healed them! 'When I wished to become a Christian,' a young disciple said, 'I took to reading the Bible. I found many terrible things in it, but they did not discourage me a bit, for they were all against sin, and I was against sin too. The words about Christ at once gave me all the encouragement that could be. I wondered how any penitent could fail to find hope in the Word of God.

As young seekers are weaker than others, Christ is, if possible, kinder to them. A thoughtful child is easily crushed by the solemn facts of life. You feel very helpless at the mere thought of sin, death, and judgment. But it should fill you with joy that Christ does not crush a bruised reed like you. The two images of our text are as two torches held up over the gospel. Under their united beams you should see the truth clearly. It was an old-world notion that fire was first brought from heaven by Prometheus. That spark of holy desire in your soul certainly came from heaven. I am sure it did not come from the devil, or from the flesh, or from man. Oh, shelter it with both your hands, and do your best to foster it. Take care lest the breath of the corner blow it out. Take care lest it should be quenched by passion. Thank God for it. True, it is like the feeble spark of a flickering lamp; it is hid under earthy ashes, yet it lives. And Christ won't quench it, if you don't, for it is of His own kindling. We get the full meaning of our text only by reading between the lines; the suggestion is far larger than the statement—not the tenth part is told. He will not quench that smoking flax, for why did He kindle it? It owes all its brightness to Him, and to you only its dulness. To raise that spark into a flame is the work on which His heart is set. You are dearer to Him than you are to yourself.

II. The Young Backslider.—You are not to think here of sliding backwards on the ice, for in Bible lands they have no ice on which people can slide backwards. But some of their roads lay over slanting, slippery rocks, down which they sometimes slid, and so were seriously wounded. Such 'slippery places' are in your path. Sometimes you forget, and do the very sins you vowed not to do. And when you think rightly about your backsliding, it seems very sinful and mean; and you mourn over your lost honour and your lost purity. You are a bruised reed that has no power to spring erect. The fifty-first Psalm is the portrait of the penitent backslider. David is a broken reed, not wholly broken away or plucked up by the roots, but sunk in the dust before God. He cannot forgive himself for having sinned amid so much light, and against so good a God. Yet how sweetly he sings of God's gentleness in restoring his bleeding soul. Peter is the bruised reed of a backslider in the New Testament. You remember how Christ looked on him in pity, melted his heart, and healed his backsliding. You should notice that hundreds of the most touching scenes in the Bible are for the comfort of backsliders who are really sorry for their sins. An earthly father cannot pardon an unhumiliated child. To pardon were to ruin him. The proud boy would not take the pardon, but would defy and scorn his father the more. And so our Father in heaven cannot pardon His erring children until they repent; but the moment they repent His compassions flow forth upon them. It is a God-honouring idea that penitents must have two purgatories, one of self-made pain in this world, and one of fire in the world to come; and that great sorrows can take away the guilt of our sins. 'The blood of Jesus Christ—that and nothing else—cleanseth us from all sin.' The bruised reed is not healed by itself, certainly not by its bruises, but by Him who lifts it up. Yet some are more afraid of their remedy than of their disease, and others hope to find their remedy in their disease.

I will give you one specimen of God's way of comforting penitents. 'For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy: I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones' (Isa. LVII. 16). God has two homes: the highest heavens, and the humblest hearts. The part of earth that is nearest heaven is a penitent's heart. Heaven enlarges its border so as to annex the cell of the penitent. Was your soul once a bright well-trimmed lamp, and is it now only a poor smoking wick? With confession of sin bring that wick to the flame of Christ's love, and it will burst into brightness again.

III. The Young Sufferer.—Of the millions of bruised reeds in this world the weakest is a little child in sore pain. It melts your heart to see the imploring little eyes as they follow you, while you feel that you can give no help. No one can tell why there is so much suffering in the world; but we know that God has compassion on the weak. We know that Christ, who was bruised for our iniquities, can feel for all bruised ones. We know that the Holy Ghost is called the Comforter, because He is wholly occupied with comforting the distressed. The Bible is filled with the most striking proofs of tenderness towards all sufferers.

The faith of Christ will make you Christ-like towards broken reeds. The suffering and sorrowing will not find you hard and selfish. When you have power over the weak you will use it in Christ's spirit. Yours will not be the rude touch that might make the spark only a heap of black ashes, but you will gladly do what you can to feed the Divine flame where it is, and to kindle it where it is not.—JAMES WELLS, Bible Images, p. 19.

A PAIR OF COMPASSES

'He marketh it out with the compass.'—ISAIAH XLIV. 13.

Object—A pair of compasses.

A PAIR of drawing compasses to be of service must be accurate, sharp, and firm. They seem to speak to us quietly in forceful words:—

Firm and pointed, tight and true,
Telling of good work all may do.

I. They Suggest Construction.—In drawing the plans for a house, the architect makes all his accurate measurements with this useful instrument. So God, who is sometimes called 'The Great Architect,' measures man, for whom He has planned salvation, by mercy and love.

II. They Suggest Control.—That a child may keep within control evil passions by the power of Faith and Prayer. Two excellent points.

It is said that when the late Dr. Hall found his temper rising that he would pray, 'Lord, control my temper.'

III. They Suggest a Fixed Centre.—If you would make any impression with your compasses, you must find a fixed centre for one arm, and make your mark with the other. Now, take Christ as a centre, and truth as a radius, and you may make worthy impressions of grace and glory for all eternity.

Trust in God,

Fixed on this blissful centre rest.

—A. G. WELER, Sunday Gleams, p. 89.

'I HAVE REDEEMED THEE'

ISAIAH XLIV, 22.

To redeem is 'to buy back'; and our redemption is a buying us out of bondage. We are 'sold under sin,' and God has bought us back with the precious blood of His well-beloved Son. If you will look at the twenty-fifth chapter of Leviticus, from the twenty-third verse, you will find the law by which the land could be redeemed; or those persons who had waxen poor and sold themselves as bondmen—the law of redemption. I will try and put it into the form of a story.

In a little village amongst the hills of Judea there lived a pious Jew who had two sons. He had trained them in the fear of the Lord, and taught them to love each other very tenderly, so that in his old age they were his comfort and joy. Whilst they were yet young men he died, and they buried him in the sepulchre of his fathers. Then Benjamin, who was the younger son, went forth as a merchant; and Jonathan, his brother, tilled the land of his fathers. It was a pleasant home, with the vines clustering about it, and dark-green olive-trees standing around, and rich corn-fields in the valley below. His flocks of sheep spread over the plain, and everything about him prospered. And indeed there would not have been a happier man in all the land than Jonathan, save that he had one sorrow—his brother Benjamin had gone away to what they thought in those times was almost the end of the earth. He had sailed for Spain, and nothing was heard of him for many years.

Thus things went on until one year there came a great drought in the land of Judea. The fields were parched and barren; the olive-trees withered; the vines died; the flocks perished. All Jonathan's substance melted away like snow in the fierce heat of the sun. Month after month the drought lasted, and when it was over he had to borrow money of a rich neighbour to buy corn for seed. 'He that goeth borrowing, goeth sorrowing,' was what Jonathan soon found out. The next harvest was scarce worth the gathering, so that Jonathan had to sell his land to his rich neighbour to pay back part of the money. The old home was his no longer. He could come and look at it with a very sad heart. He heard the laugh of strange children playing in the pleasant courts, and the haughty master passed him proudly. He, without home and without friends, could only stand and look in at what had been his father's house. He dared not set foot in it, for he had waxen poor and fallen into decay, and there was none to buy it back for him. So, with a heavy heart, he went trying his hand at one thing after another, and failing in all. All he had was gone, and at last, partly to pay his debt and partly that he himself might live, he had to sell himself as a bondman, a slave to his rich neighbour. His master had to give him food enough to live on, and some rough clothes, and a shed to sleep in. But he belonged to his master. And though the law did not allow him to be treated like slaves have been in many places, yet he was really a slave. He could not please himself, but had to do just what his master told him.

The law said that if he were able he could redeem himself. But he toiled all day in the hot sun for his master, and had no strength left to do anything to make a little money to buy himself back. So he could only go on working and sorrowing, without any hope of redeeming himself.

If you look at the chapter again you will see that there was another way in which freedom might come to him. If he had a rich relation—a brother, or a son, or an uncle, or a nephew, or a cousin—that kinsman might come and pay down the price of his redemption and buy him back. But as poor Jonathan thought of that, he only sighed very sadly. He knew if Benjamin were living and could help him, that he would spend his last mite in doing it. But he had not heard of him for many years.

And the Bible tells us that we are 'sold under sin,' that we are 'led captive of the devil at his will'. We are 'without strength' to buy ourselves free. We bring out our golden resolutions and our good desires, but they can't redeem us. We try sometimes to break the bonds, and to run away from our hard master, sin, but we cannot. You have read of slaves running away, and going through all kinds of perils to get their liberty. There is a letter in the Bible that Paul wrote to Philemon about a runaway slave. But who can run away from the cruel master that we serve? Who can run away from his sin? It is like the boy who on a moonlight night thought he saw a ghost, and ran away from it as fast as he could run. The faster he went the faster it went. Whenever he turned it followed, until at last he tripped and fell, and then he found out that it was his own shadow. And like our shadows, our sins stick to us. We cannot run away from them. What can we do then? Like Jonathan, we have nobody about us to buy us back. The preacher cannot redeem himself or any of the people. The people cannot redeem each other. Fathers and mothers cannot redeem their children. Where are we to look for a rich kinsman who is able and willing to redeem us?

Now comes a brighter bit of our story. Far off in the land where he dwelt, Benjamin lived all this time in great prosperity. He was a rich merchant, with very many ships. His house was a palace, and kings and princes were glad to make a friend of him and to borrow large sums of his money. But in it all Benjamin was not happy; the beautiful gardens, the palace, the honour of the great men and the friendship of the princes, could not satisfy him. In his dreams he often saw one thing that greatly troubled him. It was a poor slave working in the fierce heat, toiling in the fields that had belonged to his father, and as he looked at that sad face he saw that it was his own brother. At other times he dreamt of his father's house, with its vines and olive-trees; and there would come one dressed as the master of the house, but it was a stranger to Benjamin. And after him there came a wearied, sorrowful slave, and the merchant saw his brother again. Now, what was all his wealth and splendour, if his poor brother was actually a slave? So leaving all the beauties and luxuries of his home, he got on board one of his ships, and set sail for the land of his fathers. He came across the Mediterranean Sea, tossed by wild storms, and once or twice in great peril because of the cruel pirates that lay along the coast. But he did not mind all that in his eager love to his poor brother. At length he landed, and hastened at once for the old home amongst the hills. There it was before him—just the same. The vine covered it, the olive-trees were there, the merry laugh of little children rang from within. What if it were only a dream after all! And with a trembling voice he inquired for Jonathan. Then a stranger appeared in the door. He was the master. His was the house, and his the vineyards, and his the flocks of sheep.

'Is he living, then, who once lived here?' asked Benjamin, with tears. 'Jonathan, is he living still?' 'Jonathan,' cried the stranger, 'he is living, but—'

'God be praised,' said Benjamin.

'But he is waxen poor and fallen into decay, and he has sold himself to me. You will find him at work in my fields.'

'Just as I dreamed, then!' said Benjamin. 'I will go and see him; but first let me tell you that I am his brother, and I come to redeem him.' And he beckoned to the servants to bring the chest of silver that he had brought with him.

The master could not please himself about it. He must take it. The writing was made out, and the money paid. Jonathan was really redeemed. Yet he worked on yonder in the fields as if he had no rich kinsman in all the world.

'Now,' said Benjamin, as soon as that was done, 'I, must redeem the house, the inheritance of my fathers.' Again they made out how much it came to, and again the servants counted the money. Then the house and land and vineyards belonged to him again.

'And now,' cried Benjamin, rising from the table, 'let me go forth and tell him.' His tears shone with very gladness, as if his heart were too full of joy, and ran over at his eyes. He soon came to a poor slave, just such an one as he had seen in his dreams; and pale, thin, grief-stricken, with a few old clothes tied round him, so that Benjamin could scarcely believe that it was really his brother. Brushing away the tears, and trying to hide his feelings as well as he could, he came up to him. 'Jonathan! do you know me?' The poor bondman looked up for a moment, and sadly shook his head. Hope was dead and buried long ago.

'I am Benjamin, your brother, and I have redeemed you,' and the rich merchant threw his arms round the slave's neck, and kissed him and wept.

'Redeemed me!' cried Jonathan, bewildered. 'You Benjamin—and redeemed me!'

'Yes, my poor brother. God be praised! you are your own again. And your father's house, and the land of your inheritance, it is all yours.'

Then Jonathan lifted himself up like a free man, and blessed his brother Benjamin with all his heart, and kissed him, and wept on his neck and blessed him again, and kept saying it over again and again, 'He has redeemed me. It's done. The price is paid, and I am redeemed.'

That very hour Jonathan was a redeemed man. He left the drudgery of the slave. He flung away the rags, and put on fair robes again. He went back to his father's house, and claimed it as his own. It was all his own, vineyards and olive-yards, fields and flocks, asses and oxen. All his own, for his brother had bought him and all of it back from bondage. His brother had redeemed him.

And so to us, in our slavery to sin there comes the 'tidings of great joy'.

With pitying eyes, the Prince of Peace
Beheld our helpless grief;
He saw, and—O amazing love!
He flew to our relief.

He is born in our midst that He may become a Kinsman, a Brother to us all. He comes bringing our ransom price. But He does not bid the angels bring the gold and pearls for our deliverance. He gives Himself a ransom for all. We are redeemed, 'not with corruptible things, such as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ'. And now Jesus comes to us our loving Brother, and He saith, 'I have redeemed thee'.

Now do not let us serve sin any more. Jesus has hought us back from this hard master. It would be no use for the old master to come blustering to Jonathan and ordering him about. Jonathan would cry out, 'Away with you, sir. I have had too much to do with you already. My brother bought me out of your service. He paid the uttermost farthing, and do you think that I shall ever do anything more for you?' We are redeemed that we should no longer serve sin. Jesus has paid it all. And now, whenever the old master, sin, comes up to claim us, let us get up at once and tell Jesus. It is done, all done. Let us put off the rags of our slavery, and let us put on the robes that belong to us. No more pride and ill-temper and selfishness, but the purple and fine linen of love and gentleness, and the white robe of goodness and purity. Jonathan would never keep the iron ring of the fetter on his wrist; that would be broken off directly; and instead of it, very likely a golden bracelet would be placed there by his brother. Fling away all tokens and belongings of the old service. Let us have our hearts filled with love to our blessed Redeemer, and let us wear the golden ornament that He will give us, the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit.

We may be quite sure that Jonathan would never be able to do enough to show all his love to Benjamin. He could never do enough to please him. So let us love Jesus. We are not our own. We belong to Jesus. He hath redeemed us, and redeemed us with His precious blood. Oh, to love Him with all our heart, and to serve Him with all our strength! We can sing with Zacharias of old: 'Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; for He hath visited and redeemed His people . . . that we being delivered out of the hands of our enemies might serve Him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before Him all the days of our life'.

And Jesus by His precious blood has not only bought us back from the hard master, sin; He has bought for us the Father's house too. He has put us in possession of heaven and all its joys. No wonder that around the throne the thousands of saints sing unto Him their rapturous praise, their new song, saying, 'Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by Thy blood'.

In a village in Norway there is the figure of a stork carved on the church, and over many of the houses. This is the beautiful story they tell of it: That in that village once there lived a little lad, named Conrad, and his widowed mother. Every summer a stork came near the house, and built its nest close by. Little Conrad and his mother were very kind to the stork. They fed it and petted it so that it got to know them, and would come whenever Conrad whistled to feed out of his hand. Every spring they watched for it, and when it came it seemed as glad to see them as they were to welcome it. Spring and summer chased each other, until Conrad was grown up to be a young man. Then he said he would go to sea, and make money enough to come back and keep his mother in her old age. So he went as a sailor, and set out for a distant land. All went well for many weeks, but one day when they were near to the coast of Africa, a number of cruel pirates swarmed around in their boats, and climbed up the ship's sides. They took possession of the ship, and put the sailors in chains, and afterwards sold them as slaves.

Weeks went by. The widow began to be afraid about her boy, it was so long since they had heard of him. Ships had come and gone, and brought no tidings of him. At last they gave up all hope of seeing him again, and mourned for him as drowned, and all the village pitied the lonely mother in her grief. As for her, the only thing that seemed to interest her at all was the stork as it came each year. For Conrad's sake she welcomed it and fed it, until the autumn came, and it flew away into the sunny south.

Now it chanced that one day as poor Conrad toiled away at his dreary work in some lonely place, a stork came flying close to him, wheeling about him with great delight. In a moment the scene flashed on him of his home and of his mother and their yearly visitor. Scarcely knowing what he did, he whistled as he used to do to call the bird long ago. To his delight, the stork came at once close to him, as if to be fed. Conrad lifted up his heart to God, and with tears gave thanks that so dear an old friend should have found him there. Day after day he saved what he could from his wretched meal, for the joy of calling the bird to feed at his hand. But Conrad's heart grew sad again as the time came for the bird to fly away to the north. Was it going to his mother's cottage? Was the nest there still that he remembered so well? Was there any to welcome it now and any to feed it? Then it occurred to him, Why, this bird may help me to get away from this vile place. He managed to write on a scrap of paper a line or two, telling where he was, and that he was a slave, and then he tied it firmly around the bird's leg.

The spring came again, and with it the stork. The old widow's eye lit up as it came, reminding her of her lost boy, and tenderly she welcomed it and fed it. And as it took the food from her hand, she caught sight of this strange letter tied at its leg. Curiously removing it, think of her joy when she found that it was from her son! Forth with the tidings she ran to the minister of the little parish to tell him of the news. It quickly spread through the village. They must send and redeem Conrad, was what everybody said. The next Sunday morning the people brought their money to the church, and each gave what he could for the widow's son. Then one was sent to the king to lay the case before him, and to get a ship of war from him that the pirates would not dare to touch. It took a long time in those days to send to Africa, and there to recover Conrad from his slavery. But before the stork had flown, the bells of the village church had rung and all the people rejoiced with a great joy, for the widow's son was redeemed, and was safely at home again in his mother's cottage. Such is the story they tell of the stork in that Norwegian village.

And thus from the bondage of sin and the evil of our hearts we can cry to the King for His help. Prayer is the white-winged bird that can bear our message right up to the Father's house. And an answer shall come. Jesus, the King's Son, comes to redeem us. But lo! for us He gives Himself, a ransom for us all!

To Him let us look with all our hearts. And ever let us please and love Him who in His wonderful love says to each of us, 'I have redeemed thee'.—MARK GUY PEARSE, Sermons for Children, p. 86.

SELFISHNESS

'I am, and none else beside Me.'—ISAIAH XLVII. 8.

THE human heart is like a garden, in which would grow various kinds of plants, some bearing beautiful fragrant flowers and delicious fruit, others useless, or worse even than useless, giving nothing but poisonous venom.

Amidst the latter, one is so particularly dangerous that I shall describe it to-day, so that you may endeavour to root it out whenever you meet with it. It is a weed which grows as easily as dog's grass, and bears to it a striking resemblance. Its roots spread far under the ground, shooting in all directions, imbibing the most nutritive essences. It is so deep-rooted that even the smallest particle, if left in the earth, soon produces a fresh plant. It grows in any soil, under any climate, and in all seasons. This weed which springs in the heart of man from his earliest childhood, do you know its true name? It is selfishness, that natural tendency of every man to speak and to think only of himself, setting his own pleasure or his own interest above that of others. It was the sin of that proud city of Babylon to which apply the words of my text. It is the root of many other sins, and if I spoke to grown-up persons instead of speaking to children, I might easily prove to them that it is the root of all others, the receptacle which keeps them alive.

One day there rose from the depths of the seas, before the Prophet Daniel, a multitude of beasts, each more hideous the one than the other, so all the crimes, all the follies which take place upon earth, arise from the depths of human selfishness, as from the depths of the seas arose those monsters which the prophet describes in his sublime visions. In struggling against that particular sin, we struggle against all others, nipping them in the bud, and destroying their first cause.

You are all willing, I hope, to fight this terrible enemy of your souls, which I might call the father of sin, and it is but fair that you should be thoroughly armed for the struggle. Selfishness has different shapes and names, and the large family of egotists can be divided into different classes. They are well worth studying, and we shall do so together.

I. I shall speak first of those whose talk is only of themselves, saying, 'I have done this, I know this'. If you relate a story, they are sure to have another touching themselves, which they will begin before yours is half done. If you say such and such a thing has happened to anybody, they will hasten to relate what has happened to themselves, considering it much more interesting. They never lose an opportunity of speaking about their plans, their business, and their interests, and they have such a desire to push themselves forward, that they had rather display their faults and their follies than remain silent. Hardly have you begun speaking on a subject than they interrupt you with, 'Just the same thing happened to me', or, 'It is just the same with me'; and on they go, speaking of that precious self, which is always uppermost in their thoughts. If you have read an interesting book, they are sure to have read one still more interesting. If you have enjoyed your walk, do not attempt to describe it, their own is sure to have been pleasanter. Do you happen to be in trouble, why, they have troubles of their own also; how came you to forget them, and to speak of anything else?

I hope that you perceive all the foolishness of that sort of selfishness which has given birth to the word 'egotism'. Watch carefully over yourselves, and when you talk, avoid the pronouns of the first person. They have been the cause of more faults than many a difficult grammatical rule. It is the frequent use made of them by some people that has inspired the well-known saying, 'Self is odious'; and, in fact, a man who can talk of nothing but himself, is soon unbearable, everybody avoids him, and he is left alone with that precious self. Think and speak of yourselves as little as possible; it is a rule worth gold.

II. I shall now say a few words about another class of egotists—about those who are so attached to their property, that they rarely give or even lend anything. I can hardly call them stingy, as they are always ready to spend for themselves, and yet, as I have already said, if you ask them to give or to lend anything, they will be almost unable to do so. That sort of selfishness is frequently met with, both amongst young and old, rich and poor. Look at this little girl, who holds her doll so tightly; do you think she is afraid that any one should take it from her? No, but she is unwilling to lend it to her sister. Those small rosy hands which hold the doll are selfish hands! And that boy, who has just received from his godfather a box full of sweetmeats, why is he sitting alone in a corner? Look at him, dipping his hand over and over again in his box, hastening to eat his sweetmeats, so that there may be none left when his mamma shall ask him to share them with others! Is he not selfish? And that well-dressed young gentleman who has evidently been eating a good breakfast at home, and who with his well-filled purse passes by the poor little beggar boy, who stands barefooted, shivering, and hungry, without giving him a penny, what do you think of him? The thought may have struck him that it would be right to do so, for the boy had followed him, whispering, 'Oh, give me a penny, please! I am so hungry'. But with that penny our young gentleman will buy a spinning top for himself, and he hastens away, hoping, perhaps, to hush the inward voice which cries to him, 'Egotist, egotist'.

III. We shall now speak of those egotists who, secluding themselves from society, indifferent to others, live exclusively for themselves. Requiring nothing but peace and quiet, they are only happy as long as they are left undisturbed in their selfish solitude, neither caring nor troubling themselves about what happens around them. Letting the world go its own way, they see with an equally indifferent eye the form of government, be it republic or monarchy, the welfare of the working classes, the progress of instruction and of morality. Peaceful and happy in the pleasant retreat they have chosen, they have settled their lives according to their tastes, doing the same thing every day, and at the same hour. Nobody would ever think of asking them anything, or of meddling in their affairs, no more than they meddle in those of others, and yet they consider themselves supremely happy.

IV. I shall say a few words before finishing of a fourth class of egotists. I allude to those who, though requiring a great deal, and setting their tastes, their habits, and their interests above those of all others, are nevertheless rarely satisfied. Do they ever show any consideration for others? No, indeed; and it is one of the characteristics of their selfishness, to give little and to require a great deal. I am sorry to say it is a common failing with children. They take it for granted that they are to have kind parents to watch and care for them, and even to give them from time to time an unexpected treat; but do they show in return the regard and the consideration which their parents have every right to expect? Do they never lose an opportunity of proving their gratitude? How many children are there whose first thought in the morning is, 'What can I do to-day to please my father or my mother? How could I make their life easier or pleasanter?' It is a mistake too common amongst men, that the less they give and the more they get, the happier they are, and it is only in promoting the happiness of others that we can secure our own. Not only will sacrifice purify your souls, but it will make you all the richer in the end.—A. DECOFFER, Sermons for Children, p. 82.

GARDEN OF THE LORD

ISAIAH LI. 3.

'AND He will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord.' This was a real, definite, precious promise to Israel, to those who sought, followed, and obeyed the Lord, and such is the Lord's promise to all who in like manner trust Him. He will make our hearts and lives 'The garden of the Lord'. If this is to be our experience whether we are adults or children, five things must be done.

I. There are Weeds to be Removed—Nature.—Sin, selfishness, falsehood, and disobedience are all weeds. But Jesus can take them all away. Ask Him! (1 John i. 7).

II. There is Life to be Nourished—Grace.—Life must first be put into the garden, and then nourished. The seed sown, watered, and cared for. Life must first be put in the heart by the Holy Spirit and then nourished by the Word. Jesus is the Life (1 John v. 11, 12).

III. There are Flowers to be Cultivated—Beauty.—Flowers are earth's ornaments of brightness and joy. So are the virtues of the Christian life—humility, meekness, kindness, and charity (Isa. xxxv. 1, 2).

IV. There are Fruits to be Gathered—Blessing.—Fruit is the evidence of life, and the end of toil and labour. So the fruit of grace in the heart is love, joy, peace, etc. (Gal. v. 22).

V. There are Blessings to be Enjoyed—Reward.—The joy of possession, the interests of life and growth, fellowship in work, and the gladness of fruit and reward. An earnest, happy Christian life gives joy to God (Zeph. iii. 17). God is the Owner, the Planter, the Gardener, and will enjoy the fruits of His own love for ever, and we are allowed to share the joy and glory with Him.—C. EDWARDS, Tin Tacks for Tiny Folks, p. 52.

'WITH HIS STRIPES WE ARE HEALED'

ISAIAH LIHI. 5.

THE wonderful thing about this chapter is that it tells the story of Christ's life and death as if the person telling it had been living when Christ lived. And yet it was written seven hundred years before Jesus was born.

Seven hundred years before the Saviour came God told Isaiah of His coming, and told him all He was to suffer.

Then Matthew and others wrote it down after He came.

There are many things in this chapter which you might try to find out.

There is the name of Christ; there is a portrait of Christ; there is an account of the birth of Christ; there is a description of the way people spoke about Christ; and there is the death of Christ, and His burial, and His future glory.

But it is only one thing of all the things in the chapter I am going to try to make plain to you.

It is said here that Jesus died for us. It is also said that it is by His dying for us that you and I are to be made good.

'With His stripes we are healed.'

Now I think almost every child understands this much: that Jesus did not deserve to die. If it had not been for our sakes, He need not have died. He died to save us from death and from being condemned for our sins by God at the judgment day.

For this purpose God laid on Him the iniquity of us all.

But what you do not know so well is that it is by His dying for us that we are to be made good.

'With His stripes we are healed.'

Now try to listen. It is a hard thing to understand, but it is an easy thing to feel. And what I am going to relate may help to make this plain to you.

In a particular district of France there is a school for poor boys who have neither father nor mother to care for them, and who run homeless about the streets.

It is a very good school, and the boys who enter it are cared for and helped to become good men.

But sometimes bad boys get in, and boys who will not try to be better. A boy of this sort one day stabbed another in the arm with a knife.

Now in that school they have two very wonderful rules: First. Bad boys, when they do mischief, are tried by the scholars, not by the masters. And the sentence the other boys passed on this cruel lad was that he should be kept three weeks in a dark cell, and fed on bread and water.

Second. But in this school substitutes are allowed in punishments. Any boy may come forward and say, I will bear the punishment to which an evil-doer has been sentenced.

And when the sentence was pronounced, the question was asked whether any boy was willing to bear this punishment.

And to the surprise of all the school the boy whose arm had been stabbed stepped forward and said, 'I will bear it in his stead'.

And that was agreed to, but the master said, 'The criminal must take the bread and water to the cell'.

And the boy whose arm had been stabbed went into the cell to bear the punishment. And the boy who stabbed him carried the bread and water three times a day to the cell.

He went through his task six days. But then he broke down; three times every day to see the pale face of the boy he had stabbed in prison for him made him see how cruel he had been, and he came to the master and insisted on bearing the rest of the punishment himself.

So Christ's sufferings show us that it was the sin of the world which made Jesus willing to die. 'And He died for us.'—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 76.

'WHILE HE MAY BE FOUND'

ISAIAH LV. 6.

'SEEK,' or come to, 'The Lord while He may be found.'

'Call upon,' or come to, 'The Lord while He is near.'

What are we to understand by such words?

Is God only sometimes to be found by those who seek Him?

Is God only sometimes near when we call?

Now I really do not know that I can make this plain to you. But the truth is—there is a time when God is to be found.

And then there is a time when He is not to be found.

There is a time when He is near.

Then—after that—there is a time when He is not near.

At one of the New York Prayer Meetings a young school rose up and said, 'Seek the Lord now—now, while He may be found.'

'I had a shipmate who was always going to begin to seek the Lord, and always putting it off. He really meant to begin some day. But at Panama he took the marsh fever. "Oh, Ned," I said to him on his sick-bed, "seek the Lord now." "'Tis too late now," said Ned, and died.'

And continuing, he said:—

'And shall I tell you how I myself was brought to know that there is a time when He will not be found?

'My mother pled with me to give myself to Christ, but I always said, "Time enough yet, mother".'

'But one Sunday I heard my mother asking a neighbour's daughter to come with her to church. She said, "I cannot go till next Sunday, when I shall have my new bonnet".'

'And next Sunday she was in her grave.'—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 96.

GREEDY DOGS

'Yea, they are greedy dogs which can never have enough.'—

ISAIAH LVI. 11.

I. 'GREEDY dogs' always want the best bits for themselves. They like to fare better than all the rest. They will quarrel with any cat or dog or man who tries to filch their dainties. They will even steal another's food if it looks better than their own. Is not that exactly like some boys and girls? I won't tell you their names; but I will tell you of some of the things they do. At a party they always scramble for the best places; at dinner they always cry out for the best bits. They want their pudding to be all plums, and their cake all currants. If you offer them an apple—they choose the largest on the plate; a toy—they choose the very prettiest; a book—they choose the handsomest and best. They never leave the best for anyone else. Their greediness makes them try to grab all the good things for themselves. Very small children may be forgiven their selfishness. They are not old enough to know better. They will cry for the moon, and try to grasp everything in their tiny hands. But as we grow older we ought to grow wiser, and learn to be better than the 'greedy dogs'. We cannot all have the best things, and we should be willing to give other people a turn. It is said of Frederick Denison Maurice, who was a great preacher and teacher, that his sweet disposition was conspicuous even in his childhood. Generosity seemed as natural to him as selfishness to other children. One day, when he was five years old, he came into the family room with a biscuit in one hand and a flower in the other. A gentleman who was present said to Frederick's mother, 'Now we will see what he likes best; children always give up what they least care for'. Then turning to the child, he said, 'Frederick, which will you give me—the flower or the biscuit?' 'Choose which you like,' answered the boy, holding out both his hands. That was a right and noble spirit. He was willing that another should choose the best; he was not a 'greedy dog,' trying to keep the nicest things for himself, and I want you to be generous boys and girls after that fashion.

II. 'Greedy dogs' always keep their good things to themselves. Their motto seems to be 'Get all you can, and keep all you can'. Did you ever notice a dog with a bone? He looks round every second with a suspicious growl; and if another dog approaches, you don't find him offering to go shares. Not he! He snarls, and shows his teeth, and looks very vicious, and the sooner the new-comer disappears the better it is for him. He will get a bite of the wrong sort if he is not quick. We do not blame dogs for acting so, 'it is their nature'; but boys and girls should know better and do better. They should be like King Alfred. The story tells how often he was in sore straits when pursued by the Danes, and at one time was brought so low that he and the queen had only a single loaf of bread. That day a poor man came and knocked at the door and asked for charity. 'We have only got one loaf; it is not enough for ourselves,' said the queen. But King Alfred replied, 'Give him half of it; he is a Christian'. And they gave him half. How much nobler it is to go shares, like the king, than to stick to what you have got, like the dog! Then be not dog-like, but king-like, and make it a rule to go shares with your pleasures and comforts and possessions. Don't keep them all to yourselves, but give some of them away. Don't be greedy, but generous.

III. 'Greedy dogs' are very careless of the needs of others. As our text goes on to say, 'They all look to their own way, every one for his own gain'. They never put themselves out to help the needy. So, too, selfish men and women are absorbed in their own aims and pursuits, and deaf to the cry, blind to the sorrow, regardless of the needs of their less fortunate brethren. They make 'Take care of No 1' their ruling principle in life. So long as they prosper, they care not who goes to the wall. But this is both cruel and shameful. It is only worthy of 'greedy dogs,' and is a disgrace to any man or woman, boy or girl. Jesus Christ teaches us to give up our own pleasure, to sacrifice our own ease, to set aside our own desires, and by so doing we can help or bless another. A gentleman was waiting one evening outside the railway station at Leeds, when a ragged, dirty boy came up to him, with 'Buy an evening paper, sir. Please do, good gentleman. Only seven left, and they's all my profit.' He had a right honest face, but he was ragged and wet, and the gentleman said, 'Why, boy, you have no cap on this rainy night. Have you no cap to wear?' 'Yes, sir,' was the reply, 'I've got a cap, but I lent it to my sister.' 'Where is she?' 'Over there, sir, in that old doorway, waiting till I sell out.' 'But she has no cap on, my lad; where is it?' 'Oh, sir, she's got no boots or stockings, so I told her to put her feet inside my cap to keep 'em warm, and prevent her ketchin' a cold. Have a paper, sir, please: 'twouldn't hurt you to buy the lot.' You may be sure he did not plead in vain. What a brave, generous hero he was! He did not think of himself at all; he only thought of his little sister; and he was quite willing to stand bareheaded in the pouring rain so that her feet might be kept cosy and warm. What a happy world this would be if all were like him!

Jesus Christ thought not of 'self' when He left heaven for earth, and lived, toiled, and died for poor and sinful men. His heart was full of love, and He laid down His life for the sake of others. Then let us pray and strive to be like Him. It is shameful to be 'greedy dogs'. It is Christlike to be unselfish, generous, and loving; nor could higher praise be given.—G. HOWARD JAMES, Talks to Young Folk, p. 7.

A WATERED GARDEN

'Thou shalt be like a watered garden.'—ISAIAH LVIII. 11.

I. What a Watered Garden is Like.—Good amusement for children, 'Bible Pictures'. Some one draws a picture in words out of Bible, the rest guess. Let me draw one now and see if you can guess it.

[A land, pleasant but wild. In all directions things seem left to themselves. Trees, shrubs, grass, all growing wild and untended. In this wilderness a solitary man; he seems to be waiting—wondering how he came there. I look round, and off, in the east, where the sun rose not so long ago, some one seems to be at work; space is being cleared, new trees and shrubs planted, order taking the place of confusion. Presently the worker comes to the man out in the wilderness, and leads him to the place which he has planted. As we go with him we see it is a pleasant garden; in it is every tree pleasant to sight and good for food; in all directions it is watered by rivers. Here the man is settled as the gardener; told to dress it, and to keep it.]

There is the picture. Now what garden? Who planted it? Who had to keep it? How was it watered? (Gen. 11. 8-15.) That was the most beautiful garden that ever was seen; planted by God, well watered, and with Adam as the gardener. The gardener, too, had God to teach him how to do his work—how to train and dress the plants properly, and how to get them well watered.

So then this garden, and the same is true of other flourishing gardens, was well planted, well watered, and well looked after.

II. How we may be Like Watered Gardens.—Our hearts are gardens.

1. God has planted them.

What with? The seeds of graces, love, faith, hope, patience, gentleness, humility. May come up in beautiful flowers and fruits. [May illustrate, by anecdote or otherwise, the character of these flowers and fruits of the Spirit.]

2. The Holy Spirit is at hand to water them (cf. John vii. 37-39).

Like a beautiful river—the river of the Water of Life—proceeding out from under God's throne, and flowing down through the streets of the city of God (Rev. xxii. 1), always ready for use (Rev. xxii. 17).

3. We are the gardeners who have to look after them.

God will teach us (see the words before our text); then under His teaching we have—

(1) To dress. See that the plants get all the help they want, and are properly watered. Remember graces grow by exercise.

(2) To keep, i.e. guard, clear off evil thoughts and bad habits, as gardener clears off slugs and snails, and guards against birds who steal the seeds.

Our best garden-tool is prayer; that, at any rate, is the handle which fits all tools.

III. If not Like Watered Gardens, What Then ?

—Our hearts, planted by God, Holy Spirit at hand to water God's plants; if the plants are withering, or the seeds not coming up, whose fault must it be? Isaiah tells us about something of the kind. [Picture out from Isa. v. 5, 6.] Because the gardener would neglect his garden, it had to be made a wilderness again, and not even the rain allowed to water it! Well to remember what may happen if we are not watchful. How are you keeping your garden? Are God's flowers blowing there, and His fruits ripening as they should do?—C. A. GOODHART, Hints and Outlines for Children's Services, p. 77.

THE LORD'S REMEMBRANCERS, AND GOING THROUGH THE GATES

'Ye that make mention of the Lord ("the Lord's Remembrancers"), keep not silence.

'And give Him no rest, till He establish, and till He make Jerusalem a praise in the earth.

'Go through, go through the gates; prepare ye the way of the people; cast up, cast up the highway; gather out the stones; lift up a standard for the people.'—ISAIAH LXII. 6, 7, 10.

THESE may appear at first sight strange words.

They are a call made to some persons, named 'the Lord's Remembrancers'. And what do you think they are asked to do? It seems a bold demand. 'To give the Great God no rest till He grants a request! When you are very anxious to get anything from your father or mother, you give them 'no rest' till you obtain it. What is it, then, these Pleaders beseech God so earnestly about? It is about Jerusalem: and to 'make Jerusalem a praise in the earth'.

The verses bring before us three pictures. They give us three representations of Jerusalem. Let me speak about each of these.

I. The first picture is that of The Captive Jews Seated Mournfully 'by the Rivers of Babylon'.—I spoke to you so very lately, and at length, on this very topic, that I shall not dwell upon it now. Let me just say, that at the very time these exiles—fathers and mothers and children—were saying through their tears, 'When, oh when, shall we be back again to our own loved Jerusalem?' God answers their prayer. He says to them in this beautiful chapter of Isaiah, 'You shall all once more return, and that very soon'. He tells them He Himself loves Jerusalem so much, that He calls it His 'crown of glory':

as if that far-off city, though in ruins, with its walls all battered and broken, was to Ilim like a sparkling diadem which He delighted to wear. He tells them that its tumbled-down walls will be rebuilt: its fallen Temple restored; and the holy incense ascend again from its altars. He tells them also (in ver. 10) that the time is coming when Babylon's great gates of brass would be thrown open, and these 'Remembrancers' spoken of in the text—God's own servants—the prophets of the Captivity—would be heard joyfully saying, "'Go through, go through the gates!' Take out all these huge stones to make a passage for the beasts of burden: make straight the roads; level the desert which lies between, and prepare a pathway for the Lord's ransomed ones.' The little children too, if they cannot lend a helping hand in removing the piles of rock and the desert stones, can at least join the happy company, and share the joyful prospect of being within the gates of Jerusalem once more: for in our former text on this same subject we are told that 'the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof' (Zech. vii. 5).

II. The second picture is The Jerusalem of the Future.—At this day, as you all know, Jerusalem (just as it was in the time of which I have been speaking) is poor and downtrodden. Its ancient renown and beauty and glory are gone. (Oh, how gone!) When I was there, I could hardly bear to walk along its filthy, gloomy lanes and streets. Raggedness and beggary and desolation reign within the walls, the howl of the leper is heard without; a barren country around. 'Where,' I asked in vain, 'are the old joyous vineyards? Where the fat oliveyards? Where the bleating sheepfolds? Where, above all, the happy children in the Temple crying, "Hosanna to the Son of David"?'

But this chapter of the prophet tells me there is a day coming when these walls and houses are to be all restored; when (ver. 4) that 'forsaken one' shall be called Hephzibah (i.e. 'delighted in her'), and that 'desolate one' will be called Beulah (i.e. 'married'); when the spectacle shall be no longer witnessed of the Jew, as I have seen him, beating his forehead against the 'wailing-wall' of his ancient Temple; and saying in the bitterness of his heart, 'How doth the city sit solitary that was full of people?'

The nation of Israel are now scattered throughout the wide world—a hissing and a byword and a proverb among the nations'. In the first picture of our text we behold them hanging their harps on the willows of the Euphrates. There is now scarce a river in all the world on whose banks their broken harps may not be seen, and their wandering feet may not be found, and their wailing cry may not be heard: the Thames, the Tiber, the Danube, the Nile, the Ganges. But the day is coming when they too shall listen, as their forefathers did, to the words, 'Go through, go through the gates!' When the darkness that has for ages settled over that once

'delightful land' will be driven away; and as it is said in the opening verse of this same chapter, 'the righteousness thereof shall go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth'.

III. The third picture is the glory, not of Jerusalem the capital of Palestine, but The Glory of the Spiritual Jerusalem, the Church of Christ throughout all the world: and that, more especially in days yet to come.

This glory of the Church to which Isaiah refers, was so far displayed at the first advent of Jesus. The world had been for ages in thick darkness; but when He was born, angels could sing over it, 'Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee!' The salvation which the Saviour brought to our earth was like a burning lamp in a midnight of gloom (ver. 1).

Truer and better still will all this be, in happy days yet to dawn, when heathen lands now in the shadow of death, shall see a glorious light; when heathen portals, now closed and barred against the Prince of Peace, shall be thrown open; and the cry shall be heard and answered as it has never been before, 'Go through, go through the gates!' 'Open ye the gates, that the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in' (Isa. xxvi. 2). The cry, as foretold in this chapter, shall be carried from kingdom to kingdom and from shore to shore, 'Behold thy salvation cometh' (ver. 11).

Now, we should all pray for this. We are told here to do so. What are Isaiah's own words? Listen again to them, 'Ye that make mention of the Lord' (or, as I have already adopted the rendering given in the margin of your Bibles, 'Ye who are the Lord's Remembrancers').

To whom does this name apply? Well. God may have more special 'Remembrancers': His prophets of old; His ministers now. But, you too can have part in that glorious and honoured word and work! Yes, wonderful as it may seem, the youngest here can be a 'Remembrancer'; the youngest here can pray.

What a beautiful name for a child—'the Lord's Remembrancer!' that is, 'one who keeps God in mind of His promise'. Your earthly father has promised to do some kind act for you. You come and seat yourself on his knee and remind him of it; so God, our Heavenly Father, has promised glorious things to His Church. You remind Him of His sure and faithful word. 'Ye (says the prophet) who are "the reminders of God," keep not silence, and give Him no rest, till He establish—and till He make Jerusalem a praise in the earth!'

Happy time! and how well worth praying for! When a great multitude, pointing to the now closed gates of the world, shall be heard saying, 'Go through, go through!' When rejoicing millions shall sing the old Hosanna of the Temple children, 'Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord!' 'Praise the Lord, O Jerusalem, praise thy God, O Zion, for He hath strengthened the bars of thy gates; He hath blessed thy children within thee!' (Ps. cxlvii. 12, 13). Yes, Jesus shall then be welcomed as Prince of Peace; and the whole earth shall be filled with His glory.—J. R. MACDUFF, Hosannas of the Children, p. 313.

THOUGHTFUL HELPFULNESS

'Gather out the stones.'—ISAIAH LXII. 10.

MANY years ago, when the Jews were in captivity away from their own land across the Asiatic desert, and they had lost heart, fearing that they would never return to their homes again, one brave man kept his courage strong, and he said to his companions: 'Oh, friends, better days are coming; God will take us home again; we are not going to remain here, exiles and slaves, for ever. I see plainly a vision of us all crossing the desert.' And in this chapter you have his word-painting as plainly as painter could put it on his canvas. As we read these verses, we see the navies doing hard work, digging up the road through the desert; and there are the rest of the people preparing and smoothing the way; and there are the children. What are they doing? Ah! that is the text—Gathering out the stones. The strong men doing all the hard work, and the little children gathering out the stones.

Those of you who ride bicycles know what a nuisance stones can be. And the little child who gathers the stones out of the way does a good turn for all who travel. Now, what are the little helps you can render? I cannot tell you one-millionth part as well as you know yourself. Sometimes there is baby to mind because mother is tired. Sometimes there is a button to sew on. Sometimes there is orange peel to be taken off the side walk, lest some one should trip. Sometimes there is peace to be made between two of your school-fellows. Sometimes your brother comes home from school and says, 'Oh, this work is so hard; I can never, never get through it'; and you say, 'Oh, don't be a cry-baby; here, let me help you'. That is gathering out the stones.

I know a tiny little girl to whom a lady visitor once said, 'When you grow up you'll be a great help and comfort to mother, won't you?' And she piped up with, 'Please, I am a help and a comfort to mother now'. 'What! Such a midget as you?' 'Yes, I am.' And away she went to find the doll that she had not seen for an hour; the poor thing had tumbled off the sofa, so she undressed him, put on his bed-gown, tied a rag round his damaged head, and just as she had tucked him under the sheet, mother came in looking very tired, sat down and took up her sewing as if it were a tiresome duty. And her little girl jumped up and kissed her on both cheeks, and cried, 'Mother, I do love you so!' And her mother replied softly, 'My little darling, what a comfort you are!' And all the clouds were helped away.

I wonder if all of you know that brother means he who helps, and sister means she who pleases and comforts?

I wonder if you can feel the beauty that there is in those sad lines written by a lady :—

So many gods, so many creeds,
So many paths that wind and wind ;
While just the art of being kind
Is all the sad world needs.

I do not want to stand here in this pulpit and say to you in the pews, 'Always be trying to take stones out of people's ways'. I do not think anybody in the world is more disagreeable than a person irritatingly and aggressively meddling, who is always getting in the way through trying to help when he cannot really give any help.

In a railway carriage a most obliging man, when the train stopped and a rough-and-tumble boy got out, saw a bundle where the boy had been sitting, and called out, 'Take your bundle with you ; don't leave it here'. And he threw it out of the window. A good lady who was with him, said, 'Ah, young man, what are you doing? Those are my best "going-to-meeting" clothes.' You see, he had been trying to help, but it was a pity he had not thought a little more carefully first.

Children sometimes try to help without thought. Then they are a great nuisance. When the opportunity comes, do the best you can. Take the stone out of the way, but be very sure that some one has not put it there for some good purpose that you don't understand. Perhaps there is a meaning in the stone being there which you do not understand. Think ; use your brain as well as your heart.

A very good man died a little time ago, and a lady who loved him very much was telling her child how their dear friend was gone to heaven. She replied, 'Oh, mother, how happy the angels must be to have him with them!'—B. J. SNELL, The Good Father, p. 137.

GOD OUR MOTHER

'As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you.'
—ISAIAH LXVI. 13.

How does a mother comfort? And how does the Lord comfort like a mother?

I. The Lord Comforts, like a Mother, by His Presence.—In the family circle, and especially when the children are young, the mother is always at hand. She is the queen of the home. The house is not itself—it feels dull and cold—when she is absent from it. Her very presence is a comfort and a joy to her children.

It is so also with God. He is 'not far from every one of us, for in Him we live, and move, and have our being'. And although our sins have separated between us and God, and put us 'far off' from Him, we have been 'made nigh by the blood of Christ'. The Lord has promised never to leave nor forsake those who are His sons by faith in Jesus.

II. The Lord Comforts, like a Mother, by His Words.—A child's first teacher is his mother. He receives from her lips his earliest and most sacred lessons about the most important of all subjects, God, and life, and duty. Her voice is sweet music in his ears. When at any time the child is discouraged, his mother's words are an effectual comfort to him. When he has been naughty, her remonstrances bring him to penitence ; while her counsels help him to be good, and to resolve to follow the right. Many a grown young man, amid the strong temptations of city life, has been kept from falling into sin by the memory of his mother taking his hand in hers when he was a little child, and teaching him to say on his knees before her, 'Our Father which art in heaven, lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil'.

Now God comforts His people by His words, just like a mother. How often, in Bible times, when He showed Himself to His saints, and they were troubled, did He gently say to them, 'Fear not!' 'Fear not, Abram'; 'Fear not, Zacharias'; 'Fear not, Mary'; 'Fear not ye'. And still, when we go to the Lord in prayer, and confess our sins to Him, or tell Him our troubles, He speaks to our hearts comfortable words, such as these: 'Fear thou not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God: I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of My righteousness'. Holy Scripture is the Word of God; and if we choose it for our companion, we shall have His voice always in our ears. 'When thou goest, it shall lead thee; when thou sleepest, it shall keep thee; and when thou wakest, it shall talk with thee.'

III. The Lord Comforts, like a Mother, by His Sympathy.—A child speaks out all his joys and sorrows without reserve to his mother. He takes home the prize-books which he receives at school, and places them in her hands, and finds the chief reward of his diligence in her approving smile. He turns to her too, very promptly and earnestly, in all his pain and weariness. We remember the little son of the Shunammite lady, who was carried home from the harvest-field ill with sunstroke: 'He sat on his mother's knees till noon, and then died'. We remember also the woman of Canaan in the New Testament, who came to the Lord Jesus seeking help for her demoniac daughter: her prayer was, 'Have mercy on me,' for, in her yearning motherly sympathy, she made her child's sorrow entirely her own.

Such also is the love and tenderness of God our Mother. The comfort which He imparts is healing and gladdening. His love is a brooding love. As the mother eagle, when she is teaching her young ones to fly, 'taketh them, beareth them on her wings,' and receives them on her outstretched pinions when their own strength fails, so does the Lord with His people. And He is ready to love all men with a mother's love, and to care for all with a mother's tenderness.—CHARLES JERDAN, Messages to the Children, p. 284.

JEREMIAH

THE MOUSE-EAR

JEREMIAH I.

THERE is nothing which people, both old and young, take so long to learn as the kind of work which is best worth doing for God.

What most people want to be doing is some great thing—something that prophets, and apostles, or great heroes and heroines have done. But a little thing, a common everyday thing, such a thing as we require to do out of everybody's sight, in our daily duties, at the fireside, or in the school—that seems a poor kind of work to be called to do. Naaman's servants saw that thought in their master's face when he refused to go and wash in Jordan. 'Master,' they said, 'if the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldst thou not have done it?' It took some time to bring him to reason, and make him see that the little thing he was bid to do was the best thing he could do.

But there are people of a quite different sort, people who shrink away from great work—even from the thought of great work—humble people who have poor ideas of themselves, and never aspire to do great things. People of this sort say, 'Great things are not for us to do'. It was something like that Jeremiah said when God asked him to go and speak for Him to his fellow-men. 'Ah, Lord God!' he said, 'I am but a child.'

If Jeremiah had been older, or better acquainted with God's word, it would not have seemed to him so difficult. But when God called him, and bade him go forth and speak to men about heaven, his heart failed him. 'Ah, Lord God!' he said, 'I cannot be of use to Thee. I am not old enough, nor wise enough, nor learned enough—I am just a child.'

Now that just expresses what many young people and children feel, when they are asked to do work for God: 'What can we do? We are not old enough, nor strong enough, nor rich enough, nor grand enough.' Walter Crosby, the pilot's son, had a very tender heart. And when he went along the street to his school and saw very poor people ill-dressed, or cold, or begging, he would say to himself: 'I wish I were a King, or an Earl, or a Lord Mayor, or a Bishop, I would buy bread and clothes for these poor people. I would build houses for them, and make them glad all the days of their life. But what can I do? I am only a boy, and I have nothing to give.' And there was Eleanor Moseley. She saw sick people at her father's door every day. And sometimes she would be sorry for them. And sometimes she wished she were able to help them. But always she ended by saying to herself: 'Oh, that I were a queen or a duchess! I would ride about in my carriage and visit the sick every day, and all the day long. And I would say to them, "I am your sister and I love you—I love you—I love you"'. But what can I do? I am only Eleanor Moseley. And I am still a child.'

I do not think that those who speak in that way are unwilling to work. On the contrary, they are very willing, nay eager, to work. They are looking forward to a time when they shall be workers for God. But it is not that time yet. It is not that time for a long while yet. They are not able just yet. They are too young, or too humble, or too poor as yet. They cry just as Jeremiah did, 'Ah, Lord God! behold, I cannot speak, for I am a child'.

It is to young people who feel in that way I am going to speak to-day. I am going to mention some things—real work for God—which you are not too young to do. And I will begin, as I intend to end, by saying that you are not too young to make beautiful the home you live in.

I have just returned from a place where I lived many years and made many friends. Among these friends was one who was very little, far less than Eleanor Moseley, or Walter Crosby, or you. My friend was only a little flower. Where I first met with it the people call it 'Mouse-Ear,' because the green leaf is shaped like a mouse's ear. It has a most lovely little flower—five tiny petals, or flower-leaves, pale blue, or sometimes pink and blue, arranged in a circle. These tiny petals, where they join, surround a bright yellow cup. And in that cup, standing straight up in the centre, is a slender spear of light green, and on the point of that a very little ball of red. I know many beautiful flowers. I know the tall hollyhock, that stands up in our gardens in the fall of the year, like Aaron's rod that budded. I know the peony, that in the early summer puts on a finer velvet than a queen's. And there is my lady the lily, and my lord the rose; and pansies and pinks and daffodils. I know them all, and how fair they are, and how bare our gardens would be without them. But among them all, I do not know one more beautiful, out and out, than my little friend, the mouse-ear.

It was a very humble place in which I first saw my friend. It was on the roadside, under the hollow of a hedge, between the rain-drop of the hedge and the gutter which the rain-water makes on the road. Not a very sightly place—a place where snails creep and nettles grow, and the sun does not often shine. There shone the mouse-ear. There, after many years, I found it shining still. Morning and evening, from early summer till late harvest, without tiring, without murmuring, it shines on, like a little star in the shadow of the hedge, like the eye of a blessed angel, making beautiful the dwelling-place where God has planted it. In many another place as lonely, as humble, and as infested with shadow, I have found my flower since then. And many a long talk the mouse-ear and I have had together. Many a time, lying on a green bank, I have laid my ear close to it to hear what it said. And many and many a time it spoke a blessed word to me. And this is what it always said: 'Oh, my friend, make the place where God has put you beautiful. If it be but a tent in the desert, make it beautiful. If it be only a cottage in a lonely street, or an attic room in a cottage, or a fireside, or a bench in a workshop, or a berth in a ship, or a seat in a school, or a place on your mother's knee, or a place in her heart, make it beautiful. And the sadder, the darker, the poorer the place is, be the more eager to make it beautiful. If it were as poor and lonely a place as you think mine to be—a place on a roadside, where no fine people come with nobody to look at you but butterflies and sparrows and blades of grass, make it beautiful. And go on and ever on making it more and more beautiful. That is your work and mine in the world.'

Always, when I came away from listening to the mouse-ear, it came into my mind that that was what Christ did when He was upon the earth—that is what the angels do in heaven—that is what redeemed spirits are doing in God's presence. They are just making beautiful the place they dwell in. The heart of the mouse-ear's life and the heart of the heart of heaven are in this the same. Its desire is to fill the home with beauty and love. And I am sure, the poorer the home, if you could think of angels and saints as poor, the greater their desire would be to make it beautiful.

What place could be drearier and more lonely than that sea-angel, Grace Darling, filled! A lighthouse on a low reef of rocks was her home. Looking landward on clear days, she could see Bamborough, St. Abb's Head, Holy Island, and the mouth of the Tweed. Looking seaward, there were the long shoreless stretches of the Northern Ocean. Waves tumbling in upon the low-set rocks; waves leaping up in time of storm like wild horses; waves in peace; waves in tumult; waves covered with shadow and black with night; waves glancing with sunlight and bright as burnished silver! All around her, day after day, it was only this, only the world of waves, which Grace Darling saw. What she heard was the crying of sea-birds and storms. And when winter came, its awful voices sounded like calls of terror around the lonely lighthouse, on the Fern Islands where it was built. Yet there, amid that world of waves, this brave girl made beautiful the place where God appointed her to dwell.

It was early in the month of September more than twenty years ago. The winter storms had begun early that year. One morning, after a wild night, Grace Darling heard human voices mingling with the voices of the storm. And going out, she saw a vessel on the rocks of the farthest island. What was she that she should bestir herself at such a time? A feeble girl, with the seeds of an early death at work on her already! But she roused her father and pointed out the wreck. Were the human beings clinging to it to be allowed to perish? The old man saw no help for them. He shrank from the entreaty of his daughter to go out to them. It seemed to him certain death to venture on such a sea. The brave girl leaped into the boat of the lighthouse and would go alone; and then the old man's courage was roused. And so, on the morning of that sixth day of September, those two, risking their lives for mercy, pulled through the tempest to the wreck. Nine human beings were there, in the very grasp of death. And these nine, one by one, this brave girl and her father, going and coming, rescued and carried to the lighthouse, and nursed them till help came.

Oh! the land rang with praises of this heroic maiden. And poets sang these praises. And royal people sent for her to their houses to see her. But this was her glory in the sight of God, that she had made beautiful for evermore, so that it shines to this day in the memory of men, the lonely and humble lot in which God had placed her.

I used to be a frequent visitor at a home which was every way different from Grace Darling's, and also poorer and drearier. It was a home in a lonesome village, and it consisted of a single room. A poor widow lived in it with her three children—two boys and a girl. All the joy of this widow's heart for this life depended on her children. And the highest service these children had it in their power at that time to render to her was to make the heart of their mother glad. I am happy to say that they were all good children; but I think the flower of the house was Jamie. He had never spoken a cross word to his mother. He had never disobeyed her. But the thing that filled her heart with the greatest joy was this—that Jamie had begun to fear God, and to give signs that his heart was right with God. Here is one little incident out of this boy's life. I do not suppose it was anything remarkable for him, or the best thing that might be told, but it is the thing concerning him I happen to know best. Being very poor, the widow had to send out her children early to work. Jamie was sent to a farm seven miles away to herd some cows; but it was part of the bargain with the master that he should get home every second Saturday afternoon, that he might go to church next day with his mother.

One Saturday Jamie was pushing along the lonely road on his way home. He had only travelled about a mile when, at a turn of the road, three or four very wicked boys, who disliked him for going home to church, and refusing to join them in mischief, came rushing out from a clump of trees with a fierce bulldog, and said: 'Brown, you must say the bad words we tell you, before you go another step, or we'll send the dog at you'. And then they began to swear and speak the worst of words. Now there was one thing Jamie had learned at his mother's fireside, and that was, that it was wrong to take God's name in vain, and wrong to foul the tongue with bad words. But he simply said, 'Let me go, I want to get home'. 'Not one step farther,' said the biggest fellow, 'until you say these words after me. Swear this oath and we'll let you go.' And he repeated wild and wicked words. 'I dare not say that,' replied the widow's son; 'and you have no right to ask me.' 'Swear the oath this moment, or we will let slip the dog.' 'I will not swear that oath; and you have no right to slip the dog on me.' They gave him one more chance, and then let loose the dog. That night, as his mother and the other two sat round the fire, the brave boy told the rest of the adventure. It came into his head as his savage persecutors were unloosing the dog, that God, who shut the mouths of the lions in the den where Daniel was, could shut the mouth of the fierce dog on that lonely road. And God did shut the mouth of the dog. The big, hulking scoundrels, more brutal than their dog, yelled it at the harmless orphan boy. The dog barked furiously for a second or two, and went rushing up to him. But it neither bit nor offered to bite. And Jamie was delivered out of their hands. In all the land that night, there was not a spot more filled with peace and thankful joy than the humble fireside in the one poor room, where Jamie made his mother's heart glad, and his home beautiful by telling what I have attempted to tell over again.

Jamie lives where my mouse-car lived. And I went there to see him two or three years ago. The little hero of ten had become a man with a wife and two children. But he was in one thing the same as before. His pure upright life was making beautiful the humble home where God had placed him. And when I called on the old mother, and spoke about her son, her face lighted up into one of the pleasantest smiles, and she said: 'He's a joy to me still; and although he has a house of his ain, he aye looks well to me'.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, Talking to the Children, p. 165.

ONLY A CHILD

'For I am a child.'—JEREMIAH I. 6.

Who Jeremiah was (ver. 1). Not like some boys—pushing, ambitious—but very timid, quiet, fond of books. Picture out God's interview with him. [Samuel is a parallel case, though probably Jeremiah was older.] What this poor timid lad was to be and do (vers. 5, 10). Harsh, disagreeable, almost impossible. 'Oh, I can't do that, I am only a child!' Such an answer sometimes good, sometimes bad. Think—

I. When such an Answer is Good.—When it shows real humility. 'Only a child, therefore must not put myself forward.' St. Augustine says there are three steps to heaven; first is humility, and second humility, and third humility.

What a blessing if some of us would say so sometimes, e.g.—

1. Boy asks you to do something your mother has forbidden. [Take instance—go a walk on Sunday, etc.] 'Mother says I mustn't.' 'Surely not going always to be tied to mother's apron strings!' Right answer, 'I am only a child'. How often say instead, 'I'm quite old enough to look out for myself'.

Or, 2. Girl has some money. Friend shows her earrings, or necklace, etc. 'Get something like that—brighten yourself up a bit.' Who will answer, 'Not fit for me; I am only a child'?

Or, 3. Want to show how clever you are—how much you know. So put in your word when older people are speaking. Should think, 'I cannot speak; I am only a child'.

So sometimes a good answer—and more, a brave one. Safe to be laughed at. 'Oh yes, you are afraid!' Better be brave and be called a coward, than be a coward and be called brave. None so brave as those who do not like being laughed at, yet who will do right even though others laugh at them.

II. When such an Answer is Bad.—Refer to the history. Who was speaking to Jeremiah? When God speaks should be like Samuel, ready to obey, however disagreeable.

'Oh, but God does not speak to children now!' Does He not? I think He does—tells them, too, to do things which they don't like. E.g. 'I want you to work harder; take more pains with lessons'. 'I want you to speak when you hear your friend say a wrong word.' 'Those two pennies you have, I want you to give part to help me.' Take care when God speaks, not to give Jeremiah's answer.—C. A. GOODHART, Hints and Outlines for Children's Services, p. 111.

THE HEAVENLY GUIDE

'Wilt thou not from this time cry unto me, My Father, Thou art the guide of my youth?'—JEREMIAH III. 4.

WE are all travellers, but are not all travelling in the same direction. We need a guide. There is no difficulty in finding one. There is only one to be relied upon.

1. Some of the Reasons why we Need a Guide.

- 1. Our ignorance of the way.
2. Our liability to take the wrong path.
3. Our liability to leave the right path after we have chosen it.

II. Some of the Reasons why we Should Take God as our Guide.—1. Because He knows the way.

2. Because He knows the trials that will befall us.
3. Because He knows the perils that we shall encounter.

4. Because He is our Father, and therefore kind and considerate.

III. Some of the Reasons why we Should Ask God to Guide us Now.—1. Because the present time is the best.

2. Because the present time is the safest.
 3. Because the present may be the only time.—
Seeds and Saplings, p. 21.

THE FATHER-GUIDE

'Wilt thou not from this time cry unto me, My Father, Thou art the guide of my youth?'—JEREMIAH III. 4.

I. The Young Need a Guide.—You know some street or highway near your home; and you have heard of some city at a great distance from it. Suppose now, out on that road which you know, you saw a blind man groping along, and were told that he has to travel to the distant town, and present himself there by a fixed time, or he will lose his life; how you would sigh for the poor sightless wayfarer, and long for some one to take him by the hand. Still more would you pity him if you knew the way to be full of pits, and snares, and bordered with deep ditches. How can he escape? you would cry, and wonder he should venture to set out without a guide. Now, just as helpless and miserable as he is every person who has no heavenly leader. For the world is full of dangers which he does not see, threatening him on every side.

A young person guiding himself is even worse than blind, for he does not know his own unhappy case. If the blind man passing along the road could be supposed to think that he saw well enough, and so to rush on boldly, what would become of him? You would tremble for him at every step. And young thoughtless people, though blind, think they see.

Nay, sinners are even worse than this—they mistake good for evil; as if a man should see water where land was, and land where water was. So, in a dark night, I once heard of a person stepping into a canal thinking it firm ground. If there were growing in a garden a great variety of berries, some wholesome, some poisonous, and if the latter were very bright and beautiful, a child would be sure to pluck the deadly fruit. So it is with sinners. What glitters and pleases they choose, not knowing the end. A doleful thing once happened in the north—a gentleman and several guests were poisoned at a feast in his house by roots of deadly nightshade being mistaken for radishes. You remember the youth in the days of Elisha that went out and gathered wild gourds, and shred death into the pot. Now, a child left to himself will make in things of the soul like fatal mistakes. Sinful pleasures look at first like the forbidden fruit to Eve, but in the end kill like that.

But let us go back for a moment to our supposed blind man. Like him you are on a journey, and there is a distant city—the city of God—which you must reach or perish. To get into the way to it, and keep in that way, is your great need. Only the Holy Spirit can lead you into it. Your own wisdom would draw you another way. Even when it He must guide you, or your hearts would get weary of it, and leave it. They would call it hard—say there could be no great harm of going a little aside, or putting off further travel for a little. And the world would tempt you into its flowery fields; and Satan would whisper to you to go. Many, many have hearkened and been lost. On the hill-sides in Scotland there are sometimes found green spots which being trod on prove but the covering of deep wells, and treacherous banks that yield to the slightest weight, rolling down the steep. How could an inexperienced child walk there safely? How can he pass through the world without a guide? But is there one to be had? Yes, for—

II. God is Able to Guide the Young.—To make a guide fully qualified to lead one in a difficult and dangerous road, two things are needful—knowledge and power. When a traveller wishes to go up to the top of one of the snow-crowned Alps, he must engage a guide. And that guide must not only know the route, but be quick of eye, steady of brain, strong of hand. In many a danger he will need all to help. The traveller will perish otherwise down some slippery steep, or in some yawning chasm, or over some dreadful precipice. To climb to the city of God is too difficult for those who are not led by the wise and strong Guide.

But do I need to tell you how wise and how strong your Heavenly Father is? You do not know your own hearts, or the world, or Satan; but God does. He sees inside things, and appearances never deceive him. If you were travelling in the East, you would see sometimes what appear to be doors in the rocks, and you might suppose them entrances to dwellings. Our Lord spoke of them. But though they were often 'beautiful outwardly,' and 'whited' so as to shine, they were but graves after all, 'full of dead men's bones'. God's eye sees past the whitewash of the world, and can keep you from making your home in a tomb.

III. God is Willing to Guide the Young.—There is no more necessary to prove this than the words of the text. He not only is ready to guide you if you ask Him, but He pleads with you to let Him do it. He asks you to let Him take you by the hand. And then He uses the name Father to encourage you to trust Him. If a little child were lost in a crowd, or in a maze of streets, or in a wood, and a man were to come up whom the child did not know, and offer to lead it home, it might refuse, and continue to cry on in its wretchedness. But if it heard its father's voice, saw his face, felt his touch, how soon would its trust be given, and its tears dried! God comes to you, poor wandered child, and says, Look up and see your Father, and let Him lead you.

IV. It is the Duty of the Young to Ask God to Guide Them.—He speaks to you first, but He wants you to speak to Him in return. He could guide you without your asking Him. He has done it to some. The little baby brother or sister whose dead body lying in the dark grave was led so, did not know anything about it till angel arms bore it into the presence of the Lord. But you are older, and know about your duty, and must do it. God does a great deal for you without your asking, but He won't take you to heaven without. Is it not quite right that you should ask, to show your willingness? God does not want people in heaven who are forced there. Heaven is all love, and love does not force—it draws. If you were leading a blind man by the hand, and all the while he should keep trying to shake you off, saying, I don't wish you, I don't thank you—would you be likely to persevere? Can you expect God to do it?

V. It is the Duty of the Young to Ask God to Guide Them at Once.—From this time, says the text. Then seek Him now. This is safety, and it is duty. Safety, for there may be no later time, and there can be no better. What would you say about a blind man standing a yard off from a precipice, or a river's brink, if, when you ran to lead him out of danger, he should say, Wait a little till I have walked a few steps forward? Or without supposing danger quite so near, would a blind man be a wise man who should refuse to be led till he should fall a few times more, and be bruised and wounded more severely? Children who put off answering God's question in the text act like such a blind fool.

Now is the time for a 'perpetual covenant, never to be forgotten'; now is the time to give the soul up to be led by Jesus wholly; now is the time, in answer to the question of the text, for saying with all the heart, My Father, thou art the guide of my youth!—JOHN EDMOND, The Children's Church at Home, p. 12.

BAD COINS

'Reprobate silver.'—JEREMIAH VI. 30.

You have heard of many sorts of silver—German silver, nickel silver, bright silver, dark silver, and so on. Do you think there really are so many kinds? Not a bit of it! There is only one kind of silver, and that is real silver—all the rest are only make-believes or mixed-up things.

What kind of silver, then, is this we read of—reprobate silver? It is silver that isn't silver at all! It has only had a kind of acquaintance with silver—lived next door to it, so to speak, and tried to look like it—for reprobate silver isn't silver at all—it is only lead.

Let me explain. You must understand that silver is dug out of the earth, and after it is washed it is put into a big pot, as we may call it, and placed in a furnace so that the silver may be melted out of the stones in which it is found. But it is very difficult to get it to come out of the stones of itself, and so, in old days, lead was melted along with it. When the lead had melted it melted the silver, and then the two mixed together. But once the silver was got out of the stones and the earth, people knew how to separate it from the lead, and so at last they had the silver by itself, quite pure.

But what about the lead? That was called 'reprobate silver'—refuse silver—which wasn't silver at all! It might think that it was, and it might put on airs because it had at one time something to do with silver —but though the lead thought it was silver the silver-smith knew better—he rejected the lead—but carefully kept the silver.

And what is the meaning of it all? It means this: Airs won't do, pretension won't do, make-believe won't do—you must be real, or God will condemn you—will reject you.

Some people think that because they have mingled with Christians and perhaps have had a good deal to do with Christian things, that therefore they are Christians. But no!—that won't make them Christians; lead is lead only, though it has had something to do with silver, and for all its pretensions it will be cast out for lead when the silver is kept for the King's treasury. So be genuine, be real, be Christ's very own, whether people are seeing you and praising you or not. Have love for Jesus in you and not on you only; be real.

Shams always come to a bad end at the last. Some time or other you have gone into a shop and have seen a number of coins nailed to the counter. There was a sixpence, a shilling, a florin, and a half-crown, and perhaps some more, and you wondered why the shopkeeper nailed them down instead of using them. It was because they were reprobate silver—that is, they were only lead that wanted to pass itself off for silver. The coins looked all right—they had the stamp of the king or the queen on them too—possibly they were as good to look at as any others. Yes, but when they were tried they hadn't the right ring about them—they were found out to be false, and so were rejected—nailed down.

Don't you be a bad coin. Be real. A good silver sixpence is better in the long run than a bad half-crown; and though you may not be so clever as some folks, or so great as others, if you are real—a true Christian boy or girl—then on the Great Day when everything must be tested and tried as by fire, you will have honour when the shams will be put to shame.

So be real, truthful, honest, and open, whether people see you and praise you or whether they don't.—J. REID HOWATT, The Children's Angel, p. 202.

THE WARNING AGAINST PRIDE

'Be not proud.'—JEREMIAH XIII. 15.

It is surprising how much the Bible has to say about the sin of pride, and about the proud people who give way to it. In looking carefully through the Bible, I find that there are more than a hundred places in which this sin is spoken of. Kings, and princes, and great and rich men are the ones most tempted to give way to pride. But it is not confined to them. The poorest people in the world, and those who occupy the very lowest positions in the land, are tempted to give way to pride. I have known a boy to feel proud because he had a bigger kite, or marble, than his playmate had; and I have known a little girl to feel proud because she had a prettier ribbon for her bonnet, or a nicer dress for her doll, than her companion had.

I. And the First Thing that Pride brings with it, on Account of which we ought to Mind this Warning, is 'Unhappiness'.—A proud person never can be happy, no matter how rich and great he may be. We have a striking illustration of this in the Book of Esther, in the Old Testament. There we read about Ahasuerus, the King of Persia, and the eastern part of the world. He was the greatest king then known. He had a great number of servants and officers under him. At the head of all these was a man whose name was Haman. He was the prime minister of that great kingdom; and his riches and honours were such that as he walked to and from the palace of the king the people who met him were accustomed to bow their heads and make obeisance to him. And every time this was done it helped to make him prouder still. But there was one man, named Mordecai, a Jew, who never would do this. He was the uncle of Esther, the wife of the king, and used to sit near the gate of the king's palace. And as he saw Haman pass by, he would not bow to him, or take any notice of him. This wounded Haman's pride, and made him feel very unhappy. On reaching home one day, after passing Mordecai, who had refused to bow to him, he was very angry. He spoke about it to some of his friends there. He told them of all the riches and honours which the king had bestowed upon him, but said that he could not enjoy any of these so long as Mordecai the Jew would not bow down and make obeisance to him. Here we see what unhappiness Haman's pride brought upon him. And this is the way in which it always acts.

In one of Æsop's fables, we have a good illustration of this part of our subject. It is the fable of the tortoise and the eagle.

The fable says, that there was a tortoise once that was very unhappy because he had no wings, and could not fly. He used to look up and see the eagles and other birds spreading out their wings and having a good time, as they went floating through the air. He said to himself, 'Oh, if I only had wings, as those birds have, so that I could rise up into the air, and sail about there as they do, how happy I should be!' One day, the fable says, he called to an eagle, and offered him a great reward if he would only teach him how to fly. 'I never shall be happy,' said the tortoise, 'till I get wings and am able to fly about in the air as you do.' The eagle told him he had no wings to give him, and did not know how to teach him to fly. But the tortoise pressed him so earnestly, and made him so many promises, that finally the eagle said, 'Well, I'll try what I can do. You get on my back, and I'll carry you up in the air, and we'll see what can be done.'

So the tortoise got on the back of the eagle. Then the eagle spread out his wings and began to soar aloft. He went up, and up, and up, till he had reached a great height. Then he said to the tortoise: 'Now, get ready. I'm going to throw you off, and you must try your hand at flying.' So the eagle threw him off; and he went down, down, down, till at last he fell upon a hard rock, and was dashed to pieces.

Now here you see it was the pride of the tortoise which made him so unhappy, because he couldn't fly. And it was trying to gratify his pride which cost him his life.

II. The Second Reason why we ought to Mind this Warning, is that Pride brings with it 'Trouble'.—We never can set ourselves against any of God's laws without getting into trouble. Here, in our text, we have God's law regarding pride. He says to us, 'Be not proud'. If we mind this law we shall have pleasure in what we do. If we do not mind this law we shall have trouble. It is impossible for us to go contrary to any of God's laws without finding trouble. Here is a very simple illustration of what I am saying. Suppose that you and I are sitting on the sofa in our parlour. We have a favourite pussy cat. She comes and lies down on the sofa between us. How nice and clean she looks, and how smooth and glossy her hair is! Now the law of God is that pussy's hair shall grow in the direction from her head down towards her tail. And if you lay your hand on her back, and stroke her hair down in that direction, how nice and smooth it will feel! Stroking in that way will give only pleasure, both to pussy and yourself. She will lie there, and purr away, to show you how happy she is. But suppose that instead of this you try to stroke her in the opposite direction. That would be contrary to God's law for stroking cats. It would only give trouble, both to pussy and yourself. She would stop purring, and jump down from the sofa, and run away, saying as plainly as she could by her actions, 'I don't like to be stroked in that way'.

And it is the same with all God's laws. If we act according to them, it will cause us pleasure. If we act contrary to them, it will cause us trouble. And this is just as true in regard to God's law concerning pride as it is in anything else. God says to each of us, 'Be not proud'. This is His law about pride. If we mind this law, and walk humbly before Him, not thinking of ourselves more highly than we ought to think, we shall find pleasure in so doing; but if we give way to pride, and break God's law, it will be sure to cause us trouble. Let us look at some illustrations of this.

Two masons were engaged in building a brick wall in front of a high house. One of them was older and more experienced than his companion. The younger one, whose name was Ben, placed a brick in the wall which was thicker at one end than at the other. His companion noticed it, and said, 'Ben, if I were you, I wouldn't leave that brick there. It's not straight, and will be likely to injure the wall by making it untrue.'

'Pooh!' said Ben, 'what difference will such a trifle as that make? You are too particular.'

'My mother used to teach me,' said his friend, 'that truth is truth; and that ever so little an untruth is a lie, and that a lie is no trifle.'

Now Ben was a proud young fellow. His pride was offended by what his friend had said to him.

So he straightened himself up, and said in an angry tone —

‘Well, I guess I understand my business as well as you do. I am sure that brick won’t do any harm.’

His friend said nothing more to him. They both went quietly on with their work, laying one brick after another, and carrying the wall up higher till the close of the day. Then they quitted their work and went home.

The next morning, they went back to go on with their work again. But when they got there, they found the wall all in ruins. The explanation of it was this: that uneven brick had given it a little slant. As the wall got up higher, the slant increased, till at last, in the middle of the night, it tumbled over and fell down to the ground.

And here we see the trouble which this young man brought on himself by his pride. If he had only learned to mind this Bible warning against it, that wall would not have fallen down, and he would have been saved the trouble of building it up again. The second reason why we ought to mind this warning is because pride brings trouble with it.

III. The Third Reason why we ought to Mind this Warning is that Pride brings with it ‘Loss’.—The Apostle tells us that ‘God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble’. So if we give way to pride, we are in a position in which God is resisting us, and then it is certain that we can expect nothing but loss in everything that we do. In the words of our text, God says to us, ‘Be not proud’. This is His command to us concerning pride. David tells us that ‘in keeping His commandments there is great reward’. But if we give way to pride we are breaking one of God’s commands, and then of course we shall lose the great reward He promises to those who keep His commands.

When we begin to love and serve God, He says to each of us, ‘from this day will I bless thee’. And we are told that ‘the blessing of the Lord maketh rich, and he addeth no sorrow’. The riches which this blessing brings us do not mean gold and silver, and earthly property. The way in which God’s blessing makes His people rich is in the peace, and joy, and happiness which He gives them; in the sense of His favour, and the protection which they have in this world, and in the hope of sharing His presence and glory for ever in heaven. But if we give way to pride, we cannot love and serve God; and then we must lose the blessing which God promises to those who do love and serve Him. And this is the greatest loss we can ever meet with in this world. To those who truly serve Him God promises that He will ‘make all things work together for their good’. This is one of the most precious promises to be found in the Bible. But if we give way to pride we cannot love God; and then we must lose that sweet promise; and nobody can calculate how great that loss would be. We read in another place that ‘pride goeth before destruction’. The word ‘destruction’ here used is a very comprehensive word. It takes in a great deal. It means the destruction or loss of our peace, our happiness, our prosperity in this world; and in the world to come the loss of our souls, the loss of heaven. And can we think of any loss equal to this? Now let us look at some illustrations of the great loss that comes from pride.

We have our first illustration in the case of the angels.

I refer particularly now to those angels that ‘kept not their first estate’. We speak of them as ‘the fallen angels’. They were made just like the other angels. They were as pure, as holy, as happy, as perfect as angels could be. God was their Father, and heaven was their home. They had the prospect before them of being perfectly happy for ever. But, somehow or other, we know not how, they gave way to pride. They were unwilling any longer to obey God. Then we are told that ‘there was war in heaven’. And the end of it was, that they were cast down from heaven to hell. Their pride cost them the loss of heaven.

We have our next illustration in the case of Adam and Eve. God made them perfect, and put them in the Garden of Eden as their home. There they had everything around them to make them perfectly happy. They did as they wished, and went where they pleased in that beautiful garden. God told them that they might eat of all the trees of the garden except one; but of that they must not eat. This was the only command they had to mind. That made their situation very easy. But Satan got into that garden. He came and tempted them to eat of that tree. He told them that if they would only eat of it, they would become as wise as gods. This kindled their pride. They felt that they would like above all things to be made like gods. This thought led them to break the one command which God had given them, and to eat of the fruit of that forbidden tree. The result was that they were driven out of Paradise. Their pride caused them the loss of that beautiful garden.

Our next illustration we have in the case of Saul, the first King of Israel. There had been no king in his family before him. His father was only a farmer. But one time some of his asses had wandered away and got lost. Saul was sent out to try and find them. After hunting for them a long time in vain, he was at a loss what to do. So he made up his mind to call on the Prophet Samuel, and ask for information about the lost asses. Samuel told him not to give himself any more trouble about them, as they had been found. Then Samuel took him aside, and told him that God had chosen him to be king over Israel, and had given him, Samuel, direction to anoint him king. He did so. Thus Saul was made King of Israel. And if he had only minded this warning against pride, there never would have been any other Kings of Israel but the descendants of Saul. But he became proud. His pride kept him from doing what God told him to do. And for this reason God took the kingdom from Saul and gave it to David. And so we see how Saul's pride brought upon him the loss of his kingdom.

Jesus, our blessed Saviour, 'came to visit us in great humility'. And if we pray for grace to be like Him and to 'tread in the blessed steps of His most holy life,' it is very certain that we shall mind the warning of our text, 'be not proud'.—RICHARD NEWTON, Bible Warnings: Addresses to Children, p. 239.

CHRIST RESHAPING THE SOUL

'He made it again another vessel.'—JEREMIAH XVIII. 4.

IN the city of Florence, more than four hundred years ago, there happened to be a great block of marble. At that time the people of Florence loved to have marble figures of saints and angels in the streets and squares of their city. The rulers of the city, wishing in this to please the people, sent for a carver of marble and said to him, 'Take this block of marble and carve it into a statue for our city'. But the man to whom this was said was careless or unskilful. He spoiled the block. He cut into it here and there, but brought out no statue. And it was cast aside, and lay in one of the building-yards of the city covered with sand and rubbish, until it was looked upon as a worthless thing.

When the marble had lain in that place nearly forty years, a young man, who is now known as the great Michael Angelo, had occasion to be in the yard where it lay. And seeing the block buried in the rubbish, he said, 'I wish the rulers of the city would give this to me to carve'. 'But it is spoiled for carving,' said a friend: 'Not so spoiled,' answered Angelo, 'that there is not an angel inside still.' The rulers hearing of this, and looking upon the block as worthless in its present state, said, 'The young carver might go to work upon it and let the angel out'. So he cleared it from the rubbish, took his hammer and chisel, and began to carve. And bit by bit the misshapen block came into shape. And at last, when his carving was ended, there stood before the eyes of the citizens a splendid figure of David with his sling. And this the citizens set up with joy in their city, and it is one of the great sights of Florence to this day.

When I read this story the other day, in the Life of Michael Angelo, I said to myself, 'It is like the history of man upon the earth. First there is the fair unspoiled marble of human life, the first life in the garden, as made by God; then there is the marred life, the life misshapen by sin; then the beautiful new form of life, the new shapely Christian life, wrought in us by Jesus Christ. It is also like the story of the Prodigal. First there is the fair boy, the innocent life, with the promise of all good in it, in the early home; then there is the spoiled boy, the boy who would be a lord to himself, who took his life into a far land, and marred and wasted it all by sin; and then there is the boy new-made, forgiven, clothed,

This led me to think of other lives I had known or read about, lives that had been marred by sin and cast out as worthless, just as the block of marble had been. And then I went on to think of the merciful Saviour finding these lives in their lostness, and lifting them up out of the dust, and reshaping them, and making them beautiful with the beauty of His own life.

I. The first I thought of was John Bunyan, who wrote Pilgrim's Progress. There was never a young life more like a marred block than his when he was a boy. You have all read the Pilgrim's Progress. You remember the story of Christian and his burden, the evil city from which he fled, and the wicket gate through which he escaped, and the cross where his burden fell off, and the open grave into which it fell. You remember the strange things which happened to him after that, the strange places he saw, and the people he met by the way. And you cannot have forgotten the river he passed over at last, or the songs which were sung as he and Hopeful were led up to the gate of the Celestial City on the other side.

Could you imagine that the man who wrote that wonderful story had once been a rude, godless, and wicked boy? Yet that is his own account of his early life. Bad companions, and ignorance, and his own foolish heart led him into evil of every kind. 'It was my delight,' he says, 'to be taken captive by the devil at his will; being filled with all unrighteousness, so that from a child I had few equals, both for cursing, lying, and blaspheming the name of God.'

John was a tinker, and the son of a tinker, in the town of Elstow. He had been taught to read, but forgot it. He was idle and given to play. When he grew up to be a lad, for a short time he had to become a soldier, and go into battle. But all through these years the Lord Jesus was watching over him, and preparing him to be one of His soldiers, and to write the Pilgrim's Progress. He sent strange thoughts and voices into the lad's heart. One Sunday afternoon as he was playing on Elstow Green at Tip Cat with other lads, he heard a voice saying to him, 'Wilt thou leave thy sins and go to heaven, or have thy sins and go to hell?' Although the voice was only in his own soul, it sounded so real that he looked up to heaven for the speaker. Like Nebuchadnezzar of old also the thoughts on his bed troubled him. He had dreams in which he saw wicked men shut up in globes of fire. His thoughts, when those dreams came, were like masterless hounds rushing up and down in his soul. Once, for a whole year, and after he had taken Christ for his Lord, he was tempted by a voice which told him to sell Christ as Esau had sold his birthright. The voice said, 'Sell Him, sell Him, sell Him'. Sometimes it would say it hundreds of times together, till he had to set his soul against it.

'One morning,' he tells us, in the story of his life, 'as I did lie in my bed, I was, as at other times, fiercely assaulted with this temptation, the wicked suggestion running in my mind, "Sell Him, sell Him, sell Him, sell Him," as fast as a man could speak. I answered, "No, no, not for thousands, thousands, thousands," at least twenty times together. But at last, after much striving, I felt this thought pass through my heart, Let Him go if He will; and I thought also that I felt my heart freely consent thereto.

John thought he was now fairly lost. 'Down fell I, as a bird that is shot from the top of a tree, into great guilt and fearful despair.'

But John was not lost. Christ was bringing his mishapen life into His own form. In His kindness He gave him a godly wife, who taught him once more to read, and used to tell him how good it is to be good. Her father was good. John tried hard to be like her father. He went to church. He read the Bible. He followed the Ten Commandments. He prayed. Still he was not happy. But one day, he says, 'The good providence of God called me to Bedford to work at my calling, and in one of the streets of that town I came where there were three or four poor women sitting at a door in the sun, talking about the things of God'. He drew near. He listened to their talk. It was about the new birth. He learned for the first time, like Nicodemus, that a man must be born again. He now saw that it was not the Ten Commandments, or going to church, that was to save him, but a new heart. And in good time, but not without many temptations, such as the one to sell the Saviour, he received from that Saviour the new heart, and never more turned aside. And so it came to pass, that out of this poor, ignorant, idle gipsy lad, Christ formed a new, manly, beautiful life. Evil dreams of wicked men in globes of fire passed into the back region of his soul, and dreams of Christian pilgrims came into their place. He became a great preacher in this land. And although evil men put him into prison for preaching, he, even in the prison, dreamed his dream of heaven. He heard the bells of the Celestial City ringing, and saw the forms of angels and just men made perfect going up and down on the golden streets. And in the solitude of his prison, with only his blind daughter to visit him, he wrote that story which old and young shall read as long as books are read in this world, the story of Christian's pilgrimage from earth to heaven.

II. It was a great blessing to John Bunyan that God gave him a wife who could pray. She prayed for him. It is the same blessing to you when you have fathers and mothers who pray. They are always asking Jesus to give you His own beautiful form of life. And if, at any time, in any of their children they see evil coming into the life, or the first fair form of baby life becoming spoiled by sin, it is to Jesus they go in their distress. They say to him, 'Lord Jesus, save our child; for thy mercy sake reshape the soul'. But many a praying parent has to die before the prayers are answered, and the beauty of God can be seen on the children.

In a seaport town in Scotland, about twenty years ago, a Christian mother was dying, and some very earnest prayers which she had offered were unanswered still. Her husband, her sister, and all her children, except one, were in the room beside her. 'Are you willing to go, darling?' the sister said, bending over and kissing her. 'If it seems good to my Father, I am,' she whispered. Then, after a little pause, she added, 'And I have no fear and no care?'. But when she said 'no care,' the sister, with all who were in the room, thought of the absent one. And she said, 'About Dan, dearest, have you no care for Dan?' The dying mother said, whispering her words out one by one, 'My prayers for Dan are with God; He will answer them in His good time. Dan will yet become a child of God. Day and night for seven years I have prayed that this might come to pass.' These were her last words. In a little while she died.

Dan had been a great care to her. He had been idle and wilful, and many things besides that are bad. His boyhood was wasted with idleness. He passed through school without learning anything except to read and write. There was no fear of God in his heart. He hated goodness and work. Many a time his mother had taken him into her room, and pleaded with him to leave his idleness and folly; but she pleaded in vain. At last he went to sea, and at the time she died was sailing on the coast of China.

But his mother had not left her prayers with God in vain. About six months after he had heard of her death, he was one night keeping watch with another sailor on the look-out. The night was dark, a strong wind was blowing, and the ship in full sail running before the wind. As he was pacing backwards and forwards on the poop, the one sailor on the one side, he on the other, the ship gave a sudden lurch, and he was thrown overboard. In a moment he felt himself falling through the darkness into the deeper darkness of the sea. He heard, or fancied he heard, the words, 'Man overboard,' sounded out by his companion. But next moment he felt himself in the black waters, and sinking, sinking into their depths. He knew he had almost no chance of being saved. The ship was rushing forward at great speed, and must already be far from where he sank; and the night was very dark. But soon he ceased to think about safety or ship. His whole by-past life seemed to open up before him. He saw the school in which he was so idle, and the church which was such a weariness to him, and the house he had loved so ill, and the room in that home in which his mother had so often prayed and pleaded with him to change his life. The years of his boyhood came back to him one by one; and days in which he had played truant, and the faces of companions with whom he had wrought mischief. Then he recalled the time when he first went to sea, and his mother's tears as she parted with him. And then a vision of his mother on her death-bed, as she had been described to him in letters from home, came vividly into his soul. He seemed to be in the very room, and to hear the words which she had spoken, and her last words about himself. Then there was a great light, and in the centre of it he saw his mother's face; then, as he looked at her, expecting her to smile on him, the face changed and disappeared, and there was a sound of bells; then a murmur as of bees; then the light faded, and a great silence fell upon his soul.

When he came to himself again, he was lying in his berth. Dark though the night was, and far behind though the ship had left him, his brave shipmates searched back for him with the long-boat until they found him, and found him as he rose, perhaps for the last time, to the surface. It was a long week before he was able to leave the berth. But he left it a new man. In that week God gave him a new heart, and changed him in some measure into His own likeness. His mother's prayers were answered, as she foretold. Her idle, wilful boy became an earnest Christian man, and for many years did noble Christian service as captain of a vessel.

III. I may be speaking to some boy or girl who is passing an unchristian childhood, and whose heart is beginning to see the evil of it, and to wish that Christ would put that evil away. For that child's sake I will tell a little history of a childhood which a Christian lady once told to me. The lady and I were speaking of children, and she said: 'God does not despair of any child. God can turn boys and girls who are rude, and selfish, and untruthful, into right-hearted children of His own. I am far from being what I ought to be. I am still a very imperfect, very frail servant of the Lord. But my childhood, when I look back to it, was as far from right as any child's could well be. I had no thought but for myself. I have never since met a child so selfish as I then was. My brothers and sisters, my father and mother—I cared for none of them in comparison with myself. I coveted and seized the best things. I took the best places for myself. When the younger children came in cold and weary, I would not leave the warm corner at the fire to help them, or give them the corner to sit in. When anybody in the house was sick, it was a worry to me to be asked to wait in the sick-room, even for half an hour. And when I was found out in any of my selfish and unkind ways, if I could defend myself by a lie, I told that lie. One day, there had been some worse outburst of my selfishness and untruthfulness than usual, and my father was present. "Child, child," he said to me in bitterness, "I have never had one hour's pleasure in you." It was a terrible word to come from a father's lips. I was fourteen at the time, and old enough to know the meaning and feel the pain of the word. It went into my soul like a knife. I crept out of sight, went up to my little room, threw myself on the floor, and tried to cry. But no tears came to my eyes. I only felt the sharp words cutting me through and through, "Child, child, I have never had one hour's pleasure in you".'

'I tried to think my father wrong, tried to think him mistaken, or unjust, or hard. But the more I thought of his words, the more clearly I saw them to be true. Then my thoughts went up to the Father in heaven. Had he also never had an hour's pleasure in me? I became afraid. I thought I was in His presence. And a face that at a distance was in some things like my father's, in some other things like pictures of angels I had seen, seemed to look at me, and look down into my very soul, with severe eyes, while from the lips came the words, "Never one hour's pleasure in you".'

'I do not know how I got into bed that night, and I have no remembrance of what took place for the next day or two. I could never afterwards feel that my father loved me. And he died without taking back his words or showing me any love. But I thank him for his words. They were God's sharp tools to new-shape me. My life began to change from the hour they were spoken. With my whole strength I cried to God to help me to cast my selfishness away. And God has been very kind. As I said, I am still far from being what I ought to be; but He sends hours to me at times in which I am free to think, that even He is well pleased with me now, for Jesus' sake.'

IV. I will only say one thing more. God is very good, and both able and willing to reshape lives which have been spoiled by sin; but do not think it is all the same in the end for the lives He reshapes, as if they had never been spoiled by sin.

I knew a man once whom God had new-made—a most worthy, kind-hearted, God-fearing man. What God had changed him from was hard-heartedness. He had hard thoughts about God and man. He was hard in all his ways. He believed that everybody was dishonest, and had to be watched. He used to say, 'God is no more to be trusted than other people'. Although he came to the church on Sunday, he listened with hard thoughts to everything that was said. He was always finding fault, always saying to some one or other some bitter unkind word.

By the merciful providence of God this hard-hearted man fell ill, and for a time it seemed as if his illness might end in death. The servants whose honesty he never believed in were very kind to him in this illness. Neighbours whom he had spoken unkind words of came in and helped. The pastor whom he had often sneered at, and his fellow-members in the church he attended, came about him in loving and tender ways. And this love touched his hard heart. Through this love came upon him, for the first time, a belief in the love of God. On his sick-bed he learned that God may be trusted. He learned how great and true the love must have been which sent Jesus to die for us. God's love shining from the cross of Jesus was like coals of fire upon his heart. Its hardness was melted away, and a gentle, loving, trustful spirit was given to him, and he rose from his bed a new man, humble, meek, merciful, and full of charitable thoughts and deeds. But when this took place he was nearly an old man. The years which went before were lost years to him. So long as they lasted, the evil thoughts of his heart shut him out from being a friend either to God or man.

And therefore it is unwise and wrong for anyone to say, 'I will go on in evil a while longer, and God will make me all right in the end'. It is certain, that the longer one remains in such a way, the hurt of it will go deeper and deeper into the soul. Sin is always evil, and it always leaves evil marks behind.

The statue of David which Michael Angelo carved is not so beautiful as it would have been if the block from which he carved it had not been spoiled before. —ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Gentle Heart, p. 167.

EBED-MELECH, THE MODEL OF KINDNESS

'Ebed-melech.'—JEREMIAH XXXVIII. 3.

ZEDEKIAH, the King of Israel, had a servant who was an Ethiopian, or a coloured man. The time here referred to was one of great trouble in Israel. The King of Babylon had invaded their country, and was now besieging the city of Jerusalem. God had sent the Prophet Jeremiah with a message to the King and princes of Israel. He told them that God wished them to give up their city to the King of Babylon. But they would not listen to what the prophet said. The princes were very angry with Jeremiah for the message which he brought them from God. They took him prisoner, and put him down in a deep, dark dungeon, where there was no one to attend to him, or give him anything to eat, and where he sank in the deep mire. No one took any notice of poor Jeremiah, but this good servant of the king—Ebed-melech. He felt very sorry for him, and kindly made up his mind that he would try and get him out of the dungeon. He went and spoke to the king about it. He told him that the prophet would surely die if he were left in the mire of that dark and dreadful dungeon. This dungeon was underground. There was no door to it. The only way of getting in and out of it was through an opening in the top, like those we see in our coal vaults.

The king told Ebed-melech to take some men with him and a strong rope, and go and lift Jeremiah out of the dungeon. He did as the king told him; and so the life of Jeremiah—the prophet of the Lord—was saved through the kindness of this humble servant of the king—Ebed-melech. He was the only one, among all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, who showed any kindness to Jeremiah in his time of trouble. And so I wish now to speak of Ebed-melech as the model of kindness.

This is a good model for us all to study, because we can all show kindness to those about us, if we only try. And I wish to speak of three reasons why we should try to imitate this model of kindness.

I. We should do so, in the First Place, because it is 'Easy' to Show Kindness.—Some things are very hard to do. We know for how many years the Government of England, of our own country, and of other nations have been trying to find the way to the North Pole. How much money has been spent, and how many valuable lives have been lost in these attempts! And yet they have never succeeded. Getting to the North Pole is a very hard thing to do. Some things can only be done by those who have plenty of money. When a railroad has to be built, across a great country like ours, millions of money are needed for it; and nothing can be done without it. But it is very different with the work of showing kindness. There is nothing hard about this. We do not need much money to do it. The poor can show kindness as well as the rich. Ebed-melech had not much money. He was a poor coloured man—the servant, or slave of King Zedekiah; and yet he managed to show real kindness to the Prophet Jeremiah. He was the means of saving his life.

And if we learn, while we are young, to show kindness to those who are in trouble, we shall find that it is an easy thing to do.

Let us look at some examples of the easy way in which we may show kindness.

Helping and thanking.—It happened one day that an old Scotchman was taking his grist to the mill. It was in sacks, which were thrown across the back of the horse. In going along the horse stumbled, and the sacks of grain fell to the ground. The old man had not strength enough to lift the sacks up and put them on the horse's back again. He looked around to see if there was one near to help him. Presently he saw a person on horseback coming along the road; and he thought he would ask him for help. But the horseman proved to be a nobleman, who lived in the great castle near by, and the old man thought it never would do to ask such a favour of him. But that nobleman was a gentleman. He had learned to practise this point of the model we are considering. He knew how easy it was to show kindness. And so, without waiting to be asked, when he saw the old man's trouble, he instantly got off his horse and came and helped the farmer, whose name was John, to lift his sacks of grain on to the horse's back again. When this was done, John—for he was a gentleman too—took off his cap, and making a respectful bow, said, 'My lord, how shall I ever thank you for your very great kindness?'

'Very easily, John,' replied the nobleman. 'Whenever you see any one in trouble, as you were just now, help him out of it, and that will be the best way of thanking me.'

We ought to practise this point of the model before us, because it is easy to show kindness.

A woman's love.—A murderer sat in his cell in the gaol, repeating over and over again to himself the sentence pronounced by the judge:—

'You are to be hanged by the neck till you are dead, dead, DEAD—and may God have mercy on your soul!'

But there were no tears in the prisoner's eyes, and no penitence in his heart. His dark face grew blacker, and his wicked heart became harder still, as he went on repeating those dreadful words, and cursing both God and man.

Ministers had come to him with gospel messages of Divine mercy; but he spurned their words, and told them to come no more into his presence. 'Why, man,' said one of them, 'you are condemned to die; and in a few weeks you will be launched into eternity, and how can you stand before God with all your sins unpardoned?'

'That's my business,' was his answer; 'I wish no further conversation with any of you.' And he waved his hand impatiently for them to depart.

A report of this interview was published in the papers the next day. Among those who read it was a timid, delicate Christian woman. As she read the report the tears dropped on the paper, and the earnest desire came into her heart to tell the poor condemned man that she was sorry for him. But she said to herself: 'I can't do it. I never was in the gaol in my life; and I wouldn't know what to say. And then I should be sure to cry. Oh, I wish I could go and speak a few kind words to him without weeping!'

This desire grew stronger in her every day; and one morning she gathered a beautiful bouquet of flowers from her garden, and went to the gaol. The gaoler admitted her to the prison. Then he threw open a window, through which, without entering, persons could converse with the prisoner; and calling him by name, said, 'Here is a lady who wishes to see you'. But as soon as she found herself standing face to face with the hard-featured, gloomy-looking murderer, the good woman's courage and voice entirely failed her. She could not utter a single word; but handing the poor prisoner the bouquet, she burst into tears.

The sight of the flowers and the weeping woman had a strange effect on the prisoner. It brought fresh to his memory scenes long passed. It called up the picture of a dear home across the sea, and of a fond Christian mother, who wept over him at parting. His hard heart was touched and softened. And while the woman wept outside the cell, he cried, with a great, deep, bitter cry, as the tears flowed down his face, 'God be merciful to me a sinner'. God heard his cry, and visited the heart of the prisoner with pardon and peace. That good woman's kindness and tears had melted his hard heart, and he was led like a little child to Christ. How easy she found it to show kindness to that poor man! And how much good it did to him!

II. The Second Reason why we should try to Imitate this Model, and Learn this Lesson, is that Kindness is 'Useful'.—Ebed-melech's kindness was useful to Jeremiah, because it saved his life. He lived for years after this, and was the means of doing a great deal of good to the people of Israel who were living then. If we knew more of the particulars of his history, it would be easy for us to point out the usefulness of his saved life. As the prophet of the Lord, his business was to make known God's will to the people of Israel. And all the good he did in this way, through the remaining years of his saved life, was the result of Ebed-melech's kindness.

But then Jeremiah has been useful to the Church of God ever since that day by the prophecies which he wrote. And a large portion of those prophecies was written after the day in which Ebed-melech saved his life. And this shows us how great the usefulness was of Ebed-melech's kindness.

And in learning to show kindness to others, there is no telling how much good we may do. And when we think how useful our kindness may be, we see a good reason why we should try to learn the lesson of which we are now speaking.

III. But there is a Third Reason why we should try to Imitate the Model Ebed-melech has set us, or Learn to Show Kindness, and that is because Kindness is 'Profitable'.—We see this in the case of Ebed-melech himself. His kindness to the prophet Jeremiah, in taking him out of that terrible dungeon, where he had sunk in the deep mire, was the means of saving his own life. That was the reward of his own kindness.

God sent word to Ebed-melech, by the Prophet Jeremiah, that when the city of Jerusalem should be taken by the Assyrians, He would put it into their hearts to show kindness to him by sparing his life. And so it came to pass. The princes, and nobles, and great men of the nation were all put to death. The king had his sons killed before his face. Then his eyes were put out, and he was carried captive to Babylon. And to the day of his death he never could forget the last sad sight that he witnessed before his eyes were put out. It was the mangled and bleeding bodies of his dead sons. How sad and sorrowful a recollection this must have been to him!

But Ebed-melech had his wife given to him as a reward for the kindness which he showed to the Prophet Jeremiah. Surely he found out that it was profitable to be kind.

The beggar boy and the flowers.—A little boy was standing near the gate in his father's garden. On the outside of the gate was a ragged little fellow, looking through the railing at the beautiful flowers that were blooming there.

'Go away, you beggar boy!' said the boy in the garden. 'You've no business to be looking at our flowers.'

The poor boy's face reddened with anger, to be spoken to so rudely, and he was about to answer in the same style when a bright young girl sprang out from an arbour near, and looking at her brother, said, 'How could you speak so roughly, Herbert? I'm sure his looking at the flowers won't hurt them.' And then turning to the boy outside the gate, in the kindest possible way, she said:—

'Little boy, I'll pick you some flowers if you'll wait a moment.' Then she gathered a beautiful bouquet, and handed it to him through the iron grating in the gate. He thanked her heartily, and turned away, with his face all lighted up with surprise and pleasure.

Twelve years pass away. That young girl has grown up to be a woman, and is married. One summer afternoon she was walking with her husband in the garden, when she saw a young man, in a workman's dress, leaning over the fence, and looking earnestly at her and the flowers. She said to him, 'Are you fond of flowers, sir? It will give me great pleasure to gather some for you.'

The young man looked at her fair face, and then said: 'Twelve years ago I stood here a ragged boy, and you showed me the same kindness that you are showing me now. Your sweet flowers and your kind words made a new boy of me; yes, and they made a new man of me, too. Your bright face has been a light and comfort to me in many a dark hour; and now, thank God, though that boy is still only a humble, hard-working man, yet he is an honest, grateful, God-fearing man, and he owes it all, through God's blessing, to your kindness.'

Tears stood in that lady's eyes as she heard these words; and turning to her husband, she said, 'God put it into my heart to do that little kindness, and see how great a reward it has brought!' Certainly this shows that kindness is profitable.

I have just one other illustration to give under this point of our subject. We may call it—

How God works.—This story is about a certain king, whose name was Rhoud. He lived in the north of Europe some centuries ago. At the time to which our story refers there was great trouble in his kingdom. There were many enemies of the king who were plotting to take away his life.

One day the king was taking a walk through the woods. A prince, whose name was Regan, was his companion. They were talking about the troubles in the kingdom. As they were going on through the beautiful woods, they heard something scream pitifully in one of the trees.

'It is a bird up yonder tree,' said the king; 'it screams because it is in some trouble.'

'Let it scream,' said Prince Regan. 'Just now we have more important things to think about than a little bird up a tree.'

'The nearest duty first,' said the king. 'There is nothing more important now than to show kindness to that little creature in its distress. Regan, I must climb up that tree.'

'But suppose you should fall and be killed, what a shame it would be to have it said that our king lost his life for the sake of a little bird!'

'Many a life has been lost for less,' replied the king, as he prepared to mount the tree. By the prince's help he managed to get hold of the lower branches. Then he went slowly up, higher and higher, till finally he came to where the bird was. It was a pretty little goldfinch, which had caught its leg in a crack of one of the branches of the tree, and could not get it loosened. The king took it carefully out, and came down safely, with the little goldfinch in his hand. He stroked its feathers tenderly, saying as he did so: 'It shall be my adopted child, and the playmate of my little daughter Agnar'.

He took the bird home, and had a beautiful cage made for it. 'How childish the king is!' said one of his officers. 'When war is at the door, and he is surrounded by great dangers, he finds time to save a little bird, and takes care of it himself.'

In the meantime, his enemies were still plotting against him. Two of the servants in the king's palace had been bribed to help them in carrying out their plans.

One day, when the king was out hunting with his men, his enemies made an arrangement by which they hoped to secure the death of the king during the following night. Their plan was this: in the ceiling of the king's bed-chamber, and directly over the bed on which he slept, was a very heavy beam of timber. This was loosened, and yet held in its place in such a way that, whenever they desired, it could be made to fall across the king's bed, and so crush him to death. Then they thought it would be supposed that the king had met his death by accident. People would say that the ceiling over the king's bed was weak, and had fallen during the night.

The king returned from his hunting late at night. He went to bed weary, and soon fell asleep, and probably would never have risen again had not the little bird suddenly awakened him by its screaming. He sprang from his bed to see what was the matter. He soon found that he had forgotten that morning, before going a-hunting, to give the little creature any water to drink, or any food to eat; and at evening, on his return, he was so tired that he went to bed without thinking of the bird. He took the cage in his hand, and said: 'You dear little creature! and did I save thy life only to let thee perish with hunger?'

Then he poured some water into the little glass, and put some seed in the little box in the cage.

And while he was doing this, the beam fell from the ceiling, with tremendous noise, and striking the bed, crushed it flat to the floor. The noise was heard all over the palace. The soldiers sleeping in the palace-yard awoke, and drew their swords. The frightened servants rushed into the king's chamber, with torches flaming in their trembling hands. As soon as they saw the ruins of the bed, they exclaimed: 'The king is killed! King Rhoud is crushed to pieces!'

But on looking round, they saw the king standing unhurt, with the bird-cage in his hand. He smiled on them, and exclaimed: 'Do not fear, my friends; God has kept His hand over me'.

When Prince Regan heard of all this—how the beam had fallen, and how the little bird had saved the king's life—he was amazed beyond measure. Then fixing his tearful eyes on the king, he said, 'How wonderfully God works! I never again shall doubt that there is a Providence in all things.' The king answered with a smile, 'Then you can see, Regan, that we should not despise little folks. If a king can save a bird, then the bird can save the king.'—

THE DOVE AS A GUIDE TO PERSONAL SAFETY

'Dwell in the rock, and be like the dove.'—JEREMIAH XLVIII. 28.

THIS shows the special wisdom of the dove to make its home and dwelling-place in the strong rock. The Lord Jesus is the 'Rock of Ages,' and all those who are wise build and hide and rest in Him for eternity.

Christ is the Foundation Rock (Matt. vii. 25); the Refreshing Rock (Ex. xvii. 6); the Sheltering Rock (Isa. xxxii. 2); and the Eternal Rock (Isa. xxvi. 4, margin). If we are wise like the dove, we shall hide in this Rock, and be safe for ever.

Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee.

LAMENTATIONS

HOPING AND WAITING

'It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the Lord.'—LAMENTATIONS III. 26.

HOPING and waiting—these are two of the biggest things that anybody can do, and two of the hardest to learn. But we must learn them and must do them if we would find the salvation of the Lord.

Do you know what it is to hope for a thing? It is to keep brave and expect it, even though you haven't got it yet, and there is nothing to show how you are to get it. When the farmer puts the seed in the ground in the spring-time, it is because he hopes by the end of the summer to have a great crop of wheat. But he doesn't see the wheat yet; he has not got it; he can only hope and quietly wait for it. And some days it will be very hard for him to hope. Storms will come, and floods of water will run down the furrows, and there will be fear that the seeds will be rotted away. Or snow and hailstones will fall just when the tassels are coming out, and then it will look as if there could be no harvest. The farmer is sad and troubled sometimes, but he hopes on, and at last, through all the risks and all the troubles, the autumn comes, and the harvest is gathered safe home. It is his hoping, hoping, always hoping, that keeps up his heart.

It is the same with us and everything in the world. There is a risk about it all. Yes, there is nothing great or grand or good in the world but you must run risks to get it. Why, what a big risk baby takes when he is good enough to come among us! He can't do anything for himself; he can't feed himself; he can't clothe himself; he can't even ask for what he wants. What a big risk he runs of being starved to death! I don't know how many diseases there are in the world, but he may catch any of them and be killed. I don't know how many sorts of accidents might occur, but any of them might happen to him. He has to risk all that. What keeps him here? What prevents him from running away back again to where he came from? It is hope: in spite of all the risks he has to run, he hopes to be able to dodge them all and get safe through.

And you? You never go through a single day without running hundreds and hundreds of risks. It is very easy for you to run out of the way of a carriage, but what if your ankle suddenly gave way? It is very pleasant to walk along the street, but what if the wind blows down a chimney-pot or slate on your head? Why, there is hardly a moment we live but we are running some risk: a sniff from a drain, a careless step, or a bit of a chill, when we are not very strong, and we are gone. What keeps us up? What helps us to live? It is hope, simple hope.

And that is how ships get over the seas and into the harbour at last. They meet with storms and calms, sunken rocks and drifting wrecks, and many other things that might do them harm; but they take all risk, and so they do something at last. Everything in the world is a risk, and the only thing that can keep you up is hope. So hope on, hope ever, keep a stout heart, and trust in God.

And especially about being saved. Some people are frightened to begin to go on God's way, and to say boldly that they belong to Jesus. They look along the road, and they see so many dangers, so many temptations, so many snares, that they are afraid if they begin they will never be able to end. They forget that they won't have to meet these dangers and temptations and snares all at once, but only one at a time; it is wonderful when we come to a difficulty how hope can guide us through it. So do not be afraid of not getting to heaven because of anything that can happen on earth. Trust in the Lord, and hope on, hope on still. It will sometimes be hard to do it; I know things will be dark, and the road will be rough, and perhaps you yourself will be a bit weak and tired; but if your hope is in the Lord, and not in yourself, never be afraid, but go on—He will carry you through. Hope, that is the first thing, the great thing, the heart of it all.

But wait—that is the next thing. 'What was the hardest bit of the battle?' I asked an old soldier once who had been in a great and terrible fight. I expected him to say it was when the guns began to blaze, or when the cavalry came riding down, or when the swords were slashing wildly all around. But no! 'The hardest bit of the battle,' he said, 'was waiting for the battle to begin' You will often find it harder to wait than to work.

The Rev. William Gray, when he was in the Alps, visited a glacier grotto that was reached by a tunnel bored through the solid ice. 'As we penetrated into the chilly depths,' he says, 'away from the outside sunshine that flooded valley and peak, the light became dimmer and dimmer, and when we stood in the narrow chamber at the end of the passage, the darkness was as black as pitch. 'Wait,' said the guide, 'and in five minutes you shall see light clearly.' We waited, and it was just as he had told us. Yet no lamp was lit, no match was struck. What happened was this: as the eye got accustomed to its new surroundings, the atmosphere gradually brightened, the walls and the roof of the grotto glimmered into pure translucent green, and in the clear soft light that encircled us we could recognise the faces of our companions, and read the smallest type in our guide-books.'

That is what waiting can do. It can open our eyes to see things we could not see before, to see the beautiful things of God that are all around us, but which only patient, waiting eyes can see.—J. REID HOWARR, The Children's Preacher, p. 75.

BEARING THE YOKE IN YOUTH

'It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth.'— LAMENTATIONS III. 27.

THE words of our text, found in the mouth of the young, open to us this whole matter of preparing oneself in youth to meet and to assume the labours, the burdens, and, if need be, the sorrows of life. In this sense, as a distinct matter of preparation for later life, we now use the words, 'It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth'. And I affirm that no one who understands the mind and temper of youth will call this subject sad or gloomy. Is a technical preparation for later life sad or gloomy? Are we mournful when we see the young student of chemistry at work in his laboratory, or the student of theology in his lecture-room? Are we saddened by the bright, ambitious eyes, the diligent demeanour of the youth beginning his clerkship, learning the business of his employer, preparing for success and power in later life? Why, then, associate the thought of gloom with that personal preparation of life and character for the future—of which we have been speaking? Is it sad to urge the young to lay hold upon themselves, with a view to developing the beauties and the glories of a perfect character, rather than yield themselves to the wild growth of those passions and tendencies which must surely disgrace, enfeeble, and destroy? So far from finding in our text a suggestion of gloom or sadness, there is nothing presented to us save what is grand, and strong, and hopeful, when we say, 'It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth'.

There are three words by which I would characterise and explain the bearing of the yoke in youth, so far as we are competent to put the yoke upon ourselves. The words are these: Self-discipline, Responsibility, Discipleship. It is a particular comfort to me, in pursuing this subject, to reflect that so many of the young persons present are personally known to me, and that with so much of your lives and with so many of your hopes I am familiar. In a multitude of instances you have been kind enough to speak of those hopes and desires; in others, close and careful observation has revealed them. Therefore there comes that sense of knowing just where you stand, and the relation to you of this mighty subject of special preparation for life by bearing the yoke in youth.

I. Self-discipline.—Two ideas are presented here: first, Self; second, Discipline. First, Self: Every human being is created with likes and dislikes; with appetites, passions, tendencies; and by the natural law under which these things move, they cut for themselves grooves in the personality of which they are attributes. We call those grooves habits. Self is that underlying existence upon which these various tendencies, appetites, affections, and aversions lie and work. The grooves they cut are cut in self. But self is not a rock. Self is not a mass of inanimate matter. Self is a moral life. Self is a seat of will-power. Self is a reservoir of strength. Self need not lie still and let passion, and prejudice, and impulse cut grooves upon it—as the schoolboy covers his slate with idle signs and marks. Self can hear the Voice of God, and rise up and act.

Second, Discipline: Discipline is teaching and training. Self-discipline is self refusing to lie still and be rutted and grooved by passions and tendencies; rising up, taking those tendencies and appetites, and likes and dislikes, in hand—teaching them, training them, according to the law, not of pleasure or preference, but of right and wrong, as that law is communicated by God to the soul. Now note two facts about self-discipline: Whoever honestly undertakes it discovers how all of life must come under its influence. The body must be disciplined. The common matters of eating and drinking, of sleep and exercise, are a field for discipline—for bodily habits fastened upon us in youth may, as they are good or bad, crown or crush us in time and in eternity. The mind must be disciplined. To think well is not with many a natural gift. Books and schools are, to most of us, not only the guides, but practically the creators of intellectual force and vigour. The whole cycle of moral qualities must be disciplined. Courage, charity, patience, reverence, truthfulness; these, in most lives, require training the most conscientious, the most unremitting. So, self-discipline, honestly undertaken, is the education, not of one thing, but of every part of us. Again: self-discipline is found to consist mainly in compelling ourselves to cease from doing certain things agreeable to us, and to do certain other things which are distasteful. We must not misunderstand one another here. Self-discipline is laborious—it is often painful, often wearisome; but it is not arbitrary, nor capricious, nor frivolous. We do not make ourselves disagreeable things for the mere sake of doing them, but for the strength, and the completeness, and the power which arise from the deliberate conquering of a wrong feeling. To illustrate: you have the strongest possible dislike to approach any scene of human grief, pain, or agony. You desire to keep away from such things altogether, and be happy. That desire, and you know it, if permitted to be gratified, will make you, by degrees, the most supremely selfish of beings. Self-discipline consists, in this instance, in compelling yourself to go, when occasion offers, into the very midst of those conditions so distasteful to you, and in holding yourself there, and committing yourself to those very acts of the comforter and the sympathiser which have had so little charm for you heretofore. Along this line of discipline are all those acts of Christian labour from which we shrink and hold back, while convinced of our duty to go forward. And we cannot be too plain of speech in showing that in matters yet more personal, every life has its field of self-discipline. Your daily habits, your physical and mental customs, your social affiliations open to you a quiet way of doing a work in and upon yourself for which I believe you shall have cause to bless God throughout eternity. Are you too fond of sleep, though no bodily infirmity calls for late rising? Compel yourself to become an early riser, not for the mere sake of the thing itself, but for the power of that victory upon you. Are you becoming dependent upon some physical luxury? Compel yourself to let it lie for a time untouched, not as a question of physical prudence, but for the value of that victory upon you. Doing these things quietly, without ostentation, day by day, you lay a yoke upon your own shoulders.

II. The second word by which we characterise the bearing of the yoke is Responsibility. It is good for one to bear this in youth. In this country, where the competitions of life are so tremendous and the number of inherited fortunes so small, it is indeed the prevalent law that the yoke of responsibility shall rest early on the young. And when we consider all the developments of our age, not only in mercantile callings, but in literary and social and ecclesiastical life, the tendency does indeed appear to be toward an increased multitude of those who in social and domestic circles, or in special forms of religious work, or in the great battle of the open world, are bearing this yoke in youth. It is a yoke which may, and often does, press too heavily; and all of us have within our observation instances where, to our view, it does seem a misfortune that the yoke of heavy responsibility must needs have been borne so early. Doubtless, there are many of whom, humanly speaking, it might be said: their life would have been richer, more beautiful in power and grace, had God spared them the yoke a little longer. There is a sense in which nothing is more pathetic than the phrase, 'an old head on young shoulders,' when adversity and anxiety have left their melancholy imprint on countenances where yet should twinkle the sunny smile of childhood. But among you, whom I address, these extreme cases, if they exist, are rare by comparison with the numbers of you who are compelled by circumstances to know just so much of care and responsibility as you can bear without a sense of oppression, and yet, with a sense of limitation. Such a position is the best, far the best for you. It is good for you to bear a yoke of that weight. You are not oppressed, you are not distracted by responsibility, yet you feel limited; you are happy, sometimes wondrously happy, yet in connection with a thought of care. God wills that you shall have some things to trouble you and give you a taste of anxiety. Certain things depend upon you; certain claims in the household, in the church, in the business world, are represented in you, and are to be met by you. And often, without doubt, this element of responsibility grows irksome, and you feel caged by it, chained by it, and long for the freedom of a mind without care, a life without claims. Now, I believe nothing ever learned in books is so good for one as this element of care. Entering into the life of youth it is a blessed yoke, a healthful discipline; for by it the fibres of character grow firm and reliable, the habitual meeting of smaller responsibilities prepares the way for greater as they come, and makes one able to bear silently and invisibly many a care and worry of later life which would excite almost to desperation one who had never had that early schooling in responsibility. The youthful heart which finds itself encumbered by some care and envies those who seem to be emancipated from everything save unlimited self-enjoyment, need not feel itself unhappy or unfortunate. If God had put us here to find our highest aims met by pleasure, then indeed all care, early or late, would be an intrusion and a hindrance. But He has called us with an holy calling; He has adopted us as sons and as daughters; He is sending us forth into the world to taste sublimer joys than can ever come from mere pleasure-seeking, the strong joys of conscious growth and usefulness and acceptance with God. It is good, therefore, for you to bear in youth that yoke of responsibility according to your strength; it is the wisest, tenderest ministry upon your character; it is preparing you to stand firm in hours when all is lost unless you stand firm; to control yourself in crises where an unbridled word might create years of suffering; to maintain a clear head and brave heart, a pure and calm and loving spirit, when the whirling currents of a thousand separate cares seem converging to wrap you in their vortex and swallow up your courage and your hope.

III. But when, in preparing for the greater scenes of later life, all that human wisdom can devise has been said and done, there remains one other, one Divine word, by which to characterise the bearing of the yoke in youth—Discipleship. You are standing at the entering in of life; your history is in great part unmade; your position undefined; all is before you. Before you take the next step, whatever it may be, before you change in anywise your present status, let there be perfect silence in your heart; let the voices of the world, the voices of ambition, the voices of pleasure for the time be still, that you may hear with your whole heart that Voice which speaks to you at this moment: 'Take My yoke upon you and learn of Me, and you shall find rest unto your soul: for My yoke is easy and My burden is light'. I most solemnly declare to you, 'It is good for a man that he bear this yoke in his youth'. If at this hour of deep thought, with beating heart you are asking yourself the question, How can I be strong and good and useful in my generation? how can I realise the holy and glorious purposes which have been dwelt upon in this course of sermons? how can I secure 'the baptism of the Spirit' upon my heart? how can I accumulate 'spiritual wealth'? how can I avoid the choice of a 'bramble king' to reign over me? how can I ever win that victory in which one is more than conqueror?—the only answer in heaven and earth that will give you help is the answer of the Son of God: 'Take My yoke upon you in your youth and learn of Me, and you shall find rest unto your soul'. You must become a Christian. You must give heart and life to Christ. Do not think that you sacrifice any true joy or renounce any true freedom by bearing His yoke in your youth. 'His service is perfect freedom.' His yoke does not press you down, it lifts you up, lifts you up for ever.—C. CUTHBERT HALL, Sermons for Boys and Girls by Eminent American Preachers, p. 54.

EZEKIEL

TWO WAYS

'At the parting of the way, at the head of the two ways.'—
EZEKIEL XXI. 21.

THERE are only two ways in the world for us to walk in—the right way and the wrong way. They are very close together at some points, and you may think that, after all, it can matter very little which way you take. Sometimes when travelling in a railway train you feel a little sudden jerk. Somebody remarks, 'We are passing over the points then'. You look out of the window, and the railway lines seem to have increased in number. Where there had been only two lines of rails there are now four, but still they are all running in precisely the same direction. Presently, if you keep watching them, you notice that while the lines you are travelling on go straight forward, the other lines begin to slant the least possible little bit in another direction. The space between you and these increases very gradually. It is very slight at first, but it grows perceptibly wider and wider. Then there comes almost a bend in the line; it is lost to your sight now behind a hedge. You can see its direction only by the tall telegraph poles that stand up and show themselves over the wide fields that intervene. Soon they too become lost to view, and for a few moments a little white puff of smoke floating up above the trees tells you the direction in which the train on the other line has gone; but that grows less and less, and dies out at last in the distant air, and you see and hear no more. There is just such a parting of the two ways in life. The right way and the wrong way appear to be so very close, and are so very close together at first, it does not seem possible that it could matter much which you follow. Let me tell you of some of these points at which the two ways part.

I. You have grown up for years always speaking the truth to your parents. You have obeyed and loved your father and mother. A time comes when you have done something of which you are ashamed. You know that the right thing would be to go straight to your parents and tell them; but you are tempted not to do so. You think it might make them think less highly of you; and you say, perhaps they will never hear about it at all. Then you are asked about it, and in a moment there comes into your heart the thought, 'I'll just this once say what is untrue, and then never again'; and you tell your first lie. You are unhappy about it; there was a great jerk to your nature then, at the point where the line of strict truth parted from the line of deception. I think, some of you, if you just think now quietly for a moment, can remember something like that in your lives.

II. Or, again, you have grown up for years gladly obeying your parents, not only in their presence but in their absence, doing what they have told you to do, not doing anything which they had forbidden you to do. A day comes when, perhaps, you are with some very agreeable companions; you are full of joy and merriment, and something very pleasant is proposed. It is, however, a forbidden thing. The moment it is suggested you know, without waiting to think even for a minute, that your parents would not approve. But it is so nice, it would so spoil all the fun for you to say, 'I can't join in that, my father and mother would not approve'. So you say nothing. You begin to reason with yourself that perhaps it is not exactly the same thing as what they had on another occasion forbidden to you; that it cannot be very bad, when these others are all going to do it with so light a heart (if you could see their hearts you might find they were all going to do it with just such a hesitating heart as your own); and even if you do it now, and afterwards find out that it was disobedience, you need never do it again. And—you do it. There is a very unpleasant jerk again as you pass at the parting of the two ways, from the line of straightforward obedience on to the slanting curving line of disobedience and deceit.

There are a great many other points in the long line of our life where right and wrong part; those I have mentioned will, I am sure, help you to remember many others for yourselves.

III. One thing I want you particularly to learn, and that is how much easier it is to avoid the wrong way and keep to the right way just at the place where they part, than it is afterwards to travel back and resume your journey on the right way which you have forsaken. The point called the parting of the ways is, of course, also the place where they meet. Many a man and many a woman could tell you with what bitterly sorrowful memories they now look back to that place. How easy it would have been then to have said 'No!' to the temptation. How terribly hard the struggle is now, after years of indifference and sin, to recover what has been lost. Make up your minds about it while you are young. It is far easier, while your hearts are young and fresh and open to all good influences, to make your lives beautiful and pure in the sight of God and man, than it is to do so after your character has become more formed, and the chill world has cooled down your young affections and enthusiasm. I saw once, lying side by side in a great workshop, two heads made of metal. The one was perfect—all the sweet features of a noble, manly face came out clear and distinct in their lines of strength and beauty; in the other, scarcely a single feature could be recognised—it was all marred and spoiled. 'The metal had been let grow a little too cool, sir,' said the man who was showing it to me. I could not help thinking how true that was of many a form more precious than metal. Many a young soul that might be stamped with the image and superscription of the King while it is warm with the love and glow of early youth is allowed to grow too cold, and the writing is blurred, and the image is marred.

High up amid the mountain ranges of the Black Forest, in Germany, you may see a number of little tiny streams trickling down over the rough rocks and through the dark woods: small at first—so small that the broken branch of a tree, or some fragment of stone fallen from the overhanging crag, may divert it to the right hand or the left. It seems little matter, indeed, which course the stream follows, as it sings its happy way down the mountain-side, rippling and sparkling in the summer sunshine; but just that turn decides whether it is to flow with the streams below which unite to make the Danube, or with those which form the Rhine—whether, in fact, it is to pass on and on through the warmer climes to a southern sea, or to empty itself at last into the cold and freezing waters of the north. It is so with the bright, clear stream of your young, pure lives. A very little, trivial, unimportant thing, as it seems now, may after all decide whether its tide shall be ever rolling onward towards the bleakness and coldness of despair, or to the sunnier and warmer climes of Eternal Love.

'I am the way,' said Christ; 'I, and none other.' I am; not I was, or I shall be, but I am at every point and moment of your life. I am the way; not a way, but the only way. I am the way, the way that leads to everlasting joy and peace and love.

Try and learn that lesson here to-day; pray and strive that you may never part from Him who is the way, the truth, the life.—T. TEIGNMOUTH SHORE, Saint George for England, p. 91.

THE NEW HEART

EZEKIEL XXXVI. 26.

In the books I read when I was as young as you are was the story which I used to think very wonderful.

A certain king had an only son, and he was the heir to the throne. But this son had a great infirmity. Whenever he opened his mouth to speak, frogs and serpents sprang out. The king wept many tears, so did the queen. But the evil did not cease. Doctors were called in, but they could do nothing. Nobody was wise and skilful enough to cure the child; and people avoided him; they did not like to be in the same room with him.

Night and day the king cried in secret, 'Oh, that my poor boy might be cured!' Night and day the queen joined in the prayer, 'Oh, that the evil might come to an end!' But it did not come to an end, and the longer it continued the worse it seemed to grow.

One day a traveller was passing through the kingdom, and as he came near the royal palace he heard the porters and people about talking of the boy and the sorrow of the king and the queen. So he said to himself, 'Should I pass by this sorrow?' So he went into the palace and sent word to the king that he knew how the boy could be cured.

'What the boy wants,' said the traveller, 'is that a new heart should be given to him, and his present heart taken away. It is in the heart that the evil is,' and this was told to the king.

And the king said, 'The half of my kingdom I give to you if you bring this cure to pass.'

But the stranger said, 'I shall not receive either silver or gold, either house or fields; but I want that your son shall come with me'. So the king and queen allowed their son to go with the traveller.

Now down in a beautiful valley lived a wise and a noble woman who was known for her wonderful cures. She had made the blind to see and the deaf to hear. The traveller placed the boy under her care, and by the wonderful skill she had the old heart was put away and the new heart was brought into its place. And then he was sent back to his father. When he came into his father's presence, he said, 'What a beautiful dream I have had!' and as he spoke, instead of frogs and newts and serpents, there came out of his mouth the most lovely rubies and pearls. Everybody was delighted; everybody wished to be beside him. And the king made a great banquet in honour of his son's return, and bade all his friends to it.

And by and by the old king died and his son ascended the throne, and in the history of that kingdom the chapter which tells of this reign is called the history of 'The King with the Ruby Mouth'.

Now I have not told the story just as I read it. I have let you a little bit into the secret of its meaning. The mouth out of which serpents came was the mouth of a child that had a heart unkind. The mouth out of which rubies came was the mouth of the same child after the evil heart was taken away and a kind heart put in its place. The serpents were unkind words and unbecoming words; rude thoughts and harsh thoughts, spoken to servants and to parents. The pearls and rubies were the loving, honest, brave words from the new, loving, honest, and brave heart. And the wise lady in the beautiful valley was the Church of Jesus, where by prayer, by penitence and by faith in Jesus the new heart was given.

You are sons and daughters of the King of heaven. Speak good words, words honest and true, words of lovingkindness to all around you. God will fulfil His word, 'A new heart will I give unto you,' to all who ask Him, and who use it as it comes to them to make others happy.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 59.

THE DROPS OF WATER

'Then said he unto me, These waters issue out towards the east country, and go down into the desert, and go into the sea; which being brought forth into the sea, the waters shall be healed.'—EZEKIEL XLVII. 8.

I ONCE lived in an island where there were high mountains that went towering up to the sky; and steep, narrow valleys that divided the mountain ranges, and ran down from the very midst of the island to the sea. Each of these valleys or ravines had its own bright stream; in summer a little rivulet, such as you might, here and there, without much difficulty, leap across; here and there, where it grew shallower and spread itself out wider, cross by stepping-stones. But in winter they grew and increased, and became foaming rivers, deep, fierce, and terrible, roaring and rioting along their courses, and sometimes tearing up the mills which they were intended to turn, and the bridges which bestrode them. The island, I should tell you, was in the Tropics; as you know, the hottest part of this earth which God has made so wonderfully for the different needs of man. When I went there, every one thought that I was going to die, that nothing could save me, unless for the one hope of this warmer climate. It pleased God to bless the air and the mountains to me; and after three years, He brought me back to England quite well. But when I first went there, I took Jacob's words on my own lips:—

'And Jacob vowed a vow, saying, If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, so that I come again to my father's house in peace; then shall the Lord be my God: and this stone, which I have set for a pillar, shall be God's house: and of all that Thou shalt give me I will surely give a tenth unto Thee.'

So you see that, though all are bound to give what they have to God, I more than all. I only wish I did it more!

Well, as I was once walking in one of the ravines there, I thought of this story; and that if it ever pleased God to entrust me with children, I would tell it them. Now listen to it.

But first I must tell you that, on account of the heat of the climate, the gardens and corn-fields and vineyards require to be watered with little streams. Accordingly, high up in the mountains they have built tiny canals here and there, into which the water flows; and then these canals branch off to such a garden, or such an olive yard, or such a plantation of bananas with their great yellow pods, or guavas, which are like refreshing apples with blood-red insides: and thus the water is carried to them, and the wilderness and the solitary place is refreshed.

Now, one spring morning, when everything was bright and blue, the forest on the mountain-side waving in the gentlest breeze, the birds singing their best (but the song of those birds is very poor compared to ours), the lizard basking in the sun, shining with living green and gold and jewels; a little stream was dashing down one of these ravines. Far, far below it the sea lay calm and blue: it was hurrying there, that it might be swallowed up of the ocean. Oh, what a steep descent! how it foamed and roared and hissed along! sometimes in a real waterfall, sometimes over great rocks and a pebbly beach; very, very rarely forming a quiet little bay, green from the clearness and the depth of the water. So beautiful everything was! the mountains towered high on this side and on that; goats leapt from crag to crag: here there were bare bleak rocks, here mountain-sides covered with forests: on the one side, you are reminded of 'the shadow of a great Rock in a weary land'; the other seems to cry out, 'Oh, all ye green things upon the earth, bless ye the Lord: praise Him and magnify Him for ever'.

You know that water can be divided into a certain quantity of drops, but only a certain quantity: that is, there are drops as small as possible, and which cannot be divided into smaller. Now I will tell you what some of these drops said to each other, as they came rushing and roaring down the ravine, the steep mountains on either side, the blue sea in the distance below. They were just reaching a place where one of the canals of which I have told you branched off: the proper name of such a canal is a Levada.

'How troublesome this is,' said one of the drops, 'to be hurried forward and dashed from rock to rock, and from stone to stone! Never able to stop for a single moment; on, on, it must be, always trouble, always confusion, till we get down into the sea.'

'So it is, brother,' said a second drop. 'I quite agree with you. Only just look up to where we have come from! From the time we gushed out of the cavern where we were born, not one second's rest have we had; and, for aught I see, not one second's rest are we likely to have.'

'No,' said the first; 'and for my part I advise that we turn off into the next levada. See, how quiet everything is there! I suppose they get into the sea at last too; but then they go down quietly without being dashed and beaten about as we are, knocked to pieces on this side and on that; they have a smooth even bed made for them, and glide down quietly and gently, without any trouble, and without any noise.'

'Well, you two may do what you like,' said a third drop; 'but, for my part, the road I was intended to go lies straight before me, and I am determined to go straight forward, as I was bidden at first. You talk about the levada! You do not know that it leads down into the sea after all; it is just as likely to be swallowed up in the marshes. And suppose it does: you must have noticed in some of those that we have passed, how filthy the water has become, water that once was as pure, as clear, as bright, as sparkling as we are.'

And, truth to say, I never did see water so bright and diamond-like as that in those ravines. Where it gushes out of the rock, it looks when the sun shines on it as if a basketful of precious stones were being poured forth. Whether it runs swiftly along, over comparatively smooth ground, or frets and foams in the cascade, or for a moment loiters in a little pool, clear, lucid, and green as emerald; it is as clear and pure as—what shall I say? as I could wish that you might have those jewels which belong to you, your souls, clear and pure, to present to the Merchant-man, who seeks goodly pearls, when He shall ask for them at the Last Day.

'As to what you say about the levadas not flowing into the sea,' said the first drop, 'I do not believe that at all. See how they keep along by our side. True, they do not hurry down quite so quickly as we do, but there is some way at the end that makes up for that, and they will get into the ocean all the same, and by a great deal easier passage.'

'And as to the brightness of the water,' remarked the second, 'one cannot always help that. We must do as well as we can. If the water loses its clearness for a minute, it gains it again somehow, and that is enough for me.'

'Well, do as you will,' said the first drop; 'here is what settles my resolution. Look, we are soon coming to a water-mill. I am not going to be dashed about in another of those mills as I was just now, I can tell you. And look, here is a levada that turns off all very conveniently. Let us decide to get into that; and oh, what a comfort it will be to have a little rest!'

There was once a very holy man, who had written I know not how many volumes—forty or fifty at the very least—in God's service; and great, thick, closely printed volumes they were. When he was between seventy and eighty, a dear friend of his told him that he ought not to work so hard, and that he was now fairly entitled to a little rest. 'Rest!' he said, 'Rest! shall I not have all eternity to rest in?' That is what I want you, but above all, what I want myself, to feel.

But to go on with what I was telling you. 'Pray, pray stop,' cried the other drop, 'you cannot tell where you may be going, you do not know but that—'

But while it spoke, the two that had been talking together, and a good many others, glided off into the levada, and bade farewell to their companions in whatever way drops do bid each other good-bye in. And what a difference there was in the way in which they now went on! The one tumbling and dashing from rock to rock, whirled about here, dashed into spray there, and presently caught on the great wheel of a water-mill, churned up into foam, and then sent hissing and boiling forth to pursue its rocky descent; the other gliding softly and smoothly along through a trench of squared stone: no opposition, no obstacle. But our drops, instead of the pure white pebbles over which they had rolled, now found themselves constantly sliding over green slime, and those long clammy weeds that you see palpitating in stagnant water. Ease! yes, there was ease indeed! But was it not dearly purchased by the loss of clearness and brightness? And now, too, they perceived that the levada, which had at first kept side by side with the mountain-stream, began to bend off to the right: further and further went its course from the original torrent. And now it was clear that the levada led on to a village, and passed the middle of the narrow street. Ah! these villages are very different from ours! And presently the wanderers from the torrent found themselves mixed up with heaps of filth, exposed to all manner of uncleanness and impurity: now no longer the pure, bright stream, but dark, ill-smelling, stagnant pestiferous water. True: no trouble and torment now, from being dashed this way and that way; it stagnated in vile, foul, fever-bearing pools and puddles. Here was a change indeed; from the glorious brightness of a mountain ravine, to the abominations of mud-heaps, and decaying vegetables, and dung-hills!

Well; but we must not be too angry with our poor little drops, or wonder so much at their folly. It does seem very hard: I know it well enough for myself, and I dare say you know it also: it does seem very hard, always to have to strive and to struggle, never to be allowed a moment's rest, a moment's comfort. But then, you know, if the perpetual struggle is the only condition by which we can, as St. John says, purify ourselves even as He is pure, then I think we shall be ready, willingly to undergo it.

At last, after many an hour of lingering in this unclean hamlet, the stream found its way out again, and, though utterly polluted, entirely abominable, it did begin to flow. 'Oh, that we had never left our mountain bed!' cried one of the drops.

'Oh, how I loathe myself, and everything that is about me!' said another.

'How gladly would I suffer anything, if I could but make my way back thither!' said a third.

'Would you?' asked a long green weed that lay upon the stream. 'You will have the opportunity soon enough. You are now at an immense height above the torrent you left. Before long, the levada will lead you out on the mountain-side, right above it. You will find a gap in the side of the stonework. If you boldly throw yourself through that opening, you will fall, fall, fall, many a fathom down, dashing from peak to peak, and from splinter to splinter; but you will regain the torrent at last. But if you neglect that one opportunity, the only one you will ever have, after contracting more and more filth, you will finally ooze out into the salt swamp below, and there your moisture will be exhaled by the sun, and only the filth remain behind.'

'Let me but have the chance!' cried the drop. And presently they had reached the spot. There the sluggish stream of the levada divided into two; part continued its course as before; part with a courageous bound leapt through the broken barrier, and precipitated itself into the torrent below. What a below it was! Such a huge, dizzy height! Such sharp, hard-pointed rocks! For twelve or fifteen hundred feet to be battered against these, falling through the air from one awful rock to another, and then plunging into the cataract. The two drops came together to the breach.

'Whatever it cost!' cried the one, and leapt over with the leaping water.

'I dare not do it,' cried the other; and glided onwards with the filthy stream.

Should I say poor drop! of that which had leapt? True, the stream that poured over the side was dashed into foam, churned into cream, blown about in the thin air; plunging at every fall into a new agony, but also at every fall, losing some of its impurity. And when once more the last leap brought it into the original mountain stream, with renewed life, brightness, and purity—yes, then the purification was worth the suffering!

As for the other drop, the levada soon ended.

The slow sluggish motion was over. The drop was now part of a stagnant pond, caked over with filth, where nothing but unclean and slimy water insects could dwell: a vile, putrid abomination; the noon-day summer sun sucking up its vapours, and dispersing them to scatter typhus about the country. And that was the end of the Two Drops!

You can explain the story for yourselves. You know that if you are to remain what God made you in baptism, it must be by a continued effort, it must be with perpetual suffering.

You know also that if you once forsake the right path, it will be ten times more agony to enter it again. God grant that you may never fall from it! But God also grant that if you do, you may, by His grace, and at whatever cost, return again to the narrow road, and finally, like the drop in my story, be swallowed up in the ocean of Everlasting Love!—J. # DANIEL

LESSONS IN THE BOOK OF DANIEL

It is interesting to know that a Band of Hope existed six hundred years before the Christian era.

You will find an account of it in the first chapter of the Book of Daniel.

There were only four members in that band: Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, better known by the names given them by their captors—as Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego.

First Lesson (Dan. ii. 1-25).—Long ago—before the Bible was written—God made use of dreams to bring things to pass, but now that we have the Bible He does not.

A dream is a very wonderful thing. In a dream the body is asleep and at rest; but the soul is filled with people, with mountains and fields and houses and rivers and trees, with voices, with sounds.

Sometimes, not often, God spoke to His people by dreams. He spoke to Solomon in a dream; He spoke to Paul in dreams.

More frequently He sent a dream to some one not belonging to His people, that it might bring forward one of His people to explain it.

Pharaoh in Egypt dreamed a dream about ears of corn, some full, some thin; about cattle, some well fed, some starved; and God sent that dream to Pharaoh. It was to bring innocent Joseph, who himself was a great dreamer, out of the prison into which he had been wickedly cast, and lift him into the place of chief ruler in the land.

In the same way this King of Babylon dreamed a dream, and then forgot the dream he had dreamed. The dream he dreamed and the forgetting of the dream were both from God, in order that Daniel should be lifted up into a place in Babylon like that which Joseph filled in Egypt.

But although Nebuchadnezzar was great, being a king, he was both unreasoning and cruel.

In that old time, when dreams were thought to come from God, learned men sprang up who gave themselves out as tellers of dreams. They were called magicians, astrologers, sorcerers, and Chaldeans. They were interpreters of dreams. And this unreasonable king said to these learned men: 'Tell me my dream'.

Now these wise men undertook to tell the meaning of dreams, but not the dreams themselves. They could not do that.

'Put them all to death,' cried the cruel king in his rage. Put perhaps a thousand innocent men to death because he had forgotten his dream! How very cruel!

And when the king gave the order there were plenty of that class whose feet are swift to shed blood to fulfil it.

And among the number condemned they thought to put Daniel and his three companions to death, although they were neither magicians, nor astrologers, nor sorcerers, nor Chaldeans, but only harmless captives.

But it is not so easy to put to death those whom God intends to live.

So Daniel, being very brave, went straight to the angry king, and said: 'O king, do not fulfil this evil threat against innocent men; but give me time, and by my God's help I will undertake to tell your dream and the interpretation of it'.

And to this the king agreed.

Then this little Band of Hope met, and Daniel said: 'Let us form ourselves into a band of prayer. Only God can help us in this great difficulty.'

And they lifted up their cry to God in prayer.

Second Lesson (Dan. ii. 20-23).—Although there were only four in this meeting, yet this great deliverance was wrought by their prayer, and that is our lesson in this chapter.

And God heard the prayer of these four young men, who were very dear to Him, and He made known to Daniel both the dream and the interpretation.

And so Daniel saved the lives of the magicians, astrologers, and Chaldeans.

Third Lesson (Dan. iii. 1-18).—But now this is worse than the dream. An image of gold in a dream was bad enough, even when unknown, but it was only in a dream.

But this image is no dream, it is reality, an unconscious image, sixty feet high, just half the height of most church spires, plated with gold, glorious in the morning sun, splendid in the evening sun.

You will ask, Whose image was it? It was the image of the king himself!

I said he was a foolish fellow, and you see a proof of it here.

But it was a serious thing for our band of four. It was against their religion to worship any image, even an image of God—still less a likeness of a man.

And when the day of the worship of the golden image came, the Band of Hope stood still.

Daniel was not present.

Their enemies told the king.

The king, being a foolish fellow, got very angry. He said he had raised these men to their high estate. He had done them so much kindness, and this was the reward!

Then in his anger he called them into his presence. Do not follow a multitude to do evil.

Their noble answer—'Our God, whom we serve, is able to deliver, but we dare not fall down to worship graven images. God will help us: God will deliver us.'

But next: 'Whether or no, we will not worship the image. That would be sin, and we will not be guilty of this sin.'

That really is the lesson.

But a word in the First Epistle of John explains this: 'Little children keep yourselves from idols'.

What idols does the Apostle refer to? All idols, images of gold, and everything else that is not God.

Fourth Lesson (Dan. iii. 19-30).—How the three Hebrew youths refused to become idolators.

They cast themselves on God.

They said: 'If God will deliver us, well; if not, that also is well'.

Their duty was clear.

But Nebuchadnezzar was both a foolish and evil king. He could not bear that any one should disobey him. You know that in after-years he was changed into a beast. And the beast was already in his heart. His visage changed, and because those three had refused to do wrong at his bidding, they were ordered then by him to be cast into a raging fiery furnace.

What do you think these three lads felt? Were they sorry? Yes; life was as sweet to them as it is to you. But sweeter far was righteousness and obedience to God.

But they were cast in, they were hurled into the furnace.

But how strange! The king himself is looking on, the wild beast in him, but the angel in them.

He sees a sight that fills him with terror; he sees a fourth. He asks, Who is that? It is the angel of God.

God was with them. The eternal God was their refuge.

Then the king ordered them to be taken out.

'And he made a law that people were to speak no evil of the God whom those three young men worshipped.'

So it became the fashion to speak well of the three and of their God.

And they were set up in their old places of honour and power again.

The lesson is, Do the right: be faithful unto death, and God will give you a crown of life.

Fifth Lesson—(Dan. iv. 1-18).—I am afraid you will not get much in the way of a lesson, only of a Bible story, to-day.

You must think of a good many years having passed since the dream of the golden image.

During those years Nebuchadnezzar has been in many a battle-field with his soldiers, and he has won many battles. And he has heaped up gold and silver. And he has built up a great palace in Babylon; and, indeed, Nebuchadnezzar built Babylon anew.

He is very proud of what he has done.

I said he was a foolish king. But he was very clever, for all that. People can be clever and foolish both, especially if they are in high positions in life, like Nebuchadnezzar, and can always have their own way.

How his heart swelled with pride! He had got into a habit of looking very high up at the castle and palaces and walls, and also round about far and near.

And sometimes when he was being wheeled around the walls, and saw the soldiers in the barracks, the merchants in the market, the sailors on the ships on the river, and the splendid castles, he would say: 'Was there ever so clever a king as I am? or one so great?'

Well, but he had another dream, and he dreamed it was summer, and he thought he saw a tree—a splendid fruit tree.

Now that is a very fine thing to dream of.

He saw the tall stem, and the branches, and the flowers, and the fruit.

He heard the birds sing in the branches, and he saw the lambs beneath its shade; and he saw too the little children gathering up the fruit.

Then he saw a watcher, a Holy One come down from heaven, and heard Him cry aloud: 'Hew down the tree: cut off his branches; shake off his leaves and scatter his fruit'. That was an overturning!

'Hew it down, cut it to the stump; let it remain that way for seven years.

'Let the tree be wet with the dew for seven years, but without leaves; no flower and no fruit.'

That was the dream which Daniel was called upon to interpret.

But what the awful interpretation of the dream was can tell when we read the fourth chapter of the Book of Daniel, nineteenth verse to the end.

When he heard Daniel's interpretation, what must Nebuchadnezzar have felt?

To be told that the tree was himself; the cutting down was of himself! And the stump of the roots left in the earth, that too was himself.

Nebuchadnezzar, a king, was a bad king. He had not ruled by the love of God.

God bore with him long, but would now chastise him.

As he had ruled from a beast's heart, He would now send him to taste what a beast's life was.

There was but one way to escape: to leave off being a beast.

Well, the way Nebuchadnezzar became a beast was with pride, personal pride.

'This is great Babylon,' he said, 'which I have built.'

No more thought of God than if He had been a beast.

But there are other ways of being a beast besides the way of Nebuchadnezzar. Strong drink makes beasts of men and women.

And God sends drunkards out to live beasts' lives. And there is only one way out from it: that is, to leave off being beasts.

A DEVIL'S ELIXIR.

There grows no vine
By the haunted Rhine,
By the Danube or Guadalquivir,
Nor on island or cape,
That bears such a grape
As grows by the beautiful river.

Drugged is their juice,
For foreign use,
When shipped o'er the reeling Atlantic,
To rack our brains
With the fever pains
That have driven the Old World frantic.

To the sewers and sinks
With all such drinks!
And after them tumble the mixer,
For a poison malign
Is such Borgia wine,
Or at best but a devil's elixir.

Sixth Lesson (Dan. vi.)—This is our last lesson in this book, for the rest is prophecy much too difficult for children to understand.

Now you all know the story of Daniel in the den of lions; but something connected with it you perhaps do not know.

It is a story of the conflict of two religions—the heathen religion, which is man's, and the true religion, which is God's.

The heathen religion is the attempt to lift man up and make him as God.

The Babel builders made their attempt.

Then the Roman emperors made theirs.

So here they lift Darius up, as if he were God.

God's religion is, that God comes down and changes man into His own likeness.

Daniel believed that God had come down to Sinai and to Judea, and manifested His power also to captives by the rivers of Babylon.

But now we know about Christ. God comes down to the earth, and by His Holy Spirit changes man into His own image.

The heathen religion was cruel.

But the true religion is tender and loving. Christ came to die for others.

He could die, but He could not be untrue. He could not put dishonour on God.

Then there is the presence of God. He is always present.

He was in the den of lions. It was He who shut their mouths, to show that—Righteousness triumphs.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 39.

THE BOY DANIEL

DANIEL I.

The Bible is like a garden, and almost every page is like a flower. And what we want to do is to get the honey out of the flowers. We are like the bees that go from one flower to another, gathering a little honey here and a little there. But we must go down deep to the root, and get the very best. We are the bees; let us try to get the honey.

We are going to talk about Daniel when a boy.

Daniel means—what? 'Dan' means judge: 'Dan shall judge his people'. 'El' is short for 'God'. So it is 'God's judge'.

Daniel was, I think, a very happy boy, though he had great troubles respecting his prosperity. At the time of which we are going to speak he was about twelve years old. I believe he was a relation to Jehoiakim, King of Judah; and Daniel lived at Jerusalem.

Well, a dreadful and terrible thing happened. The great King Nebuchadnezzar came against Jerusalem, and burnt up the city, and destroyed Jehoiakim's palace, and took the sacred things out of the temple and took poor little Daniel a prisoner, hundreds of miles away, to Babylon. So at twelve years of age he had this great trouble. But Daniel was to be a great man by and by.

Have you any trouble? Perhaps it is because God will lead you to be very great Christians some day. Therefore, now you are children, God sends you trouble that you may be great—great!

Life is like a book. Now, when you read a book, you read one chapter, and then another chapter; and one chapter is very sad, and you cannot understand it till you read the next chapter, and that explains it. So we must never forget this. And perhaps, when you are men and women, your troubles will be explained which you have now. So wait—wait!

Daniel was a very handsome boy, and he was very clever. He was 'very handsome'. Did he know it? If a girl is 'pretty,' should she know it or not? Which?

I knew a girl who had beautiful black eyes. And her mother said to her, 'Sarah, if anybody says to you, "What beautiful eyes you have got," that person thinks you are silly, and that you have nothing else—that you have no mind. When that person praises your eyes, it means that you have no mind!'

Was she right? Certainly not! She should have said, 'You have beautiful black eyes, but God has given them to you, and you must use them, and do good for Him'. It is as God makes us.

I don't care about (do you?) that sort of 'beauty' which girls and boys 'put on'—being very 'straight' or 'gallant,' like a piece of marble or wax! I like to look at a face, and be able to say, 'I could tell all my secrets to you!' That's a pretty face! I could say anything to you! That's real beauty.

Have you ever felt that when you have seen a beautiful man or a beautiful woman? I think that's real love. It shows kindness, and love, and sense. A good, kind, and sensible person is happy, and therefore 'pretty'.

I have read about the people in the city of London, who went out on the 1st of May, into the fields near London, while the dew was upon the grass; and they took the dew and they washed their faces with the dew, and thought it would make them very 'pretty'. Now, if you use the 'morning dew'—such a 'dew,' as we read of in the Book of Exodus or in Hosea—you will be 'pretty'. You will have Daniel's beauty.

He was remarkably beautiful—in a truer sense. If you are like him, you will be beautiful, clever, wise, sensible boys and girls.

When Daniel was brought to Babylon, the King, Nebuchadnezzar, wished to have some young Jews come to live with him in his palace. And he said to the master of his eunuchs, whose name was Ashpenaz, that four of these young men should come to be with him in his palace; and Belteshazzar (or Daniel) was one of them. And the King said that for three years they were to prepare for his palace, and to learn and become very beautiful. They were to eat the King's food, and drink his wine, for then they would become beautiful and fit to come to his palace. And Ashpenaz told Daniel all about it, and what a beautiful palace it was.

It was a wonderful palace. It had what they call 'hanging gardens,' one above another. I suppose there never was a more beautiful place.

But when it was proposed to Daniel, Daniel thought about it. That is what everybody ought to do. He thought and considered about it, and he thought it was not right, because such things would pollute him. Daniel thought he should only do wrong if he did it; so he said he would not do it. And Ashpenaz said to him, 'It is a very serious thing, and the king will be angry with me. I may lose my life; and you may incur the king's anger, and be killed!' So Daniel made a proposition. He said, 'Now try us. Give us some pulse to eat, and some water to drink, and we will live upon it, and you shall see whether it does not do as well as all these dainties.' And after examination as to whether this fare did, they were found to be better-looking than all the people who drank the king's wine and ate his dainty meats.

Now I want you to look at three things.

I. First, that evidently Daniel, when about twelve years old, did not care about Eating and Drinking. Do you? Which is master, and which is servant? Is your body the master of your mind, or your mind the master of your body? Which is it? Everybody in this church has one master or the other. How is it with you?

Daniel's mind ruled his body, and therefore he did not care for nice things. He would not take nice things at any cost—at any cost. Ah, it does cost a great deal sometimes!

I remember reading about a gentleman who had a beautiful house, with a garden and park. He had been a good man till he had this house and garden. But then he began to be careless, and did not care about God. One day a friend was looking at his property, and he said to a gentleman who was with him, 'How much do you think that place cost him?' The gentleman said, 'Really, I cannot tell.' 'I can tell you,' said the friend; 'it cost him his soul!' It cost him his soul! Ah, and you may, if you love eating, and drinking, and gluttony, go on till it costs you your soul!

Two little girls were close to the sugar-basin. One little girl said, 'I will take a lump of sugar!'

The other little girl said, 'You may be found out.' 'Oh, no; mother doesn't count the lumps of sugar.' 'Ah, but God does!' Remember that, when you would touch a piece of sugar, or the treacle, or the jam—remember that God knows. And if that little girl did take it, it cost her a great deal. Don't you run that risk; you will find it too dear!

II. I will tell you another thing. Daniel acted According to his Conscience.—What the rudder is to the boat, so that is to your mind. Conscience is sometimes a 'thorn'. Did you ever feel a 'thorn' when you have gone to bed? Have you ever found a 'thorn' in your pillow? You lie down upon your pillow, a soft pillow, and you feel a 'thorn'. 'I was greedy and selfish to-day. I have deceived some one. I have been proud and unkind to-day.' That is the 'thorn'. Ah, if you and I were dying, and there were 'thorns' pricking us—sins not resisted, sins not forgiven—what an awful thing it would be to have those in the pillow on a dying bed! If you have any 'thorns' now, get rid of them! Else, conscience will be as a 'thorn' in your pillow.

Conscience can be, and I hope is, a 'little bird singing sweetly in the bosom'. It is very pleasant then. And if your conscience tells you, 'I am trying to do my duty; I am trying to conquer myself'—then the 'little bird will sing sweetly in the bosom'. Is it your 'little bird'? Which is it—a 'thorn,' or the 'little bird singing sweetly in the bosom'?

If you want to act according to conscience, you must be very particular about thus conquering your body. I think one good thing is to get up very early. You then begin the day by conquering the body. You get a victory over the first thing in the day; don't you see that? I know the bed is very comfortable, and it seems hard to get up! But make a conscience-work of it, and conquer your body.

A little girl whom I knew said she would conquer her body and never go to the pastry-cook's again. Some one said, 'Oh, that's very fine to say that now. But when you come to look in the pastry-cook's and see all the nice things, you won't be able to resist!' The little girl thought, and then said, 'When I get near the pastry-cook's I will shut my eyes and run by!' She acted according to her conscience. Don't go too near.

A gentleman wanted a coachman, and he advertised for one in the newspapers. Several coachmen came to apply for the place. When the first one came he said, 'Coachman, how near could you go to a precipice and not drive me over?' The man said, 'I think I could go to an inch.' The gentleman said, 'You can go away. I will send for you if I want you.' The second one came, and the gentleman said, 'Coachman, how near could you go to a precipice and not drive me over?' The man said, 'I think I could go within half an inch.' The gentleman said, 'You can go away. I will send for you if I want you.' And the third one came in. 'Coachman,' he said, 'how near could you go to a precipice?' The man said, 'Well, that is a strange question! I don't want to try! I always go as far away as I can!' The gentleman said, 'That is the coachman for me. You can have the place.' Now, you remember that, and don't you try to go too near the precipice.

III. And one thing more. Daniel showed his Faith in God.—The first thing is, that he conquered his body; the second thing is, that he obeyed his conscience (it was the voice of God); and the third thing is, that he showed his trust in God. Faith trusts in God. Often you won't see your way. You will think, 'Oh, if I do this I shall lose a great deal; or if I do not do this, I shall be the loser.' Trust God! Faith is the hand which lays hold on Jesus.

There was a poor woman who lived in a very little place, in a house by itself, on a common. And somebody said to her, 'This is very lonely for you. Aren't you afraid to live here?' 'No, I am not afraid,' she said; 'faith shuts the door at night, and mercy opens the door in the morning!' Now, wasn't that pretty? Think of it. It was real faith. Trusting in God.

Little Lucy lived in the country, and she had to come into the town with her mother on business. She had never been before, and she was rather afraid. There was a number of people about, and she held her mother's hand very tightly. They came upon a crowd—something had happened; but they got safely through the crowd. Then it came on to rain; so she took Lucy to a large draper's shop close by, and left her there, while she went to finish her business. At first Lucy was very happy, much amused with the ladies coming in to buy ribbons, etc. But she got tired. She yawned and gaped about. Another little girl came into the shop, and Lucy told her why she was waiting. The little girl said, 'Perhaps your mother will forget you'. 'Oh, no,' she said; 'mother never forgets.' 'But she may,' the little girl replied. Lucy felt uncomfortable. That was a naughty, thought, wasn't it? Well, the time went on, and Lucy's mother never came. It got dark; the shop looked very dreary; and Lucy was very tired. A lady came in who knew her, and she asked her why she was there. On being told the reason, the lady said, 'I will drive you home'. Lucy said, 'No, thank you; my mother told me to wait, and I will wait!' Soon after that her mother came in. She kissed her mother, and told what had happened. And her mother said, 'That is the way to trust God'. Faith always trusts God.

One more thing. St. Chrysostom was a very holy man. He was brought before a Roman emperor when he became a Christian; and he threatened him. The emperor said, 'If you become a Christian, I will banish you from the country—your father's land—I will banish you'. He said, 'You cannot, the whole world is my Father's land. You cannot, banish me.' The emperor said, 'I will take away all your property'. St. Chrysostom said, 'You cannot. My treasures are in heaven.' The emperor said, 'I will send you to a place where there is not a person to speak to'. He said, 'You cannot. I have a "Friend who sticketh closer than a brother"'. I shall have my brother, Jesus Christ, for ever!' 'But,' the emperor said, 'I will take away your life.' He said, 'You cannot. "My life is hid with Christ in God!"' There was faith.

Do you remember the three things? To conquer your body—don't care about eating and drinking. Next, act out your conscience. And, thirdly, trust in God.

Daniel rose to be a very great man on those foundations. Such a boy makes a noble and beloved man. Three times in the Book of Daniel God calls Daniel 'O Daniel, greatly beloved'. I hope God will say to you, 'Greatly beloved!'—JAMES VAUGHAN.

DOING RIGHT

'But if not——'—DANIEL III. 18.

WHEN Nebuchadnezzar was King of Babylon, three of the Jewish captives who had been taken in the war were, on account of their good behaviour and honourable conduct, raised by the king to high positions in the State. The people of the country, however, did not like this. They were jealous of them as foreigners, and they hated them because they were too just and honourable to take any part in, or even to permit, all the pilfering, and what we now call 'jobbery,' which used to take place amongst many classes of the officials in Babylon. There was no use, however, in attempting to accuse these three men of doing anything contrary to the laws of the country or which was disloyal to the king. They were all good men and true. Though far removed from their own land, they had remained faithful to their God. They took no part in the surrounding idolatry. 'Here,' said their enemies, 'is our only chance.' So they invented a plan to get these men into trouble with the king. They went to the king and flattered him very much, telling him how great he was, and that he could make all his subjects obey him, no matter what he might order. They proposed to him to set up a great image in the midst of a wide open plain in his dominions, and summon every one to bow down to it and worship it; and that if any subject refused, he should be cast into a burning fiery furnace. The king agreed to this; it gratified his pride to think of all the millions of people gathered there at a given moment, and bowing their heads in homage to the figure which he had set up. These men knew very well that these three Jews were very loyal to the king, but that they were still more loyal to their God, and that nothing would induce them to bow down to an image and render to it the homage which should be given to God alone.

The day arrived; there stood the golden image, some ninety feet high, glittering in the bright sunshine, while around it gathered the thousands and thousands of devoted but ignorant worshippers. The three Jews were not among the number. Their enemies told the king, and he summoned them to his presence. He wished to give them a chance of escape. So he reminded them of the decree he had made, and of the terrible fiery furnace which awaited all who dared to disobey. They answered him with great respect and dignity, for, no matter how bad he was, he was a king. They said they could not do it, it would be wrong; and as to the fiery furnace: 'Our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from that, and He will deliver us out of thine hand, O king!'

We know that their God did deliver them out of the fiery furnace; that with these three men there was seen a fourth, 'like unto the Son of Man,' supporting and saving them in the midst of their fiery trial. It would have been no great heroism if they had done right because they knew that by doing right they would escape both the displeasure of God and the fiery furnace. But they did not know whether God would be pleased to let them escape the torture and death by fire. They knew God could do so; they did not know whether God would do so. Far braver and nobler than the words I have told you were the words which followed. They not only said, 'Our God can and may deliver us'; they added, 'But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up'. That is, we will do the thing which is right because it is right, because it is the will of God. If it be God's will to save us from suffering for doing right, He has the power to save us. But whether we suffer or whether we do not suffer, makes no difference. We must do the right whatever happens.

The true principle is that of these three heroes. Say to yourself, 'I will, with God's help, live truly, honestly, purely, loving Christ and serving Him. God is able to bless my work, and to give me great results in life, if He sees good. But if not—well, all the same, I will not fall down and worship any golden image of fame, of fashion, of success, of popularity, or of anything else, no matter who sets it up or how many bow down to it.' And if you say this in your heart, and say it when you kneel down alone, thanking God for having taught you, by His Blessed Spirit, to say it, and asking for His help to enable you not only to say it but to live it, God will give you a great reward. Perhaps great blessing and success in this life, but certainly the inward joy and peace of feeling that you have done right. You will have a peace, a joy within, which these things could never give, which the want of these things can never take away. —T. TEIGNMOUTH SHORE, Saint George for England, p. 127.

A MAN AMONG THE LIONS

DANIEL VI.

I WANT to go with you this afternoon into the lions' den. I once took a very dear little boy to see a lion, and we stood together and looked upon his magnificent head, his splendid eye; and the little boy kept holding my hand, and did not speak for some time; he was quite rapt, looking at this grand animal. After he had thought for a long time, he said to me, 'Does that lion know God?' Does the lion know God, I wonder? I am not sure. It says in the Bible, 'The young lions roar after their prey, and seek their meat from God'. We are also told, 'These wait all upon Thee; that Thou mayest give them their meat in due season'. If you would give something to the lion, he would know you gave it him, and he would love you because you gave it him. But when the lion finds something to eat in the wood, do you think that he thinks, 'Somebody must have given me this to eat—I do not know who it is'. That is God. Therefore, he may thankfully praise some one he knows nothing about, for God gives it to him. Do the lions then know God? I do not know.

Now I want to talk about Daniel going into the lions' den. How old do you think Daniel was? He was over eighty years old. You know he was a boy when he was taken captive, and carried from Jerusalem to Babylon, say he was ten, I don't know exactly how old he was; then the captivity lasted seventy years, when Cyrus came and set them free. Then Darius came after Cyrus, therefore he must have been a little more than eighty; I should think he was about eighty-four when he was put into the lions' den because he would not stop praying. He loved his prayers too much, and would rather be killed than stop praying. I want that you should think what Daniel took with him into the lions' den. He took sweet music with him. I hope that music is playing in everybody's breast in this church now—the music of a good conscience. There is no music like it! Somebody says, 'A good conscience is the bird singing sweetly in the bosom'. Does 'the little bird sing sweetly in your bosom' to-day—a good conscience—trying to do what is right, having nothing that is not confessed, nothing that is not forgiven—a good conscience? Daniel had a good conscience, and he was cast into the lions' den for doing right, his conscience told him so; so he took that with him into the den.

And he took a great deal of prayer with him, and when anybody goes into trouble praying, they need not be afraid. Somebody calls prayer 'the gift of the knees'. I hope you have got 'the gift of the knees'. I have known some very silly boys who care more for their trousers than they care for God; because they are afraid of dirtying their trousers, or because they don't fit well, they only half kneel when they pray. They are afraid of their trousers—they love their trousers more than they love God.

Daniel made great prayers. I do not suppose he prayed to be kept from the lions. When prayer goes up many things come down! Do you know when a rocket goes up, it goes up one rocket, but when up there a beautiful shower comes from it—many showers of beautiful star-like lights come down! So it is with prayer. You send up one prayer, and God will send you down showers of answers. This was one of the answers Daniel had—that God would take care of him in the lions' den. So he went on with his prayers, I have no doubt, while he was there.

The telegraph is a wonderful thing—how quickly it goes; the answer comes back as quickly. Prayer is quicker than a telegram! You may send up your message to heaven—anything you like—telegraph it up, then at once comes down the answer from God. Daniel took much prayer with him.

And he took with him faith, trust in God. Faith is a beautiful thing. Somebody says, 'Faith is the head leaning on the bosom of God'. That is pretty, isn't it? 'Faith is the head leaning on the bosom of God.' That is faith! Take care you lean on the bosom of God; then you will be quite safe. So Daniel was quite safe.

I heard about a great storm at sea, and on board a ship was an officer and his wife. The storm was raging, and they were all in great danger. The lady was very greatly alarmed and was in much distress. Her husband tried to comfort her, and told her to trust in God. She was surprised at his calmness in such a time of terror, and said, 'Aren't you very much afraid?' He said, 'No, I am not very much afraid.' She said, 'Why not? We are in great danger.' The officer drew his sword and placed it against her breast and said, 'Are you afraid of that?' She said, 'No'. He said, 'Why not?' 'Oh,' she said, 'my husband holds it.' Then he said, 'I am not afraid of the storm, because my Father holds it'. Daniel had great faith in God.

Daniel also carried with him the presence of God.

I was once examining a girls' school, and I said to a class of girls, 'Why was not Daniel afraid in the lions' den?' Now what do you think one of them answered? She made a beautiful answer out of the fifth chapter of the Book of the Revelation. Think of it. It was a perfect answer. I did not think she could have made such an answer. She said, 'Because the Lion of the Tribe of Judah was there!' Daniel was not afraid of all those lions, because another lion—a greater Lion than all the lions in the den—the Lion of the Tribe of Judah' was there—that is, Jesus Christ. If you had seen the Jews marching through the wilderness, you would have met first the banner on the right hand—that was the standard of Judah. It always went first. Daniel was not afraid of the lions because 'the Lion of the Tribe of Judah' was with him. What a mercy!

I have read in history that upon one occasion, in the time of one of the European wars, one of the Duke of Wellington's regiments became frightened; they were going to turn their backs on the enemy and fly, when, just in the midst of their fear, the duke himself came in their midst, and an old soldier cried out, 'Oh! here is the duke, God bless him! He is as good as five thousand men! He is one who has never been defeated, and never can be. There is no fear for you, my boys, the duke is here!' They all became brave-hearted again, charged the enemy, and conquered. That is what the presence of the Duke of Wellington did. What if God is with us? Was He ever defeated?

These are the four things Daniel took with him into the den of lions: he took sweet music, he took prayer, much prayer; he took trust, faith in the promises of God; and he took the presence of Jesus. That is the reason he had such peace.

I. Now Let us Look into the Den.—Have you ever seen any picture of Daniel in the lions' den? I have seen a great many; I don't know which I like best. In one picture I have seen, Daniel is sitting down, and all the great lions are playing with him, and fawning upon him, like little spaniel-dogs. I have seen another picture, where Daniel is praying, and in his prayer he is so thinking of heaven that he does not even notice the lions that are all around him. I have seen another picture, where Daniel is singing, and, though the lions are all about him, he is singing so heartily that he does not even think of them. And I have seen the picture where Daniel is looking upon the lions with such a steadfast look, as if he could command the lions, and they could scarcely move because of his eye upon them—such a beautiful eye. And I have seen a picture where he is walking about quite carelessly; he does not fear the lions, he turns his back upon them, so you cannot see his face. It is a beautiful picture, shown in the Royal Academy in London.

Which is the best? I do not know which is the best, but I am quite sure that you cannot think of anything so quiet and happy as Daniel was when he was with the lions.

It was, as somebody says peace is, love reposing. It was love reposing.

II. Now I want you to go a little farther if you are not tired. I want you to consider What are our Lions? Have we got lions, and what are they?

The devil is a lion. Do you remember where he is called so? Just look at 1 Peter v. 8: 'Your adversary, the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour'. Now, supposing you were to meet a lion, what would you do? If such a thing happened that you were alone, and a lion came up and attacked you, what would you do? Would you run away? That would be the worst thing you could do. He can run faster than you. Don't run away, you'd better not; look him firmly in the face; stand quite still, and look him fixedly and firmly in the face; that's the best thing you can do. I don't know that it would do, but they say that sometimes the eye of a man can quail, control, the wildest animal in nature. Some people's eyes are more powerful than others. Sometimes a lion will quail at the eye of a man. If you run away he's sure to kill you.

Now shall I tell you what to do if you meet the devil? What can you do? Don't run away; don't be afraid. Keep up your courage. Shall I tell you what to do? Present Christ, think of Christ in your heart. Say the word 'Christ!' It will be enough. When Jesus was here upon earth, remember, whenever the devil came near Christ, the devil was afraid of Him; the devil always said, 'What have I to do with Thee? Hast Thou come to torment us before the time?' If you have Jesus in your heart, think of Jesus, say the word 'Jesus,' that will be the best thing you can do if you meet the devil. In James iv. 7, it says, 'Resist the devil (be firm), and he will flee from you'. Not only he cannot hurt you, but he will run away from you. That is the first thing I advise you to do when the devil attacks you. Present Christ, keep very firm.

Shall I tell you of another lion? It is perhaps the worst lion that boys and girls have to overcome. Bad company, wicked boys and wicked girls. I think I once told you of a prayer of a little friend of mine; she used to say it when she went to bed: 'O God, keep me from fire, keep me from robbers, keep me from naughty boys. Amen' It is a great thing to be kept from naughty boys. Perhaps your danger is being with wicked people, who talk about naughty things, and wish you to do naughty things, and use bad words. But you need not be afraid of them. If you put your trust in God, you will conquer.

When Luther was going to be tried at Worms, and his life was in great danger, and his friends tried to dissuade him from going, saying, 'Don't go to Worms, for there are many enemies there, and they will try, like lions, to kill you,' Luther said, 'I don't care. If there are as many lions in Worms as there are tiles on the roofs of all the houses, I will go. I am not afraid, for God is with me.'

You will meet with these lions. Bad boys at school. Very likely some of the big boys will put wrong things into your head, advise you to play truant, run away. If you keep with other boys, it often happens, when many boys sleep together in a room, a great deal that is bad goes on; bad words are used. But if a boy does his duty, thinks of his mother, and does what his mother would wish him to do, kneels down and says his prayers, I know how the other boys will laugh and jeer at him.

I have read of a boy who knelt down to say his prayers the first time he went to school. The other boys flung their slippers at him, and tried to stop him; but he went on saying his prayers amidst all the noises of his companions. While he was praying he felt some one at his side, and, looking down, there was a little tiny boy, the smallest boy in the room. He had got out of his bed, and had come and knelt down by him; for as he lay in his bed he thought of his mother. 'My mother told me to say my prayers. I should like to do so now, if I were not afraid of the other boys.' So he went and knelt down with the praying boy.

What a blessing that praying boy was in that room! What a brave boy he was! what a hero! Don't mind being laughed at. Boys and girls may laugh you into hell, but they cannot laugh you out of it again. You will never get to heaven unless you are bold.

There are a great many temptations in the way, which are like lions. If you were to go through a country where lions are, you would know they are generally to be found in high bushes, and sometimes these bushes are full of flowers; but under the flowers is a lion. Do not be deceived. Under the flowers, in the bush, there may be a lion.

I must just tell you one story more. It happened a long time ago. One of the Roman emperors had an army called the 'Thundering Legion'. It was just at the time of Constantine the Great, when the Christian religion was spreading over the world. The army occupied a very high place. In that regiment—the 'Thundering Legion'—forty soldiers all became Christians, and declared themselves so; they were dreadfully persecuted; and when they could not be persuaded to give up Christ, this is what was done to them. In a cold country, on a very cold night, these forty men were put naked upon a frozen pond. The wind was coming down with the greatest fury! By the side of the pond was a beautiful house, lighted up with fire and candles; and in it were nice warm baths. A supper was also spread. Everything that could make life delightful was within. And this is what was said to the men, 'If you will give up Christ, any of you, who ever will, he may at once leave the ice, and the cold, and go into that warm house, and have that supper, that warm bath, that bed, and be happy. But going into that house means giving up Christianity. If you stay upon the ice you will die before morning. Nobody can live through the night on that ice.' Well, these forty men stayed upon this ice, and this is what they said in prayer: 'O God! forty wrestlers have come forth to fight for Thee, Grant, O Lord, to the forty wrestlers the victory.' And they continued then to pray. As the night went on, however, some of the soldiers felt inclined to sleep that sleep which if a person indulge in, when very cold, he does not wake again; some walked very fast to keep themselves warm; some were looking at the house with all its comforts. One poor man could bear it no longer; he went into the house, and gave up his religion. When he went into the house to give up Christ, the centurion, who was a heathen, but an honest man, thought to himself, 'There must be something in this religion which can make these men bear all this agony, and go to the death for the sake of Christ. There must be something in it that is quite true. I will go and join them.' So this Roman centurion, who commanded a company of soldiers, went and joined these wrestlers in the place of the poor man who had gone. And still the prayer went on:—

Forty wrestlers have come forth to fight for Thee!
Grant, O Lord, that the forty wrestlers may have the victory!

And when the sun rose the next morning there were forty dead bodies on the ice; but their happy spirits were with Christ!—JAMES VAUGHAN.

TRUST IN GOD REWARDED

'So Daniel was taken up out of the den, and no manner of hurt was found upon him, because he believed in his God.'—DANIEL VI. 23.

CHILDREN, and young people who are pretty well grown, after having pored over the wonders of the Arabian Nights, have often laid down the book with the disappointed expression, 'Oh, what a pity that it is not all true!'

Now, what I am about to tell you is not only quite as strange as anything you have ever read or heard of, but there is this additional advantage that we know that it really happened.

I shall carry you a long way off in a moment, even to mighty Babylon. You must look on the map of Asia, if you would form a correct idea of the region where the great city stood. Babylon was built in the midst of a wide plain, on the banks of the Euphrates, which divided it into two parts. It was a very ancient city, its foundations having been laid at the same time with those of the tower of Babel (Gen. xi.). Modern travellers have discovered its site near Hillah, forty miles from Bagdad.

Babylon was sixty miles in circumference, with twenty-five brass gates on each side, and a beautiful bridge across the river, connecting the two parts of the city. The king's palace was exceedingly magnificent, and he went to great expense and trouble in building an artificial mountain, three hundred feet high, to gratify his queen, who sighed for the pleasant hills of her native Ecbatana, as her eye wandered wearily over the flat country around Babylon.

There was a great excitement in the royal garden one morning, and you will not be surprised when I tell you the occasion of it. In this garden there was a den, built of massive stones, in which several fierce lions were kept, and the people had heard that on the previous night a young man had been cast into it, and left to be eaten up by the hungry beasts. Early this morning they learn, to their amazement, that he has been taken out alive. The rumour spreads rapidly from mouth to mouth, and crowds come swarming towards the place. Those nearest to the garden gate begin to point him out to the rest, crying out eagerly, and in exultant tones, 'There, there! the young man with the raven locks!' 'Yes, I see him!' another answered, 'a Jew, as is plain from his marked features.'

Well may the people press forward to catch a glimpse of him as he hurries by—a wonder worth seeing, surely—a young man who has passed the whole night in the den of lions, and yet no manner of hurt is found upon him.

Who was this young man? How did he happen to get into such a dangerous place? and, stranger still, how did he ever get out? I shall answer these questions as briefly as I can.

In the third year of the reign of King Jehoiakim, Jerusalem was besieged by the Chaldeans. At first the victorious Nebuchadnezzar put chains on his captive and proposed to carry him to Babylon. He, however, thought better of this, and gave Jehoiakim back his crown, and concluded to be satisfied with the payment of a handsome sum of gold and silver every year. When Nebuchadnezzar returned home he took with him several Jewish lads of high rank, and various precious things which struck his fancy; and, worse than all, the holy vessels used in the worship of God's house.

This sort of pillage is commonly called sacrilege, and, although I have no time to go into particulars about it here, I cannot help remarking that it is a sin which does not escape unpunished.

This was what is known as the first Babylonish captivity. One of the young men whom King Nebuchadnezzar thus cruelly dragged away from his native land and his kindred was Daniel—a name so familiar to us all, and one so universally honoured.

At the time of which we are speaking Daniel was about fourteen years old—a period of life most dangerous for anyone to be exposed to snares and temptations. With two other lads of noble birth he was selected to enter into the service of the king of Babylon, and they were placed in charge of the royal chamberlain, and, among other things, were taught the Chaldee language.

According to the custom of the country (the same which is observed in Turkey in our own day), new names were given to the three youths, Daniel being known at the court of Babylon as Belteshazzar.

Some of you may remember that Joseph was called by another name when he became a favourite with Pharaoh, King of Egypt (Gen. xli. 45). Fortunately for Daniel he remembered that the eye of God was on him while he dwelt at Babylon, as much as when he was with his own people at Jerusalem, and he determined, by the help of God, always to do his duty.

What a lesson here for the young persons who go from home to attend school, or to engage in business, far from the watchful oversight of parents and friends! It is often a hard and painful struggle, under such circumstances, to practise self-control and to triumph over evil; but the Holy Spirit will help all those to do it who seek for that help, as God has appointed.

Three years having been spent by Daniel and his companions in preparation for their duties at the king's court, they entered upon this new and trying position. I cannot go into details, and must say, in a few words, that the young Jew soon rose high in the royal favour, from the fact that God enabled him to explain a dream to Nebuchadnezzar which had greatly perplexed him.

Under the bad kings who appear to have succeeded this great monarch the three young men were almost forgotten, and we lose sight of them for awhile, until the reign of Belshazzar, the last King of the Chaldees.

After the conquest of Babylon by the united forces of the Medes and Persians, Daniel was busy for the two years that Darius reigned in devising plans for securing the deliverance of the Jewish captives from their weary exile. His honourable position at the court gave him much influence, and, at the same time, made him an object of envy and suspicion. We are, therefore, not surprised to hear of the cunning plot which was devised for his destruction. His enemies persuaded the weak monarch to issue a decree requiring certain observances, which they knew very well that so conscientious a man as Daniel would never obey. According to the edict, anyone within the bounds of the kingdom, who, for the space of thirty days, should ask a petition of any god or man, except of Darius himself, should be cast into the den of lions. The king, not suspecting that this was aimed against his favourite, signed the document, and sealed it with his signet ring.

When God commands us to do one thing, and mortal man calls upon us to do another, we ought never to hesitate as to which we must obey. Daniel paid no attention to the royal order, but went to his chamber three times a day—morning, noon, and night—and prayed to God, as it had been the custom of his whole life to do. A timid, time-serving person might have said, 'I will not give up my prayers, but I will pray in my mind, while I am walking about, or after I have retired to bed, and then nobody will be sure that I pray at all'.

Daniel, however, was no truckling coward, and so he continued to kneel down when he prayed, and even prayed as he always had done before at the open window of his chamber, with his face towards Jerusalem.

This was just what his enemies desired, and when they instantly informed the king of this violation of his decree, it was in vain for Darius to try to shield his favourite. According to the laws of the Medes and Persians the statute to which the monarch had affixed his signature must be carried out at all hazards.

Daniel was cast into the den of lions; a great stone was rolled to the mouth of it; and, lest some of the Jews might come and take out their countryman from this dreadful place, the signet of the king and of his lords was set upon the stone.

And so Daniel's cruel enemies had their way, and we can imagine how the poor man closed his eyes in prayer, as they lowered him down by cords to the dark, deep den, and how the hungry lions snuffed about their prey. They did not harm him, for the angel of the Lord was there for his defence, and the voice of the Almighty One seemed to say, 'Touch not Mine anointed, and do My prophets no harm!'

Daniel was safe, even in the lions' den, while the king passed a wretched night in his palace. He tossed uneasily on his couch; no refreshing sleep came to his relief, and he refused to allow the instruments of music to be brought with which they were wont to lull him to repose. By break of day we find him at the door of the den, asking, in anxious tones, whether Daniel has escaped from death. How cheering to hear the servant of God answer joyously from the depths below, 'O king, live for ever! My God hath sent His angel, and hath shut the lions' mouths, that they have not hurt me!'

Can we wonder that Darius forthwith issued a new decree, very different from the last, calling upon the people of his realm to pay honour to the God of Daniel?

The important point to be brought out is this: the reason why Daniel escaped. The secret is made known in the text. It was because he believed in his God. Even when everything seemed against him, he still continued to do right, and left it to his Father in Heaven to protect and deliver him.

The sooner we all learn to imitate his example, the safer and happier we shall be.

God shall charge His angel legions
Watch and ward o'er thee to keep,
Though thou walk through hostile regions,
Though in desert wilds thou sleepest.

On the lion vainly roaring.
On his young, thy foot shall tread;
And, the dragon's den exploring,
Thou shalt bruise the serpent's head.

DANIEL, THE MODEL OF DECISION

'O Daniel, a man greatly beloved.'—DANIEL X. II.

GABRIEL, the angel of God, spoke these words to the prophet Daniel. In using them he meant to let Daniel know not only that he was beloved on earth, but that he was beloved in heaven. He meant that he was beloved of God, and beloved of the angels. What an honour this was! Who would not rather have an angel say this of him, than be permitted to wear the crown and sway the sceptre of the mightiest monarch on earth?

Daniel was one of the best and wisest men of whom we read in the Bible. Most of these men, though generally very good, yet sometimes said or did what was not right. But it was not so with Daniel. All through his life—so far as we can learn from the Bible—he never spoke a word, or did an act that was not right and good. He began to serve God when he was quite young; and this, no doubt, was one thing that helped to make him so good a man. He was a very decided man. He always did what he knew was right, no matter what the consequence might be.

And so we may speak of Daniel as the model of decision. And we can see three great benefits that followed from his decision.

I. In the first place, Daniel's decision Kept him from Doing Wrong.—And if we learn to follow the model he has set us it will do the same for us. We have a good illustration of this point of our subject in the first chapter of the Book of Daniel. When about sixteen years old he was carried captive to Babylon with a number of his countrymen. Daniel belonged to a princely family. After arriving in Babylon he was chosen, with a number of other young Jewish princes, to stand in the king's palace. Among these were the three famous men—Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, who were afterwards cast into the burning fiery furnace, and came out unhurt. It is said of them that they were young men 'in whom was no blemish; they were well-favoured'—or good-looking—'skilful in all wisdom, and cunning in knowledge, and understanding science'. Daniel and his companions had to go through a course of instruction, that they might understand the language and the learning of the people among whom they had come to live. And in going through this course of training Daniel was expected to eat and drink things that were forbidden by the Jewish law. Now most young men, situated as he was, would have said: 'Well, I can't help this. Here I am in Babylon. I must do as the Babylonians do.'

But Daniel did not think so. He felt sure that what would have been wrong for him to do at Jerusalem, was wrong for him in Babylon; and he decided not to do it. He made up his mind that he would do what was right, and leave the result with God. He did so, and it all turned out well. I have not time now to tell the whole story. But read the first chapter of Daniel, and you will find it all there. And you will see how Daniel's decision kept him from doing wrong.

And then we have another illustration of the same thing farther on in Daniel's history. In the meantime he has risen to be the greatest man in the kingdom of Babylon. A man in such a high position always has some people about him who envy him, and become his enemies, just because he is so much better off than they are. And Daniel had a number of enemies of this kind. They envied him, and hated him, for no other reason than just because he was so good, and so great. They tried to find some charge to bring against him. But he was so honest, so true, and so faithful in all his duties that they could not possibly find anything against him.

Then they determined to get up a charge against him on account of his religion. They knew how regular he was in praying to God, and they thought that they could succeed against him here. So they got the king to pass a law that no man should pray to any god for thirty days; and that if anyone did so he should be cast into the den of lions. The law was passed. Daniel knew it. But he decided not to mind it. To stop praying to God was a wrong thing, and he determined not to do it, even though the consequence must be that he would be cast into the den of lions. He had been in the habit of praying to God three times a day. He kept on doing this just the same as before. His enemies rushed into his chamber and found him on his knees. They accused him to the king of breaking the law. He could not deny it. The king was sorry, for he loved Daniel very much. He tried all he could to save him; but that was impossible. So Daniel was cast into the den of lions. But God sent His angel to shut the lions' mouths, and they did not hurt him. The next morning he came out of the den safe and unharmed. And here we see how Daniel's decision kept him from doing wrong.

Decision in telling the truth.—We find this story in Persian history. A little boy named Abdool Kader had a dream one night, which made him feel that he must devote himself to the service of God. The carrying out of this dream would make it necessary for him to visit the sacred city of Mecca. The next morning he went and told his mother about it.

'She wept,' he says, 'when I told her of my dream, and where I was going. Then taking out eighty dinars, she said: "This is all the family inheritance that remains to be divided between you and your brother. I give you forty dinars, which is the portion belonging to you. And now, promise me faithfully that wherever you go, and whatever happens to you, you will never tell a lie." I promised her faithfully. Then she bade me farewell, saying: "Go, my son; may God bless you, and permit us to meet again".

"Then I started on my journey. All went on well, till one day our caravan was attacked by a large company of horsemen. One after another they plundered all our companions. At last one of them came to me. 'Little fellow,' said he, 'what have you got?'

"Forty dinars," said I, "sewed up in the border of my coat."

"The man laughed, and went away, thinking, no doubt, that I was joking with him.

"Then another man came up to me. He asked the same question. I gave him the same answer, and he too went away.

"Then I was taken into the presence of the chief of the band, who was sitting under a tree. "What property have you got, my little fellow?" he asked.

"I have told two of your men, already," I replied, "that I have forty dinars sewed up in the border of my coat, but they did not seem to believe what I said; and now, sir, I tell you the same."

"He ordered the border of my coat to be ripped open, and there he found the money. He was very much surprised, and turning to me, he said: "And how came you, my young friend, to speak so plainly about your money that had been so carefully hidden?"

"Because," I replied, "before leaving home, I promised my mother that I would never tell a lie; and now, whatever happens, I cannot break that promise."

"Brave boy!" said the robber. "Can it be that you have such a sense of your duty to your mother, at your early age, and yet I, at my age, am unmindful of the duty I owe to my God? Give me your hand, that I may swear repentance upon it."

"A number of the band, impressed by his words and example, did the same.

"You have been our leader in doing wrong," they said to their chief, "now be our leader in trying to do right."

And so, the example of that brave boy, and his decision in telling the truth, was the means of turning those robbers from their wrongdoings.

II. The Second Great Benefit Daniel found in his Decision was, that 'It Helped Him to do Good'.—When he was a young man in Babylon, Daniel had three warm friends with him. Their names were Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego. They saw the decided way in which he acted, when he refused to eat or drink anything that was forbidden by the law of Moses. Those young men admired Daniel's conduct on that occasion. They resolved to follow his example. They learned the lesson of decision then, and they never forgot it.

And nobly indeed they practised that lesson in after years.

The time came when Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babylon, set up a golden image. At the same time he passed a law, requiring that everybody should fall down and worship this image, when they heard the instruments of music play; and stating that if any persons refused to do this, they were to be cast into a fiery furnace, and be burned to death.

These friends of Daniel had never forgotten the lesson of decision which he taught them so long before. They made up their minds that, whatever the consequences might be, they would not bow down and worship this image. The instruments of music sounded. All the rest of the people fell on their faces and worshipped the golden image. But Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego stood upright in their places. They refused to keep this law of the King of Babylon, because there was a higher law of the King of heaven which forbade them to do any such thing.

The case was reported to Nebuchadnezzar. They were brought before him. He asked them if they were ready, when the instruments of music should sound again, to fall down and worship his golden image? They said decidedly, 'No; we cannot do it'. Then he ordered his servants to make the furnace seven times hotter than usual, and to throw these men in. They did so. But God wrought a miracle for their preservation. He took away from the fire its power to hurt them. It just burnt the cords by which their limbs were bound, and then they walked up and down, amidst the roaring flames of the furnace, with as much ease and comfort as if they had been walking in a garden of roses.

The king looked on with unspeakable amazement. He called them out of the furnace. They came out. Not a hair of their heads was singed; and even the smell of fire had not passed upon them.

This event, so strange, so wonderful, converted the king from his idolatry; and led him to publish a law, through all his vast dominions, in favour of the one true God whom Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego worshipped. And all the good done by these three men to the King of Babylon, and the people of his dominions, followed from the example of decision which Daniel set when he was a young man.

Here is a story about the decision of a young lady in standing up for Jesus, and of the good that followed from it.

At a fashionable evening party, some time ago, a young physician was present. He spoke of one of his patients who was in a very dangerous state. 'I am very much annoyed,' he said, 'by some Christian people, who are all the time talking and praying with him. I wish these people would let my patients alone, and mind their own business. What's the use of all this fuss? Death is only an eternal sleep. The religion of Christ is all a delusion; and Christian people are simply mistaken.'

A young lady, one of the gayest of the party, was sitting near, and heard all he said.

She at once answered him, saying: 'Pardon me, doctor, but I cannot hear you talk thus, and remain silent. I am not a professor of religion myself, and I never knew anything about it by experience. But my mother was a Christian. Times without number she has taken me to her room, and with her loving hand upon my head has prayed that God would give her grace to train me for heaven. Two years ago my precious mother died, and the religion which she loved in life sustained and comforted her in death. She called us to her bedside, and with her face all radiant with glory, she asked us to meet her in heaven. And now,' said the young lady, her voice choking with deep feeling, 'can I believe that this is all a delusion? Does my mother sleep an eternal sleep? Will she never wake again on the morning of the resurrection? Shall I see her no more? No; I cannot, I will not believe it.' Here her brother tried to quiet her, for, by this time all the company had gathered round her, and were listening to her earnest words. 'No,' she said; 'brother, let me alone. I must defend my mother's God, and my mother's religion.'

The physician made no reply, but soon left the room. He was found shortly after, walking up and down an adjoining room, in great distress of mind. 'What is the matter?' asked a friend. 'Oh!' said he, 'that young lady is right. Her words have pierced my soul like an arrow. I, too, must have the religion I have despised, or I am lost for ever.' And the result of that conversation was, that both the young lady and the physician became earnest Christians, and spent all their days in doing good to those about them.

And here we see how much good was done by the decision of that young lady, in so nobly standing up for Jesus, and the truth as it is in Him.

The Third Great Benefit which Daniel found from his Decision was, that 'It Made Him Successful'.

—He went to Babylon a poor boy, about sixteen or seventeen years old. But God blessed him for the decided way in which he always did what he believed to be right. And this blessing brought success to Daniel, as it will do to anybody on whom it rests. He rose to one higher place after another, till he got to be—next to the king—the chief man in the nation. In the sixth chapter of Daniel we read: 'It pleased Darius to set over the kingdom an hundred and twenty princes, which should be over the whole kingdom; and over these three presidents; of whom Daniel was the first. Then this Daniel was preferred above the presidents and princes, because an excellent spirit was in him; and the king thought to set him over the whole realm.' And when we see Daniel rise to so high a position as this, we realise how very successful he was. And he continued to occupy this honourable position, under the reign of four successive Kings of Babylon. That was very remarkable. This shows us how wonderful the success was which followed Daniel's decision.

A little boy's decision.—One day a small boy entered a store. The merchant looked at him, and asked, 'Well, my little man, what will you have to-day?'

'Oh, please, sir, mayn't I do some work for you to-day?'

'Do some work for me, eh? Well, what sort of work can a little chap like you do? Why, you can't look over the counter.'

'Oh, yes, I can, and I'm growing, please, growing very fast—there now, see if I can't look over the counter!' said the little fellow, raising himself up on his tiptoes.

The merchant smiled, and then came round to the other side of the counter.

'I thought I should have to get a magnifying-glass to see you; but, I reckon if I get close enough, I can find out what you look like.'

'Oh, I'm older than I'm big, sir,' said the boy. 'Folks say I'm very small of my age. You see, sir, my mother hasn't anybody but me; and this morning I saw her crying because she couldn't find five cents in her pocket-book. She thinks the boy that took the ashes stole it—and—I—haven't—had—any breakfast, sir.'

Then his voice choked, and his blue eyes were filled with tears.

'I reckon I can help you to some breakfast, my little fellow,' said the merchant, feeling in his vest-pocket. 'Here—will this quarter do!'

The boy shook his head, saying:—

'Thank you, sir, but my mother wouldn't let me beg, or take money, unless I did something for it.'

'Indeed!' said the gentleman. 'And where's your father?'

'He went to sea in the steamer "City of Boston". The vessel was lost, and we never heard of him after that.'

'Ah! that was bad. But you are a plucky little fellow, and I like you. Let me see,' and then after thinking for a few moments, he called out to one of the clerks, 'Saunders, is the cash boy No. 4 still sick?'

He died last night, sir,' was the reply.

'Ah! I'm sorry to hear that. Well, here's a little fellow that can take his place. What wages did No. 4 get?'

'Three dollars a week, sir,' replied the clerk.

'Well, put this boy down for four dollars a week.' Then turning to the astonished boy, he said, 'There, my little fellow, go up to the clerk yonder, and tell him your name, and where you live; and then run home and tell your mother you've got a place at four dollars a week; come back on Monday morning, and I'll tell you what to do. Here's a dollar in advance; I'll take it out of your first week's wages. Now go.'

Little Tommy darted out of that store like an arrow. How he flew along the street! How nimbly he mounted the creaking stairs that led to his mother's room! As soon as he entered it, he ran across the room, clapping his hands, and jumping up and down, and crying out: 'Mother! mother! I'm took!—I'm took! I've got a place at four dollars a week. There's the first dollar to get something to eat with. And don't you ever cry again; for I'm the man of the house now!'

But Tommy's mother did cry then. And how could she help it? She took the little fellow in her arms, and pressed him to her bosom. She wept tears of joy over him; and then she kneeled down, and thanked God for giving her such a treasure of a boy. Now here we see how decided little Tommy was in doing what is right; and what success followed his decision.

I have just one other story to tell. We may call it—

The story of a grasshopper.—If you ever go to London, of course, among the places of interest there, you will visit the public building known as 'The Royal Exchange'. There is a cupola at the top of that building. Rising from that cupola is an iron rod, with a huge grasshopper on it, for a weather-vane. And there is an interesting story connected with that grasshopper. It is this: One day, more than three hundred years ago, a mother in England had an infant, a few months old, which she wanted to get rid of. So she wrapped it up in a shawl, and laid it down under a bush in a field, and left it there to die, unless somebody should find it, and take care of it.

Shortly after, a little boy was coming home from school. As he passed by the place he heard a grasshopper chirping in the field. He stopped a moment to listen to it. Then he climbed over the fence to get it. But just as he was about to catch it he caught sight of the baby, which was close by. He let the grasshopper go; and taking the baby in his arms, he carried it home to his mother. She took charge of the baby and brought him up. He turned out to be a good, pious boy. He was always decided in doing what he knew was right, and in not doing what was wrong.

When a young man he went to London, and entered into business there. He was successful in business, and became rich. He was not only rich, but great. He was knighted, and is well known in English history as Sir Thomas Gresham. The Royal Exchange was built in honour of him. And he had the grasshopper put as a weather-vane on the top of it, in memory of the wonderful way in which, when an infant, his life was saved by the good providence of God.—RICHARD NEWTON, Bible Models, p. 240.

HOSEA

HALF-BAKED

'Ephraim is a cake not turned.'—HOSEA VII. 8.

This is a strange text, but there are so many strange people in the world that odd words are sometimes needed to reach them. God speaks to people in ways they shall understand: to scholars He speaks scholarly, which is always simply; to shepherds He speaks as a Shepherd; and He breaks up great truths into little portions for children. Many might not understand about stars, or geography, or history, but all can understand about a cake. You can!—very well, too! Suppose you saw a nice-looking cake in a shop window, and bought it, but found when you took the first bite that it was nasty—brown and beautiful on the one side, but damp and doughy on the other—then you would say that it was a cake that had not been turned while baking. It was only half-baked, and you would say it was a deceit. There are people like that: they look so beautiful and good when in church, or when they want you to see them at their best, but when you come to try them, they are anything but pleasant. They are cakes not turned.

Here is a boy, for example, who has to learn five questions by heart, with their answers. But he thinks he will get off easily if he learns only the fifth question and its answer, and places himself the fifth in the class. But when the master comes, he begins with him; and he cannot tell the first or the second question, or any one but the fifth. He is a cake not turned; he pretended he had learnt all, but had not. He was deceiving.

Here, again, is a girl; she has got some sewing to do, and when she is asked if she has done it, she says she has. Yes; but how? With great wide stitches, an inch or two long, when they should have been closer together than the teeth of a comb. She is a cake not turned.

Jesus was once speaking of this kind of thing, and took cups and saucers for His text. 'Be thorough,' He said, 'never deceive; if you pretend to wash the cups and saucers, wash them both inside and out. Do not wash the outside only, and make-believe about the inside. And do the same with your characters. If you pretend to be good, then be good, inside and out—in your heart and your thoughts, as well as in your appearance.'

And that is what this cake is meant to teach—Be thorough; do not try to appear to be what you are not. When you are very sick and ill, and your face is pale, and you are in danger of dying, the doctor does not come and say, 'Ah! you do not look well, we must make you look better,' and then begin to paint your face, so as to give you the colour of health. If he only did that, you would die with the paint on your face! But the doctor is wiser, and tries to make you well inside; once he succeeds in doing that, you soon come to look well outside. He makes you healthy, and then you seem healthy. And that is always the best way to seem good—by being good. What is the good of seeming good if your thoughts are bad, and if you like in your heart to listen to naughty stories, and to repeat wicked words? God can see what is within as clearly as He can see what is without; and though you might look well in the eyes of others, God can see when you are only as a cake not turned. Try to be thorough in everything, inside and out, and through and through.

Sometimes you say, 'I would like to be good and true, and love Jesus rightly, only I would like first of all to do this thing, though it is bad, or go to that place, though it is wrong, if—if—if!' That reminds me of an old Cornish fisherman we shall call John Brand, for, I am sorry to say, I have forgotten his real name. The fishing had not been good for some days, the water had been wild and stormy; but at length, on the Sabbath, the weather became fine, and the other fishermen said: 'We would wish to keep the Sabbath—but—we have had so few fish lately; and we are sorry to go out to-day—but—the weather is so good. It is a pity; we would not go if we were not so poor.' 'What!' said honest John, 'are you going to break God's laws with your ifs and buts? Better be poor than be wicked. My religion is not the kind that shifts with the wind. "Thou shalt remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy"—that is enough for me.'

So he persuaded them, and they took his advice, and spent the day in worshipping God. And it was well they did so; for that night, just when the boats would have been coming back, a terrible storm suddenly burst over the deep, and lasted two days. Any boat out in that weather would certainly have been wrecked. But two days after, the beautiful weather returned, and more fish were taken then than had been caught for weeks before.

No; no one ever yet lost by obeying God. Be you like John Brand; be thorough, honest, and God-fearing in and out; do not have a religion like a weather-cock that shifts with the wind, or one that can be broken with an if or a but.

God sees you always, and sees you altogether. A great sculptor in Greece, long ago, made a statue that was to be set on a high column, yet he was as particular about the hair on the top of the statue's head as about all the rest. 'Why should you take such pains about that?' some one asked him; 'for no man will be able to see the top of the head when the figure is on the column.' 'No,' said the sculptor; 'but God will see it.'

Be true in heart if you would be true in life, for it is out of the heart the life comes.—J. REID HOWATT, The Churchette, p. 252.

KICKING CALVES

'Thy calf, O Samaria, hath cast thee off'; or (as the words have been rendered), 'Thy calf hath kicked thee. O Samaria: or even, 'Thy calf, O Samaria, hath kicked thee off.'—HOSEA VIII, 5.

Look at some calf-worshippers, then, and mark how their god treats them.

I. Take, for instance, the greedy boy who puts no restraint on his appetite; who lings not so much for food as for forbidden food, or for those richer kinds of food which are not wholesome for him. To gratify his appetite, he will do things which are mean, selfish, wrong. And, at last perhaps, he has his will, gets what he wants, and eats till he can eat no more. What follows? Stomach-ache, headache, sickness, the doctor, with his potions and his pills. That is to say, the calf which Little Glutton worshipped has kicked him, and kicked him in his tenderest part, just where he feels it most. He who would always be eating if he could, turns sick at the very smell of food. He who craves nothing but rich savours and sweet juices, is dosed and drenched with nauseous drugs. And it will be well for him if he takes the warning, and so gets off with a mere kick or two. For if he does not, the greedy boy will grow up into a greedy man, pampering and gorging his appetite, making, as St. Paul says, his belly his god, until at last his calf kicks him off into all the miseries of incurable indigestion, or even into the dust and ashes of a premature grave.

Or take the case of a vain foolish girl, who gives herself great airs when she goes to a new school, talks big about her 'pa' and her 'ma,' her home, her servants, her dresses, her friends, her pony, or 'our carriage'; seeks in all ways, in short, to draw attention to herself and to lift herself above the heads of her companions. When she is found out, her fibs detected or her foolish self-complacency resented and exposed, may we not say that her calf has kicked her, humbled her to the dust, so that she who wanted to be admired is despised, and, instead of being raised above the level of her fellows, is thrust down below their level? Her sin has found her out, has wrought its own punishment, we say. But let us also say, and remember, that, in the strange mercy of God, she has been punished by and for her sin in order that she may learn what an ugly sin it is, learn to hate and to renounce it. Let us remember that, by her very punishment, God is seeking to save the vain foolish girl from growing up into a still more vain and foolish woman, and thus to spare her a still deeper humiliation and shame.

II. Not only the base passions which all reasonable men condemn, but also our best affections, our plainest duties, may be exalted into the place of God, and thus be turned into calves which will only too surely kick us, or kick us off, before they have done with us.

The first thought with most of you young men is, I suppose, how you are to earn your bread, by what kind of labour and service you are to secure yourself a livelihood and a suitable place in the world. And when you have chosen your vocation, you, very properly, trust to your industry, your intelligence, your energy, your fidelity to the duties confided to you, to make your way, to rise in the world, to secure a competence, if not a fortune. In this you do well. It is your plain and obvious duty to earn your daily bread by daily toil; and to look for success in life to your devotion to the duties entrusted to you, and to the intelligence and the diligence with which you discharge them. But as you go on, and get on, you may be tempted to snatch at success by taking some mean advantage of your fellows, or by some base compliance with the base humours or habits of those who employ you, or by adopting some dishonest trick of the market, or by in some way staining your integrity, defiling the clear honour of your soul, and so violating the allegiance you owe to your principles, your conscience, your God.

On the other hand, you may preserve your integrity untouched; but, while you do nothing that men call mean and base, you may suffer mere success in business to absorb all your energies; you may come to regard it as 'the chief good and market of your time': you may pursue it with an ardour which will compel you to neglect, not only the culture of your mind and the best and purest affections of the heart and home, but also your public duties as a citizen, the worship of the Church, the service of Him to whom you owe all you have, and to whom alone you can look for comfort in your griefs, for support in death, for life and peace beyond the grave.

In either case, if you yield to these temptations, you will have turned what was once a clear duty, a duty which you owed to God and man, into an idol, into a calf such as that which of old men worshipped in Samaria. And your calf will kick you, as it kicked them.

III. Finally, let me remind you that all these foolish and hurtful idolatries of ours spring from our false conceptions of God, and of what He requires of us. The greedy boy thinks to be happy if only he can fill his greedy mouth; and the vain foolish girl thinks she shall have nothing left to desire if she can only indulge her self-conceit. But they could not possibly think so if they knew that God is really ruling their life, and understood what His plan for them is, and what is the end He would have them pursue. And if they knew God aright, neither could the lad just launched in business assume that success in business is to be obtained by doubtful means, or that it could possibly satisfy him if it were attained; nor could the maiden dream that by following the bent of a strong affection in the teeth of duty she could enter on a happy life. The true ends of life, the highest ends, do not lie here—in mere worldly success, or even in gratified affection. A man may live and die poor, a woman may live and die alone, and yet may have both found and enjoyed the chief good of human life, may yet have reached and rested in its true end.—SAMUEL COX, The Bird's Nest, p. 163.

JOEL

TEMPTATION

'Sanctify a fast, call a solemn assembly; gather the people, sanctify the congregation, assemble the elders, gather the children.'—JOEL II. 15, 16.

CHILDREN as well as older people have to keep Lent.

It was commanded that the Jewish children should be gathered when a solemn fast was to be kept, so how much more must Christian children take their share in keeping Lent!

You might be surprised that, when God commanded the Prophet Joel to call the people together to keep a fast, He should command 'Gather the children'; but when Jonah preached to the people of Nineveh to repent of their sins, even the animals were made to fast.

It is hard to understand why the animals should be made to fast, for they could not have sinned against God. But God had good reason for commanding 'Gather the children,' for it could not be said that they had never sinned.

So when God tells us now that we must all be sorry for our sins, and spend time in prayer to overcome them, the children cannot be left out; for even they have their sins to repent of and to overcome.

When Elisha was travelling from Jericho to Bethel 'There came forth little children out of the city,' and what did they do? They mocked him?

Yes, and God was very angry with them and sent two bears which killed forty-two of those children. This shows that they knew better or God would never have punished them so severely. You must be very thankful that God gives you time to repent. But you see how displeasing to God even the sins of little children are. So you children must make a special effort during Lent to overcome your sins, and if you pray to God He will help you.

Make some simple resolution, to overcome that sin that you know you are most subject to, and pray about it every day of Lent.

Lent will not leave you where it found you; so, if you are not nearer to Jesus at the end of Lent, you will be further from Him. I don't mean that you must only fight against that sin during Lent, but as long as you are tempted to it. You must go on until you have overcome it, however long it may take.

I told you once about some races held near Corinth. Do you remember what I told you a man did, if he fell down while he was running?

He got up again at once, and went on running.

Yes, and it is the same in the race you are running. If you have a fall you must not give way to despair, but you must pray to God to help you to do better, so that you may get safely to the end of your race, and win your prize. You must not only begin Lent well, but go through Lent well, right to the end. You remember how well Jesus went through that struggle with Satan in the Wilderness, without ever giving it up. How hard then we must try to overcome those sins of ours!

Think what pain even your sins caused Jesus to bear. It was just those little sins of yours that caused the nails to be driven into His hands and feet on the cross. How much He must love you if He could bear all this pain for you! Would you like to crucify Jesus again? No.

No, I am sure you would not; but I want you to remember, that each time you give way to sin you cause the dear Saviour as much pain as if you actually nailed Him to the cross; while each time you resist temptation you are helping Him to bear His cross, like Simon, because you are saving Him from the pain that sin would have caused Him if you had given way to it. If you really love Jesus you will try hard to overcome your sins, because of the pain they cause Him; but could you overcome all your sins at once. No.

No, you have to overcome them gradually. We have to overcome our sins just one at a time.

Perhaps before many days or even many hours have passed you will have given way to that very sin you resolved to give up. But even then you must not give up in despair.

Perhaps you have heard the story of the King of Scotland and the spider. He noticed a spider trying to get to the top of the wall. When it had almost got there it fell down to the ground, but it did not give up in despair. The king became interested. He saw it try to get to the top of the wall eight times over, but each time it fell to the ground. It tried again, the ninth time, and succeeded. Then the king concluded that he should be conquered by his enemies eight times and would conquer them the ninth time. He did conquer them the ninth time, and reigned long and gloriously after that.

Now, I want you to think about that spider, in your attempts to overcome your besetting sin this Lent. You may not completely conquer it at the ninth attempt, or even at the ninety-ninth, but if you go on praying to God about it, you will conquer it at last.

God promises that you will be victorious over sin; He says, 'Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you'. He does not say how many times you will have to ask, or seek, or knock, but He does promise to you that 'Every one that asketh receiveth, and he that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened'.

The Saints would never have conquered their sins and reached Paradise if they had given up in despair.

Jesus loves those who try to love Him, and He will always help them. What strength Jesus gives you older girls in Holy Communion to resist temptation! I hope you will spend Lent in such a way that you may make your Easter Communion loving Him more.

I hope you will all begin at once with the resolve to fight against your besetting sin this Lent.

Ask God to help you not to fall; but if you do fall, ask Him to help you to rise again so that you may share in Jesus' Resurrection on the great Easter Day in your home beyond the grave.

No home on earth is like it,
Nor can with it compare;
For every one is happy,
Nor could be happier there.

—J. L. SMITH-DAMPIER, Christ's Little Citizens, p. 197.

THE VALLEY OF DECISION

'The day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision.'—JOEL III. 14.

I REMEMBER how this text struck me when I was a little lad. Children have a strange way of mixing up things, and I came to think of these words as in some way connected with a place to which I should like to take you all, near to my native town, in the far west of this country. Away out on those wild cliffs, with the fierce Atlantic rolling in upon them, there is a valley which came to be in my mind a sort of 'Valley of Decision'. You left the little town and turned through some fields; then came out again upon the road and under some pleasant trees; again through fields and lanes, over marshy places, and past a muddy red river flowing from the mines and rolling down to the sea; then by a mill with its dripping wheel covered with bright green moss, and the wet wall green with ferns. You had to climb a steep hill, and at the top of it stepped upon the moorland, golden with the scented furze, purple with heather, and green and brown with the hardy bracken. Away over that still moor, far from the haunts of men—where you might go for days together and scarcely see anyone but the shepherd and his dog—you would, if you knew just the right place, go down a little path by a shining stream, and it would lead you into one of the most lovely valleys you ever saw. The steep sides of furze and heather rise high up and shut it in completely. It opens towards the sea, and far off you catch sight of the blue ocean which stretches away, away for thousands of miles, and you hear the surge and roar of its breakers rolling in on the calmest summer day. Right in the middle of the valley runs the little brook, hurrying on until it shall leap off the cliff a clear hundred feet, and be lost in the waters of the great sea below. Here let us sit for awhile, and let this be our valley of decision. The deep blue sky is above us, now and then the kite is poising himself on a trembling wing far over our heads; or the gull goes sailing along without a beat of his white wings; or the raven's hoarse croak comes from the cliff.

I. This valley of decision is A Place for Sober Thought.—Look at the little stream hurrying on between the banks. Here, almost hidden under the thick growth of forget-me-nots and long grass; here, spreading out into a broad pool, catching the light of the sun and reflecting the flowers on its banks; there, narrowed into a swift river under dark bushes; but always and everywhere hastening away to the great sea. Is not that just like our life? It is hurrying away, always and everywhere. Laughing with pleasures, idle and happy, troubled and murmuring, life is always hurrying on. Friendships and joys cannot keep it, any more than the flowers can keep the brook. And, like it, we are going away to that great sea, Eternity. Day and night, awake and asleep, working and resting, life is hurrying on to that great sea. How are we going? Sometimes when winter torrents have swollen the stream, I have seen it go leaping over the cliffs, a black flood, dashed upon the rocks below, and lost in the angry waves. But in the summer time I have seen the little silver thread of water caught by the summer breeze, and turned into a shower of spray, about which rainbows played as the sun shot through the glistening drops, and it seemed to die in light all crowned with radiant beauty. Where is our life going? Dark, troubled, sullen, in the chill winter of the soul, going away to be lost in those dark depths? Or, is it lit up with heaven's sunshine and joy, going only to be borne upward, gently home, covered with light and rainbow hues? let us press these things upon our minds. The valley of decision is a place of sober thought.

II. Then again, sitting here in this pleasant valley, I am reminded that the valley of decision is A Place of Solemn Warning.—Just under this little valley a merry party had come one day for a picnic. One of the company, a strong young man and a capital swimmer, had slipped away to bathe. Suddenly, as the others sat singing on the rocks or were strolling on the sands, one sprang up and pointed to their friend as he was being borne away by the current. He was drowning. There was no boat near, and none could help him, and there his friends, in an agony of grief, watched him sink down under the waves, and he was seen no more. It is a place of solemn warning.

Another day I had been under the cliffs, and was returning with my friend, when we met a little bright-faced lad running down the steep side. When we had reached the top, we saw him, a speck far away down under us, skimming along the foaming edge of the waves. Scarcely had we turned our faces from him before a huge wave swept in, and he was borne away, struggling in vain, with none to hear his cries—just swept away and drowned. That valley came to be a place of solemn warning.

What is death, but the sweeping in of the waves of eternity, bearing away one and another? Day after day, hour after hour, those about us are being swept away. Where are we? What hope have we? We too must die. Many younger than we are have died; many as young as dying every day. Death may just as likely sweep around us and bear us out to be seen no more—beyond all help. Think of these things deeply and seriously. The 'valley of decision' is a place of solemn warning.

III. The place further suggested Our Danger and Our Deliverance.—This little valley stood at the head of a deep gulf shut in on three sides by the cliff, and we could look over the sloping shoulder of a headland and see beyond it a steep precipitous cliff, in which was a huge cave, running up three-fourths as high as the cliff itself—a huge, black, rounded cavern, that went by the name of Ralph's Cupboard. Never accessible from the land, it was scarcely ever to be entered from the sea. At low water the sharp rocks rose up and blocked its entrance, and when the tide came in, the wild waves swept about it so as to threaten destruction to any that should attempt to enter it.

Its name came from the romantic escape of a bold smuggler. He was known to the coastguard men, and they had tried again and again to take him; but he was loved and admired amongst the people, and they were always ready to afford him shelter and to mislead the officers. One wild night, however, the coastguard came upon him, and surrounded him. He sprang into his boat, and pulled hard over the wild waves. But the men gained on him. Hard pressed, there seemed but one escape. There, in front of him, the great foaming waves were thundering into this cave, dashed against its sides into a shower of spray. Turning his boat towards it, he waited a moment until he could catch the swelling wave, and then, as the coastguards watched him in horror, they saw him swept into what seemed to be the great black jaws of destruction. But his confidence and courage were his safety. With a cool head and a strong hand, keeping his boat in the very middle of the cave, the wave swept him right away to its very end, and left him on the little bit of shingle beach that the tides had thrown up there.

Now, like him, we have broken the laws: we are condemned. We have sinned, and the law saith, 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die'. The 'terror of the Lord' is upon us, at our heels, following us like our very shadow. The moments are hastening upon us, bearing the evils that must come. We must perish, unless we can find some way of escape. No skill, or cleverness, or courage of ours can save us. It is folly to go on hoping and desiring, unless we can find a place of refuge. See, here it is: 'A Man shall be as an hiding-place'.

The text tells us that when we have made up our mind, the day of the Lord is near.

When the prodigal said, 'I will arise,' and when he did arise and go, it was not long before his father saw him, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him. When we set about it in downright earnest, the day of the Lord is near. In the life of Billy Bray—which many of you, I think, have read—he tells us that he had gone sorrowing and sighing for some time, until he could bear it no longer; and one night he sprang out of bed, and fell on his knees, and cried out, 'Lord, Lord, Thou hast said, "Ask, and ye shall have; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened." Lord, I ask now—give; I seek now—let me find; I knock now—open unto me. And that moment I found.' When we have made up our mind, the day of the Lord is near. But perhaps some burdened soul says, 'Well, I have sought earnestly; I have pleaded and cried to God, and no help or light has come'. Well, perhaps you have been trusting in your earnestness. Your confidence has been in your tears. Your faith has been in the agony of your wrestling. Look to Christ. Come to Him, saying, 'Lord, here I am, a poor, needy, helpless sinner. I can't seek Thee as I want to do; let me sink into Thee! Here I lie, unable to do anything of myself. I will be Thine, and I must have Thee'; so sink down in helplessness upon Him.

The day of the Lord is near—the day of salvation. A day—because it is light. The shadows shall flee away. The gloomy clouds of night shall be dispersed. The healing sun shall rise, and the night with all its perils and fear shall end. A day—because it is joyful. The rosy dawn touches the eastern sky, and at once earth wakes up to music; the air is full of joyous sounds; the flowers open; the dew-drops sparkle in its light, and all is joy. Ah! the day of the Lord is near, when sorrow and sighing shall flee away. Then we shall obtain joy and gladness. The time of the singing of birds shall come for us. Joy cometh in the morning.—MARK GUY PEARSE, Sermons for Children, p. 1.

JONAH

The Basket of Fruit (Amos vii. 1).—‘Behold a basket of summer fruit.’

There are two kinds of fruit in life, the fruit of sin and the fruit of grace (Rom. vi. 21, 22).

There is a season for the perfecting of these fruits. Now (Luke xiii. 7).

There is a ripening of this fruit, both bad and good (Luke viii. 14, 15).

There will be gathering soon, some for destruction, and some for glory (Matt. xiii. 39).—C. EDWARDS, Tin Tacks for Tivy Folks, p. 13.

THE DOWNWARD MAN

‘But Jonah rose up to flee unto Tarshish, from the presence of the Lord, and went down.’—JONAH I. 3.

JONAH was a remarkably ‘downward man’. In fact, he was about as downward a man as we ever heard of. In this verse we are told that he ‘went down to Joppa’; and then, in the same verse, after we are told that he had found a ship, we are also told that he ‘went down into it’. He was not content, like other people, with being on deck; he must go down to the cabin, or the hold, or the bilge-water—down, down—he must go down. When the storm came on, and the cargo had to be cast overboard so as to lighten the ship, after clearing out one article and another, they came upon Jonah, and no doubt they were surprised, for the fifth verse tells us that ‘Jonah was gone down into the sides of the ship’. And even then he was not standing—‘he lay, and was fast asleep’. He was down—thoroughly down—down in body and down in mind; and, in a little while, when the winds were roaring, and the waters were raging, he went down farther still—he went down in heart. It was just what we might have expected then, since he was so bent on going down, that he would get enough of it. So he was sent farther and farther down than ever. He was cast into the sea, and went down to the ‘bottoms of the mountains’—to the brown sand, and the wavy, tangled weeds in which the mountains plant their feet. He could not go much farther down than that, and by that time he did not want to go down any more. He wanted—and wanted very much—to come up.

Jonah has a large family, and they are all like their father in that respect; they have a strange fondness for going down, down—always going down. You meet these people everywhere. They started well enough, and had as good a chance as any, but somehow they soon got on the downgrade, and once they were on it they went faster and faster down and down; and now, poor things, they are quite down—down at heels, down in heart, down in hope—thoroughly ‘downed’. What is to be done with them? A great many people settle that question in a moment by giving them another push, and helping them to go down a little farther. Isn’t that cruel? Isn’t it wicked. Isn’t it ab-om-in-a-ble? That is a big word, and I like to say it slowly, that you may take it in, and tremble by seeing what a wicked, wicked cruel thing it is for any man or any woman, any boy or any girl, to give a push to any weak one who is going down already fast enough and sure enough. Never, never do you that, or you will be doing one of the biggest sins you will ever be doing in your life.

There is something better to be done. Put the skid on; stop them if you can from going down any farther, and then help them up. That is good work; that is God-like work; that is the work Jesus was always doing, and the work He is always doing still, and it is the grandest, happiest, most blessed work you will ever get a chance of doing all your days. Angels cannot find anything better to busy themselves about. So, whenever you know of anyone going down, becoming poorer through some misfortune, or becoming wicked through some bad habit, do not go speaking about it to other people, and calling their attention to the one going down. That is mean, that is low, that is bad-hearted; that is forgetting to be like Christ. Do something better. Think and plan and do what you can to help the downward one to come up again.

Sometimes, poor things, they feel as if they couldn’t help themselves. I have seen a bicyclist on a light machine without a brake go nicely along till the way became steep, and he has thought he could manage to go down gently, back-peddalling all the way, and keeping himself well in hand. But he could not do it. Here and there there came a jolt, and his foot has slipped from the pedal, and then down, down, down he has rushed, swifter and swifter, unable to stop himself. Well for him if he got down safe! I have seen some that did not; and when they were wounded and bruised a good bit, they learned to have a little charity and a little pity for poor folks in the world that seem quite unable to help themselves from going down, down, down. Be you kind and pitiful to them all your days, and a kind heart will soon find out the best that you can do for them.

But what was it that sent Jonah down so fast and down so far? It was sin. The Lord showed him the road He wanted him to go on, and that was an upward one; but an upward road is always a bit stiff, and Jonah wanted to take things easy, so he left the Lord's road and took his own, and that is always a road that leads down. God's road always slopes up. We are a bit higher to-day than we were yesterday—a bit purer, a bit more loving, a bit less selfish; and sometimes we have a bit of a stiff job to keep ourselves at it, but then—how much happier, how much healthier we are growing! Our own road, however, is always smooth and broad, and it winds about so gracefully that we never notice how it slopes down. But it does—always does; and it is not till we have gone pretty far down that we begin to find out the ruts and the mud and the boggy places. That is the way of the man or woman, boy or girl, who begins to think of pleasing himself, and himself only, and forgets what God wants, and leaves the road that God has marked for him. That one is going down, going down all the way—going down first in heart and mind, not seeing, not thinking, not caring for the pure and beautiful and noble things he saw and thought and cared for once; and then going down in happiness—the sunshine that was at the top becomes all lost down in the hollows; and then going down in character, and down—down at last even in his own eyes. For he has found then—yes, he has found then—that it was all a great mistake. The things that promised so fair at first deceived him in the end.

Yes, take note of it, and keep the note always locked up in your heart, so as to be safe, that God's ways—God's ways alone—are ways of pleasantness, and all His paths are paths of peace—peace for the heart, peace for the mind, peace for the life. Keep to them and you will keep moving upward, and not downward, and the good spirit of Jesus will always put it into your heart never to push another down when he is going down, but rather stop him, and help him up as best you can. As far down as Jonah went, God brought him up at last. If God can do that with one who had gone so low, you need not despair about anybody.—J. REID HOWATT, The Children's Pew, p. 104.

NAHUM

THE LORD'S GOODNESS

'The Lord is good.'—NAHUM I. 7.

WE apply the word good to a great many different things, and the meaning which it bears depends on circumstances. You have all often spoken of a good apple or a good peach, and every day somebody is heard to boast of his good horse or his good cow.

All that good means, in such a connection, is, that the apple or peach suits the taste of the little fellow who is eating it, or that the horse is gentle, and does not refuse to pull his load, and that the cow gives plenty of rich milk.

When I speak of a child as being a good boy or a good girl, the word means much more than in the cases just referred to. The boy or girl who is called good must be one who is obedient to parents; one who loves God; one who is anxious to do right; and various other points which I have not time to mention.

We are apt to think of our mother as the best person in the world. A school-teacher was once telling his pupils how bad the human heart is, and concluded by asking them whether they had ever known anybody who was always good.

One little fellow, prompted by a simple childlike affection, answered, without a moment's hesitation, 'Yes, sir, I know one: my mother!'

Good as many Christians certainly are in various particulars, there is only one person who ever lived in the world, who was perfectly free from faults, and that was our adorable Saviour. Indeed, it was no easy thing (as I have no doubt you have already found out) to be even tolerably good.

More than once your mother has said to you, 'Do try and be a good boy to-day!' You do wish to obey her; you intend to do it; you succeed for a while; but, when thrown off your guard, how often it has come to pass, that you have been led to do very differently from what you had expected and really desired to do! God alone is always good. This is the point taught us in the text, 'The Lord is good.'

How do we know this to be true? Have we anything more than the prophet's word for it? Let us see.

1. We know that 'The Lord is good' by His works.

He made this beautiful world. It is a sort of great house for His creatures to live in. He hung out the sun and the moon in the sky, to give light to them by day and by night. He has spread a carpet of green over the earth, and variegated it with beautiful flowers.

Our ears are charmed with the music of birds, and our eyes gladdened with a thousand pleasant sights.

A little girl, ten years old, once rode up on horse-back, with a party of ladies and gentlemen, to the top of Mount Washington. All dismounted, and, standing on the rugged summit, covered with stunted, pale-green moss, they gazed about in wonder. Below, stretching in all directions, lay a silver sea of clouds, amid which lightnings were seen to flash their forked shafts, and from which the deafening thunder sounded on the ear, peal after peal, in rapid succession.

Far down beneath the travellers knew that the rain was descending in torrents, but where they stood the sun shone on them in all its splendour.

The father of the little girl, who was not troubled with a very vivid imagination, said to her, as he looked about on this grand display of God's works with a careless and indifferent eye, 'Well, Lucy, there is nothing to be seen, is there?'

The child caught her breath, lifted her clasped hands, and replied, reverently, 'Oh, yes, papa, I see the Doxology!' Everywhere about her Nature seemed to be saying with a loud voice:—

'Praise God, from whom all blessings flow!'

I spoke of the world as a sort of great house, and I might add to this that it is a house full of useful things.

Men dig down into the hills and mountains, and bring forth rich treasures of iron and coal. They explore the mines for silver and gold. The waters abound in fish. Grain and fruits are produced in unstinted abundance. The industrious bees lay up their stores of sweet, of which we are always so ready to take our share.

All these, and a thousand other good things, our Heavenly Father has put into this treasure-house.

Is not the Lord good?

2. We know that the prophet gave a true statement of the case, because of the pains which God took to redeem us.

I read of three children who got lost in the woods, and went wandering about trying to find their way back home. They lived for a while on blackberries and roots, but they soon became worn down by fatigue and anxiety, and lost all hope.

The distracted father, with some kind neighbours, searched two days for them, and when they were found at last they were nearly dead.

And so sinners had wandered off from their Heavenly Father and got lost. God so loved them that He sent His own dear Son to search for them, and bring them back.

We express this idea very often in our prayers when we say, 'We have erred and strayed from Thy ways like lost sheep'. When we behold our Saviour in His agony, on Good Friday, we can form some faint conception of how tender-hearted and compassionate He must have been towards the ungrateful creatures who deserved no kindness from Him.

3. Again, we know that 'The Lord is good,' because He takes such great care of us.

A little child fell, one day, from the third story of a house to the ground below, and the nurse ran down in great terror expecting to find its bruised and mangled body, as she remembered that some large stones were lying about in the yard left there by the workmen, who had been doing something to the cellar wall. Judge, then, of her amazement, when she beheld the little creature seated between two of these great blocks of stone, playing with a flower which she had plucked from the tall grass which served her for a cushion!

Surely one of those guardian angels which our Saviour speaks of, as having a watchful care over little children, must have protected this child from harm.

Who takes care of us when we are asleep, and when we are quite unable to protect ourselves? The question is answered in the verse of good Bishop Ken's hymn, in which we ask God to do it:—

Keep me, O keep me, King of kings,
Under Thine own Almighty wings.

This protection which the Lord extends to us is only one among many ways by which He proves that He is good.

The subject suggests three lessons, which I hope you will learn from it:—

1. If God is thus good to us, we ought to try, very hard, never to forget Him.

In olden time a great army came to attack a strong city, and they would most assuredly have taken it, but for a very curious circumstance. One night, while the besieging soldiers were enjoying their sound sleep after a hard day's toil, the mice crept in among them and gnawed their bow-strings! The next morning, when they wished to go on with the attack, it was impossible to shoot their arrows. After that the people of the city worshipped mice! This was indeed very silly, but it showed that the inhabitants did not forget favours.

We know that God is very good to us, and the least that we can do is to bear it always in mind.

2. If the Lord is thus good to us, we ought to love Him. When your father and mother do kind things for you, or have been very patient and forgiving towards you, although you have not deserved it, you cannot help having your heart warmed towards them with tenderness and affection.

No earthly parent can ever be half so kind and forgiving as our Heavenly Father is; and hence it would be the most shameful ingratitude if we did not show some proper appreciation of His goodness.

The King of Armenia having broken his engagements with Cyrus, the indignant conqueror forthwith marched into his country, and having made prisoners of his faithless vassal and his family, gave orders that they should be brought before him.

'Armenius,' said Cyrus, when the fallen monarch came in, expecting some terrible sentence, 'you are free; for you are now sensible of your error. And what will you give me if I restore your wife to you?'

'All that I am able.'

'What if I restore your children?'

'All that I am able.'

'And you, Tigranes,' said Cyrus, turning to the son, 'what would you do to save your wife from servitude?'

The young man had lately married, and was much devoted to his wife. He answered up, with spirit, 'Cyrus, to save her from servitude, I would willingly lay down my life.'

'Let each have his own again,' said Cyrus, and all were made happy in a moment.

When the conqueror had departed, one spoke of his clemency, another of his valour, while a third praised his noble bearing, and the graces of his person. Tigranes turned to his beautiful wife, and asked, 'Did you think him handsome?'

'Really,' she answered, with artless simplicity, 'I did not look at him.'

'At whom, then, did you look?'

'At him who offered to lay down his life for me!'

Greater love hath no man than this, that he should lay down his life for his friend. Tigranes was willing to die for his wife. Even while we were enemies to Him, our adorable Saviour died for us. Surely we ought to consider Him as 'the fairest among ten thousand, and altogether lovely'.

Once more. If the Lord has been thus good to us, it becomes us to try to be good also that we may be like Him.

I need not tell you that this will be a very hard and discouraging undertaking. Indeed, it will sometimes appear almost absurd to make the effort any longer; and yet this conclusion would be wrong.

You have seen a child learning to write. The teacher has set a nice, fair copy at the top of the page, and the business of the little scholar is to learn to write like it.

Alas! how very slow the progress which he makes! What a number of writing-books are scrawled through with the most awkward-looking marks, before he succeeds, in any degree, to his teacher's satisfaction, or his own!

And even after he is classed among those advanced scholars who have acquired the art of penmanship, still his best efforts will fall far short of the copy.

Just so in our efforts to be like the good Lord. We may be ready to despair, but if we are really anxious to be better, and to do better, God will help us. Indeed, He will always help those who care enough about it to ask Him.—JOHN N. NORTON, Milk and Honey, p. 218.

ZEPHANIAH

SERVING THE LORD WITH ONE SHOULDER

'Then will I turn to the people a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord, to serve Him with one shoulder.'—ZEPHANIAH III. 9.

WHAT is meant by the people learning to serve God with one shoulder? It is evidently a matter of some importance, for the writer of these words represents God as watching with desire for the time when His people should have learned to serve Him thus.

Did you ever see a long ladder, or a long wooden plank, carried through the streets on the shoulders of two or three men? Now, if one man walked in the least faster than the others, or if he walked in the smallest degree out of line with the others, the thing which they were carrying would slip off. The ladder can be safely supported only so long as each man keeps his shoulder, on which it rests, exactly in a line with the shoulders of the other men. They must do the work as if they had but one shoulder; they must all keep step, they must all proceed at the same pace, they must all walk on the same line. That is what I understand the image or illustration to be which the prophet uses here to explain to us the best method, and the only really true and successful way of serving God. We are to serve God together, and we are to serve God in unison. We are to do our work for God along with others, and we are to do it in harmony with others.

Our Lord Jesus Christ, when He was upon earth, established or founded a Society. This Society is called the Christian Church. It consists of all persons who have been baptised. You can never too early learn that your greatest honour and privilege is to be a member of this Society. Some of you belong to old and famous families; you read in history how your forefathers gallantly served their country and their king, and did famous deeds of devotion and bravery. There is no reason why you should not be proud, in a right manly or a right womanly way, of these things. Be so proud of your family, if in God's providence you have been born the child of an ancient and noble house, that you will never do a mean, cowardly, uncharitable act, to bring shame and dishonour upon it. But there is a greater honour, a nobler privilege, which belongs to every boy and girl, and that is that you belong to the family of Christ. You are members of that Society which He founded. You are one of the brethren of the family of which He himself is not ashamed to be called the First-born Son. Jesus Christ died for each one, and, like the shepherd, calls each of His own sheep by name, and leads them out, and loves each one; but also He died for the whole flock, and loves them as a whole.

Most people who do much in the way of what we call religious work are, I believe, striving to serve God. But how much more and how much better work would be done for God if we not only endeavoured to serve Him singly, but all of us to do it 'with one shoulder'.

'Now, then, Highlanders, shoulder to shoulder!' was the cheery and inspiring word of command that rang out above the roar of battle as a gallant soldier led his Scotchmen to the charge; and every man, not for himself but for England, rushed forward as with only 'one shoulder' in the regiment, and with the irresistible might of their courage and their valour swept the broken ranks of their defeated foes before them. Oh! my friends, let us hear the voice of our great Captain ringing across this world's great battle-field, and summoning us to give up our petty jealousies and our miserably little differences. 'Soldiers of the Cross, shoulder to shoulder!' against all the evil, all the falseness, all the baseness, all the meanness, all the impurity, all the pride, all the folly, all the mighty army of sin that the Prince of Darkness has set in battle array against us.

Try daily more and more to serve God as with one shoulder in your homes. It will make those homes so much brighter, so much happier for all.

When you find the old self-will and selfishness stirring within you, just ask yourself quietly, 'Will this help us to serve as with one shoulder?' And just steal a little minute to spend in your room, to ask God to guide and bless and strengthen you in your endeavour.—T. TEIGNMOUTH SHORE, Saint George for England, p. 101.

THE REST OF GOD

'He will save, He will rejoice over thee with joy: He will rest in His love, He will joy over thee with singing.'—ZEPHANIAH III. 17.

THE inquiry which I wish to answer is, from what does God's satisfaction and joy arise? How is His rest connected with His saved people? I remark:—

I. God is not Satisfied with doing Nothing.—Think back on a time when all the things that now are had not yet been made. There were no living creatures; no men, no beasts, no birds, nor creeping things on earth; no angels in the skies. There were no worlds for living creatures to dwell in; no heaven, no sun, no moon, no star, no globe like ours—nothing. Then, however, there was God—God alone. And, doubtless, even then God was happy. But He was not satisfied in the sense of the text. He was at rest, silent in His blessedness, but not satisfied. There was something He wished to do. He longed to work.

He arose, and created. Having created, He continues to preserve. He is taking care of the universe every day. Hence our Lord Jesus said to the Jews, 'My Father worketh hitherto,' from creation till now, even on the Sabbath of rest. The old heathens could not imagine that their gods could be happy unless removed from the affairs of men. They supposed them to dwell far up above the clouds on a high mountain-top, minding their own pleasures, and letting the world look after itself, except on some great occasions which called them to leave their lofty seats, and come down to human abodes; just as there have been wicked kings who lived in their own palaces, and followed their own delights, leaving their subjects to fare as they might. But our God is not as the gods of the blind nations. He must watch over the interests of His great creation. He does not overlook the smallest part of it, nor the meanest thing in it. Not a sparrow falls to the ground without Him. He takes care of the world; His eye is always on it; His hand is always upholding it. I once saw what I felt to be a very daring picture. There was a majestic figure representing God, or the Son of God. In the open hand, of which the very fingers seemed full of strength, rested a globe. The meaning was, God bears up this great world as in His hand. I did not like the way in which the lesson is told, but the lesson is true. He upholdeth all things by the word of His power. But:—

II. God is not Satisfied with mere Works of Power and Wisdom.—Did you ever see an orrery? You know it is a skilfully constructed machine designed to represent the movements of the planets around the sun. If you have seen one, you must have felt, as you looked at it, that it required much wisdom to contrive and arrange it. But, after all, it was but an imitation of what God does with the real globes, and what he contrived without anyone to show him the plan. God made all the planets, put them in their places, gave them their motions, and made them fit into each other, so that we have a system, and not a maze of chance. In this world, too, He made all things to answer each other. The Greek and the Latin words for world show what observers long ago thought of the appearance of things around us. They signify orderly, well-arranged, beautiful. The world is indeed all this. Look at hills, valleys, seas; at grass, flowers, trees; think of air, clouds, rains; consider how they are adapted to each other, hills to valleys, herbage to both, rain to all, how useful and at the same time how beautiful they are—and then say, was not David right when he exclaimed, 'How manifold are Thy works, O Lord, in wisdom Thou hast made them all!' Have you ever thought what wisdom and skill to make things fitting and beautiful there are shown in the seasons—spring, summer, autumn, winter? The poet Thomson speaks truly when in a hymn addressed to God, he says, 'The rolling year is full of Thee'. Now, when God made all these things wisely and beautifully, they were pleasing to Him. He liked to look at them. But

He could not rest in them. Otherwise He might have stopped His creating work on the fourth day.

III. God is not Satisfied with mere Works of Goodness and Bounty.—After the fourth day God made living sentient creatures. All of these were capable of feeling pleasure, and enjoying happiness after their kind. He made a great many sorts of them. He made some to fly about in the air, some to roam about on the land, some to swim through the waters of rivers, and lakes, and seas. Have not you seen birds and beasts quite evidently happy? You have found it pleasant, have you not, to look at lambs or other young animals frisking and gambolling about? Now, doubtless, it gave God pleasure to make such creatures, and to see them happy. Besides, He had made angels before who should be able to know, and love, and serve Him. He made man, also, rational and capable of seeing His glory, and speaking of it. In the happiness of angels and men He has great delight. He likes to hear their voices and to see their works. It is very pleasant to Him to talk with them. Just as the father of a family, sitting in the midst of his children, likes to hear them asking questions, and thanking him for his care; likes to see them growing in knowledge and loving one another, so God has pleasure in the joys and services of holy angels and men. You recollect that when God had finished His six days' work He beheld, and lo, all was good; and then He rested on the seventh day. He was thus far satisfied. He rejoiced over a holy unfallen world. But He had a deeper happiness, a fuller rest, than even this. The highest Sabbath was not yet.

IV. God is not Satisfied with Works of Justice and Judgment.—After God had made the angels a number of them sinned, and He cast them out of heaven. When Adam sinned He drove him forth from paradise. He has said that He will banish wicked men from His presence and the glory of His power. He has often brought destruction on vile and bad men in this world. He drowned the whole race once for their iniquity, saving only Noah and his family. He rained fire and brimstone, in awful storm, on the cities of the plain. He brought the waters of the Red Sea on the host of Pharaoh, when hardened hearts they pursued the people of Israel. He destroyed Jerusalem, after it rejected Jesus, with a very terrible overthrow. Now, there is a satisfaction to God in thus visiting sin with its due punishment. In a passage of one of the prophets He speaks of great judgments as being a sacrifice, satisfying His justice. But this is not the rest of delight. It is the rest merely of relief. It is ease from a burden. God uses this very way of speaking Himself. He says, in Isaiah, 'Ah! I will ease Me of Mine adversaries'. The history and condition of the Jewish people may be adduced to illustrate this. God has thrown them off for their rejection of His Son, as a load He could no longer bear. But He has not yet done with them. Relieved from them, He yet remembers them. He will by and by rest in His love over them, bringing them back with songs of joy. This brings me to remark:—

V. God is Satisfied with Works of Love and Mercy.—He will save, says the text. Then He will rest. Of old He called the land of Canaan His rest, because He there finished His work of leading Israel out of the house of bondage, and through the wilderness into promised habitations. The earthly was but a shadow of the heavenly. God now rests in Christ, rests in the Church, will rest in the Church brought home to glory. For then will His work of love and mercy be completed. Now, it is not wonderful that the work of redemption should give the highest joy to God. For it shows all His character that is shown elsewhere—wisdom, power, justice, goodness, truth; and it shows something more. It shows His pity, and His mercy towards the unworthy and the lost. You remember how this idea of God's chief joy in saving is set forth to us in the parables recorded in the fifteenth chapter of Luke. The shepherd, coming back with the strayed sheep on his shoulder, is gladder over the restored one than over the safe ninety-nine. The woman, finding the lost silver-piece, must have her neighbours to rejoice with her over the recovery. The father, receiving back his poor lost son, makes a feast for joy of soul. When old Jacob met his son Joseph, after he had long mourned him as dead, do not you think he would be gladder over him than when he was first born to him, the child of his beloved Rachel? When the Shunanmite mother got her dead boy back again to her embrace, alive and well, how must her heart have leapt for fullest joy! I recollect reading a story somewhere how a little babe, laid on a flowery bank by a boy-brother, to whose care it had been given, was seen by an eagle that swiftly stooped from her high flight, and carried it away to her eyry in the rocks. The shrieks and anguish of the poor mother when she heard of the theft of her darling roused the country-side, and strong men ran in haste to climb the mountain-side and search the cliff, if haply the infant might be saved from being devoured. The little boy, whose intermitted watch had given the bird of prey her opportunity, was lowered from the top of the rock to where the nest of the eagles was made, and found his lost sister yet safe among the eaglets. The child was brought back with shouts of joy, and as the mother once more clasped her infant safe, she drew from a deeper well of gladness than she ever knew before. Our Heavenly Father, in like manner, rejoices over the saved. Nor will He rest till the salvation of His Church is complete, and His children are all and altogether blessed.—JOHN EDMOND, The Children's Church at Home, p. 661.

HAGGAI

THE GLORY OF THE LATTER HOUSE

'The glory of the latter house shall be greater than of the former, saith the Lord of hosts.'—HAGGAI II. 9.

For what reasons and in what respects was the second temple to have greater glory than the first? I answer, on three accounts.

I. Because Christ was to come to it.

II. Because Christ was to make atonement for sin there.

III. Because it was to give place to a new and better temple than either Solomon's or itself.

I. Christ, the Promised Messiah, was to Come to it.—There is a beautiful title given to Christ in the seventh verse. He is spoken of as the Desire of all nations. How is that? you say. You know well enough that the Jews, taught by their prophets from the beginning, were looking for Him when He came. But how did the blind heathen desire Him? Different things must be stated to give an answer to this question. There was in the hearts even of the dark nations a blind seeking after Him. I have heard it said that insane persons, or persons in delirium from fever, will sometimes go away back to childhood and bring up things altogether forgotten in sane hours. I have heard of one who, at a time when the brain had reeled in disease, was overheard speaking a language of which she was quite ignorant when well. It was the language of her early childhood, altogether forgotten, till the fever heat quickened the memory and brought it back again. So I sometimes think the hearts of the heathen must have occasionally called up, as in a dream, some dim feeling of the old happy state from which sin cast the race down. Besides, and this is plainer, conscience and heart cried out for peace, such peace as Jesus came to give and alone can bestow. Then yet further, by the scattering of the Jews, and the circulation of the Scriptures, an expectation of some great Deliverer to appear in the East was widely spread when Christ was about to come. Now it is evident, from the verse where the Desire of all nations is spoken of, that His coming was to make the temple glorious; for immediately after His coming is foretold, it is added, 'And I will fill this house with glory, saith the Lord of hosts'.

II. Christ Came to make Atonement for Sin, in the Second Temple, and so to Make it Glorious.—In the close of the verse it is said, 'And in this place will I give peace, saith the Lord of hosts'. Now peace is made by the blood of the cross of Jesus; and the shedding of that blood to secure peace on earth was the most glorious event of time. It is true, Jesus' blood was not literally shed in the temple, it did not, like the blood of the animal sacrifices, flow in the sacred courts; but He who visited the temple came to die for men, and so to fulfil all the typical sacrifices that had been offered there for ages. The brazen altar of burnt-offering stood in the court around the holy oracle, to show that entrance into the presence of God could only be had by offering of life—there must be suffering for men on earth, in order to their finding access into heaven; and it was partly a sign of the same truth that was given when Jesus died on the tree outside the gate of Jerusalem. The old economy had a daily succession and profusion of oblations in the form of animal death; many victims fed its altar-fires, and there was something grand, though awful, in the multitude of its sacrifices. But the very multitude and continuance of them showed that they could not take away sin. Oh, how much grander was the sight of that one sacrifice, to which all others looked forward, and which fulfilled them all, and made them no more necessary or fitting! Surely that temple had a superior glory, which, could it have spoken, might have said, as Jesus walked its courts, See Him to Whom all my services have pointed, in Whom alone they had significance and worth; see Him come at length—Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world'.

How different, we may here reflect, is the world's estimate of glory from the Bible's! The world has allowed war and conquest to take the word 'glory' to be very much their own. So we speak of a glorious victory, a glorious campaign, a glorious death. But the Bible joins glory and peace. In natural things we do the same. We do not call the hurricane, the earthquake, the conflagration, glorious; but sunshine, summer calm, summer noon, the summer landscape, rich and in peace, take the epithet appropriately. Around Christ Jesus and His work on earth you see the glory of peace richly shining. His grand mission was peace. His life was peace. He taught peace. He bought peace. The angels sang peace when He was born. He left a legacy of peace when He went to the cross to die. When He rose up in the ship and said, 'Peace, be still,' to raging winds and waves, He gave a picture of what He came to do. He gave another when He rode on an ass's colt into Jerusalem. And when we look calmly at it, we see that in making peace is true glory. It is a grand thing to do so anywhere. It is a sweet work to hush the quarrels of children. It is a fine thing to stop the sound of strife in neighbourhoods. It is a noble thing to heal divisions in a church, to induce contending nations to lay down their arms, to bring alienated friends together again. But oh, how glorious to restore peace between God and man! This the second temple saw Jesus do, by the offering of Himself without spot to God.

III. The Second Temple had a Glory beyond the First, because it was to give Place to a New and Better Temple.—That is a strange saying of the wise man, 'The day of one's death is better than the day of his birth'. How can that be? Is it better to die than to live? No; but the end of the present life is better than its commencement, because it is the beginning of a new and higher life. It closes life, but if it open immortality, what then? John the Baptist was the greatest of all the prophets before Christ, for this reason, as for others, that he was the last of them. You know, I dare say, the star of evening and of morning. It is the same star in different positions. It shines with much the same brightness in both, and is always beautiful. But why is there a special delightfulness about it when it adorns the eastern sky? Because it leads in the dawn. Because it is soon to Melt away into the light of heaven.

So the second temple was to be the last of its kind. It shone when the night of the old age was far spent, and the day at hand. A new temple was to rise in the new age. That temple had its foundation laid when Christ died and rose again. It began to be built on the day of Pentecost. It is still a-building. We are in it. If we are Christ's we are stones in it, built up in faith and love. Or take another view suggested by what happened in the building of the temple of Solomon. Far off in the quarry and ground apportioned for the work of hewing, we are being shaped and fashioned and polished, to be laid noiselessly in our place in the great temple of salvation as it shall appear completed and filled with God on Mount Zion above.

There are four remarks I wish you to notice in closing:—

1. This text proves that the Jews are wrong in believing that Christ has not yet come. For in the temple of Zerubbabel, God was to give peace. The Desire of all nations was to appear there. But the second temple has long been destroyed. Not one stone of it has been left above another. If, then, the Messiah has not come, this prophecy has not been made good.

2. This text shows that outward splendour is not true glory. It is not in a person. There may be beauty of face and nobility of form; there may be rich and splendid dress; but if the soul be foul with sin, or meanly robed, there is no real glory. It is not otherwise in a church. A fine edifice, a crowd of hearers, riches, numbers, gifts of mind, will not make a church shine in the eye of God, if faith, and love, and life in Christ be wanting. What makes day glorious? Not the clouds; not the hills; not the woods, rivers, seas, but the sun that clothes them all with his light. So is it with the church: everything is dark if Christ the Sun be not there.

3. This text suggests such questions as these—Have you desired Christ? Have you sought Him? Has He come to you? Has He made your hearts temples, glorious with His presence?

4. This text shows what will be the great glory of heaven. 'The Lord God giveth it light, and the Lamb is the glory thereof.'—JOHN EDMOND, The Children's Church at Home, p. 566.

ZECHARIAH

THE CHILDREN'S FUTURE

'And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof.'—ZECHARIAH VIII. 5.

THE prophet Zechariah is painting a beautiful word picture; he is painting the Jerusalem which is to be. At the time he was speaking the hearts of all holy men and women were pained because of the state the city was in. A great many people had come back from exile, but they had come back to a city in ruins and to a temple in ruins; and, sad to say, there were enemies who hindered them in rebuilding, and there were also sins in the lives of some of the people which added to the sadness and disorder.

But yet there were good men and holy women amongst them, and these the prophet wishes to encourage. Yes, not only does he wish to encourage them, but he has received from God a special message, a special prophecy for them. Jerusalem or Zion is yet to be great, and so at God's prompting he draws a beautiful picture of the future city. Let us read just a few words of the prophecy. He says—

'Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, I am returned unto Zion, and will dwell in the midst of Jerusalem, and Jerusalem shall be called a city of truth, and the mountain of the Lord of Hosts a holy mountain. Thus saith the Lord of Hosts: There shall yet old men and old women dwell in the streets of Jerusalem, and every man with his staff in his hand for very age. And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof.'

What a picture to feast the heart upon! Old men and old women shall be seen dwelling in Jerusalem, every man so advanced in his age that he needs his staff to support him. Not as it had been—the streets deserted, the people carried into captivity, the young men going off to the wars and perishing there, pestilence and famine cutting off men and women in the prime of life. No; but men and women living on to a happy old age in peace and quiet; coming to their grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in his season.

But we have not got all the beauty of the picture yet. There is something still more attractive, something more tender, something which appeals more powerfully to us; there is something of dancing, laughing joy yet remaining. We have it in the words of our text: 'And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof'. What brightness these words give the picture! We see children's faces wreathed in smiles, we hear their joyous shouts, we watch them flitting to and fro, we mark the smiles of the aged men and women leaning on their staves as they see them at their play.

Oh, the picture would not be nearly so complete nor so beautiful if it were not for those boys and those girls playing in the streets. Such, then, was God's picture, God's promise, God's future for their beloved city Jerusalem.

'And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof.'

There is an inference that we may draw from these words which concerns the young people; it is this: 'God's future is a good time for the boys and the girls. When God looks forward to the future city, He does not think of the men and the women only—He thinks also of the boys and the girls. They have a place in His thoughts and a part in the life of the city; there is to be happiness for them.

When you remember the marvellous way in which God led some of the young people of the Bible—led them to usefulness and happiness; when you remember how He preserved them amidst their dangers and false charges, and brought them out at last to stand in the full light, so that all men might see their truthfulness and their righteousness, surely you must feel that these things are all proofs of His readiness to serve even the youngest among us.—JOHN EAMES, Sermons to Boys and Girls, p. 91.

A SERMON ON PLAY

ZECHARIAH VIII. 5.

I. Children Playing.—I was staying the other night at the house of a friend, and the lesson at evening prayer happened to be the chapter in Zechariah in which the words occur, 'The city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets'.

It was the old city of Jerusalem that was meant. Only a few years before no children could be seen in the streets. The city itself was in ruins. Its walls were thrown down, its houses burnt, its streets deserted. Its people were slaves in Babylon. But that evil time was coming to an end. Builders were building up the broken walls, and Zechariah had been sent by God to cheer them at their work and to tell them of good times coming. There shall be happy homes once more in the old city, and the streets of it shall be full of boys and girls at their play.

But best of all, this New Jerusalem which comes down from God out of heaven is not some city in a far land which we cannot enter till we die. It is the city the dear Saviour brought down out of heaven when Himself came; the city He tells us of in the Sermon on the Mount which is to give light unto the world, and which He speaks of in the parables as the kingdom of heaven. It is on the earth now, it is in every home where Christ is loved; it is in every Church and nation where God's will is done.

And what is better still, what the prophet said of the Old Jerusalem is true also of the Jerusalem which comes down from God out of heaven. In the New Jerusalem as in the old, the streets shall be full of boys and girls at their play. And boys shall grow up to manhood and girls to womanhood in the service of its King, and in the joy of a dwelling-place which shall also be the dwelling-place of God.

In every city where Christ is King there shall be boys and girls at play.

I cannot tell you how beautiful this seems to me, that this should be part of the glad tidings of God. It shows that the sight of boys and girls at play is a pleasure to God Himself. I really think it is a pleasure to everybody who loves God. Dr. Martin Luther was a great lover of God. He once sent a letter to his little son John about children in heaven. And he described them even there as at play. 'I know a lovely and smiling garden,' he said, 'full of children dressed in robes of gold, who play under the trees with beautiful apples, pears, cherries, nuts, and prunes. They sing, they leap, they are all joyful. There are also beautiful ponies with bridles of gold and saddles of silver. In passing through the garden I asked a man what it meant, and who were the children. He replied: "These are the children who love to pray and to learn, who are pious and good children."'

That is a garden not a city; but it is the garden where Christ is King. And it is like the city in this, that it had boys and girls in it at play. Pious and good the boys and girls were, lovers of prayer and learning; but after that, happy with play. I have not seen this garden as Luther did. But I believe in it. It will be in that garden as Zechariah said it was about to be in Jerusalem. Whether in the garden, or on the streets of God's city, the children will be at play. And even now in this world, in the city where we live, I never see children at play but I think it is a little foretaste of the new Jerusalem dropped down into their lives.

Play is neither idleness nor folly. It is one of the many good things which have come into your life from heaven. It is a gift from God. It is one of His wonderful works. When he made the beautiful earth and the sky, and the body and soul of man, He made the happy play of childhood. It is part of your life as truly as prayer is, as truly as the soul itself is. And it is part of the life of children all the world over.

I have sometimes thought that I have seen little glimpses of the pleasure that God takes in your play. I have seen a mother sitting at her door on a summer afternoon, laying her sewing down that she might enjoy the sight of her children at play, and I have said to myself: 'Something like the joy of that mother is the joy of God'. I know a poet who made a song on the happiness of poor children at their first day of play in spring. All the winter they were shut up in their homes for want of shoes. But now, the winter was past and the sun shining and the air warm. And 'the bairnies', barefooted, but happy, 'were out on the pavement again'. The poet watches them as they skip and dance and play. He enjoys their joy. It is real gladness to him that

There were shoeless feet have forgotten their pain
As they walk in the sun on the pavement again.

And oftener than once, when reading that song, I have said: 'Something like this must be the joy of God as He looks down on the same sight'.

II. Purpose of Play.—I want you next to understand why God has made play a part of your life. For one thing, He wants you to be strong. He has work waiting in the years to come for every boy and girl on the earth. And although it is not all the same kind of work, all of it is work which will want strength for the doing. Therefore He will not have you always at tasks. He has divided the time for tasks with times for play. And he has made it a joy to you to be at play. He will have you out in the open air. He will have you drink in the breath of the sea and of the moorland when you can. He will have head and throat and arms and limbs and inside and outside of you bathed and fanned by every passing breeze. And by your games He will have your body in endless motion. You shall run and not be weary. You shall leap and dance and race and climb, so that every part of you may be made strong for the work that lies before you in life.

For another thing, God wants you to have a happy gateway into life. Nobody can tell beforehand whether your after life shall be happy. But God in His love has secured that the time of play shall be happy. I look back to that time in my own life. I would not, for a whole world, have it taken out of my life. It is the same with almost every one. The time of childhood which you are in now, when your companions and you romp and run and fill up your days with games, will become a memory to you when you are old, which shall be worth more to you than thousands of gold and silver. I have heard old people telling the story of their happy childhood. The world was all fair to them then. Their hearts leaped up when they saw a rainbow in the sky. The stars, the hills, the sands and waves of the sea, the running streams, the woods, the open parks in cities, the very streets themselves were a wonder and a delight to them. Those were the days when every day seemed like Joshua's for length, and when a year looked like a stretch of the eternal years. So wonderful, so fresh, so full of delight were those days and the happy play enjoyed in them, that one looking back upon them once could only tell out the delight of them by saying, 'Trailing clouds of glory do we come, from God who is our home'.

There is one more reason I should like to mention why God has made play a part of your life. He wants to train you to be fair and just, cheerful and unselfish. In games you are joined together, just as we who are old are in our toils. The playground is a little world. And you cannot have pleasure in any of its games unless you try to have the others playing with you as happy as yourself. You have to learn to forget self. You have to try to consider the wishes of others. To be unkind, or unjust, or unfair, or ungenerous in a game is to spoil it, or bring it to an end. Even to be ill-tempered and sulky is to spoil a game. Perhaps you never thought that the Lord Jesus has left us a word about children sulking in their play. But He has. He liked to see children at play. And it was a pain to Him when they sulked and spoiled the game. There was a play in His time that He often looked at in the market-places, and perhaps in His boyhood took part in. It required two companies: the one, of children pretending to be a marriage company; the other, of children who had fifes and harps and were a band of music. When the play went well, the marriage company stopped before the young musicians and danced to their music. Sometimes the game took a sad turn, and instead of a marriage it was a funeral. But all the same it was play. Now the Lord had seen the play spoiled because some of the children sulked. He had seen the vexation on the faces of the children who were willing to play, and had heard them complaining that they had played the wedding music and their companions had not danced, and the funeral music and they had not mourned.

But now I will bring my sermon on play to an end. I shall be glad if what I have said helps you to see God's love more clearly than before. The more we know of God, the more we see that He deserves our love. And surely this is a new rich addition to our knowledge of Him, when we discover that the same kind Father who gave His Son to die for us, that He might deliver us from sin and death, made the joy and play of boys and girls on the streets.—A. MACLEOD, The Children's Portion, p. 291.

CHRIST WOUNDED BY HIS FRIENDS

(For Good Friday)

'And one shall say unto Him, What are these wounds in Thine hands? Then He shall answer, Those with which I was wounded in the house of My friends.'—ZECHARIAH XIII. 6.

I THOUGHT you would like to-day to think only about Jesus Christ, and about the 'wounds' of Jesus Christ. You know why we should think about that to-day particularly.

Now what were the 'wounds' of Jesus Christ? Let us think about that first. I wonder how many there were. You know that cruel people crucified Him. Sometimes, when people were crucified, they had no 'wounds'. They were only tied with cords to the cross. That was one way of crucifying.

But when Jesus was crucified He was nailed to the cross. They ran the nails through His hands, and fastened each hand to the cross; and they ran the nails through His feet, and they nailed His feet to the cross. That made four 'wounds'.

And then you remember, that when the Roman soldiers came to break the legs of the three that were crucified, they found that Christ was dead already—so they did not break His legs; but one of them ran a spear into His side, near His heart, and there came out 'blood and water'. So that made five 'wounds'.

Four soldiers crucified Him—it was called a quaternion, and each, probably, took a hammer and a nail and drove it into His hands and feet, making four 'wounds'; and one came after, and ran his spear into his side, making the fifth 'wound'.

But there were more than five 'wounds'. He received the Roman scourging. The manner in which the Romans used to scourge was dreadful! I have no doubt His back bled very much.

And, besides that, He had a crown of thorns upon His head, and that probably pierced His temples. So He had 'wounds' in His head.

Was that all? Oh, no! I do not think that was the worst part. I think He had worse 'wounds' than these; 'wounds' in His feelings, 'wounds' in His heart. You remember that Solomon says (Prov. xviii. 14), 'The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity: but a wounded spirit who can bear?'

Now how much our dear Saviour had to 'wound' His heart! Think of all the unkind and cruel things that were said to Him. But I do not think that they hurt Him. I think he was grieved more on account of the sins of the poor people that said them. He said, 'Do not weep for Me, but weep for yourselves'. It was the thought of their sins that made Him so sad.

Who gave Him all those 'wounds'? Can you think? The four Roman soldiers? They drove in the nails, but they would not have done so if they had not been told. Who told them? Pontius Pilate. Thus Pontius Pilate made those 'wounds'. But Pontius Pilate would not have done it if the Jews had not wished it. Poor wretched man! he tried to please everybody. He did not wish to crucify Christ, but he was a weak-minded man; and weak-minded people are always cruel. He did it because the Jews wished it. Therefore the Jews sent Pontius Pilate to do it; and Pontius Pilate sent the soldiers; and the soldiers did it.

But who sent the 'wounds' into His heart? Almost everybody who was there. Poor Peter did. When he denied Him three times, he must have made three great 'wounds'. And I am sure Judas, when he betrayed Him, made a great 'wound'. And all the disciples when they ran away, must all have made great 'wounds'.

Were they 'friends'? All of them. Do not you remember that all the Jews were particularly His 'friends'? How kind He had been to all the Jews! He had placed them in a beautiful country, and taken great care of them. But see how his 'friends' received Him. Read John i. 11, 'He came unto His own, and His own received Him not!' He calls them 'His own'. All these dear Jews He loved as 'His own'. And yet they 'wounded' Him.

I am sure Peter was His 'friend'. He took him with Him even when He would not take anybody else. He was His great 'friend'.

Was Judas His 'friend'? Yes, he was twice called His 'friend'. Look at Psalm xli. 9—it is about Judas—'Yea, mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread'—you know again and again He fed him; at the miracles of the loaves and at other times, he 'hath lifted up his heel against Me'. And now look at Matthew xxvi. 50—Jesus said to him, when he came to take Him in the garden, 'Friend, wherefore art thou come?'

So they were all 'friends' to Him. Is not that like the text?—'These wounds were those with which I was wounded in the house of My friends'.

But who gave those 'wounds' to Jesus? Really, not the soldiers—not Pilate—not the Jews—not Peter—not Judas—not all the disciples. What did then? Cannot you think?

God would not have let the Jews hurt Jesus merely to please them. No: there was something behind the hammer; something behind the four soldiers. What was it? 'Sin.' Sin brought the hammer; sin brought the nails; sin moved the hands that drove the nails. Sin did it.

What sin? Everybody's sin. Not merely the soldiers, but the sin of everybody in the world. Who then crucified Christ? Everybody in the world.

There was a little girl who knew very well what it was to be a 'friend of Jesus,' of whom I have read in the life of Dr. Morrison, missionary to China. She was a very little girl; and she slept in a little bed by herself in a large room, where there was also a great bed, in which nobody slept.

One night after she had gone to bed and was sleeping, there came to the house where she lived this great missionary, Dr. Morrison; and he said he had come to sleep there. As there was no other empty bed in the house, they put him in the great bed, beside the little bed where the little girl slept. She did not know he was there.

When she awoke very early in the morning, she saw him, and was much frightened at first, and then she said to him, 'Man, are you a friend of Christ?' And he replied, 'Yes, my dear, I hope I am.' And then she was not at all afraid. She knew what it was to be 'a friend of Jesus' herself, and it made her happy to be with one of His 'friends'.

You are the 'friends' of Jesus; but if you do what is wrong you 'wound' Jesus; and it is such a base, ungrateful, shocking thing, when a 'friend' gives us a 'wound!' Would you not think so if a 'friend,' one to whom you had always been very kind and good, were to give you a 'wound'—would you not call it a base, mean, dastardly thing?

Now, a great many in this church will know what I am going to tell you. There was a very great man once, called Julius Cæsar; he was excessively kind to his 'friends,' and he made a great many. When Julius Cæsar became a great man, Emperor of Rome, his 'friends' were jealous of him, and I will tell you what they did one day, when Cæsar went to the senate house as usual.

Some followed him there; and, as soon as Cæsar had sat down, one man, called Cimber, took hold of the bottom of his robe, pretending to love him; and began to supplicate him, holding him down on his seat; and, while doing so, there came up another man called Casca, and with his dagger, he gave him a wound in the neck. Cæsar sprang up against Casca; and immediately another man, called Cassius, came and plunged his dagger into Cæsar's breast. Being a strong and brave man, Cæsar flew at Cassius also; and, by fighting, probably he would have relieved himself from these, had not a third man, called Brutus, attacked him. Cæsar had been more kind to Brutus than any of his 'friends,' and when he saw him, he said, 'And thou too, O Brutus?' and immediately fell—he could fight no longer; he drew his mantle round him, and died, covered with wounds, twenty-three in number, all given him by his 'friends!' Thus Cæsar died in the senate house. Oh! how base were Cæsar's 'friends!'

But might not Jesus, from His throne in glory, look down upon this church, and say to you, 'And thou, my friend, whom I have treated as a child, dost thou wound me?'

I have seen a very little baby 'wound' Christ. A little baby in arms perhaps lifts up its little naughty arm in a passion, and strikes its nurse or mother. Now that little child does not know Jesus; but still I believe Jesus in heaven is grieved (if I may so speak) to see the naughty heart there is in that little baby so lately born. When it gets angry and strikes, even though it be a little baby, its sin 'wounds' Jesus.

But still more when it gets a little older. Suppose a boy or girl tells a lie. Now we never tell a lie without doing injury to some one, and besides, it breaks a commandment. Therefore a lie not only injures somebody in this world, but it runs a dagger into the Lord Jesus Christ. You 'crucify Him afresh'. You make a 'wound,' as far as you can, in His heart.

Or, I will suppose such a thing as any boy being disobedient to his own father or mother, or disrespectful to them, or saying something wrong to them. It goes like a poniard into the heart of the father and mother—they are deeply grieved; but that is not the worst part of it. It has gone through the parent's heart into the heart of Jesus—it is a 'wound' in the side of Jesus!

Now, suppose there are any cruel boys or girls who say something very spiteful, or tyrannical, or do something cruel; perhaps strike some little boy or girl. They hurt others; they hurt themselves; and they 'wound' Jesus. The blow you give, the cruel word you speak to another little boy or girl, goes through the heart, remember that; and it actually 'wounds' the Lord Jesus. These are 'the wounds that He receives in the house of His friends'.

But now I am going to tell you something very true—you make the 'wounds,' yet those 'wounds' heal. You are saved by what you make.

Now I want you to look a minute, with the eye of faith, within them. Look on the 'wounds' of Jesus—the five 'wounds'; and the 'wounds' on His forehead, and the 'wounds' on His dear back, and the 'wounds' in His precious heart—think of them! Now what are they to you? I am going to tell you three things they are to you.

The first is, they are to you a fountain—something comes from them. Will you look at John xix. 34. What came out of His side? 'Water and blood.' What for? To wash your sins away. You have 'wounded' Jesus—that is what God is so angry with you for, till you are forgiven. What displeases God more than anything else is, that you have 'wounded' Jesus, His dear Son; and the 'water and blood' came out of His 'wounds' to wash your soul from sin.

If you look at Zechariah xiii. 1, you will find it says, 'In that day there shall be a fountain opened to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for sin and for uncleanness'.

There was a little boy who one day had grieved his father by being disobedient; and his father was obliged to keep him at a distance. In the evening, he came to his father, and said, 'I am very sorry, papa; I hope you will forgive me'. He said, 'I will forgive you at once'. The little boy said, 'Now I am so happy; I can do my Latin and Greek with anybody now'. His father said, 'Stop! there is some one else grieved besides me. Christ has been grieved. You must go and ask Christ to forgive you.' 'Oh! father,' said he, 'do you think I could be so happy if I had not asked Him to forgive me? I went first to my own room, and asked Him to do so, and I think He has washed out my sin'. So he found the 'wounds' caused him a cure.

Further, they are a letter-bag. That is not my thought; but the thought of perhaps one of the most beautiful poets that ever lived—George Herbert. I should like you all to read and love his poems. One is called 'The Letter-Bag'. If you have not George Herbert's poems, I should be glad to lend them to you, or read them to you any Thursday morning.

I cannot repeat this poem now; but the idea is that of a traveller having come all the way from heaven to our world; and he describes how He was dressed, and all about it; and then he tells how the 'wound' was made in His side with a spear; and then he supposes this traveller (who is the Lord Jesus Christ) to say, 'I am going back to my own country, to heaven; and if you have anything to send there, I will take it—for I have a place here in my side, a 'wound'; and I will carry it safely to heaven, it shall lose nothing; but I will make it pleasant by adding a little to it, to the person to whom I am taking it'. So he calls it 'a letter-bag' where Christians are to put all their prayers and petitions, that are to go to heaven. Do you think they would ever reach heaven if it were not for those 'wounds'? So they are like a letter-bag, in which to put everything, and send it up to God for remembrance.

I will tell you of one thing more. These 'wounds' are a 'hiding-place'. I do not, of course, literally mean a hiding-place, but they are like one. Because Jesus was 'wounded,' we may go and be safe—safe in the love of that dear Saviour who was 'wounded' for us: there we may safely hide ourselves from all dangers and evils in this life, and from all peril in the day of judgment.—JAMES VAUGHAN.

JEWELS

'My jewels'.—MALACHI III. 17.

God's jewels are men and women, boys and girls. He has many others. The stars you see at night up in the sky, flashing with the light of ten thousand diamonds, are jewels upon His garments. But they are not His most precious jewels—the gems of His crown'.

There are three things about God's jewels which I wish to speak of:—

I. The Finding of the Jewel.—Look at the ring on your mother's finger. It is a beautiful hoop of fine gold; and see, there are five diamonds clasped in its delicate work. Where did the ring come from—that gold and these diamonds? I will tell you.

The diamonds came all the way from India or Brazil. They were found among earth and rocks. Men went down and wrought in the mines for them. They broke the rocks with hammers and picks, till they found a thin vein of earth, which they dragged out with long iron hooks and carried carefully away. They put it in long troughs, slightly inclined, and made a stream of water run over it, which gradually carried away all the mud, leaving only the stones and bits of rock. These they took up one by one, looking carefully to see if any of them were diamonds. Yes, look! there is a streak of light shot out from the heart of that one; it is a diamond. After lying for ages among the worthless earth and rocks, it is found and rescued by man's patient toil.

But where did the gold come from? From an African river. The river, swollen with tropical rains at its sources, came down, bearing with it all sorts of debris from the far-off mountains, and soil from the countries through which its floods had poured. The negroes had to flee away from its banks for their lives. But when the flood was over, they returned. They dug down through the mud left by the river, and carried the sand away. They washed it till nothing but the gravel was left, in which they then carefully looked for the shining grains of gold.

This is the way jewels are found. And God finds His in the same way. Just as the diamond and the gold are hidden among rocks and earth, mud and sand, and are only found by great labour and trouble, so God's jewels are lost and hidden among vile sins and earthly habits, and shut up in hard stony hearts; and it is with great trouble He discovers them. He sent His Son down out of heaven to seek His lost jewels; and He had to come and work in the muddy river-beds, and in the dark earth and rocky mines to find them.

In every man and woman there is one of God's jewels, however much it may be hidden, however firmly it may be enclosed in the rocks of sin. When you see a drunk man or woman going along the streets, when you see a beggar with ragged and dirty clothes, with a dissipated and sodden face, with a whole lifetime of sin displaying its marks on every feature, remember that even that is one of God's jewels. When you hear of heathens far away who are vile savages, the slaves of every sin, remember these are yet God's jewels.

II. The Fashioning of the Jewel.—Look at the ring again. I have told you where it comes from. But nobody could wear the gold as it comes out of the mine. It has to go through many processes first. The diamond goes to the lapidary. He takes it, and with a great number of delicate but very strong instruments cuts it into the right shape. It is extremely hard, so hard that nothing can cut it but another diamond. And he has diamond-sand, which he must use with all his instruments to make them pierce it. Its surface is cut into a number of little squares or triangles—facets they are called—which make a splendid play of colours, although the diamond itself is as pure and transparent as water.

The gold goes to the goldsmith. He has first to separate it from the earth and other things, such as silver and copper, which he finds mixed with it. He does this by washing it with water, by applying different kinds of acids and other chemical substances to it, and by burning it in the fire. Then he has to mix it with other metals to make it hard enough to be wrought. When all is ready, he puts it into the fire and makes it soft enough either to be poured into a mould, which he has ready for it, or to be bent by his hammer on a little anvil. He taps it with the hammer, and grasps it in the vice, and bites it with the file, and rubs and polishes it, till at last it is ready to receive the diamonds, which he then carefully fits into their places. And so at last it is a jewel, fashioned by the cunning skill and the patient work of the master.

Now God has to fashion His jewels too. Jesus finds them and snatches them out of their sins; but they are not yet fit to be worn by God. He has to give them over to a most skilful Artificer, who purifies and polishes them, and forms them into jewels fit for God to wear. This is the Holy Ghost. I cannot at present explain all the ways in which He does this work, or all the instruments He uses. I dare say you have been surprised in a jeweller's shop to notice the number of little hammers and files and drills, and you have wondered what they were all for. But the Holy Spirit uses a far greater variety of means to fashion God's jewels. Let me mention only two of them.

1. Water.—I have shown you how water is used to cleanse the diamond and the gold. What is the water which the Holy Ghost uses? If you turn up and read Ephesians v. 25-27, you will see. It is the Word. When people who are God's jewels read His Word, and when they hear it preached, it purifies and polishes them. For it shows them the hateful-ness of their sin, so that they put it away; and it shows them some grace or virtue which they do not yet possess, and they begin to long and pray till they get it, and it shines as a new beauty in their character.

2. Fire.—The goldsmith uses fire, as I have told you, to melt the gold, either when he wants it to run into a particular mould or when he wants to bend it into a particular shape. Now what is the fire the Holy Spirit uses? It is affliction. I have to call on a great many people who are afflicted, and they often tell me that they never would have been Christians if God had not afflicted them. Their hearts before were as hard as a piece of iron. But affliction melted them, and then they flowed into God's mould.

III. The Wearing of the Jewel.—But at last the work is complete. The jewel is all ready now. Once it was away down in the black, filthy mine. Now its shape is lovely, its beauty is perfect. It is a ring to adorn a beautiful finger, or an ear-ring to hang on a lovely ear, or a bracelet to flash on a shining arm, or a crown to grace the brow of a king.

So, after all the work of Christ in finding them, and all the work of the Holy Spirit in fashioning them, the jewels of God are fit at last to be worn. Kings and great people who have many jewels keep most of them locked past; but on great occasions, such as a coronation day, they bring them all out. So there is a day coming when God is to gather together all His jewels and wear them before all eyes. It is the last day. Then God will bring forth His jewels; He will gather them from the east and the west, from the north and the south, and wear them all. Then all His saints, from every age, and from every clime, all who have ever loved him, will be gathered round him. How they will shine! How He will be made glorious in them!

People wear jewels for two reasons: first, for the beauty of them; and secondly, to show their own wealth. So on that day God will rejoice in the beauty of His jewels. They will be beautiful without and within. If you be there, you will be beautiful in your clothing, beautiful in your faces, and beautiful in your souls. Sometimes in this world people are beautiful to look on outside; but if you could look within them, they are as ugly as can be; their souls are little and deformed, and defiled with pride and envy and falsehood. On the other hand, there are persons who have beautiful souls—pure and gentle, simple and affectionate; but their faces are plain or their bodies are deformed. But God's jewels will then be equally beautiful within and without. Yet they will all be different, and there will be millions of them together! They will be like a glorious galaxy of stars.

But God will rejoice in them chiefly as a display of His wealth. He has all sorts of wealth. But the wealth He is proudest of is the wealth of love. And just as a king's jewels show his wealth in money, so will the redeemed show God's wealth in love. No other jewels which He has can display His love as that gathering will.—JAMES STALKER, The New Song, p. 131.

JEWELS

'My jewels.'—MALACHI III. 17.

I. Jewels are Precious.—Of all earthly things they are the most costly. Many of the most famous gems are worth a king's ransom. The Koh-i-noor, or 'Mountain of Light,' which glitters in our Queen's diadem, is valued at £250,000; the 'Regent' diamond was sold to Louis XV. of France for £130,000, and is now said to be worth twice that sum; while the history of the Orloff diamond, the most brilliant gem in the Russian crown, is quite a romance in itself. It was once the eye of an idol in India, but a Frenchman who saw it made a glass eye to resemble it, and put it in the place of the diamond, with which he ran away. Finding his treasure a burden, he sold it to a ship's captain for £2000; the captain brought it to Europe, and sold it for £20,000; and after many changes it came at last into the hands of a diamond merchant, who sold it to the Empress Catherine, through Count Orloff, for £90,000 in money, a yearly pension of £4000, and a peerage of the Empire. These of course are world-famed jewels, and there are few to be compared with them. But there is no need to take such startling illustrations of the value of precious stones. Even gems of small size are of great worth, and far above gold for preciousness. You all know the value of a sovereign; a diamond of the same size would be worth thousands of the gold pieces. So, when God calls us His jewels, we see that He must prize us very much. He esteems us worth His care; He holds us very dear; He cherishes us with unspeakable love. And when we do wrong, and stoop to low and mean practices, it grieves Him, as the Queen would be grieved to see the precious gems of her diadem rolling in the gutter.

II. But there are Many Sham Jewels.—Whatever is valuable is sure to have counterfeits. Our gold and silver coins are imitated in inferior metals; and there are people who make a living by issuing these bad coins. The shopkeeper generally tries the ring of your sovereign upon the counter before he gives you change, lest he should be cheated. So are jewels imitated. Preparations of rock crystal or very fine glass are tinted with the needed hue, and deceive the keenest sight. Paste diamonds cannot be told from real ones by anything in their appearance. There was a celebrated Genoese vase which for hundreds of years was thought to be a real emerald. On one occasion it was pledged for £30,000, so great was its supposed value. And, after all, it was discovered to be nothing but coloured glass. It looked like an emerald; but when the file was applied the cheat was discovered. In other cases some sharp acid is used to detect the real nature of the seeming gem. Now, people who make believe to be good are like sham jewels. They are called hypocrites, or actors. They are playing a part and pretending to be what they are not. Very often the motive which prompts them is the desire to be thought well of and honoured by men. They make a fair show in the flesh, though their inner life is unrenewed.

It is easy enough to do right when the right is pleasant and delightful. To do right when you are laughed at or threatened tries of what stuff you are made.

III. Most Jewels Need Polishing.—Precious stones are chiefly found in veins of the rocks or in the gravel of rivers. They are generally rough and shapeless in their natural state, and have little beauty that we should desire them. The brilliancy of the diamond is hidden under a hard dull crust. The blushing red of the ruby, the soft clear green of the emerald, and the velvet hue of the sapphire are not displayed to advantage until the lapidary has exercised his skill upon them. There is no comparison between the dull shapeless stone and the sparkling gem in point of beauty and worth. If the stones could speak, I dare say they would complain sorely of ill-usage, as they are being cut, and ground, and polished. But the result pays for all. Now, is not this a parable of the sweet uses of adversity? As Archbishop Leighton said: 'God hath many sharp-cutting instruments and rough files for the polishing of His jewels, and those He especially loves and means to make the most resplendent He hath oftenest His tools upon'. All the pains and sorrows God sends us are intended to make us holier, purer, and more radiant with 'the beauty of holiness'. I don't suppose you feel the need of this lesson yet. Childhood is happily sheltered from the cares and anxieties of later life. But I want you to make provision against the evil day. Take this thought home to your hearts, whatever befalls you comes from God; and when His discipline is most painful, it ministers to our highest good. As Shakespeare says, 'Tis a physic that's bitter to sweet end'. We are His jewels; and He polishes us that we may shine the more. But—

IV. All Jewels do not Need the Same Treatment.—The diamond is a very hard stone. In ancient times it was supposed to be too hard for cutting. And though it has been discovered that one diamond may be used to cut another, and that the diamond may be ground and polished in its own dust, the process is still very long and tedious. First of all the stone is firmly cemented to a piece of wood in the required position; then it is held against a rapidly revolving wheel, to which a mixture of diamond dust and olive oil has been applied. When one face of the diamond is finished, the cement is warmed and the stone taken out and fixed in a different position. This is repeated until the diamond is polished on every side. The work lasts for days; and weeks; sometimes it occupies years. With the emerald it is very different. When taken from the mines it is soft enough to crumble when rubbed or pressed, and so is very easily cut into the required shape. The onyx, again, is exceedingly hard and difficult to polish. There are great water-mills in Germany where this stone is dressed. The wheels are six or seven feet high, and the workman lies at full length upon a bench, with his feet pressed against two supports, so that he may hold the stone more firmly against the whirling wheel. But, on the other hand, pearls require but little grinding or polishing. Many of them are perfect, and only a few of them are rough and badly shaped. So that there is a great difference in the treatment required by various precious gems. This may help us to see why some people have so much more trouble than others. God deals with us each in the way that will bring out his character best. It is not that He favours some at the expense of others. He assigns to each the discipline which will suit his case. And sometimes those who are dealt with most severely may be like the diamond and ruby—among the choicest of his gems when the process of cutting and polishing is ended.

V. Jewels are Fittingly Set.—Some of them are fixed in golden rings, others adorn glittering bracelets, others shine in diadems, others are strung in necklaces. But they are not cut and polished for nothing. Each is placed where it can shine, and where its beauty can be seen. So, too, are God's jewels destined for a lofty place in heaven. All the discipline of life is intended to fit us for our sphere above. No harm can befall them that love and serve God. They are His peculiar treasure, and He will set them in his royal diadem, to 'shine as the stars for ever and ever'. 'They shall be Mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up My jewels.' Are we among those who are counted as the jewels of the Most High?—G. HOWARD JAMES, Talks to Young Folk, p. 141.

OUR SUN

'Unto you that fear My name shall the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in His wings.'—MALACHI IV. 2.

I. The Sun.—Of all the things the eye can see the most Christ-like is the sun, for he is quite alone in our world. Nor rival, nor helper, nor partner has he. Before him all lesser lights pale and pass away. We have many stars, but only one sun, whose 'absence gives them leave to shine'. And all light is in and from the sun. All this beautifully represents the Light of Life, the Light of men. He eclipses all other lights, but can be eclipsed by none. He has extinguished the lamp of the Temple, whose light was merely the shadow of His coming. Yet even this glorious image fails in some ways; for the sun has its dark spots, but in Christ our sun is no darkness at all.

And the sun is the centre of all the worlds.—Every star is held in its place by the attractive power of the sun, and so the world is kept from ruin. And such a central place and controlling power belong to the Sun above the sun. The spirit that breaks away from Him is as a wandering star plunging into the eternal darkness.

Then the sun is the grand giver in this world.—Our thoughts wax warm as we sum up all the benefits with which he fills our earth. You cannot overstate them. But for his rays earth were one graveyard. The flowers of the field, as well as your eyes, borrow all their freshness and lustre from him. The fire that warms you, and the gas that gives you light, owe all their genial force to sunbeams shut up in trees ages ago, and now set free for your service. All earth's beauty is but the returning of the sun's smile. Science is every year finding fresh wonders in sunlight. All kinds of force come from the sun. Light must be ever moving and giving: when light stands still it loses its nature. One of the latest discoveries is, that ether in motion is light, and the same ether at rest is darkness. It is thus the sun's nature and life to give with boundless bounty. He gives just as you breathe: for him to be is to shine, and to shine is to give, and to give is to remain as rich as ever. He is also a most gracious giver. He shines on us not because this dull earth attracts or invites him: the sole reason of his shining is in himself. What an unwearied, ungrudging, impartial giver!—fit emblem of Christ Jesus.

The Church above, the moon below,
A wondrous race they run;
But all their lustre, all their glow,
Each borrows from its sun.

Christ is the Sun of righteousness; but why not the Sun of love, or of grace? Note well this strange name. As the sun gives according to a never-changing law, so Christ blesses only in a righteous way. He will not, He cannot heal us save by righteousness. God's equal Son, He is love, for He is our Sun; and He is light, for He is the Sun of righteousness. The grace He brings 'reigns by righteousness'.

II. The Sunrising.—To us it is matter not of prophecy but of history. The Sun has arisen; and here again the image fails to set forth all, for He has risen never to set. The first rays are seen in the Gospels, and after the dark eclipse on the cross, the rising was complete when Christ left the grave. Sunrise is probably the grandest sight in the world. In the East it is so magnificent as almost for the moment to make one a Parsee—a worshipper of the rising sun. One Swiss mountain, the Righi, gives a fine view of sunrise, and so myriads from all lands flock to it every year; and a railway has been made to the very top, though it is more than 5000 feet high. Now, what is the great sight that rewards that crowd of early risers? The rising sun makes perfectly plain what was previously hidden. Hill, valley, and lake that were a confused mass, are now all distinctly seen. The light undecives, and reveals a charming scene. At its touch the whole land bursts into beauty. The snowy mountains glow like burnished gold. The chilled spectator is warmed; he sees, admires, and rejoices. The Sun of righteousness does more than all that in the world of the soul. He has driven away the chilling shadows of night, and poured a full light over the whole realm of Divine truth. He shows us things as they really are. Life and immortality are brought to light. What a panorama lies before us as the shadows retreat! The glorious land afar off stands boldly out to faith's eye, and Beulah's mountain tops appear.

Light is the oldest thing in the world; but on the fourth day of creation God gathered together all the scattered rays that had been quivering in the air, and made the sun, with the moon and stars to reflect its light. And so, some one has said, in the fulness of time, after four thousand years—a day is with the Lord as a thousand years—all the rays that had appeared in the Old Testament were united in Christ Jesus our Sun; and then God made the Church to be fair as the moon, and Christ's people as the stars to give forth His light. Thus Malachi was in the twilight, and you are in the daylight. To him the sun was beneath the horizon, sure harbinger of the wished-for day, shooting many a ray into the darkness, sending forth many a bright streak over the mountains. The first streak came to him from Eden. The Psalms would send forth many bright beams to him, and the fifty-third of Isaiah, and many other passages which you could name. You may wonder how Old Testament saints lived such holy lives when they had only a fraction of your knowledge of Christ. A very recent discovery about sunshine may illustrate this. Sunshine has two kinds of rays: the visible, which have most light; and the invisible, which have most heat. A yellow glass lets in all the light-giving rays, and shuts out nearly all the life-giving ones; but some dark blue glasses let in scarcely any light, and yet let in all the living energy in the sunrays. You may thus have light without life, and much life with little light. Thus a well-understood Gospel may be to some as an Arctic sun, shining everywhere, melting nowhere. And thus Old Testament saints and simple souls among ourselves—believing cottagers and children—may have minds like the dark blue glass. Though they take in little light, they may take in that strange something, that quickening soul in the sunbeam which gives life, and life more abundantly; and may thus excel the learned in every Christian grace.

III. The Blessings Christ Brings to Men.—As the sun destroys only darkness and its hateful brood, so Christ destroys only our miseries, and brings us all blessings. And first, healing. Have you ever watched the sun rising behind a thick cloud or a hill? Were not its rays then very like the outspread wings of a bird? The pencils of light were like feathers whose unequal lengths readily suggested a wing. They branched out equally on both sides, and showed a wing-like curve. Pictures of the sun often have this wing-like look. The Easterns often carved a winged sun above the gateways of their temples, and

I have seen the same ornament on one public building in our country. Malachi has a poet's quick eye for the glories of nature, and perhaps this also was in his mind—the sun rises like a bird, with equal wings wide enough to cover the world: he is not like a big bird, whose level, heavy flight is winged in the lower regions of the air; but, eagle-like, he soars upwards above the hills, above the mountains, swift, self-poised, unwearyed. The Greeks gave a chariot and horses to the sun, as a symbol of his speed; Malachi gives him wings. So we read elsewhere of 'the wings of the morning,' and 'the wings of the wind'. Or perhaps the shimmering sunrays reminded him of the mother-bird hovering over her young, and all her feathers shivering with fond affection. Which-ever of these explanations we like best, Malachi's meaning is, that as sunlight brings health to a diseased, dying world, so Christ brings health to our diseased, dying souls; and this healing virtue comes to us with all the ease, swiftness, gentleness, and freshness of morning sunshine.

To healing and health Christ adds victory.—For verse third says, 'And ye shall tread down the wicked'. The Mexicans inquired of their priests whether Cortes and his Spaniards were gods or mortal men. 'They are the children of the sun,' was the reply, 'from whom they draw all their strength, but they have no power in the darkness.' And so the Mexicans attacked them at midnight and nearly destroyed them all. That night is still known in the history of Spain as noce triste, 'the sad night'. You at least are a child of the sun, whence you gain all your strength. If you walk in darkness you shall fall before the onset of your great foe, the prince of darkness. Walk always in the light, and there shall be no 'sad night' in your spiritual history.—JAMES WELLS, Bible Images, p. 129.

ST. MATTHEW

THE WONDERFUL GUIDE

'Optima revelatio stella.'

'We saw His star.'—MATTHEW II. 2.

THIS motto contains a kind of punning reference to the name of the family that bears it, and also alludes to their crest, which in this case is a star. The family is that of Reveley, which, you see, corresponds in sound to part of the middle word of the three. The text that I have given you points, I suppose, to the source from which the motto itself is derived. It occurs in one of the most beautiful of the many lovely and suggestive stories that cluster round the cradle of Jesus.

There are no more picturesque figures in the imagination of the early Church than those of the three wise men who came from the far East. They were typical of how one day not only all nations, but all the wisdom of this world, was to bow at the feet of Jesus. They came from a long distance, no one knew quite whence, and they had followed a strange and wonderful guide, no revealing voice, but a brilliant steady star. Are there stars for us to follow? We cannot look for them to appear suddenly in the heavens as the wise men saw theirs, but if this motto means anything, it implies that there are such stars, which may be guides to our feet.

I. One noticeable point about the star the wise men followed was, that it led them to Jesus. The stars that may be the guides of our life are what men call 'ideals'. Now, perhaps that word is not quite an easy one for you to understand, but it really means pure, high, and noble aims. Every boy and girl builds what we call 'castles in the air'. They form fancies about their future life—one is going to be an artist, another a poet, another a nurse, another a doctor, another a minister, another a soldier: they discuss all these with the greatest gravity, and regard them as of the highest importance. Sometimes their ideals are very strange. They are like the little boy, perhaps, in Stevenson's poem of the 'Lampighter', who thought that the finest occupation in the world:—

Now Tom would be a lawyer, and Maria go to sea;
And my papa's a banker, and as rich as he can be,
But I, when I am stronger, and can choose what I'm to do,
O Leerie,<sup>1</sup> I'll go round at nights, and light the lamps with you.

But in spite of all their quaintness these children's fancies are of the greatest value, they often mould our life much more deeply than older people think. We cherish them within our hearts, and we do not let them go, though if people make fun of them we may cease to speak about them. They remain our own secrets, and are all the more precious because of their secrecy. Many times they are God's messengers to us, to show what He wants us to be and to do; they point out the way for us whereby God will lead us to render Him the best service we can in the coming years. Men think they explain them when they call them by such long names as 'indications of hereditary talent,' 'artistic temperament,' and so forth, but it is much better for us to think of them as God's stars, and never to lose sight of the true and noble ones, for they will bring us to the place we desire.

A friend of mine was early one morning walking along a path in an Indian forest. Suddenly he became aware, in front of him, of a Brahmin priest walking along the same path. He knew it would not be courteous to pass him. The priest was engaged in chanting verses from his sacred writings. My friend knew the words, and presently joined in the responses. Then the priest began to extemporise, as was the manner of his people, and in this strange kind of chant a conversation was carried on. The missionary began to tell him of a great friend of his own, some one who was so wise and good and helpful and great that He always was able and ready to aid those who loved Him. 'You must show me Him, you must bring me to Him,' cried the Brahmin. 'I cannot show you Him,' was the answer, 'but if you speak to Him with your own heart He will hear you and will show you Himself.' 'I understand,' said the priest; 'that is what my sacred books tell me—henceforth I will meditate only upon Jesus, and my heart will commune with Him.' Can you doubt that along the lines of his own thought the Lord had really come to this faithful seeker? So I say to you, follow those things which are best and purest, so far as you know and understand them. Let your noblest impulses guide you, your most loving thoughts prompt you, and be true always to the best that is within you, and you will find Jesus.

II. Another thing about the journey of these wise men is, that when once they saw the star they followed it faithfully. Had they turned aside at the first difficulty, or when beset by discouragements and dangers, they had never found their way to Bethlehem; so when we set out on this quest of the best and highest that life holds, we must not permit ourselves to turn aside for any lower consideration. We shall, most certainly, be often laughed at, and there will be many ready to dissuade us from the line of conduct we have chosen, but if we are only brave enough to persevere we shall find our endeavour crowned with the highest and truest success.

III. The last thought that I wish to impress upon you is—that these men saw a star only, yet it was enough for them. There are some words in the story that I always delight to read: ‘When they saw the star,’ it says, ‘they rejoiced with exceeding great joy.’ Such gladness filled their hearts because the star they had been following at last stood still over the place where the Child lay. For us there is not only the star and the Child that they saw: but we know the Child grew up to be the boy Jesus at Nazareth, to be the Man of healing and helping in Galilee and in Judea, to be the Man of Sorrows who suffered on the cross, and to be the Man at God’s right hand who, Victor over sin and death, remembers and prays for us.—G. CURRIE MARTIN, Great Mottos with Great Lessons, p. 175.

THE STAR OF BETHLEHEM

‘When they had heard the king, they departed; and, lo, the star, which they saw in the east, went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was.
 ‘When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy.
 ‘And when they were come into the house, they saw the young child with Mary His mother, and fell down, and worshipped Him: and when they had opened their treasures, they presented unto Him gifts; gold, and frankincense, and myrrh.’
 —MATTHEW II. 9-11.

I. WHAT made these wise men go to Jerusalem? A dream, was it? Or did somebody come and tell them to go? God taught them, and put it into their minds and hearts to go, we know not how. We never go truly—no one ever goes truly to seek Jesus, till God puts it into the heart. All good thoughts and desires after Jesus are from God. They said, ‘We have seen His star.’ They saw a star. You often saw a star, and I suppose often said:—

Twinkle, twinkle, little star,
 How I wonder what you are.

But this was a very curious star. God hung up in the sky many other stars, but this star was different from them all—it moved, and the others remained as they were. The wise men, perhaps, heard some one say—‘Mark that star that moves, and follow it till it stands over the Saviour.’ Perhaps their wives and children, with their friends, were surprised at their looking so much at the star, and then at their leaving home and following it. Perhaps they said—‘Why do you look at it so, and follow it? Oh, surely you will not leave us, and go after a star; we may never see you more.’ They may have answered—‘We will follow that star wherever it leads us; God bids us do so, and we will obey Him, whatsoever wives, and children, or neighbours may say or think’. On they went over hill and dale, till they reached Jerusalem, and inquired—‘Where is He that is born King of the Jews?’ ‘When Herod the King heard these things he was troubled, and all Jerusalem with him.’ He was a bad man. To be troubled when persons are seeking for Jesus is the sign of a bad heart. If he had been a good man, he would have said—‘Welcome, welcome to Jerusalem, as ye come to ask about the King of the Jews’. But naughty people do not like to hear about, nor talk about the Saviour. They will speak at breakfast, and dinner, and tea, almost about anything and anyone, rather than about Jesus and His salvation.

II. How did these wise men find out where Jesus was? How could the people tell them where He should be born? How could they know that He was to come at all? I am sure some of you know how they found it all out. They found it out in the same way that everything else about Jesus is known. Was it by the dictionary? No. Was it by the History of England? No; but by the Bible. Every boy and girl should have a Bible, and ought to be able to say—‘This is my Bible, and this is my name in it; I can find out in it all I want to know about Jesus, and about the way to heaven’. It was by the Word of God that they knew where Jesus should be born. ‘Then Herod, when he had privily called the wise men, inquired of them diligently what time the star appeared. And he sent them to Bethlehem, and said, ‘Go and search diligently for the young child, and when ye have found Him, bring me word again, that I may come and worship Him also’. ‘That I may come and worship Him also.’ That was a lie; though a king, he was a liar. He did not want to worship Him—he wanted to kill Jesus. He thought within himself, ‘If I find out the time when He was born, then I will know how old He is, and I will kill all the children of that age; thus I will be sure to kill Him too. But God would not allow him to kill Jesus. He was wicked enough to desire to do so; for wicked people wish to do a great many bad things to God’s children, but God does not always allow them. God takes great care of our little children, and why should He not take care of His only-begotten Son?’

I remember reading a story of a baby—a wee child—that travelled by railroad. Away whirled the coach very fast; but it soon knocked against something, and all were thrown out—men, women, mothers and babes. Some were pitched here, some there; heads were broken; hands cut off. In the midst of the confusion a voice was heard crying: ‘Where is my baby? Oh! my dear baby! I cannot find him anywhere. Did nobody see my sweet baby? What shall I do?’ One man lost his leg; another his hand; another his eye; but the mother did not mind them, but was going about wringing her hands, and crying: ‘Where is my baby?’ After much search for it, and for a great while in vain, at length a man went over to a place where was a handbox. He took up the handbox, and what do you think he found under it? The baby fast asleep! Now, if God takes care of common babies, surely He would take care of His own child Jesus.

I remember reading a story about some little boys who went to a river near the sea on which was a boat, and when they were playing there, one said, ‘I will go into the boat’. ‘So will I,’ said Tommy; ‘So will I,’ said Charley; ‘And I,’ said Billy; ‘And I,’ said Patsey. Seven or eight of them went into it.

They jumped about, and played, and laughed heartily. The boat was not fastened, and as the tide ebbed it carried out the boat gently. The little boys went on laughing and playing and telling stories, and out farther still went the boat; and the more the waters were retiring, the farther from the land they carried out the boat. The poor little boys, when they looked at the boat and saw that they were going out to sea, knew not what to do. One was tired, and another was hungry, and all were afraid. At last they all got close together, and laid themselves down at the bottom of the boat, and being tired fell fast asleep. The evening came on, and the boat was still going out to sea. Then night set in and no little boys came home to their mothers. One poor mother came to the shore, looking everywhere and asking every one, 'Where is my Bill?'—and another said, 'Did you see Charley?'—and another, 'Where is my Tom?'—'Oh! did you see my Pat anywhere?' They ran up and down the strand, and round about the town, looking everywhere, asking every one, and crying. The bellman was sent out, and the poor mothers thought that all their children were lost, and they could not eat or sleep without their little ones. A fisherman who was out at sea saw a boat moving very queerly on the water. 'What can that be?' said he, 'no one is steering—no one is rowing it—what is it? I must go and see.' So he pulled away as fast as he could till he came up to it. Then, what do you think he saw? Seven or eight little boys fast asleep, huddled together in the bottom of the boat keeping each other warm, like little birds in a nest. Who took care of them? God—the good and great God. They were foolish children to go into the boat without leave; but God took care of them and brought them back safe to their friends.

I remember reading a story of a little child who had found Jesus. She was sick, and in bed. One day her mother heard a great noise in her room; she ran in, asking, 'My child, what is the matter?' 'Oh! mother, I am singing, singing about Jesus.' 'Why are you singing so loud, my child?' 'Because I am so happy, mother.' This little girl, though she could not go to seek for money, found a treasure in Jesus, and was glad she had found Him—the pearl of great price. She had found riches that made her heart sing for joy, and when she grew worse and worse, and more and more sick, a loud noise was heard again, and she was heard to say, 'Father, take me; Father, take me'. Her father went in and said, 'What ails you, my child?' 'It was not you I called; it was my Heavenly Father; my Father above; my great and good Father. It was my Father in heaven I was asking to take me.' When people find Jesus, it makes them very happy; it makes them sing loud and long, and praise Him with a tongue sweet as silver; for they regard God as their Father, and heaven as their home.

III. The wise men presented gifts to Jesus, and so should you. I read of a poor blind girl, who brought thirty shillings to a person collecting for the missionaries. The man said, 'That is too much for you'. 'No, sir,' she said; 'I save that much by being blind. I can work in the night as well as in the day. If I had my sight, I would have to pay for candles to work at night, so I give the thirty shillings to tell poor sinners about Jesus.' I also read of a little boy, who, when the man went round to collect at the meeting, put a bag on the plate—a great bag twice as heavy as my Bible—and, when they examined it, what do you think they found in the bag? Two hundred and eighty-five farthings. His mother used to send him with messages, and when she gave him money to pay her bills, she allowed him to keep the farthings for himself. When he got them altogether he put them in a bag, and gave them for the missionaries.

IV. Is there anything like that star to show you the way to Jesus? I know something like it, very like it. It has a great number of stories in it, and children are fond of stories. We tire of some stories when we hear them often, but we never tire of the story of peace. What is that story? The thing of which I speak will tell you a great deal about the sun, and the moon, and the stars—about the air, and the water, the birds and beasts. It cannot talk or walk, but it can inform you of a lovely place that once was—a place where was no sorrow, no sickness, no sin—a place where the lions were quiet, quite tame—where you might pat a tiger, and rub an eagle down the back. Would you not like to have that thing, that great thing, to tell you all this and much more? What is it? What do you think it is? The Bible. Yes, that is the Star of Bethlehem now. The Bible is like that star, and shows us the way to Jesus. If we follow its directions—if we mind what it says we will find Jesus, and if we find Him we should also worship Him, and present Him our best gifts.—JOHN GREGG, Sermons to Children p. 209.

TEMPTATION

MATTHEW IV.

TEMPTATION is not sin. Christ Himself was tempted, yet was He without sin. Temptation becomes sin when the arms open to receive it. Every sword-stroke is not a wound. The stroke becomes a wound when the blade pierces the armour-plates. So with temptation. If it but ring against the armour all is well. If it cut through it has a poisoned blade. Temptation is not sin. Rather if it be rightly used it is a lesson-book. Life has few teachers like temptation. One temptation bravely met is worth the reading of a hundred books.

I. For in the first place temptation shows us what we are. If life were all sunshine, every lad would be a hero. But when the clouds gather, and the thunders clap, we see the cowards then. The battered hulk sails gallantly on the summer sea. But blow! thou winter's blast, and the rotten timbers part like matchwood. That house built in July—do not be sure of it till March has come and gone. So with the soul, the life. I ask not how it fares in summer weather. I want to see it in temptation. That is the hour of revelation, of insight, of knowledge. Alone with your temptation, what are you then? That is the question. Every temptation is a judgment hour. Had Jericho been a poorhouse, Achan might have died an honoured soldier. Had Potiphar been a widower, we could all have been pure Josephs. But Achan, Joseph, you and I, all stand in our true selves in temptation's hour. Blessed knowledge. Blessed bitter experience! To get one glimpse of what we really are.

II. And then too temptation is like pain. It shows us that danger is about. Pain and temptation! both are great mysteries; and yet rob life of them, and life is robbed of two clear trumpet-notes that tell of danger. If you are never tempted, Jesus have mercy on you! Not to be tempted at all would be life's fearfullest temptation. Here is a man whose foot is in an agony. The pain is terrible, piteous. But in a month we return. The pain is gone. Pierce that poor foot. It feels nothing. It is dead, mortified, lost. Better the wildest agony than that. So with the soul. Better most terrible temptation than to sin and fall, and fall and sin, without a fear, without a pang. Temptation is the soul's bugle-call that the enemy is near. And with the bugle-call there is the girding of armour to the battle. Well said old Jerome in a letter to a friend, 'Then art thou most terribly assaulted when thou art ignorant of the assault'. And well said Jeremy Taylor too, 'In the deepest peace and silence of spirit oftentimes is our greatest danger; not to be tempted is sometimes the subtlest temptation of all'. Young friends, temptation is sore. But I shall tell you one thing sorer. It is to be so completely Satan's slave that it would not pay him to tempt you any more. God keep you all from that.

III. Now mark where temptation comes with greatest power. To most it comes just at the weakest point and in the weakest moment. Not a soul but has a flaw in its armour. Achilles has always his unprotected heel. And to that weak spot temptation will come. You may hide your weakness from everybody. You cannot hide it from your temptation. As surely as sickness flies to the weakest part of your body, so surely will temptation fly to the weakest part of your soul.

What is the weakest point with you? I think I shall give a twofold answer to that question.

1. It is very likely to be the point where you have fallen in time past. Satan will not go to the trouble of planning a new temptation for you, if there be any old one handy. If the garden-gate has a shaky sneek, he will never trouble to climb the wall. Young people, watch! watch! watch at the gate where sin has entered again and again. That gate has been open so often that Satan thinks he has a right to come through it. There will be a wild struggle the first time you bar it in his face. But bar it! bar it in Jesus' name. That was a gallant deed in Scottish history when the fierce nobles, searching for King James, thundered at the chamber-door, and the fair lady thrust her hand into the rings and held the door fast by a living bar of flesh. You are no Stuart king; but there is some One here to-night who will do that for you.

Thou hast an arm that's full of power,

A hand that's great in might,

And Thy right hand excedingly

Exalted is in height.

2. Again your weakest point is perhaps the very point where you think that you are strongest. I wonder now if any day last week any of you were talking about that most interesting subject in the world—yourself. And you said, 'Well, well, I'm this or I'm that, I'm hasty or I'm proud, I admit, but I never could do such a mean nasty thing as So-and-so did'. Watch yourself there! Satan has got his eye on you just there, where you think you could never fall.

Now if you ask me for guidance in resisting temptation, I fear I have no counsel save that which is old as the hills.

1. Resist beginnings. Tamper not. Handle not. A child can dam the streamlet at its source, but the sons of Anak cannot stop it when it becomes a river. Set guards at every gate of the great city of Mansoul—eye-gate, ear-gate, mouth-gate—and challenge every comer. Do not deliberate how far you can go without falling. Bethink you, you have gone far enough if you are not to fall. Watch and pray that you enter not into temptation.

2. Continue to resist. The battle's never over. There's many a soul been lost, because it won. Won in the first onset, then said, All's well, and became careless. But the angels are gathering for war again, and the soul is taken after all. It is not always the first or second or third attack that works the havoc. For then the man is fresh and watchful. It is when the heart is careless again, and has forgotten the sting of the old sin, that is the moment of danger. How often are you to forgive? Till seventy times seven. Just so often must you resist. Not once, not twice, not in fine moments and noble hours alone, but daily, drearily, determinedly, forgive your brother and fight your foe.

3. Remember that the great day of your life is to-day. This, and none other, is your hour of crisis. Your farthest-reaching battle is your present one. And every coming trial, triumph, fall, is being determined now. Life is not built like modern merchantmen in separate compartments. Life is a piece. Life is one grand sweet song. Touch but a single string of that harp mystical with note of triumph, and all the chords will vibrate victory. A thousand unrecorded triumphs, and in the great trial you shall triumph. A thousand secret failures, and in the great hour, wreckage. We make or mar to-morrow by to-day. The Holy Ghost is saying to-day.

4. Try to remember that God sees you. Practise His presence, and it will help you mightily. Say,

'Thou God seest me,' and think you are never alone.

I remember reading the story of a little girl, who went into the attic to steal the apples that were stored there. On the wall there hung the portrait of some long-dead and forgotten family ancestor. And into whatsoever corner our little friend might turn, the eyes of her forefather seemed to follow her and search her to the heart. At last in desperation she got the scissors and cut out the eyes. And now her case was only worse. For the empty circles like gaping sockets seemed to track her now. There was no escape. And the eyes of God follow us like that, in love and helpfulness, not in anger, if we be His true children in Christ Jesus. If we ascend into heaven, He is there. If we make our bed in hell, He is there. If we take the wings of the morning, and fly into the uttermost parts of the sea, we are not beyond Him there. Try to live daily in the thought that God sees us, guides us with His eye, for so we shall be strong in the Lord and in His might.

5. Lean hard on Jesus Christ. Pray to Him. Cling to Him. Work for Him. Refuse to let Him go until He bless thee. And though thou go maimed like Jacob all thy days, thou wilt be blessed indeed.—G. H. MORRISON, The Oldest Trade in the World, p. 135.

THE THREE TEMPTATIONS

MATTHEW IV.

I. A young man might have been seen one day, faint and weary, in a wild desert and among wild beasts in an eastern land. He was exhausted with hunger, and the marks of it were on His face.

Poor and haggard and hungry though He looked, He was the Son of a King, and was even in that desert on the way to His kingdom.

The wonderful thing was that it was His Father who sent Him into the desert, and suffered Him to be without food for many days. A still more wonderful thing was that when He was suffering the sharpest pangs of hunger and ready to perish, He did not doubt His Father's love, nor that His Father's way of bringing Him to His kingdom was the best.

But one day a stranger came up to Him and said, 'You are the Son of that King of whom everybody has heard, and to whom this wilderness belongs. If You be His Son, why should You remain hungry? Bid the wilderness provide a table for You. Turn these stones into bread.'

Now this young man could actually have turned the stones into bread. That would have satisfied His hunger. That might save His life. That was a way which at the moment might have seemed right. But He knew that it was not right. His Father had sent Him into the wilderness; His Father had sent Him hunger instead of bread; and He knew His Father to be wise and good and loving. 'No,' He said to the stranger, 'I will follow My Father to the end—trust Him to the end—trust Him through hunger and faintness—trust Him even to death. My Father's love is better to Me than bread.'

This stranger was a very deceitful man; but he saw at a glance that the King's Son was resolved to go forward on the path of trust. So he followed the young man until they came to the capital town of the kingdom, and by and by they went up to the high towers of the temple.

'It is a great thing,' said the stranger once more, 'to be a King's Son, and especially the King's Son You are. Your Father cares for You every moment, and would not suffer a hair of Your head to be hurt. His servants follow You, watch over You, care for You. Suppose—since You are cared for in this way, and the King's Son—You cast Yourself down to the court below. See, there is a whole army ready to receive You in their arms!'

The young man simply said, 'To trust My Father's care when I am in the way of obedience and duty is one thing; to put it to the test in the way you propose, as if I disbelieved it, is another. It would be tempting My Father. And it is written, Thou shalt not tempt the King.'

So the stranger saw how noble this youth was, and how kingly and well fitted to reign. And he took Him to a high mountain, and showed Him all its glory, and the glory of all the kingdoms on the earth, and said, 'All these will I give unto Thee, if Thou wilt love me and trust me as Thou lovest and trustest Thy Father'.

But the young man turned round upon him in anger, and said, 'Get thee behind Me! for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve.'

Then the stranger left Him. And the heavens opened, and 'angels came and ministered unto Him'; and the smile of the Father shone round about Him like a great light; and far up in the depths of heaven there were songs of victory. For this was none other than the Son of God, and the stranger was the devil who sought to lead Him out of the right way.

II. That is an old story; but it is also new. It is the story of our daily and hourly temptations. It is the story of the attempt made by the Evil One to win us over to his side. In a thousand different forms in this very country, and just now, that is taking place which took place eighteen hundred years ago in the wilderness of Judea. I could not hope, if I tried it, to give you any idea of the countless variety of forms in which those three temptations come to us; but I will take you along one or two of the many lines of life in which they are to be found, and mention their names.

1. The first is the temptation of hunger: If you think a little, you will see that everybody has to toil for bread. Now the devil often comes to people who have to toil, and says, 'Bread is everything. Turn everything into bread—turn your skill and your time, and your talent, the ships, and the docks, and the railways, and the banks, and the Sunday-schools, and the churches into bread. If you are Christians, and Christ is in the sky, He will help you to do that. You are pinching yourselves, and spending time on religion and churches and missions and such things, which your more sensible neighbours spend in enjoying life.' Many are deceived by these words, and turn aside from a religious life, and give all their soul, and strength, and life, and power just to labour for bread. A good table with plenty to eat and drink on it—that is the one grand aim of life for them. And they forget God, and the Bible, and heaven, and go blindly on, labouring and toiling, and working for only the fine dinners, and forgetting that they cannot live on bread alone.

2. After that comes the temptation to presumption.

There are thousands of Christians—men and women—who nobly fight against the first temptation, and resolve not to spend all their soul and strength for bread; but, on the contrary, even when bread is not to be had, to keep the desire for God and truth and right above the desire for bread in their hearts. And again and again people of this stamp will say, 'Although God should take all our bread from us, we will put our trust in Him'.

The devil sees that people who act in this way are full of trust in God; and in a very cunning way he tries to get round them by the very strength of this trust. He puts this thought into their minds: 'Trust is a good thing—one of the best of things. One cannot have too much of it, especially if he is a Christian. Christians are God's children, and are free to trust Him in everything. God has promised to bring them all right at last. May they not trust Him then in perilous things—in risks, in daring ventures, even in leaps in the dark? God takes good care of His children. He gives His angels charge over them, lest they dash their feet against the stones.'

Many are wise and cast out such thoughts, and shut their eyes on these dangerous ventures. But others are caught by the temptation and lose themselves. And what they find in the end is only bitterness and remorse and shame.

3. There is still another temptation beyond this one. Even those who resist the temptation to presumption are often taken, as the Lord was, to where they can see the grand things of earth, and tempted with the temptation of pride, the temptation of reaching grandeur and influence by a single evil step. The temptation works in many ways; but sometimes it comes in the form of an advice from one who pretends to be a friend, to go into an evil trade.

'Don't you see how life is slipping past, and you are losing your chances?' this evil counsellor will say. 'You want to be in a higher position: you think if you were, you would have more influence for good. That's the very thing I say about you every day. Why are you so slack, then, to ascend to this position? Did you see that mansion we passed? It is owned by a rich friend of mine. Everybody speaks of him as "the eminent tradesman". He will be a baronet some day, and he will leave, by the profits of his trade, a million of money to his children. Do as he is doing. Give up strictness and sentiment. Go in for money-making in his way. You cannot help it, if the way be evil, or if the trade be evil. Somebody must be in that trade. Other people follow that way. And by that way and that trade, sooner than otherwise, you shall have the means of doing good.'

Counsels like these fall dead on the hearts of God's real children. But sometimes they are addressed to those who are only His children by name. And ah, there are many, under such advice, who break off from Christ's way, and follow the devil's, and are ruined for ever! They see splendour of social position, and fine living, and fashionable society, and carriages and grand mansions and fine entertainments—all passing like a panorama before them, and offering to become theirs—if only they will fall down and worship the devil to the extent of following an evil trade, or trading in an evil way'.

III. Once upon a time there were two brothers, and one was rich and the other neither rich nor poor. The rich brother had made his riches in an evil way and by an evil trade. But the brother who was neither rich nor poor said: 'It is better to be poor than rich, if the riches come by evil means'. It happened that this brother had three sons, but the rich brother had no children at all.

It came to pass, in course of time, that the brother who was neither rich nor poor was about to die. And he called his three sons to his bedside and said: 'I have spent all I had to spare in giving you education, and I have nothing to leave you except my mill. Be good and honest, and God will not suffer you to want. I leave my mill in equal shares among you. But the eldest shall be master, so long as he lives, and then the next eldest, and after him the youngest.'

When the good man was dead and the funeral over the eldest son stepped into his father's place, and the other two continued to serve as before. And time went on, and trade increased. And all things would have gone well if the one who was master had not gone on a visit to his rich uncle. But he was so feasted there and had such plenty of rich food to eat that he could not look on the simple fare at the mill without disgust. So he said to himself, 'What is the use of our increasing profits and of our toils, if we are not to have fine food like my uncle. Why still live on barley bread and milk as our father did? Then he put the old ways of the house aside, and had fine dinners and wine to drink. And he gave and accepted invitations to parties. And by and by, hardly a day passed in which he was not dining out, or having a dinner party at the mill. If his father had come back, he would not have known the old house again. Nothing was heard of in all the country side but news of the feasting at the mill, and the other feasts to which that feasting led. All the talk at the country fairs, where the people met, was about the last feast and the feast to come. One would have thought, to hear this talk, that man's chief end was to eat fine dinners every day. But all this came to an end, and an end that was not good. At one of those feasts, in a neighbour's house, the poor man drank so much wine that he did not know what he was about when coming home. And instead of coming down from his horse at the doorstep, he came down at the very edge of the mill-pond and was drowned.

So there had to be a second funeral. And after that the second son became master. He was different from his brother in some things. He was no drunkard, and he did not spend his time in feasting. But he was a little impatient. And it was a trouble to him to go round the right way if he could get a shorter cut across. What troubled him most was the slow growth of the money at the bank. Although the mill was prospering the profits were small. And this was a cross to him. It happened to him also to be the worse for a visit to his rich uncle. When he was at his uncle's he saw heaps of bank-notes which had been got in a single day. And he came home thinking sorrowfully that the toil of a mill was a slow toil. One day a stranger came up to him at the mill and said: 'We have found lead in the hills out there, and only want a little money to dig it out, and make thousands upon thousands in a single year'. It was the very chance the miller wanted. He could not sleep for thinking of it. He saw the thousands coming in like a flood. And he would have bank-notes as many and as soon as his uncle. Now this poor fellow was a very good miller, and was doing well with the mill. And his brother and himself were slowly getting to be well-to-do; but he was as ignorant as a baby about lead and lead hills, and the expense of working lead mines. To give out his savings would be a risk—he saw that clearly enough. To risk his brother's means would be wrong—he saw that too. But on the other hand, if the mine succeeded he would be as rich as his uncle, and he would get to that riches in a single year. So he got out of his bed very early next morning, and took his Bible and began to search it to see if it said anything about a case like his. He found in one place that God would make everything work together for good to those that loved Him, and in another that God would suffer no evil to befall His children. He said to himself—'I hope I love God and am one of His children'. Then he knelt down and committed his way, as he thought, to God, and then he felt stronger and happier. It was a great risk—he saw that very clearly. But he thought God would take care of him. And he would put all his trust in Him.

He forgot that the good God has given no promise to help people in their folly, or in their wrong-doing. And he knew it was wrong to put his brother's portion in peril. But he hoped it would all come right, and even that his brother would thank him for what he had done. So he sat down and wrote to the stranger, and told him to buy as many shares in the lead-mines as the mill was worth.

Everything seemed very bright for a week or two—but only for a week or two. A letter came from a lawyer to say that the expenses of working the mines were greater than had been expected, and that more money would be needed. And after that a second letter demanding more still, and saying: 'It would be a pity to have paid out so much and not pay out a little more to get it back'. The miller began now to see that his bank-notes were not so certain as he once thought, but he could not draw back. He sent off the last penny his brother and himself had in the world.

And a year went past. And one day a letter came to him to say that the lead-hill had been searched and only a little lead found, and the expenses were far beyond the payments, and he would have to send twice the sum he had already paid. He did not answer this letter, but simply gave it to his brother to read. Then he said: 'Brother, I have risked everything and lost—lost all—yours as well as mine—forgive me—I thought I was doing it for the best'. Then he rose, went up to his bed, and died of a broken heart.

In a short while there was another funeral, and then a sale. The mill, and the house, and the horses, and the cows, and the fields were all sold, and the money taken for the wretched mines. And the youngest brother was left without a penny, or a home, or a friend, in the whole world.

But when the sale was quite over, and he was about to leave the house in which he had been born, a man came up on horseback and gave him a letter to read. It was from his rich uncle. And it was full of kind words. The uncle was old, and had no children to inherit his riches. This third nephew had always been a favourite with him. He had offered to adopt him when the father was living. He renewed the offer now. He would make him his son and heir if only he would come into the trade, and promise to carry it on when the uncle was dead. I told you before that it was an evil trade, and one on which God's blessing could not rest. But the young man was touched by his uncle's kindness, and he told the messenger he would bring his answer to his uncle himself.

So he went back into the empty house, and sat down on the trunk in which his clothes were packed. There was no fire on the hearth, but it was there he sat, where he had so often seated himself in happier days. It was not every day such an offer came to a man. All that would be his, if he accepted it, came before his mind: the splendid seat in the country, the fine house in town, the multitude of servants, the carriages, the fine society, the high position, the possible rank he might attain to. All this, and visions of a future in which all this had place, floated before him and came round about him. And voices seemed to speak from the depth of his soul and say: 'All this will be yours if you accept your uncle's offer'.

But he must also accept the evil trade. He thought of his dear father's honourable life—of his father's refusal to accept the same offer on this condition—and of his father's spirit as perhaps watching over him at that very moment. Then he raised his thoughts to his Father in heaven and cried for strength. Then, when a long forenoon had been spent in the cheerless, empty house, he rose up and trudged a long way till he came to his uncle's, and thanked him for his kindness, but declined his offer because of the evil trade.

I do not know what became of the uncle, nor what he did with his riches. But the young man who refused the splendid offer came back to the village in which he had spent his boyhood, and went into a neighbour's mill to serve. And after a while he married his master's daughter. And although he never got to be very rich he was very happy, and had a clean heart and clean hands, and lived in favour both with God and man.

May God help you to resist temptation as this younger brother did—as our blessed Lord did. And always remember this, that in business, in home, in life, in love, in everything, it is just—With Christ, or Without Christ. That makes all the difference in the world, at the journey's end.

Christ has come down from heaven to open for us the way to heaven itself, and to guide us thereon to the end.

He is saying even now—'Follow Me, and I will bring you to all good things, to happiness, to fortune, and to enduring riches'.

May the Holy Spirit give you the grace to believe that He is speaking truth, and help you to follow Him along all His ways!

May He open your eyes to see, and your hearts to understand His love!

Your ways, after that, are sure to be ways of pleasantness, and all your paths, paths of peace.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, Talking to the Children, p. 21.

BEING TEMPTED

'Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil.'—MATTHEW IV. I.

We are going to talk this afternoon about 'Being Tempted'. Jesus was 'tempted'. Who can tell me—can you tell me—without looking—the first word of the fourth chapter of St. Matthew? Will you look? 'Then.' A very important word. Always look at the little words of the Bible; and always look at the word 'then'. 'Then' is a very important word in the Bible. When? When?

I will ask you another question—Are we most likely to be 'tempted' when we are good or when we are naughty? When we are good. Are we most likely to be 'tempted' when we have been with good people or with bad people? With good people. Are we most likely to be 'tempted' when we have been doing some good thing or some bad thing? Some good thing.

Which is the man that the robber attacks—the man who has got a full purse or the man who has got an empty purse? The man who has got the full purse.

Then, which is the man the adversary will attack—the man who has an empty heart or the man who has a full heart? The man whose heart is full.

'Then.' 'Then'—when Jesus had been fasting and praying—just after he had been baptised—just after God had said, 'This is my beloved Son!'—then, 'then came the tempter.'

When you least expect it, then 'the temptation' comes!

'Led up into the wilderness to be tempted.' Then did the Holy Ghost 'tempt' Him? Does God 'tempt' us? Yes. Does Satan 'tempt' us? Yes. Do we 'tempt' ourselves? Yes. Then Satan 'tempts' us; the Holy Ghost 'tempts' us; and we 'tempt' ourselves.

God 'tempts' us? Is that quite true? Look at the first verse of the twenty-second of Genesis. Will you read it with me? 'God did tempt Abraham.' Will you look at the twelfth chapter of the second Epistle to the Corinthians, and the seventh verse? I want you to understand that verse, the end of it: 'There was given to me a thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet me'. Satan's messenger, to buffet him, and it was God's gift! It was God's gift—Satan's buffeting him! That is true. Satan's buffetings are God's gifts. 'There was given to me a buffeting of Satan.' Yes, God 'tempts' us to try us, to prove us, to do us good.

Is it, then, a good thing to be 'tempted,' or a bad thing to be 'tempted'? Quite a good thing. I should be very sorry if you were not 'tempted'. It is a very good thing to be 'tempted'. Jesus was 'tempted.'

Supposing I made a very wonderful steam engine and put it into a ship to make it into a wonderful steam packet; it is all beautifully made and complete, and I want to 'try' whether it is all good—whether the machinery is right and works well—where should I send it, into a smooth sea or a rough sea? Should I send it 'up the rapids'—up the river—against the stream, against a waterfall, to see whether it would go up? I should.

So God does with you. He furnishes you with everything you want, then puts you up to the 'rapids,' sends you on the rough water, just to 'try' you, to see what you are made of.

Those beautiful Eastern swords (there are more beautiful swords in Asia than in Europe) are made of such fine steel, that men can bend them double without breaking them. In order to 'try' them, when they are being made, men do bend them double, to see if they can possibly break them. So God 'tries' you—to see what you are made of. It is a good thing to be 'tempted'. Luther said, 'Prayer and temptations make the Christian'.

Now I am going to ask you this. We are going to think about Jesus Christ's 'temptation'. Will you try to think?—Why was Jesus Christ 'tempted'? Can anybody tell me? Why was Jesus Christ 'tempted'? I can think of three reasons. Will you think of three? Will you think of one? Why was our dear Saviour 'tempted'?

I. I think the first thing was that He might feel with us when we are 'tempted'. Look at the fourth chapter of Hebrews and the fifteenth verse. It is about Christ. He is called a 'High Priest'. Will you read it with me? 'For we have not a high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin.' 'Tempted 'like us!' So that when anybody is being 'tempted' they might say: 'O dear Jesus! Thou knowest how hard it is to be "tempted"! Thou knowest how hard it is to conquer the "temptation"! Help me, dear Lord, help me—for Thou hast been "tempted"! Thou canst feel for me! Thou hast been through it all! Help me, Jesus! Help me, Jesus!'

I advise you to do that when you are going to be 'tempted'. Remind Jesus that He was 'tempted'. 'Thou knowest that I want help; O my Lord, help me!'

That is one reason why Jesus was 'tempted,' that He might have sympathy for us, that He might feel with us, when we are being 'tempted'. Because we can never quite feel with anyone until we feel the same thing, then we have real sympathy. Jesus has sympathy.

II. Let us think of another reason. Think of the next. To show us what we are to do when we are tempted. What did Jesus do when He was 'tempted'? Tell me this. Jesus was 'tempted' three times; and each time He said three words, the same each time. What were the words? 'It is written.' Each time He said, 'It is written'. That is, He quoted out of the Bible. He took the Bible, and conquered the devil. What book of the Bible did He take the words from? Did He take them from the same book? Yes, all of them. A book you do not care much about, perhaps. I do not think you do. 'Deuteronomy.' Do you care much about your Deuteronomy? Is it a book you turn to often? Do you often read Deuteronomy? I advise you to do so, when you get a little older. Jesus loved Deuteronomy dearly. He always quoted out of Deuteronomy. How did He know it? Was it because He knew everything? Not a bit of it. How did Jesus know it? He loved it when a boy, when at Nazareth, when He lived with His mother and Joseph. He loved the Bible and learned out of the Bible. He had got His 'sword' ready when He was attacked. For He loved the Bible when a boy. You must be a good swordsman.

Do you know how to use your sword? Whether you are a boy or girl, when you are attacked you must use your sword. 'It is written.' Bring a text out of the Bible. That will conquer the tempter. That was the way Jesus acted. Oh! the Bible is a wonderful book!

We read that Oliver Cromwell had in his army one regiment—a fine, strong regiment—called 'The Ironsides'. They were very religious men. They might have been mistaken in some things; but they were very religious. And it was quite the custom for almost every soldier to carry his Bible to battle with him. They used to carry their Bible under their dress; and more than once, in a battle, the soldier would have been shot through the heart but for his Bible. The bullet went through his Bible, or it would have gone through his heart. The Bible saved the heart!

The Bible will often save your hearts in another battle. Know your Bible. Love your Bible. That is the sword that Jesus had. He was our pattern—to show us what we ought to do when we are 'tempted,' and how to use the Bible.

III. Let us think of a third thing. Encouragement to conquer. Supposing you were to go out to Asia, or somewhere, and there was to attack you a great serpent. Supposing a great serpent came out of the grass and attacked you; say, a boa constrictor. And supposing, when you looked at him you thought—'Oh! dear, why, his head is crushed; he will not hurt me much. I won't be afraid of that serpent.' It would be a very little thing to fight with a serpent if his head was crushed! You have to fight with a serpent; but his head is crushed. Jesus crushed his head. You need not fear him very much, because his head is crushed. Jesus was 'tempted,' but He conquered. Therefore, when fighting, remember you have Jesus on your side. Jesus has fought the same battle. He has crushed the serpent's head!

In the old Roman times there was a great Roman general to whom one of his soldiers said: 'Oh! the enemy are so many! We are not half so many as the enemy! The enemy is twice as many as we are.' The general said to him, 'How many do you count me for?'

Do you understand? There are 'more with us than there are against us'. Jesus is with us. How many do you count Him for? If you had to fight with a legion of devils, which is six thousand! remember, you have One with you who is more powerful than the six thousand. Jesus is with you!

These are the three reasons: sympathy, pattern, encouragement. He can feel with us when we are 'tempted'. He shows us what to do when we are 'tempted,'—and assures us that we shall fully conquer when we are 'tempted' if we only try.

Now I want to look, if you please, at what Jesus' 'temptations' were? How many were there? 'Three'.

1. What was the first thing Satan asked Jesus to do? To 'make stones into bread'. Was He hungry? Yes. Why was He hungry? Because he had 'fasted forty days and forty nights'. Then the 'temptation' just entered into His feelings? Do 'temptations' always enter into our feelings and circumstances? Do they? He asked Him to 'make bread'. What was the first word that Satan said to Him? 'If.' Do you like the word 'if'? I do not. 'If.' 'If' Thou be the Son of God.' 'If.' 'If.' I do not like the word. It is generally very bad. 'If.' 'If.'

Sometimes it is good ; but it is so doubtful. Just as at the first. 'Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?' A sort of 'if'. Is it really so? Satan is very fond of 'if'. Do not pay attention to the 'if'.

Why did Satan say then, 'If Thou be the Son of God'? Why just then? Can you think of the reason? Can you tell me? Because God had just said, 'This is My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased'. That is at the end of the chapter before—at His baptism. Then Satan says, 'If you are the Son of God—if it is true—then make these stones bread'.

Could He have made those stones 'bread'? Yes. What could not God make out of 'stones'? He once said some strange thing He could make out of a 'stone'. He could make 'children' out of 'stones'. 'Out of these stones I can make children unto Abraham.' Certainly, then, He could turn 'stones' into 'bread' if He liked.

Would it have been wrong to make the 'stones' bread? Yes. What would He have shown if He had done so? Answer me this, please. If Jesus had made those 'stones' bread, what would it have shown in Jesus' mind? Would not it have shown that He did not trust God, that God would feed Him? If He worked a miracle, would it not have shown that He did not trust in His providence? Yes, it would have been want of faith. That was the first 'temptation'. Distrust. Getting His 'bread' not in God's way. Distrust of God's providence. Is God sure to give us 'bread'? Yes. Is He sure to give us plumcake? No. He is sure to give us 'bread'; but He is not sure to give us plumcake. He has not promised that. But he is sure to give us 'bread'. We must not get our 'bread' in a wrong way!

2. Now let us look at the second temptation. Will you tell me what the second was? The first was distrust, getting bread the wrong way. But what was the second? Satan asked Him to throw Himself from the Temple. Where did the devil take Jesus? He took Him into Jerusalem, into the Temple; and he took Him up into what was called Herod's tower. It was a very high tower indeed. It was more than 200 feet high. And the walls of the tower went straight down a precipice to the valley of Jehoshaphat, where the brook Kedron ran along. By standing at the brook Kedron you would look up a high precipice, 200 feet high. Above that, this tower of Herod stood, 200 feet higher; so it was altogether nearly 450 feet high; higher than St. Paul's; higher than the Monument; higher than any building in England, take it altogether. The devil took Him, and put Him on the pinnacle of Herod's tower, looking down this tremendous precipice; and he said to Him, 'If Thou be the Son of God, cast Thyself down'. Perhaps he thought, 'How fine it will look to all the people!' or perhaps Satan thought that Christ would not have faith enough to trust God. He quoted a passage out of the Bible. Do you know where he quoted it from? The ninety-first Psalm. It was very strange that the devil quoted the Bible. But he very often does. He knows a great deal; but he turns it to bad account. Satan very often turns the Bible to bad account by quoting it in a wrong way. I wish everybody who can read in the church would read with me the eleventh verse of the ninety-first Psalm: 'For He shall give His angels charge over Thee, to keep Thee in all Thy ways. They shall bear Thee up in their hands, lest Thou dash Thy foot against a stone'. Now turn to the fourth of St. Matthew, and the sixth verse: we will read it together: 'If Thou be the Son of God, cast Thyself down: for it is written, He shall give His angels charge concerning Thee; and in their hands they shall bear Thee up, lest at any time Thou dash Thy foot against a stone'. Where is the difference? What is the difference between the verse in the ninety-first Psalm and the verse in St. Matthew? 'To keep Thee in all Thy ways' is left out. The devil left that out. Now 'the Angel,' i.e. God, will 'keep us in all our ways,' our proper ways. But if we go out of 'our' proper 'ways,' will He 'keep' us then? No. That was the important thing. Like the hinge on the door. If we do not 'keep' in our (proper) ways, God will not 'keep' us. The ways of duty are where we ought to go;—let us always look at that. If Christ had thrown Himself from that pinnacle, what sin would He have committed? What is the right word? Would it be right if I said, 'It would be rash'? or would not it be 'presumption'? Which is the best word—'presumption' or 'rashness'—which do you think? I should call it 'presumption'. He would have gone out of His own proper way, trusting God would take care of Him when He knew He was not in His proper path.

If you find God has promised anything, you may push it as far as ever you like: 'Oh, do, Lord! do give it me'. You may go on ever so long if God has promised it. But if He has not promised it, do not press it, because that is 'tempting' God. Then it may be with you like it was with the Israelites: He may give you your desires, but your souls will be the worse for it. He may 'send leanness into your souls'.

3. Now look at the third temptation. What was the third? Satan 'showed Him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them,' and asked Him to worship him. How do you think Satan looked then? Ugly? Would he be likely to look ugly? Which should we be most likely to 'fall down and worship'—a handsome man, or an ugly man? one, looking grand like a king, or one very miserable? I have no doubt Satan looked excessively beautiful. 'Fall down and worship me,' he said to Christ; 'and if you will, I will give you all this glory.' If Christ had done so, what would have been His sin? Remember, if He had done the first thing Satan wanted Him to do, He would have shown want of trust; if

He had done the second, it would have been presumption; and if He had done the third, what would it have been? He would have shown that He loved the world too much. Is not the world belonging to Christ? Is not it all going to be His? What would have been the sin if He had taken it then? Taking it too soon, and in the wrong way. He will have it all one day. But then it would have been too soon, and in the wrong way. Are there not a great many pleasant things in the world? Yes, very pleasant! But remember, you must wait for your pleasant things. You will have them all by and by. Everything you can wish. There are some pleasures of which you must say, 'I will wait for them. I shall be sure to have them by and by, but I won't take them at a wrong time and in a wrong way.'

Just two or three things in conclusion about 'temptation'. Will you listen to me? Don't be 'tempted' if you can help it! Keep out of temptation's way! What do we say in the Lord's Prayer? 'Lead me not into temptation, but deliver me from evil.' 'O God, do not "tempt" me. It is a great trial to be tempted. But if Thou dost, deliver me from the sin, deliver me from the evil. If Thou bring me into temptation, deliver me from the evil.'

But, if you are 'tempted,' take out your sword. What is it? The Bible. Where is the Christian sword? It is among the Christian's armour. Do you know where it is? It is in Ephesians vi. 17. 'The sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God.' Take care you know how to use it. Remember it. If some naughty thought would lead you wrong, try to think of a text, and it will help you.

The third thing is, when you are 'tempted,' do what Christ did. Do not go a single step. Stop at once. 'Resist the devil,' at once. Adam and Eve talked to the serpent; they parleyed with him. So they fell. Christ did not. He 'resisted him' at once: so He conquered.

I will tell you a fable they have in Arabia. It is an Arab fable. There was a miller in his comfortable tent. There came a camel, and he put in his nose at the door; and he said, 'Let me have my nose in; my nose is very cold. Let me put my nose in.' The man said, 'Yes, you may put your nose in'. Then the camel said, 'Let me put one of my fore feet in'. The man said, 'Yes, you may put in one of your fore feet'. Then the camel said, 'Let me put my neck in; you have let me put in my nose and one of my fore feet'. And he let him put in his neck, till at last the camel got in altogether; and when in he began to knock the furniture all to pieces. The man then said, 'I will thank you, camel, to go out at once.' 'I thank you,' said the camel, 'but you may go out.' And the miller had to go out; the camel would not go out at all.

I need not explain to you what it means. Resist the little sins. Do not let sins begin to come in.—

'MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE.'

MATTHEW IV. 4.

I. In an old volume in my library there is a woodcut which I sometimes study. It is the picture of a little boy at a pastrycook's window. He is on his way to school. The morning is dark and stormy. The pavement is glistening with rain. But neither wind nor rain can force him to pass this window. Inside are piles of fancy bread, and cakes, and candies, and all sweet things. And there he stands, in the raw morning air, his right arm resting on the brass fence, his eyes fixed, his little heart going out in earnest longing for the delicious things inside that window. Not that he is a poor, ill-fed, hungry boy. His plump, round cheeks, his cosy cloak, and the end of a roll of bread sticking out of his pocket, tell that he is well fed and well cared for at home. But he is thinking to himself, as he stands looking in through that window: 'What are rolls of home bread, or home itself, or the school to which I am going, to the sweets and sugar cakes heaped inside there?'

That is the way with boys. For a long while of their lives they think that things to eat, especially sweet things, are the best things of life. Nuts shaken from the trees, berries gathered from the bush, apples dropped in the orchard, fish caught in the river by their own rod: boys think that life has nothing better than things like these. To go away to the woods or the rivers, to kindle a fire of leaves and dried branches of trees, to roast the nuts and the apples and the fish, and eat them without knife or fork, without table napkin or table, as hunters and wild Indians do: that seems to boys the very best joy that earth can give. If they were kings, and had as much money as they could tell, they would have dinners of that sort every day.

II. And boys who think in this way are not altogether wrong. Things to eat are really good things. And the good Lord who made us has made food sweet to our taste. Sometimes it will seem, even to grown-up people, that bread must be one of the best things in the world. When I see hungry children on the streets, I cannot help thinking what a blessing a good dinner every day would be to them. And when I pass old men and women whose white, pinched faces show that they have tasted little food that day, I cannot help thinking what a blessed thing good food would be to them. And I think the same thing as often as I read some of the sea stories which the newspapers tell.

Shipwrecked crews on lone rafts far out at sea, with never a sail in sight, with not even a bag of hard biscuit on board—driven to eat their very shoes for food—with hunger tugging at every heart, and at last with wild looks at each other, as the hunger is making them mad, and they are silently beginning to think that the lot must be cast, and the death of one become the life of all—in cases like that I do not wonder that people come to believe that land with birds on it, or a ship with food in it, or a bagful of bread, would be the best thing the life of man could see or taste.

But I intend to show you that we cannot, even in such cases as these, be satisfied, or made happy, or wise, or strong, by bread alone. If we had all the bread the world contains, or all the money of the world to buy it with—if we were always able to go into woods and rivers and find food for ourselves, with companions whom we loved, we still could not have all that our hearts and lives need to have. By eating and drinking, by feasting with great people, or with wild people, whether on sea or land, in hunting-fields or palaces, neither boys nor men could be perfectly happy or contented or well.

III. I read a story once of some sailors on just such a raft as I have referred to. Their very dreams were of food, of which they had none. As they sat there on the raft—straining their eyes often to look for passing ships—visions of food of all kinds, of ripe fruits, and rich meats, and pastry, and bread honey-baked, floated before their souls. And each man said to himself, 'Oh, for one loaf such as my mother baked for us in the early days!' But the days went past and no ship appeared, and one by one, for want of bread, they began to die. After dreadful sufferings, the two who survived drifted to an island on which there were friendly natives and plenty of food. One died, but the other lived and spent some years on that island. He had food as much as he could eat, but he was not happy. He hunted, he fished, he learned to catch all kinds of birds. He lived in tents; he was treated as chief's son. But he was not happy. And one day, when an English ship happened to pass the island, he threw himself into the sea, and swam to the side, and said, 'Take me on board, and take me home to England; I will endure hunger and poverty and hard living rather than live longer here'. The man had as much food as he could eat—and on the lone raft no doubt he thought food the best thing; but you see he had found out that a man cannot live—cannot be happy—by bread alone.

IV. I always remember the way a young girl who lived where I once lived came to learn this truth. Her home was a lonely farmhouse away up among hills, and miles away from village or town. Living where she did, she knew nothing about the pleasures which town children have. No panorama, nor concert of sacred music, is ever seen or heard near such places. But she was not without pleasures; and there was one so sweet, so always new, that she thought it must be the very best pleasure in the world. About a mile from the farm was a hill on which gorse and heather and wild violets grew all the summer. Here and there were nut-trees, but the ground was mostly covered with bramble and bilberry bushes. The hours she spent there were the happiest in her life; and she thought a girl who had a bramble and bilberry hill had nothing more to wish for.

One day, in harvest time, she was at home with her mother and grandmother, and grandmother suddenly turned ill. It was a long way to the doctor's, and there was nobody to send but this child. The farmer and the servants were away helping a neighbour; the mother could not leave the sick grandmother; and this girl of ten years old must hurry away for the doctor. She lost no time in preparation; she dearly loved her grandmother, and her little feet seemed to fly along the road. It was the road on which the bilberry hill was, but she was not thinking of that. She was thinking only of the errand on which she was sent, and of poor sick grandmamma at home; and she was hurrying along as fast as her feet could carry her. But just as she came within sight of the hill, at the very bend of the road where the gap in the hedge was that led up to it, she saw, not a hundred yards off, a mad bull tearing along, and coming right up to meet her.

She could not go back. That never entered into her mind. To go forward was death. But here was her bilberry hill. She darted to the gap in the hedge through which she had so often passed. She fled up through the trees, thinking there might be some outlet, higher up, to another part of the road. There was no such outlet. A river on one side, a high close fence on the other, shut her in. She could only leave by the way she came; and there, to her horror, stood the furious bull. A whole hour went past, afternoon was melting into evening, and still she was a prisoner. The bull had planted himself right at the entrance, glaring up at her with a savage look. In that hour what whirls of thought drove through her soul! She thought of her poor old grandmother, of the pain she was suffering, of the possibility of her dying before the doctor could be brought. She thought of her mother's anxiety. At first she was sick with fear. Then that passed away, and she grew hungry. The hedges were covered with her favourite brambles; late bilberries also were hanging ripe at her feet and all around her. But she could not touch them. What were bilberries or brambles, or any other kind of fruit, or food to her now? It was liberty she wanted—liberty to go her message—liberty to bring help to the dear sick one at home. She never before thought there could be anything better in life than a bramble and bilberry hill; but she learned it that day.

Her whole young heart cried up to God for liberty to reach the doctor. Although she was in mortal terror of the bull she saw and remembered afterwards things as if she had no fear. She saw a hare running through a little space in the high fence, and wished she were a hare. She saw the birds flying about overhead perfectly free, and wished she were a bird. She cried with vexation; and what she cried for, although she could not put it in words at the time, was liberty to do her duty. 'Oh, to be out of this trap!' that was the shape her prayer took. 'Oh, Lord Jesus, send some one to drive away the bull!' And by and by, when the shadows of night began to fall, and while it was still not too late to bring the doctor, the Lord heard her cry, and sent some neighbours to let her free. But that day she learned—and so learned as never to forget—that hills of brambles and bilberries cannot make people happy, and that times may come, even in a child's life, when she may be where the ground is covered with her favourite berries, and she not able to touch a single one.

V. One day a hunter was returning to his home, tired with the chase and faint with hunger. As he came near the tents in which his family lived, the air came about him filled with the fragrance of the richest soup. He quickened his steps. New light came into his eyes. The taste of the rich soup was already in his mouth. And just as he pushed back the curtain and stepped inside the tent, his brother was preparing to serve it out. The brother had gathered it, and prepared it, and cooked it, and it was all his own. And it was the only food in the tent that day. The famishing hunter said to his brother, 'Jacob, let me have some'. But Jacob was not a kind brother, and he said, 'If you buy it, you shall have some'. Esau at that time was fonder of food than anything else, and he was almost dying with hunger. So he said, 'I will give you anything you like, Jacob; but let me have the soup'. Then Jacob said, 'Give me your birthright'. It seemed at the time like asking nothing at all. The brothers were twins, but Esau had been born first. And Jacob could never get sorrow for that out of his mind. He was always wishing he had been born first. And now when this chance came, and his elder brother famishing and begging for food, he could not let the chance go. 'Let me be elder brother, Esau, and you shall have the soup.' Esau thought a very little over it—too little, as he came to see afterwards. He said to himself, 'What's the birthright to me just now?' He should not have said that. It was God who had made him elder brother. It was despising the gift of God. What's the birthright to me just now?' he said, still speaking to himself. 'It is food I want. I am dying for want of food, and here is food, and the best sort of food, that will be life, and strength, and joy to me. I must have it; I cannot live without it.' Then he turned to Jacob and said, 'I give you the birthright—give me the food'. He was a grown-up lad at that time. And there was no more said about it then. But when years had gone past, and the two lads were men, a day came when their old father had to acknowledge the birthright, and say with his dying lips which son was to be chief. When that day came, the old father was blind and seemed near to die. Jacob said to his mother, 'I bought the birthright from Esau'. And his mother took him one forenoon, when Esau was out hunting, and dressed him like Esau, and made the blind old father think it was the eldest son. And Jacob the younger got the blessing. And the blessing made the birthright his. Then Esau saw the folly he had done. He had sold for a red mess what God had given him. He cried like a child. 'Give me a second birthright,' he said to his poor vexed father, when he came and found what had been done. But there was only one blessing to give, and Jacob had got it. In that hour Esau saw that man does not live by bread alone.

VI. In the great kingdom of Babylon there once reigned a king who thought man could live by bread alone. And one day he invited a thousand of his lords and ladies, princes and princesses, to a great feast in his palace. Every one was dressed in gold and silver, purple, scarlet, and fine linen. There was music floating all round. Slaves came out and in carrying meat and wine and flowers and fruit. And the tables were filled with guests. But when kings have had many banquets they begin to be tiresome, and this king thought he would do a thing at this feast which might keep the tire-omeness away. He remembered that Nebuchadnezzar his father had once been to Jerusalem, and had fought against the city and had taken away all the gold and silver vessels of the temple there. So Belshazzar the son commanded those gold and silver vessels to be sent for and brought to his great feast. And everybody praised the Hebrew vessels, and they were filled with wine, and went round all the guests, and every lord and lady drank wine out of these vessels. And the king said, 'Was never a feast like this; this is life, this is blessedness'. But the great God at that very moment thrust out His hand from the darkness, and with His finger wrote these words on the wall in a language neither the king nor his lords could understand: 'Oh foolish feaster, you need righteousness more than bread to make you happy. The God whose temple your father robbed of these vessels has numbered the hours of your kingdom. You have been tried as a king and found wanting. And your kingdom is about to be given to others.' Although for a long while nobody could read the words, it was something terrible to have them written on the wall in that way. Where now was the happiness the king had in his gold vessels and his wine? It was gone. He was filled with terror. All the glory of his banquet disappeared. What did that awful hand coming out of the darkness mean? What were those terrible letters on the wall? His face became white, his knees shook, the chill of death came over him. Before that feast was ended he and his lords and ladies learned that man cannot live by banquets alone, nor by drinking wine in vessels of gold and silver, nor by any other kind of feasting which is feasting on what the Bible calls 'bread alone'.

VII. Going back to the woodcut I described at the outset, I will make one more remark suggested by it. Sometimes when I look at it, it seems to say to me: 'It is not little schoolboys only who stop to look in at windows. We are all, big people as well as little people, like the boy at the window, only, as we grow older, the window changes, and the things inside change as well. Instead of the pastrycook's window, it is that of some neighbour richer than ourselves, or it is the avenue leading up to some noble mansion, or it is the door opening into some public banquet, or it is a marriage party, or a general's staff, or an association of artists, or a fellowship of learned men, or the partnership of a merchant company, or a circle of high ladies of fashion.'

Yes, these are the windows through which, as we grow older, we look. And as the windows through which we look are different, the things inside are different too. It is a place inside those circles of rich, learned, and fashionable people. It is possession of the things which make this life seem so beautiful. It is the wedding coaches, the gay dresses, the high companions, the honourable titles, the splendid banquets, the magnificent homes. Ah, there are boys and girls who are now as young as the boy in my woodcut, and as fond of looking into pastrycooks' windows, who will come to think, as they grow older, and look through other kinds of windows at other sweet things in life, how much better it would be to be inside, among the rich, gay people, than out, and how poor and homely their lives are when compared with the lives at which they look. But it will be a vain thought whenever it comes. To have all the fine things we see in the possession of others, to dwell in stately houses, to have troops of servants waiting on us, to have carriages at our call, and great people for our friends, and great honours to our name, that is not our life. There are thousands and tens of thousands who have attained to all that and are not so happy as they were before.

In one of the iron districts of our country, about forty years ago, lived two young married people. The husband was a blacksmith, and very industrious and temperate. The wife was thrifty and otherwise good. They were happy, but not perfectly happy. He, especially, kept looking into the lives of the people who gave him work, and wishing he had comforts like theirs. Many a time, as he sat in a corner of his forge taking the dinner which his wife brought to him, he would say to her: 'I would have a carriage like this one, and a grand house like that one, and great banquets like theirs, and servants and rich dresses for you.'

And it really came out so that before twenty years were over he had all these things which he had so eagerly hungered after. He had a fine mansion to live in, a fine carriage to ride in, fine dresses for his wife, great feasts for his friends, and hundreds of people to serve him. A friend of mine was once invited to one of his parties and asked to stay over night. There was a grand banquet, and lords and ladies and other great people sat down to it. When the guests were all gone, and the three drew round the fire, the husband said to his wife, 'What did you think of our party?' And she said, 'Indeed, John, I was thinking all the time of it, that you and I have never been so happy, or good, as long ago when I used to take your dinner to the forge and wait till you had eaten it.' 'That same is my thought too at times,' said the husband.

They got the grandeur and the banquets they hungered for, you see, but their happy life they had left behind.—A. MACLEOD, The Gentle Heart, p. 211.

SILLY JACK'S PARABLE

MATTHEW IV. 4.

I. 'MAN cannot live by bread alone.'

In order to live as God would like us to live, we need all the words which have come to us from God. Bread is only one of these words. Bread tells us of God's care for our bodies. But God is speaking to us by other things besides bread. The love with which our parents love us, and liberty, and truth, and justice, are all words which God has spoken and which we need as well as bread. To make us good, and wise, and happy, we need every good thing which has come to us from God.

One dark November night, a few years ago, two gentlemen in a gig were driving along the banks of the river Leven, and in a very lonesome part of the road they heard the cries of a child. Although they could see nothing, they knew by the cries that not far from the road a child was in great distress. They pulled up, and found that they were beside a graveyard, and, following the sound of the cries, they came up to a little boy, six or seven years old, lying all his length on a grave, and crying on the mother who lay below to come back to him. The mother had died a few days before, and home had lost its sweetness for the child. He would not leave the grave. 'I want to be beside mamma,' he said, when the gentlemen wished him to come with them. At last they got him to tell where he lived—it was four miles off—and, lifting him up in their arms, they drove to the door. It was a bright enough home, with no scarceness of bread or comfort in it. It only wanted a mother's love. The poor child had food, and clothes, and comforts, as much as he could enjoy; but even a child cannot be happy with food, and clothes, and comforts alone, but with every word that comes from the mouth of God. And the best word which had come from the mouth of God for this child had been his mother's love—and that was gone!

II. Yet even a mother's love is not enough. Moses had love from two mothers, and he had bread, and a bright home, and ease, and splendour, but he was not happy. Ever since the kind princess lifted him out of the ark of rushes, he had lived in a king's palace and been loved by the king's daughter. He was her adopted son. He might even become king himself some day. Servants waited on him to give him whatever he asked for. Tutors waited on him to teach him all that was then known. He had horses, and carriages, and yachts, and splendid clothes, and plenty of money, and everything this earth could supply to make a man happy. But he was not happy.

What he wanted more than all he had was justice and deliverance for his Hebrew kinsfolk. While he was feasting on king's meat in the palace, they were living on hard fare in the brick-kiln. While he was a free man, they were slaves. While he could say to guards and servants 'Go,' and they would go, 'Come,' and they would come, but I men were standing over his Hebrew kinsmen, with whips in their hands, cutting into their flesh if they fainted with their toil. He had no peace day nor night. And everything reminded him of the sufferings of his people. If he went to town, he saw the bricks they had made being carried along the streets. If he went to the country, he came on the kilns where they were suffering. If he visited the brick-kilns, he heard the crack of the lash on every side of him, and the sharp cry of the lashed one's pain. Now and again, too, riding in a royal carriage, and dressed like a prince, a Hebrew would pass him on the road carrying straw for the bricks. And the poor bent form of the slave would straighten up, and his eyes would cast one look into the carriage, as much as to say, 'You there—I here!' And all these things cut into the soul of the young man. And he was very sad.

One day it happened to him to be near a brick-field. The air was filled with the sickening vapour of the clay. He saw crowds of his kinsfolk moving about at their dreary task. His heart was sore for their misery. Just at that moment a poor slave rushed out into the road, pursued by one of the taskmasters, his back all cut and bleeding with the lash, and fell dead at the feet of Moses. The hidden fountains of anger, which had been gathering and growing hotter within him for years, burst forth at the sight, and, rushing at the cruel taskmaster, he killed him in his wrath.

He knew well enough that his own life would be taken if it were known. But he had made up his mind. It was better to die than to live as he had been living. He could no longer live on splendid clothes and royal banquets. His soul wanted God's justice for his poor oppressed and trampled kinsfolk. His soul yearned for their deliverance. He knew how God meant them to become His people; and he wanted them to be free that they might go and be His people.

Dear to him, no doubt, was the love of his adopted mother, dear also the books he had learned to read; but a great voice from God was speaking in his heart, and bidding him leave Egypt and kings' houses, and prepare to work out the will of God in delivering His people. And he left all and went.

III. Hundreds of years ago, in one of the old Etruscan cities of Italy, there lived a young and wealthy lawyer whose name was Jacob Bendetti. He had a beautiful young wife, and he and she were once invited to a splendid ball.

Now something came in his way, so that the husband could not get to the ball at the beginning, and his wife had to go with some friends. But in a little while he arrived. When he came into the room everything was in confusion. His beautiful young wife had been seized with a sudden illness and there, or on the way home, she died.

Jacob was almost in despair. He gave up his business, sold all his possessions, gave his money to the poor, and became a minister of the gospel. People laughed at him for doing this. Always there are people who laugh at things noble or good. They said it was so silly for a rich young fellow to cry as he cried for his wife, and to sell all he had and give all his money away. And there was another thing these people thought silly. He not only began to preach to poor people about Jesus, but he wrote poems, and prayers, and parables for them in their own mother tongue. 'Oh, so silly!' cried the people who used to go to balls with him. So they called him 'Silly Jack,' and he is known as Silly Jack to this day.

But it wasn't he who was silly; it was the ignorant and stupid butterfly people who had not sense to see that he was wise.

I was reading some notes about the life and writings of this man lately, and among these notes I came upon a parable which I thought would make a good sermon for the boys and girls I speak to.

The parable is this: 'Once upon a time there was a fair young maiden who had five brothers. One was a musician, the second was a painter, the third was a merchant, the fourth was a cook, and the fifth was a builder.

'Now this fair young maiden had a beautiful diamond which her father had given her, and each of the brothers wanted it for himself.

'The first who sought it was the musician. He came to her and said, "Sell it to me; I will play you some beautiful music for it". But she said, "And when the music is ended I should have nothing"; and she refused to sell her diamond for music.

'Then came the painter. "I will paint you a splendid picture for your diamond," he said. But she replied, "Your splendid picture might be stolen, or its colour might fade. I will not sell my diamond to you."

'Next came the merchant. "Oh, sister," he said, "I will bring you such spices and perfumes from the East in my ships as you never smelled the like of; and I will give you sweet smelling roses and lilies—a garden full." But she said, "The perfumes will cease to please me, and the roses and lilies will fade".

'Then the cook came up and said, "Dear sister, I will prepare for you a splendid banquet of the finest, richest things you could eat: give your diamond to me". But she said, "After the banquet I should be hungry again and my diamond gone: no, I will not sell it to you."

'Then the builder came. He offered to build her a beautiful palace to live in—a palace that might do for a queen. "But a palace is filled with cares, even to its queen," she said, "and I cannot sell my diamond for a house full of cares."

'At last, when all the brothers had been refused, came the prince of a great kingdom and said he wished to buy the diamond. "And what will you give for my diamond?" she asked. "I will give myself," he said; "myself, and all I possess." Hearing that, the young maiden answered, "I accept that gift. I will be yours and you shall be mine for ever." Whereupon she gave him the diamond.'

Now that is the parable, and here is the interpretation. The fair young maiden is you, or your sister, or any young person you know. The father is God. And the diamond given by the father is the soul. The five brothers are the five senses, each of which wishes to get the soul all to itself. The ear comes first, and wants the soul to give itself altogether to the pleasures of music. 'That is the great life,' it says, 'just to be going to concerts and listening to fine airs and fine songs'. The eye comes next and wishes the soul to give itself away to fine sights, beautiful paintings, beautiful statues, beautiful sights on the hills and the fields. And the other senses, one after another, come and want to get the soul all to themselves—to fine gardens, to fine parties, or to fine houses.

But the soul sees that all these things perish as they are used. The soul knows that ear, and eye, and smell, and touch, and taste are only little bits of one's being; and that it would never do to give itself away to a mere little bit of its being. The soul has learned that nothing can fill the whole being except God Himself who made it. And it says, 'What would it profit me though I should gain all that the five senses could bring to me if I were to lose my very self and be cast away?'

There are plenty of people who sell their souls for music, painting, fine dinners, and beautiful gardens, and fine houses. But no wise child will do it. No one who knows Christ will do it. Christ alone is worthy to have the soul. He gave Himself for the soul; Himself and all that He has.

And the wise maiden in the parable knew that. The pleasures of earth were nothing to her in comparison with Christ. 'What are fine parties, beautiful pictures, or splendid mansions, if at the end I should lose my soul?' So she gave her soul to Christ. And she got what was better than pictures, or palaces, or fine gardens. She got Christ Himself.

True happiness is to have Christ's love in our hearts. Does Christ love me? Do I love Christ? That child has begun to live the true life who can say 'yes' to those two questions. And that is the life which Jesus brought from heaven to us. He is offering it to us when He is telling about His Father's love. He is inviting us to it when He says 'Come unto Me'. Himself is the true life. Himself is bread, and life, and love. To have Jesus for our friend, and His life in our heart, is better than gold and silver, or fine mansions, or banquets with the great. It is the grand secret of a good life. It is the true way to happiness. It is a life that will never die. And it is the life which prophets and apostles and saints are living before God's throne in heaven.—A. MACLEOD, The Gentle Heart, p. 229.

THE BLESSINGS OF MEEKNESS

'Blessed are the meek.'—MATTHEW V. 5.

I wish to speak of three ways in which meekness brings a blessing even in this present life.

I. The first way is, By saving us from Trouble.—

Sometimes we hear persons complaining that the people around them are cross or disagreeable, when the real trouble lies in themselves.

One day a little boy, whose name was Johnny Wilson, came running into the house when his sister Mary was sewing. He held something in his hand which he had found in the yard. 'Oh, Mary,' said he, 'I've found a pretty thing. It is a piece of red glass, and when I look through it everything is red too. The trees, the houses, the green grass, your face, and everything is red.'

'Yes, it's very beautiful,' said Mary; 'and let me show you how to learn a useful lesson from it. You remember the other day, you thought everybody was cross to you. Then you were like this piece of glass, which makes everything look red, because it is red. When you feel cross and disagreeable, you think everybody around you is cross and disagreeable too. But when you are in good humour, and feel kind and pleasant yourself, other people will see just the same towards you.'

I remember hearing of a little boy who was taught this same lesson by his mother in a different way. They were on a visit in the country. At the edge of the woods, near the house where they were staying, was a very fine echo. Little George didn't understand about echoes. One day his mother was sitting on the porch, and he was playing near by. Something led him to call aloud. Presently the echo of his voice came back. He didn't know what it was, but supposed that some boy in the woods was calling to him. He stood still a while.

Then he cried 'Halloo!'—'Halloo,' was the reply. 'Who are you?'—'Who are you?' asked the echo. 'Clear out!'—'Clear out.' 'You're a scoundrel!'—'Scoundrel!' 'I'll thrash you!'—'Thrash you,' said the echo. He could not stand this. So he ran to the house. 'Mother, I don't want to stay here,' said he, 'there's some bad boy down in the woods who keeps calling me names, and threatening to whip me.'

'Oh, surely not,' said his mother, who had heard it all, and knew what it was.

'Yes, indeed there is then, for he has been calling me names, and saying naughty things to me.'

'Well, go out again,' said his mother, 'and tell him he's a good boy, and ask him to have an apple.'

So the little boy ran out towards the woods, and cried 'Halloo!'—'Halloo,' was echoed back. 'You're a good boy!'—'Good boy,' was the answer. 'I'll give you an apple!—You an apple,' was heard from the woods. Then he ran back to his mother, and said, 'Why, mother, there must be two boys in the woods, a good boy and a bad boy.'

'No, my child,' said his mother, 'there is no boy there at all. It's only the echo of your own voice that you have heard. When you speak kind and pleasant words, the echoes are kind and pleasant; and when you speak cross and rude words, the echoes you hear are just the same. Kindness is like a soft, gentle echo. If we speak loving words to others, loving words will come back to us ; and it we do kind actions to others, kind actions will come back to us.'

A great while ago there was a little girl at school in France. One day she was walking with her companions in one of the public gardens in Paris. It happened that there was a soldier then on duty. He was suffering very much from thirst, but was not able to leave his post to go and get a drink. So he begged these young ladies to bring him a drink of water from a fountain not far off. The little girl's companions passed proudly on, and said it was very rude and impertinent in a common soldier to speak to them. But little Lucy had a kind and tender heart, full of meekness and gentleness, and she could not think of leaving a fellow-creature to want, when it was in her power to help him. So she ran and got some water, though her companions were scolding her for doing it. When she brought the water to the poor soldier, he drank it eagerly, and then thanked her heartily for it, and asked her to give him her name, and the name of the street and the number of the house in which she lived. She did this, and then went away.

Not long after this a dreadful massacre took place in that city of all the Protestants. Hundreds and thousands of them were cruelly murdered ! But that little girl was saved. The poor soldier had not forgotten her. He had been accustomed to scenes of cruelty and bloodshed, but that one kind action had made a deep impression on him. He sought out the little girl while the massacre was going on, and took her to a place of safety. And so she found that the echo of her kindness and gentleness came back to her amidst those fearful scenes of slaughter. Here you see how her meekness was a blessing to her in saving her from trouble.

II. The second way in which it is a blessing is, by Doing Good to Ourselves.—Meekness or gentleness is very much despised by some people, yet it is one of the mightiest things in the world. God is conquering the world to Himself by love—the love of Jesus in dying for us. And gentleness or meekness is the only way in which love shows itself in acting or speaking. A kind word, a loving, gentle voice or manner, has more power in it than all the harsh words that ever were spoken, or all the hard blows that can be given. It will subdue the stubborn will, smooth down the rugged, frowning brow, and work wonders. Why, even the dumb animals, though they don't understand what you say, yet know when you speak kindly to them.

A man was driving a loaded cart along the street one day. It was a heavy load the horse was drawing. At one place the horse did not turn in the way the carter wanted him to go. He was a cross, ill-tempered man, and he began to swear at the horse, and lash him with his whip. Still he would not go right. The more the man beat him, the more he persisted in rearing and plunging, and holding back. There was another man along with the cart of a different temper. He went up to the horse, and patted him on the neck. He stroked his mane softly, and spoke gently to him. The horse turned his head, and fixed his big eyes on the man, just as if he was trying to say, 'Why, my good fellow, I'll do anything in the world for you, because you speak kindly to me'. And then, bending his broad chest against the load, he turned the cart down the lane, and trotted along as briskly as though the load was only a plaything.

Politeness is one of the forms in which true meekness or gentleness shows itself. Now it costs very little to be polite, and it often pays very well. Some years ago there was a poor widow. She had an only son whose name was George. She was a Christian mother, and had taught her son the blessedness of meekness. He was a very gentle, polite little fellow, and very active too. One evening George's mother wanted to milk their cow. But the cow had a calf who did not like to see anyone getting the milk but itself, and would therefore make all the trouble it could while this operation was going on. So George's mother told him to catch the calf, and hold it by the ears till she had done milking. He did so ; and while he was thus engaged, a very wealthy gentleman in the neighbourhood was passing by. As he rode along, he said :—

'Good evening, my little man.'

'Good evening, sir,' said George, at the same time making a polite bow.

'But why didn't you pull off your hat, my son,' asked the gentleman, 'with such a polite bow?'

'Why, sir, you see I am holding the calf by the ears while mother milks the cow ; but if you will only have the kindness to come and hold her for me, I will take my hat off in a minute.'

The gentleman was so pleased with George's politeness, and the shrewdness of his reply, that not long after he came to see his mother. He said to her, 'My friend, your little George, is a smart boy, and if he is properly trained he'll make a great man some day. If you will allow me, I shall be glad to educate him, and give him a good start in the world.'

The mother thanked the gentleman for his kindness, and let him take charge of her son. And George rose from the ears of that calf to the highest rank as a lawyer ; he was sent to the Legislature, then to Congress, and finally he became the governor of the state. This was George M'Duffie, the Governor of South Carolina. George's polite bow made his fortune.

Everybody has heard of the Duke of Wellington. He was the greatest soldier Britain has had in this century. He defeated the great Napoleon Bonaparte at the battle of Waterloo. When this great warrior had done fighting, and had retired to private life, he was as meek and gentle as a little child. He always said, 'if you please,' when he asked for anything. He had been accustomed to command large armies, and to give orders that no one dared to disobey, and yet 'if you please' was constantly on his lips. It is said they were the last words he ever spoke. There the great warrior, the 'Iron Duke,' as he was called, is on his death-bed. A faithful servant is attending him. He thinks the duke is thirsty. He pours out a little tea in a saucer and asks him if he will have a drink. 'Yes, if you please.' He never spoke again. All about him loved him because he was so meek and gentle. 'Blessed are the meek.'

III. The third way in which it is a blessing is, By Doing Good to Others.—This is one of the ways of doing good which we can all practise. There are some ways of doing good that only rich people can practise; but we cannot all be rich, and so we cannot all do good in those ways. There are other ways of doing good that only great people can practise; but we cannot all be great, and therefore we cannot all do good in those ways. But we can all try to be meek and gentle, kind and loving, in what we say and do; and so this is a way in which we can all be engaged in doing good. And it is one of the best ways of doing good.

See, there is a poor sick and wounded soldier. He has been taken from the battle-field, and put into an ambulance waggon to be carried to the hospital. But that hospital is a long way off, and it will take him some time to reach it. As soon as the waggon begins to move, it is found that the wheels are dry, and every time they move round they make a terrible creaking, grinding noise. The springs are broken under it too, and it goes jolting and jarring over the rough roads. Ah! how the harsh noise of the creaking wheels distresses the aching head of that poor soldier! And what terrible pain the jolting causes to his wounded limb! But presently a kind person comes along. He puts some oil on the wheels, and that stops their creaking. He has the broken springs taken off, and new ones put in their place, and now the poor soldier goes softly along, with no noise, and no jolting to trouble him.

And this is just the way in which a meek or gentle spirit is trying to do good to others all the time. It is always trying to stop the creaking and jolting that worry people as they are journeying on through this world.

If you wish to be really meek, and have the blessing that Jesus here speaks of, you must become Christians. You must learn to love Jesus, and be like Him. Sometimes we see persons who call themselves Christians, and are members of the church, who yet allow themselves to get angry, and give way to very bad tempers whenever anything is said to them which they don't like. What shall we say of such persons? There is only one thing to say of them: They are not Christians! The Bible says, 'If any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of His'. If we indulge in bad tempers, and allow ourselves to get angry, don't let us say that we don't mean any harm by it, and that it isn't very wrong. It is very wrong. It is dreadfully wicked. It shows that we are not Christians, and that we are not fit to go to heaven. We should be very sorry for these sinful tempers. We should ask Jesus to forgive us, to take away all angry feelings from us, and make us meek and gentle as He is. Then we shall know what He meant when He said, 'Blessed are the meek'.—RICHARD NEWTON, Bible Blessings, p. 119.

THE PURE IN HEART

'Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God'.—
MATTHEW V. 8.

'BLESSED are the pure in heart: for they shall see God.' But what does this mean? we know, when our dear Lord shall come again to judge the world, every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him.

I. No doubt it especially means that the pure in heart shall have the nearest and dearest place to Him there.

II. But it means more. It means that they shall see Him even here. It means that the more anyone tries after that great grace of Christian modesty, the more, even in this world, they shall see how God it is Who rules all the changes and chances of their lives: the more they shall see Him in outward things; and in [their souls and hearts too, which shall be His dear Temples].

III. And then remember: all these Beatitudes are true the contrary way. If, Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God; then, Cursed are the impure in heart, for they shall not see God. That is: most especially, most particularly, most above all others, they shall be shut out from His sight, here and hereafter. If there is one sin above another which blinds our eyes, and deafens our ears, it is that of impurity. He, that spotless Lamb of God, Who condescended to have it said of Him that He cast out devils through Beelzebub the prince of the devils, never allowed one slightest suspicion of this sin to dwell on His infinitely glorious name.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons for Children (2nd edition), p. 92.

THE WARNING AGAINST SWEARING

'Swear not'.—MATTHEW V. 34.

In handling this subject, I wish to speak of three good reasons why we ought to mind this warning.

I. And the First Reason why we ought to Mind this Warning is 'Because Swearing is a Disgrace to Ourselves.'—The greatest honour that anyone can have is 'the honour that cometh from God'. And if you ask how we are to get this honour? God gives us the answer Himself, when He says, 'Them that honour Me, I will honour'. And one of the best ways in which we can honour God, is by showing proper respect to His holy name. And when we do this, we may be sure that God will honour us.

But when we swear, and take God's holy name in vain, we dishonour Him. And then we may be sure that He will dishonour us, or cause disgrace to rest upon us. And we can have no greater disgrace than to know that God is displeased with us; and that the holy angels, and all the good people in heaven, are displeased with us. And yet we may be sure that this is the case when we swear. It is a disgraceful thing to swear.

Here are two illustrations of this part of our subject. Our first story may be called, 'What a little girl thought of swearing'. A captain in the army had a month's leave of absence from the camp. He returned home to spend that holiday among the members of his family. While there he went to make a visit to an uncle who lived in the country, several miles distant from his home.

This uncle had a dear little girl, about ten years old, who loved the Saviour, and was trying to please Him in all things. She sat on her father's knee while he was talking with his nephew, the captain, and was very much distressed to hear how terribly he swore.

When he was going away, the little girl walked out with him towards the barn, where his horse was waiting for him.

As they were going there, she said to him, 'I don't like to hear you swear, cousin John, because swearing is such a disgraceful thing'.

'I know it's wrong, my dear,' he said, 'and I'm sorry I've got into the way of doing it.'

In the same gentle way, the little girl said, 'Well, then, if you know it is wrong, why do you do it?' Now this was a question much easier for her to ask than for him to answer. He felt it to be so, and did not attempt to answer it. But in speaking of it afterwards to a friend, he said, 'I never felt a reproof in all my life as I did the one given me by that little girl. I kept asking myself her question over and over again, "If I know it's wrong, why do I do it?" And then I made up my mind, that, by the help of God, I never would do so again. It is now a number of years since this took place. But from that day to this, I have never sworn another oath.'

That brave soldier was led to feel the truthfulness of the lines written by one of our English poets, who says:—

It chills my blood to hear the great Supreme,
Lightly appealed to, on each trifling theme.
Maintain your rank, vulgarity despise:
To swear is neither brave, polite, nor wise.

Our next story may be called 'The minister's reproof'. A lieutenant in the English army had gotten into the habit of swearing fearfully. At one time he was stationed at Newcastle, England. While staying there, he got into a quarrel with some labouring men who were working for him on one of the public streets. They all got very much excited, and were swearing terribly. Just then, the clergyman of a Scotch Church in the neighbourhood was passing by. He was greatly shocked by the awful oaths which he heard. On looking round at the excited crowd, he saw among them one man whom he knew. Going up to him, he laid his hand on the man's shoulder, and said, 'Oh, John, John! what is this I hear? You are only a poor collier boy, and yet swearing at this terrible rate! What will become of you? Did you ever think what a disgraceful thing it is for you, or anyone, to take in vain the holy name of that great

God in whom we live, and move, and have our being?'

And then, turning to the lieutenant, who had been swearing as badly as any of them, he said, 'You'll please excuse this poor man, sir, for he is only an ignorant fellow, and does not know any better'.

We are not told what effect the minister's words had on poor John.

But the lieutenant felt them deeply. They made him feel very much ashamed of himself. The next day he called on the minister, and thanked him sincerely for the words that he had spoken.

'I never thought before,' said he, 'what a disgraceful thing it is for poor sinful creatures such as we are, to take in vain the name of the great God of heaven. But I see it now, sir, and I wish to tell you that I have sworn my last oath.'

And so the first reason why we ought to mind this warning against swearing, is because it is a disgrace to ourselves.

II. And the Second Reason why we ought to Mind it, is 'Because it is an Injury to Others'.—If we have a companion who sets us a bad example by constantly breaking one of God's commandments, he would be doing us a great injury by tempting us to commit the same sin that he was committing. If a person who had the small-pox, or the scarlet fever, should want to keep company with us, we can understand how much injury he would do us, because we should be likely to catch his disease from him. If a playmate of yours had the power of taking away from his companions the use of their limbs, and of making them lame; of taking away the use of their eyes, and of making them blind, we can easily understand how much injury such a person would do to his companions. But if we have among our playmates one who is in the habit of swearing, and taking God's holy name in vain, there is no telling how much injury he may do us. By his example, he may lead us to commit the same great sin that he is committing, and this would be a terrible injury. And we ought to mind this warning against swearing, because of the injury it will lead us to do to others.

Several years ago an officer of the navy was a passenger in one of the cars that runs from Jersey City to Trenton. He was engaged in earnest conversation with a gentleman who sat next to him, and accompanied what he had to say with terrible oaths. A young lady, who was an earnest Christian, was sitting so near him that she had to hear every oath he uttered. At first she tried to bear it patiently; but as the swearing continued, and grew louder and worse, she was very much distressed. She looked round for another seat, further away from the swearer. But every seat in the car was occupied, and it was impossible for her to get away.

Then she made up her mind to try and stop his swearing in some way. After thinking over it for a while, she turned to the officer, and said, 'Sir, can you speak in Hebrew?'

He was very much surprised by this question, and after looking around him, in a confused sort of way, he answered the lady's question by saying, 'Well, I guess I could, if I tried.'

'Sir,' said the lady, 'it is very painful to me, and the other passengers, to hear the terrible oaths that you have been using. And if you swear any more, it will be a great relief to us if you will please do your swearing in Hebrew.'

The officer seemed thoroughly ashamed of himself. His face turned first red and then white. He looked first at the young lady, and then at the floor of the car, and then out of the window. But he stopped talking, and not another oath was heard from him, all the rest of the journey, either in English or in Hebrew. Here, we see how that officer was doing a real injury to all the passengers in that car by his swearing.

III. But the Third Reason why we ought to Mind this warning is 'Because Swearing is an Offence to God'.—Just think what it is that we are doing to God when we swear and take His holy name in vain. When the Israelites were coming out from Egypt, God met them at Mount Sinai. He came down on the top of that mountain, in the most solemn manner, and gave them in a voice of thunder His Ten Commandments. The third of these is the commandment against swearing. But when we swear, it is just as if we should take the leaf out of the Bible on which this commandment is printed, and should tear it in pieces, and trample it under our feet; and should say, while we were doing this, 'We don't care for God's commandments, and we are going to swear as much as we please'. What an offence to God that would be! There is something awful in the very thought of it. It would not surprise us, if the lightning from heaven should blaze forth against the person who did this, and consume him; or if the ground should cleave asunder beneath him, and swallow him up. Yet this is just what every swearer does. Surely, then, there can be no greater offence to God than that which swearing offers to Him.

Willie was a little boy about eight years old. His mother was a good Christian woman, and tried in every way to make him a Christian too. She had been particularly careful to teach him the Bible warning against lying and swearing. Willie loved his mother very much, and tried to remember and follow her teaching. He was generally very bright and happy. But one afternoon when he came home from school he looked very sad and unhappy. His mother said, 'Have you hurt yourself, Willie?' 'No,' was his reply. 'Have you been in any mischief?' 'No,' he said again. Still she wondered what could be the matter with her boy. At supper time he hardly ate a mouthful, and never spoke a word, though he was always in the habit of talking freely at meal-time. When supper was over, his mother said to him, 'Willie, my dear boy, do tell me what is the matter with you?'

'Oh, mother,' he said, 'on coming home from school this afternoon I swore. It was the first time I ever did it. And the moment I had spoken the oath, and thought of the great offence I had committed against God, I felt frightened, and ran home as fast as I could. I would rather be dumb all the days of my life than to be a swearer. Mother, dear, won't you please kneel down with me, and ask God to forgive me for taking His name in vain?'

Then they knelt down together, and his mother asked God to forgive the great sin he had committed, and give him grace never to do so again. When they rose from their knees, Willie wiped away the tears from his face and said: 'Thank you, my dear mother. That was the first time I ever swore, and with the help of God I am sure it will be the last.' And so Willie learned the Bible warning against swearing, from seeing what an offence it was to God.

I have one other story to illustrate this part of our subject. We may call it, 'Struck dumb by swearing'.

The incident here referred to took place some years ago in the State of Indiana. The person to whom it relates was named John Lyman.

He had been a sailor for many years, and had learned to swear in the most terrible manner. On giving up going to sea he settled in Indiana. Here he had a company of half a dozen men in his employ, who used to go about the country, working under him in different ways. On one occasion they were employed in moving out all the contents of an old barn, and stowing them away in a new barn which had just been finished. While this work was going on something occurred that made Lyman very angry. Then he began to swear at a terrible rate. He kept on swearing worse and worse. It got to be so awful that the men stopped working, and put their hands to their ears that they might not hear any more of those dreadful oaths. While this was going on, all at once Lyman stopped speaking. Then he staggered and fell to the ground. He had suddenly lost the power of speech. He was unable to move. The men carried him to the farm-house. After awhile he rallied, so as to be able to move about as usual. But from that day to the day of his death he was never able to speak another word. What an offence his swearing must have been to God, when He punished him for it in this fearful way!—RICHARD NEWTON, Bible Warnings: Addresses to Children, p. 334.

OUR FATHER

'Our Father which art in heaven.'—MATTHEW VI. 9.

I SUPPOSE that we all say this when we pray. Perhaps it is one of the earliest things that we learned to say. Let us be very thankful that we were ever taught to kneel down and pray to the Great God in heaven as our Father.

You know that it is more than eighteen hundred years since Jesus taught men to use these words. And yet only four hundred years ago the mothers in England were forbidden by law to teach their children the Lord's Prayer; for the priests wanted to keep the people as dark as possible, and only allowed them to say the Paternoster, that is the Lord's Prayer in Latin. And then afterwards, though it was allowed, the people remained so dark that thousands of children were never taught these words. The venerable Mr. Thomas Jackson tells us in his Life then when he was a boy the people were so dark and foolish that they knelt and said a jumble of rhymes about

Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John,
Bless the bed that I lie on.

So let us thank God that we have learned to say, Our Father which art in heaven.

But it is not enough to say it. You know when we pray it is not what our lips say that makes prayer, it is what our heart says. It is better, much better, to say a very poor stammering prayer that comes up from the heart, than it is to say even these sacred words if we do not think about them and mean them. I have heard a story of a little lad who was keeping his sheep one Sunday morning. The bells were ringing for the service at church, and the people were going over the fields, when this little fellow began to think that he too would like to pray to God. But what could he say? He had never learnt any prayer, yet he felt in his heart that he should like to ask the Heavenly Father for a blessing, and to help him to do right, and to keep the sheep. So he knelt down. Now it happened that a gentleman was passing on the other side of the hedge, and he heard a little lad's voice saying over the letters of the alphabet, A, B, C, D. He looked through the bushes, and there he saw this little fellow kneeling with folded hands and closed eyes, saying his A, B, C.

'What are you doing, my little man?' asked the gentleman kindly.

The little lad looked up, 'Please, Sir, I was praying'.

'But what are you saying your letters for?'

'Why, I don't know any prayer, only I felt in my heart that I wanted God to take care of me and help me, so I thought if I said all I knew He would put it together and spell what I wanted.'

'Bless your heart, my little man, He will, He will; when the heart speaks right the lips can't say wrong.'

The prayer that goes up to heaven must come from the heart. You know that in this old England years ago there were no guns, but the people shot with bows and arrows. Now if they put the arrow on the string only, and let it tumble off again, it would never shoot anything, would it? It was when they got hold of the string and pulled it back, back to the very breast, then away went the arrow and brought down the bird or the deer, or the wolf, or the foeman tall. So when our words just fall from the lips they go nowhere and do no good. But when our words go from our hearts they fly right up to heaven, and they bring down the blessings that we need.

Let us then think well of what this means—Our Father which art in heaven.

I. And first there is the word our. What a happy thing that we can all say it, and say it truly. All can claim Him as our Father. I am so glad that everybody can kneel down and say this with me—Our Father.

One day when I was a very little boy, as far back as I can remember at all, I had been dressed up in some fine clothes—a sort of plaid suit—and sent with the others for a walk. It may have been in looking for something in the woods, or it may have been that I was foolish enough to think that a boy in such fine clothes was big enough to take care of himself, how it was I don't know, but somehow I got lost. I suspect that I should have been very much frightened, but I came upon a ragged lad who looked so hungry and wretched that I forgot all about myself, and as I looked at him the tears filled my eyes. He wondered at my looking at him so, and must have wondered more as I came up to him and said:—

'Poor boy! why haven't you any nice clothes to wear, like I have?'

He told me that his father was dead, and his mother was very ill and had nothing to eat, and he had come out to gather a few sticks to make a fire for her.

My heart was full enough before, now it ran over. I took hold of the ragged sleeve of his brown smock frock and cried, 'You must come home with me; you shall. And my father shall be your father and my home shall be your home, and we will send and make your mother better, and you shall have my clothes to wear.'

Home we went, for he was bigger than I and knew the way. Then up through the streets of the town, the people looking out of their houses wondering whatever I could be doing with this ragged lad. Straight home, and still holding on to the torn sleeve, I led him from room to room looking for my mother, and told her all the sad story. Ah, I remember well how he went away—how the sleeves of my dress came far above his wrists; how he carried a great basket of good things and promises of ever so much more. I was very glad—and yet it was not all that I wanted. I wanted him to have my father for his father, to have my father's love and care every day as I had. I just wanted him to say this, Our Father. Let us thank God that we all come to Him, and all have His love and care. Every one of us can call Him our Father.

However little we are we may say Our Father.

II. Then secondly, there is the word Father.

God is our Father therefore He loves us.

How much He loves us I cannot tell. We may think of His love for ever and ever, but can never find out how great it is. It is like those seas and lakes that they cannot find the bottom of, they are deeper than anything men have to measure them with. Paul thought about it as much as anyone and he says that it passeth knowledge. I should like you to think very often of what Jesus said: 'God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.'

You remember the little child Moses, and the three

Hebrew young men who were cast into the fire; and the story of Daniel amongst the fierce lions, and how they did not harm him. One was a pillow for him, perhaps, and another a footstool. God did all these things. And He is our Father. Yours and mine. And because He is our Father too, He delights to take care of us. Do not think that all these wonderful things belonged to a wonderful age, and that there are no such wonders now. Things quite as wonderful are going on every day, through our Father's loving care.

III. Thirdly, God is our Father.

Then we should honour Him. You remember His commandment, the first commandment with promise. 'Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee'. And if we are thus to honour our earthly parents how much more should we honour our Father Who is in heaven? Let us always think of Him with reverence. The Lord is a great God and a great King above all gods, let us therefore give unto the Lord the glory due unto His name. We are sinful and unworthy to come to Him at all. Let us always come to Him in the way He has taught us in His Word. Jesus said No man cometh unto the Father but by Me. We must come bringing with us the precious blood of Jesus as our sacrifice. Cain came to the Father bringing only the fruits of the earth, and his offering was not accepted. Abel brought with him the blood of the lamb, and with him God was well pleased. It pointed on to that Lamb of God Who taketh away the sin of the world. He is the great, the holy, and the high, and He accepts of us only when we come to Him through Jesus Christ.

There is yet another thing that we must not forget. God is our Father, then we must love Him.

Love always wants love back again. It won't take anything else, it must have love. One day little Mary said to her mother: 'Mother, I love Jane so much, but I think Jane only likes me'.

'Why? Isn't she kind to you?' asked the mother.

'Oh, yes, mother, she is kind enough, and all that. But she is not glad when I come, like I am when she comes. She does not love me just like I love her.' Little Mary was just finding out what I have said, that love must have love back again.

We can never satisfy our Father in heaven with anything but our love. He loves us, and we must love Him. How do you think I should feel if I had a little child who was always very good and proper, always spoke very nicely and did what he was told, but did it all because he ought, and not because he loved me and tried to please me? I am sure that I should feel grieved, and say with little Mary, my love wants love back again.

You may sometimes see in old churches the image of a knight carved in stone. There he kneels, with his hands clasped, and his eyes shut, and looking so very good. But it is all cold and dead. There are hands and eyes, but there is no heart in it. Many men and women pray like that stone knight. Indeed, you may find in the Bible where God sent one of the prophets to tell the people that they drew near to Him with their lips, but their hearts were far from Him. Our Father wants our hearts. Try with all your might to think in everything—What will please our Father in heaven? In your play or in your work, at school or at home, in the business that you are learning, and in the friendships that you are forming, have this in your mind—let me please my Father in heaven. Ask Him to help you. Because He is the Father let us love Him with all our hearts.

And again, if God is our Father we must obey Him.

Be quite sure that He stands on His holy hill watching us with tenderest love, watching when it is wild and stormy. And by and by He too shall come to welcome us home to the Father's house.—MARK GUY PEARSE, Sermons for Children, p. 143.

TRESPASSES

'Forgive us our trespasses.'—MATTHEW VI. 12.

WE often say these words, let us try this afternoon and see if we understand exactly what they mean. Sometimes I am afraid I say words without thinking of what we are saying, or trying to find out all they mean. Now, what are trespasses? Let us see.

Suppose we are taking a walk along a country road with hedges or fences on each side, and see all at once in a field on the other side of one hedge some beautiful wild flowers growing—or perhaps, if it is autumn, trees laden with nuts, and think we should like to climb over and get some. Just as we are going to climb over we see a board with this notice, 'Trespassers will be prosecuted'. What does that mean? Why it means that we mustn't cross over the hedge or fence, but keep to the road, or we may be prosecuted. And so, as we don't wish to get into trouble by doing wrong, we keep to the road.

Of course, if there were no fence or board we might be excused if we went astray, but as it is, it would be our own fault if we were punished.

You and I are walking on a road every day of our lives; the road of life, which leads from this world to the next. This road has a fence or a hedge on each side to keep us right; and there is a notice-board too, to tell us if we cross over we shall be punished. You know what these fences and these notice-boards are? Yes. God's commandments, and if we break them we commit a trespass or a sin, and so displease God.

Some of these fences or laws are, 'Thou shalt not steal,' 'Honour thy father and thy mother,' 'Thou shalt not bear false witness'.

Now when we kneel down at night to say our prayers, we should try and find out how we have trespassed, what sins we have committed, in thought, word, and deed, against God, and then ask Him to forgive them for Christ's sake.

And now let us see what we mean when we say, 'Forgive us our trespasses'. It doesn't mean we want Him to forgive us because we are afraid of being punished. No, if we meant that, it would be unworthy of us as God's children. Supposing you disobeyed your parents in any way, if you loved them you would feel sorry because you had displeased them; you would know they would be very grieved and sad because you had disobeyed them, and if you asked them to forgive you, that would be a sign of your sorrow. 'I am very sorry I have done this,' you would say, 'will you forgive me?'

You couldn't undo the past, but you could show you were sorry for it. So when we ask God, our Father in heaven, to forgive us our trespasses, that is one way of showing our sorrow that we have grieved Him.

It is a very easy thing to kneel down and say, 'Forgive us our trespasses,' but it isn't so easy really to mean and feel what we say.

When you ask your parents to forgive you and say how sorry you are, and that you will try and do better for the future, they can't always tell whether you are in earnest, and may forgive you when perhaps you have no right to forgiveness. But it isn't so with God. He knows whether we are really in earnest. He can read our hearts, and sees where the words really come from; if only from our lips or from the bottom of our hearts.

And so when we say, 'Forgive us our trespasses,' we should try to be in earnest and ask God to make us truly sorry that we have grieved Him. We should try and remember how dreadful a thing sin is. Sometimes we forget what a serious thing it is to commit a trespass or sin. But look. See, there is Jesus Christ hanging on the cross. Why is He dying there? Ah! you know, it is to save us from our sins. Then, if it cost so much to redeem us and save us from sin, what a dreadful thing it must be in the sight of God. So when we ask God to forgive us our sins, let us try and feel really sorry that we have done that which grieves our Father in heaven.

But does this prayer only mean we are sorry because we have sinned against God? No, it means more than that—it means that we know God still loves us in spite of our sins and that He is always willing to forgive us.

There was once a father here in England who had a very bad son, who had done many things to bring sorrow and shame upon his family. At last, however, his father said to him, 'You are no longer a son of mine, you must leave this house; it shall never be your home again, for I will never forgive this last act of yours.'

The son went abroad for two or three years, and at last came to see how badly he had behaved to his friends, and a feeling of deep sorrow filled his heart. Yes, it was quite true; he had deserved all he had suffered, but he would go back and ask his father's forgiveness, and then perhaps the old home would open its doors for him again. So he wrote two letters, one to his father and another to his sister, saying when he should be back in his native village, and asking her to meet him.

It was Christmas Eve when he reached the village, and as it was too late to do anything that night, he went to stay at an inn. As he lay awake listening to the bells chiming from the old church tower, to welcome the birthday of the Lord Jesus Christ, he thought they seemed to be sounding out a message of love and forgiveness for him. The next day he met his sister; but she had no good news for him; she brought no story of peace and goodwill from his father, such as the angels sang when Christ was born.

'Tell him,' this was the message from his father, 'tell him I will never forgive him'. And so whilst the church bells were once more pealing forth and inviting God's children to come and hear the story of their Father's love in sending Christ, His only Son, on earth to seek and save them, that young man turned away in sorrow from his home, because the old love had died out from his father's heart, and the prayer for forgiveness had been uttered in vain.

But we know that our Heavenly Father is always waiting to forgive us, His love never dies out, however much we sin against Him; and when we say, 'Forgive us our trespasses,' we are quite sure that our prayer will be answered if it is said in earnest. And so when night comes let us kneel down and confess our sins to God, and ask Him to pardon us for Christ's sake; we can then lie down to rest with a peaceful happy heart and say, My Father in heaven still loves me, and I will try and love Him more because He is so kind and good to me.—R. G. SOANS, Sermons for the Young, p. 37.

THE FOWLS OF THE AIR

'Behold the fowls of the air,' etc.—MATTHEW VI. 26.

THE Lord Jesus was anxious that even the fowls of the air should not be overlooked. There is no danger of little boys or girls overlooking any pet fowl or bird which they own; but the fowls of the air, which are not owned by anyone, often remain unnoticed. Especially is this the case in wintry days, when their songs are not heard, and when poor songless birds remain perched upon the trees in the biting east wind or nipping frost, having given up all search for food, since the snow everywhere lies thickly on the ground. Our Lord would have little children think even of those birds which have little about them to win notice, as well as those which have rich plumage and sweet songs wherewith to win our favour.

Now Jesus, in His teaching, calls attention only to two birds in particular. But I imagine some little child saying, 'I should like to know the names of those birds. How beautiful they must be, and how sweet their song, for Jesus to pay them such honour!' No; He Who paid special attention to men and women who were neglected and despised by grander folk had an extra thoughtfulness for poor despised and neglected birds. (1) One bird specially mentioned by our Lord is the raven: 'Consider the ravens' (Luke xii. 24). One strange fact about the raven was that it was the only bird of its particular order which the law of Moses pronounced unclean. Yet Jesus would have us consider that poor despised bird, and teaches us that God feeds it. Again, there has been a very general and ancient belief that the older ravens are very neglectful of their young, and that Job (see chap. xxxviii. 41) and the Psalmist (see Ps. cxlvii. 9) refer to God's tender care of the young ravens which are so cruelly neglected by their parents. Whatever may be said about that, we know that the ravens are not very charming birds. Like some people, whatever you do for them, all they can do is to look very black and croak. They are also great eaters, and have very voracious appetites. It takes a great deal to satisfy ravens. Their great danger is to die of hunger, since what would content other birds cannot satisfy them; yet 'God feedeth them'. (2) Jesus speaks, too, of the sparrow. Now, the sparrows of Palestine, like ours, have nothing specially to recommend them—a grey coat and a shrill chirrup, that is all. Their danger consists chiefly in being caught in nets and sold for food. The raven was not in danger of this because it was unclean. But the sparrows are sold by thousands in the East, and very cheaply. Our Lord exclaimed, 'Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing?' (Matt. x. 29). And again, 'Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings?' You see that in the second case the fifth sparrow was thrown into the bargain. Even the seller did not reckon the odd bird; but our Father does—'one of them' shall not fall on the ground without your Father.

Both the raven and the sparrow belong to an order of birds who have not the strength of the birds of prey, and who, on the other hand, have not the fixed food of other birds; yet 'your Heavenly Father feedeth them'. Notice He is the God of the raven and the sparrow, but your Heavenly Father. You have learnt of Jesus to call Him, 'Our Father, Who art in heaven'. Then you never need be anxious and doubt His care for you. How much dearer are you in His sight than the fowls!—DAVID DAVIES, Talks with Men, Women, and Children (1st Series), p. 41.

THE SWALLOWS

'Behold the fowls of the air.'—MATTHEW VI. 26.

You know how our dear Lord often chose the things that we see around us, the fowls, the trees, the crops, the flowers, the birds, to teach us about Himself and about His kingdom. He left us an example that we should do as He did.

Now, then, let us see what we can learn from a swallow's nest, and from all that happened in it last year, in the early part, I mean, of the summer before this.

It was as lovely an evening in June as you ever saw: in one or two of the fields the hay had been cut, and was lying ready, after a day or two of sunny weather, to be carried. The cowslips were beginning to die off, the foxgloves were beginning to bud, the trees were at their very greenest, the flowers at their very brightest. Everything showed how beautiful a summer can be.

In the eaves of an old, old farm-house, a swallow had built her nest of clay and earth; there she had brought up her five young ones; there they were fledged; and there they had grown up to nearly their full strength.

'It is a beautiful country, this where we are now living,' said the mother-bird; 'but you know we shall not live here always. The time will come when we shall have to cross the wide, wide sea, before we can settle down in what is really our home.'

'But why can we not stay here always?' asked one of the little ones.

'Because,' answered the mother, 'the time will come when all these trees that now look so beautiful will lose their leaves; the days will grow very short and cold; all the ground will become as hard as stone, and there will be no worms to pick out of the beds, or flies to catch in the air. You cannot guess from what you have seen in your little lives, what a miserably cold, dark time winter is. You cannot tell what it will be when all the water turns into ice, and the ground is covered with snow, and men light up great fires in their houses, and, when they go out, go out wrapped as warmly as they can; and when a great many of the poor birds who live here all the year are starved or frozen to death.'

All the little brood of birds began to look very grave, and to ask all manner of questions at once.

'How long will it be before we have to go?' said one.

'How long will it take us to get there?' asked another.

'What kind of a country is it that we have to go to?' inquired a third.

'Can none of us stay here?' asked a fourth.

'I cannot tell you,' said the mother, 'the exact time when we shall have to leave this land. That must depend on the weather; whether the wind is warm and the sky is unclouded, or whether the wind comes from the north, and the thick black clouds shut out the sun altogether. It may be ten days sooner or later: but some time in the autumn, when the leaves begin to turn yellow, and to fall from the trees, when the acorns begin to drop from the oak, and the hawthorn berries are quite ripe, then we shall have to go.'

'And how long will it take us to go?'

'That, too, depends on how the wind blows, and on what the weather is. But we shall have to fly day and night; not over land like this, where we could rest if we are tired, but over the great water men call the sea, for a day and a night, and perhaps part of another day, before we can come to our real home. You think these trees and flowers very beautiful; and so they are; but what will you say when you see the great trees and the bright flowers of that country! the tall palms that tower up far above the oaks and elms here, and the sweet fruits, the guavas and the bananas, and the custard apples, that are in that land. But now you see why it is I am so anxious for you to strengthen your wings, and to try how far and how fast you can fly; why I do not like your loitering in this nest, but would have you, day by day, go farther and farther from it. For, depend upon it, it is as much as any of us can do to cross that sea at last, and when we do come to the other side, some of us are more dead than alive, and though we have reached it, it required all our strength to get there, and we were all but exhausted by the journey.'

Well, as you may easily think, the little birds for some time thought and talked a good deal about what their mother had told them. They often wondered, as the long, long days of summer came on, how there could be any country more beautiful than this. When they had tried their wings for a longer time than usual and felt tired, they were sometimes afraid that their strength would never hold out; and they would sometimes try to fancy that unknown land; what it was, what kind of creatures lived there, and what trees they could be that were so much more beautiful than these. But as July came on, and the weather grew warmer and warmer, one or two of them (foolish little birds) began to doubt whether it could be as their mother said. 'She talked,' said one, 'of the air getting cold, and the days becoming shorter. I am sure that it is a great deal warmer than it was when she spoke to us.'

'I do think,' said one of the others, 'that the days are a little shorter.'

'I don't see that,' said the first, 'but I am quite sure that it is hotter.'

'However that may be,' said the youngest, whom we may call Tiny, 'I believe what our mother said; and I try every day harder and harder to prepare myself for our journey.'

'You, Tiny!' cried the others, 'such a poor little weak thing as you, you will never be able to pass that great sea, whoever else can!'

'I will do my best,' said Tiny, 'and I hope after all to see that beautiful country, some day, of which my mother is so fond.'

July passed away, and still the hot weather continued, and though the days did shorten a little it was nothing to speak of. But as August went on the little birds were astonished to see some of the leaves, as those on the willow, turning yellow. And though the days were very hot there was a chilliness in the evenings, and a heaviness in the dew that they had never known before. And towards the end of August the sun began to set very much sooner; and they could almost see a difference in his time of setting every evening. And now sometimes the old birds began to hold a council which the young ones were not allowed to attend; and at last the mother of our little brood told them that it would not be so very long before they had to leave this land.

All of them felt very uncomfortable, and they began to feel sadder and sadder, when the next two or three days were darker and wetter than any they had yet seen.

The eldest of the whole brood had been the most backward in trying its strength. Its mother had often warned it that unless it would practise now, it never would have any chance of crossing the sea. But for all that it had led a sadly idle life, only exercising itself just as much as it was necessary to get a living, and then resting. The one next to it, the strongest of the whole brood, delighted in proving its strength, but never could believe the stories of the long nights and the cold days which the old birds told.

At last all the trees began to turn yellow, the leaves fell from the walnut and the lime and the willow; every rough breeze swept down hundreds of beech-nuts, and chestnuts; the wheat-sheaves were long ago safely housed in the barns; and the days and nights were nearly equal. One fine evening the mother of these little birds called them together again, and said: 'In a very few hours the time will come that is fixed for our departure. When once we have left the land, I shall be able to do nothing more to help you till we reach that other country. You will have to take care of yourselves. Only keep as near as you can to me; or if you are separated from me, then keep close to the band of swallows with whom we shall go: else you will miss your way, and never reach the beautiful country that I have so often told you of. In the meantime you must keep close to the nest, that whenever the notice is given, we may all be ready to obey it.'

Two evenings after this, about an hour before sun-setting, an old and very swift swallow went flying round to all the eaves of the farms and old houses near, and appointed them to meet on a certain hill (one of that range of hills that we see when looking to the south), and by the spire of the church there at sunset. So they took their last meal, and by the time appointed were on the wing; but with very different feelings. The eldest bird, who had never exercised himself, began to doubt whether he could ever bear the fatigue: the second would rather have stayed in his own familiar woods, and skinned round the old, well-known buildings; Tiny, a weak little bird, after all, was terribly afraid of the distance, but resolved to do her best.

As the sun set, they met by hundreds and hundreds round the spire. Presently the signal was given, and all the birds set off for the south. And as they passed many and many a little village, they were joined by fresh hosts of birds; so that when they first came in sight of the sea, instead of hundreds they might have been reckoned by tens of thousands.

When they first came in sight of the sea! Ah, then it was that the courage of the eldest bird utterly failed. When he saw nothing before him but the broad, broad water, and found that the army of his companions were still winging their way towards it, he resolved to take his chance and remain behind.

There was no time for a long consultation then. The season of preparation and advice was over. Those that were ready must make the effort at once;

those that were not ready had now no hope. It was in vain that his mother, and the rest of his little family, tried to urge him on; stay he would, and stay he did. There were a few sunny days in which he could still enjoy himself in his old haunts. But then came clouds thicker, and rain heavier than ever. Three or four weeks of misery: the recollection of his companions now safely at home in that sunny and beautiful country; and then one night of sharp frost put an end for ever to the sufferings and sorrows of the poor bird.

But as for the rest. As they passed over France, still fresh and fresh hundreds joined themselves to the huge army. And when they were fairly over the Atlantic Ocean, swiftly as they flew, and wide as they stretched out, it took half an hour for the whole body to pass any one spot. All that night, and all the next day, they went southward, southward still; but towards the evening, just as the sun was about to sink into the purple ocean (oh, how purple it is out there, at such a distance from land!) Tiny, who had all this while kept close to her mother, said that her strength was failing. The poor mother tried to comfort and support her as well as she could; but they flew slower and slower; and the great multitudes of birds were passing before them. At last, just as Tiny's strength was about to fail, far below them they beheld a ship.

'I will keep with you my child,' said the mother; 'it is not the first time I have rested on the houses which men build upon the seas.'

And in another minute they were resting on its mast. The sailors, as they always do, strewed bread-crumbs on the deck, left a wide space for the weary birds, and did everything they could to make them welcome. So they ate and were refreshed: while all that night the ship was bearing them towards the land whither they were going.

And a stormy night it was: and among the hundreds that perished in the tempest was that one of our little birds, who had most trusted in his strength, and had feared nothing at first setting forth.

The rest of a night and a fine morning sent forth our two birds, Tiny and her mother, on their way, and brought them to their home.

And now you have seen the lesson that they teach us. We, like them, belong to a better country than this: we, like them, but for our own fault, shall return thither: we know not the exact time, but we know that there is a certain time beyond which we cannot linger. The ocean, across which none, save God Himself, can help us, is death. And so the next time you see those swallows preparing, as you may see them now, for their autumn journey, think whether you are preparing for yours. You have every help now which can assist you in your preparation. God grant you so to use them that when the time shall come, however terrible that passage must be to every one, it may, nevertheless, be safe to you, and blessed, beyond the power of words to speak, in its ending!—J. M. NEALE, Sermons for Children (2nd edition), p. 215.

GOD'S CARE FOR THE BIRDS

MATTHEW VI. 26.

TO-DAY I have been out among the green lanes, and there I saw some wonderful proofs of God's care of birds. You will think it strange, yet it is true, there are people who do not think God has care for His creatures. But I think everything about us speaks of His care, not for man alone, but for the animal world.

The hedges are covered with red berries and black; the bright red clusters of the mountain-ash, the elder-berries, the great red pods of the dog-rose, the small dark-red berries of the hawthorn, and the black-berries, they are plentiful on every thicket and wild-growing hedge. Now, I have been noticing one thing in these fruits. First, there are hardy ones, like the berries of the mountain-ash and the hawthorn, which will remain ripe on the trees for many weeks. But there are others which are not hardy, like blackberries, which must be gathered when they are ripe. These do not all ripen at once, but gradually, twig by twig, branch by branch, as the sun reaches in to them; so that they will go on ripening and giving newly-ripened berries for weeks to come. Now it appears to me as if our Lord must have been thinking of something like this when He spoke of how God cared for birds. These hedges are God's table for the birds for bleak winter months. From April till June He feeds some of them with caterpillars and grubs, and others with other things; from June till August they have seeds of a thousand kinds, and because they are in one sense our fellow-creatures, and also our fellow-workers in our orchards and harvest-fields, we give them a share of our corn and barley and fruit. But, when these are all cleared away, God spreads a new table for them, covers the hedgerows with clusters of beautiful berries, which hang through the winter. Such is provision for some birds. For other kinds of birds He has other winter stores. These other birds I have often seen in a certain week in late autumn gathering in flocks and settling on the roof of a church, and when the entire flock was gathered the whole multitude of it spread their wings, rose up and up, higher and higher, flew away and away into a warmer land, where God had taught them to go; where He had prepared stores of new grubs, new seeds, new berries for them. And so they went year by year. Such is God's care for the birds.

Now, God has more care of you; He has furnished a far better feast for you; to you Jesus has been given to be your Bread of Life. 'Are you not much better than they?'

It is beautiful to think how God cares for the sparrows. It is still more beautiful to think how much more He cares for you.

Sometimes in Italy the people meet to have a great holiday. They call that holiday the 'Carnival'. The streets are filled with people. In the windows of the houses people sit with baskets of flowers and sweets, which they throw at the people in the streets. From all the villages round about at one of these carnivals the people went into the city; but one peasant boy preferred to be at home—a bright-eyed boy. He remained at home to play with his pet sparrow. And when everybody else was gone away, he took out the cage of his pet, opened the door, took the sparrow on the forefinger of his one hand and fed it with the other. They had a happy time together. Brightly shone the little bird's eye; loudly it chirped its song of thanks to its dear friend and master. The boy told his love to the bird; the bird trilled back its love to the boy. But something was going wrong; the air grew black, and then arose near and far an awful sound. The earth began to heave, the houses to fall, the houses of the rich and the houses of the poor—and the cattle were filled with terror. It was an earthquake.

The boy, thinking of his sparrow, fastened it up in its cage and hung the cage on its peg. But the earth heaved under the poor boy's house and the house was shaken to pieces, and walls and roofs fell down. And the boy was caught in the falling ruins and buried (his brother also; his brother flung his arms about his neck, and thus they died, and in the ruins they were buried), and all that was visible of the boy that had been so happy with his little bird in the morning was his hand. His hand rose up out of the ruins. And then came other shocks of the earthquake, and one of these unlatched the door of the cage, and the little bird flew out. Where did it fly to? To the hand of its dear young master—to the hand on which it had perched in the morning.

The living bird, the dead boy, the ruined cottage, the heaving earth; but God, our God, is over all, good and strong and blessed for ever.

I am only a little sparrow,
A bird of low degree;
My life is of little value,
But the Lord doth care for me.

I have no barn or storehouse,
I neither sow nor reap;
God gives me a sparrow's portion,
But never a seed to keep.

If my meal is sometimes scanty,
Close picking makes it sweet;
I have always enough to feed me,
And life is more than meat.

I know there are many sparrows;
All over the world we're found:
But our Heavenly Father knoweth
When one of us falls to the ground.

Though small, we are never forgotten;
Though weak, we are never afraid;
For we know that the dear Lord keepeth
The life of the creatures He made.

And God had some good reason for letting the sparrow's little master be buried in the ruins.

He was taking him from evil to come. He was taking him where he would be for ever safe from sin.

It is still a great mystery. But one thing is clear. You see God cares for the sparrow, and the Lord says, 'He will much more care for you'.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 63.

FLOWERS

'Consider the lilies of the field.'—MATTHEW VI. 28.

OUR Lord took for His text one day the flowers which grew in their brightness and beauty, the bright red lilies which dotted the fields of Galilee, and so I would do to-day. As you look at these lovely flowers which you have here presented as an offering, and of which some will be distributed to poor sick children in the hospitals by gentle and loving hands, 'consider them, how they grow'. I would ask you to consider three things about flowers and their growth. I. How quietly they grow. II. How innocent they are. III. How useful they are.

I. We often think that noise means power. The thunder, as it rolls and echoes along a mountain-side; the storm, as it tears and rages through a forest; the cataract, as it descends in foam and spray; or the deafening clang of the machinery in some great factory—these things seem to be strong and powerful. But the forces of Nature, which work without noise or noise, are quite as mighty and effective. Through some calm winter night the snow will fall so silently that it disturbs not the lightest sleeper, and each little flake is so tender that a touch destroys it; and yet the vast snow-drifts defy all your efforts to remove them, and the great engine, which seems to rush on the line with irresistible power, stands defeated by the silent snow. Or, year after year, with no noise whatever, the tree grows up from an acorn to be a mighty giant of the forest, and the silently formed oak resists the great storms which beat upon it. So it is that the strongest things and the loveliest things grow silently. All these beautiful flowers, and all these ripe fruits—so lovely, so useful, they have all grown in silence.

It is just so with our lives. You tender plants in the garden of God, your lives ought to grow up with all lovely flowers of virtues, and with all useful fruits, quietly and silently. You must not always be making a great fuss about every little deed of kindness you do, and every little piece of work you accomplish, and every kind and loving word you speak. Noise, does not mean growth and progress. God sees everything; but I am sure He looks with most approving love on those things which make least noise. It does not matter in the least whether other people see and admire them. God knows all your silent prayers, all your silent deeds of tenderness and love.

A gentleman was walking late one night along a street in London, in which stands the hospital where some of our little friends support a bed<sup>1</sup> for a sick child. There were three acrobats passing along there plodding wearily home to their miserable lodgings after their day's work ; two of them were men, and they were carrying the ladders and poles with which they give their performance in the streets whenever they can collect a crowd to look on. The third was a little boy in a clown's dress. He trotted on wearily behind, very tired, and looking pale and sick.

Just as they were passing the hospital, the little lad's sad face brightened for a moment. He ran up the steps, and dropped into the box attached to the door a little bit of paper. It was found next morning there. It contained a sixpence, and on the paper was written, 'For a sick child'. The one who saw it afterwards ascertained, as he tells us, that the poor little waif, almost destitute, had been sick, and in his weary pilgrimage was a year before brought to the hospital, which had been a 'House Beautiful' to him, and he was there cured of his bodily disease. Hands of kindness had ministered to him, words of kindness had been spoken to him, and he had left it cured in body and whole in heart. Some one on that day in a crowd had slipped a sixpence into his hand, and that same night, as he passed by, his grateful little heart gave up for other child sufferers 'all the living that he had'. It was all done so quietly, so noiselessly ; but, oh ! believe me, the sound of that little coin falling into God's treasury that night rose above the roar and din of this mighty city, and was heard with joy in the very presence of God Himself.

II. How innocent and pure the flowers are. Can you imagine a flower making any one have an evil thought, or exciting in any one a bad passion ? Why, the lily, for example, is almost another name for Purity and Innocence. Keep your hearts innocent as long as you can ; be pure in thought, in deed, in word. That seems to be the lesson which those pale-lipped evangelists, the lilies, would teach you. Keep out of your hearts all envious, proud, unkind thoughts. Keep your lips unsoiled by any hard, passionate, spiteful, false, or cruel words. Let your deeds be tender, brave, and true. Grow as noiselessly and quietly as the flowers grow up to their innocence and purity.

The illustrious Queen Caroline Mathilda, of Denmark, was one day tempted to commit a great sin, and she wrote on her castle window with a diamond, so that the words might be constantly present to her as words of prayer, 'O God ! keep me innocent. If Thou wilt, make others great.' What a blessed day this might be in your memories for ever and ever, if you resolved that this night, and every morning and night while you live on earth, you would pray these simple words, pray this from your heart of hearts, 'O God ! keep me innocent'. Do make that resolve to-day.

III. Flowers are not only beautiful and innocent, they are useful also.

What can be more useful work than that of a teacher ? Are not the flowers teachers ? Have they not been preaching to us to-day, giving us lessons of life and duty ? I remember a poor old sick woman once said to me, as she pointed to a little bunch of violets in a glass by her bed, 'Them flowers, sir, preach to me so beautifully'. You who have fine gardens in the country, and even here in town have your houses filled with flowers, can scarcely understand what a rare blessing flowers are to the poor people who live in the dark and crowded streets of our city. Children have grown up to be almost men and women without seeing a flower ; and so when they get a flower they value it much, and its beauty and its perfume seem to teach them lessons of purity and love.—T. ### CLEAR THE LINE !

'Seek ye first.'—MATTHEW VI. 33.

WE are all born explorers ; there is nothing we like better when we are little than to seek, and seek, and rummage about and find new places and things. Whether it is an old cupboard, or a crooked street, or a bit of a wood on the fringe of a meadow, there is a thrill of pleasure in exploring it and finding out all about it, such as we never have after discovering all that is there.

I suppose that is why every healthy boy and girl likes books of adventures and tales of travel. Oh, to have been with Columbus when first he looked on the New World ! Oh, to have stood beside Magellan when his ship first glided into the silent, mighty Pacific Ocean ! But it's no use wishing ; it is very nice, but it doesn't bring us any nearer. All the same we love to hear and read of the men who were the first to do things and the first to see them, and we can't help wishing for what we love, can we ?

As we said, there is a bit of the explorer in us all. We like to find out, and if we are the first to find out, so much the better. And it is well that it should be so, for there isn't anything worth having but needs to be sought out, and hunted up, and asked and asked for again. That's why you are always asking 'Why?' You were made to do it. You see, this is a big world, with a great many things in it, and you never saw them before or knew they were there, and so you must ask Why ? Why ? Why ? if you are ever to find out and learn. It is a good thing, then, of itself, to have the seeking spirit.

But everything depends on how we use it, if it is to do us any good. The boy who goes seeking for blackberries, when he has been sent to seek for his little brother who has wandered away, will have a very bad quarter of an hour after he gets home. No harm, but much good, in seeking for blackberries ; but much harm and no good in seeking for them when we should have been seeking for something else. And it is the same about everything ; what we are doing may be right enough in itself, but it may be all wrong because we are doing it at the wrong time. There is a first and a second and a third, and very many more after these, and if we put the third second, or the second first, we have turned things the wrong way about, and are certain to suffer for it ourselves, and to make others suffer too.

What, then, is the first thing we should seek? Most people say, Money! Oh, to be rich! to be able to buy things, and roll about in a carriage, and live in a big house, and have tarts every day! Let me tell you a tale by a great poet.

There was a poor Roman scholar once, who was very clever and gave promise of doing much good in the world. One day he saw a strange statue with curious writing carved upon it. He could read and understand the writing, and it made him watch the shadow which the statue cast on the ground, and this led him to discover his way into a hall that was stored with riches—silver and gold and precious gems. What a quantity he gathered together! What dreams he had of the great mansion he would build and the grand things he would do! Just as he turned to go, however, he saw at his feet a wonderful green stone, and he stooped to lift it, for it was worth the price of a kingdom. But the stone was fixed to the ground, and as he struggled to loosen it he saw the figure of a knight in armour that stood near slowly lift his bow and draw the arrow on the string. The arrow struck the great jewel by which the hall was lighted, and in an instant all was dark. It was in vain the scholar groped and groped to find the door by which he had entered; he could not come by it, and so perished miserably in the dark by the side of all the treasure he had gathered together.

That is an interesting story, is it not? But what does it mean? Just this: the riches are dear, dear, however abundant they may be, that are got at the cost of all that makes the light of life for us. They never, never should be the first.

And so there are many other things that people put first, only to find—perhaps when too late—that they should have been second, or third, or even farther down.

Jesus leaves us in no mistake. He speaks the right, clear, bold word we all need when He says, 'Seek ye first!—what? The kingdom of God and His righteousness. That means—make it your first concern about everything to be right with God.

That fits everybody. There are some things we may never hope to be able to do: they may be too great, or too wise, or too difficult for us, or they may take too long a time, or more strength than we shall ever have. But—to be right with God!—we can all seek this, and seek successfully, too. How? By trying to live up to Jesus. He is like the top line of the copy-book, and as we imitate that, we come by and by to write like it. He is the Friend, and as we keep close by Him we come to speak as He speaks, and do as he does, and be as He is. What is more—He is the Helper, and when we have done wrong He can put us right. To believe in Him, to love Him and strive to be like Him—that is the first thing every one of us has to do.

I had a dream once: many have had a similar one with the eyes open. And I saw a great many people standing before God. They were telling about all they had done. One had been a king, and had built vast palaces; another had been a soldier, and had conquered in many a battle; another had been a merchant, and had employed thousands of people; and so on. But one question was asked them: 'Did you do the first thing?' One by one they hung their heads—and when I looked again they had vanished away, and there was only the sound of sobbing in the air.

Then set your hearts on seeking Jesus and pleading Him as the first thing of everything you have to do. Everything else you want and everything else you need He promises to send, and send in the right time and way, as you keep doing this. It is a promise, and Jesus never breaks His promises. Trust Him.

When the King has an important message to telegraph everything else has to be set aside. 'Clear the line!' is the word that is then passed on, and till the royal message has been sent no other can be despatched.

That is the way this message from Jesus is sent to us. It comes saying, 'Clear the line!' Everything else—books, play, work—must be second or third or fourth. 'Seek ye first!—' that is the command, and till we have obeyed it we have not even begun to be right with God.

So begin now—at once. When it is a matter of life and death (as this is) of obeying God or disobeying Him, there is need that we should promptly 'Clear the line!' and hearken and do. Seek first—seek first—Jesus. 'They that seek shall find.'—J. REID HOWATT, The Children's Preacher, p. 5.

ON PUTTING THE RIGHT THING FIRST

'Seek ye first the kingdom of God.'—MATTHEW VI. 33.

It is a great thing in a child's life to know the first thing to seek after. It is greater still, when that is known, to seek that first thing first.

What most people do is to seek some second thing first, and the first thing second, or not at all.

Now there are just two things in life which people seek after. These are right things and nice things. And of these two, the first to seek after is the right thing; the second is the nice or pleasant thing.

In the Sermon on the Mount, our Lord, speaking of those two things, says—Seek the right thing first, and the pleasant things will come after. 'Seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things,' all pleasant things, things like food and clothing, shall be 'added unto you.' It is the same as if He had said, Seek first what ye ought to seek, and God will send you what you would like to get. The right things, the things of God, and of heaven, and of the soul, first; the pleasant things, the things of the world, of earth, and of the body, next. God, religion, duty, first; honour, health, happiness, next.

I. The great King Solomon began life by seeking the best things first. He had sought knowledge and wisdom from the Prophet Nathan when a boy. And when he was made king, hardly out of his boyhood, he began his reign by seeking the help of God. One of his first acts as a king was to take his great captains, judges, and counsellors up to the hill Gibeon, to ask this help from God.

It must have been a great sight, the beautiful young king in his royal robes, the soldiers in their armour, the counsellors and judges in their robes of honour, as they went up the sides of the hill to the place of prayer. Priests were there with sheep and oxen for the sacrifice. There still was the old tent which had gone with the people in all their wanderings. There also was the brazen altar which Bezaleel had made for Moses long before in the wilderness. The air was filled with the clang of trumpets as the king and his mighty men went up. Then rose from the brazen altar the smoke of the sacrifices. 'A thousand burnt-offerings did Solomon offer upon that altar.' A beautiful sight! But the beautiful thing at the heart of it all was this—that it was a young king beginning his life as a king by seeking the best things first.

On the night which followed that day of prayer, Solomon was asleep in Gibeon. And God came to him in a dream and said, 'Ask what I shall give thee'. And even in the dream of the night, the heart of the young king went out towards the best things. He remembered that the kingdom he was called to rule over was a great kingdom, and he was still a mere lad. So he said, 'I am but a little child, yet, O Lord. I know not how to go out, or come in. And Thy servant is in the midst of Thy people which Thou hast chosen, a great people that cannot be numbered, nor counted for multitude. Give, therefore, Thy servant an understanding heart to judge Thy people, that I may discern between good and bad; for who is able to judge this Thy so great people?'

Now that was the right thing to seek. It was therefore the best thing. And Solomon sought that best thing first and received it. And God 'added' the pleasant things. He gave him riches, and honour, and long life besides. 'Because thou hast asked this thing—this best, right thing, and hast not asked for thyself long life, or riches, or the life of thine enemies, behold . . . I have also given thee what thou hast not asked, both riches and honour, so that there shall not be any among the kings like unto thee all thy days.' It happened to him just as our Lord says: 'Seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things, food and clothing, and a happy life, and honour, shall be added unto you'.

II. Now Solomon had a brother who took the other plan. It was his brother Absalom. He was an elder brother, but not a wiser brother. This brother put the pleasant thing, the thing he would like, first. And he put the right thing second.

The thing he thought pleasant, and put first, was to be king on his father's throne. He kept saying to himself, 'Oh, if I were only king!' He was a very beautiful man. And it was part of his beauty that he had a fine head of long and curly hair. And he was proud of this hair, and sometimes would dress it, and show himself to the people. At last he thought his hair would help him to become king. So one day he dressed it, and put on his princely robes, and sat at one of the gates of Jerusalem, and as the people went out and in, he kept saying, 'If I were king things should go better with you all'.

Now that was a very pleasant thing to wish for, to be king. But just then, and for Absalom, it was not a right thing. For his father David was still living. And he was still king. And the right thing for Absalom, his son, was to honour and obey his father, so long as that father lived. But he did not honour his father. He wished his father dead and away. His one wish, the wish he put first among all the wishes of his heart, was to be king in his father's place. Often he would look at himself in a mirror and say, 'What a splendid figure I shall make seated on the throne!' And he thought day and night about it. And he wished this evil wish. And to those who would listen to him, he talked about it. Although he never prayed to God, he began to pray to the people. As they came in by the gates of the city, he said, 'Dear people, make me your king'.

Some of the people were foolish and wicked, and listened to his prayer. And they joined together to drive the old King David away from the kingdom, and put beautiful young Absalom on the throne. And Absalom and his people got swords and spears, and began to fight. They got together a great army to drive out David. And David was driven from his home and from Jerusalem, and had to flee beyond Jordan.

But when this had gone on for a short while, some of the people who still loved David, and thought that right things should go before pleasant things, came together with swords and spears also, to fight against the army of Absalom. And there was a great battle in the forest of Ephraim. Absalom was there amongst his fighting men on the battle-field. But as he rode about on his royal mule he was separated from his own soldiers, and met those of his father. And he was afraid, and turned and fled back into the wood to hide himself until they passed. But as he rode, his beautiful hair was caught in one of the branches of a tree. And his affrighted mule rode on from under him. And he was left hanging between the branches and the ground. The hair he was so proud of held him fast, till his father's soldiers closed round about him, and put him to death. Then they threw him into a ditch and covered him with stones.

That was the end of Absalom. He put the pleasant thing first, and the right thing last. And he lost all—everything he had liked and worshipped, and sought after—his beautiful hair, the face he had so often looked at in the mirror, his place among the princes of Israel, his honour and character as a son, and at last life itself.

III. This has always been God's way. In all ages and to all sorts of men, those who have put the right things first have been blessed by Him: those who have put the pleasant things first have been troubled.

The Prophet Daniel was a man who put the right things first. He loved God. He loved praying to God. Three times a day, with his windows open towards Jerusalem, where God's temple was, he cried to God in prayer. But the wicked men of Babylon hated this praying to God. And they hated Daniel because he prayed to God. So they got the king to say that for thirty days everybody was to pray to him and to him only, and every one who prayed to God, as Daniel did, should be cast into a den of lions. What Daniel had to choose between, therefore, was this right thing—praying to God, and this pleasant thing—saving himself from being cast into the den of lions.

I am sure life was as sweet to Daniel as it is to you and me. It could never be a pleasant thing to be cast into a den of lions. And he might have said, 'Tis only for thirty days'. But then, there was nothing wrong in being cast among the lions. And it would have been quite wrong, even for thirty days, to have stopped praying to God, or to have prayed to the king instead of God. The right thing to do was to keep on praying to God; the pleasant thing, to keep from being thrown to the lions. But when the two came together, and he had to put one of the two first, he put the right thing first. He kept on praying to God.

Now it was not Daniel only who had to make this choice. The bad men who got the king to pass the wicked law, they also had a choice to make. It was a pleasant thing for them to get Daniel thrown to the lions. It is always pleasant for bad men to get good men out of their way. But although it was pleasant, it was wrong. And it was very wrong. The right thing was to have left Daniel free to pray to his God. The right thing would have been to have said, 'O king, do not pass such a cruel law as that'. But they put the pleasant thing, which was also a cruel, wicked thing, first. And from the right they hid their eyes entirely.

See now how differently God dealt with Daniel and with them.

Daniel had put the right thing first. He had said, 'I dare not stop praying to God'. And God did not forsake him when he was cast into the lions' den. All that night, all through the black hours, beside those hungry lions, face to face with their sleepless eyes, God, unseen, stood by His servant and shut their mouths.

But when the men who had put, not the right thing, not God's honour and law, first, but their own wicked and cruel pleasure, when they came next day and were thrown, because of their wickedness in Daniel's stead, among the lions, God let the fierce beasts open their mouths to destroy them. In a moment the 'lions had the mastery of them, and brake all their bones in pieces, or ever they came at the bottom of the den'.

IV. This is still God's way; His law never changes. Although twenty-four hundred years have passed since he saved Daniel, He still puts a blessing on all who like Daniel put the right thing first, and He refuses to bless those who put the pleasant thing first.

About thirty years ago there was a famous master at one of our universities who used to give a gold medal every year to the student who wrote the best essay on 'Truth'. And year by year the name of the student who gained the medal was set up in letters of gold on the walls of that master's class-room. One year there came up from the country a young lad who wanted greatly to have his name on these walls in letters of gold. And he set his heart on winning the gold medal for the essay on 'Truth'. As he was pacing to and fro in the corridors of the university one day, thinking what fine things he could put into his essay, the author of an essay which gained the medal some previous year went past. And in a moment it flashed into the young student's mind, that if he could get this essay to read, he might find out from it what sort of essay was likely to win the prize. So he went to the author and borrowed the essay which had won the prize. But when he read the essay he saw that it was far beyond anything he could think or write. And the evil thought came into his soul to copy it from beginning to end, and send it in as his own. It would be so pleasant to get the prize. It would be so pleasant to have his name printed up on the walls in letters of gold. It would be so pleasant when he went back to the country to have the neighbours and his old schoolfellows saying, 'That is the man who got the medal of gold for the essay on "Truth"'. And he did that very thing. He put all thought of what was right out of his soul. He thought only of what was pleasant. He bent the whole force of his mind to seek his own pleasure. He neither sought righteousness, nor fairness to others, nor truth, nor honesty, nor God. He sat down and copied out the whole of the borrowed essay, word by word, and put his own name on the back of it, and sent it in to the master as his own.

The master read the essay, and said, 'This is the best essay of the year; it deserves the prize'. But, although he said that, some words in the essay kept coming back to him, as if he had somewhere or other seen them before. And by and by, the whole essay came back to his memory, and he found out that it was the essay which had won the medal two years before.

The Bible says, 'Shame is the promotion of fools'. Instead of glory, this foolish lad was to have shame. The master brought the essay to his class next morning, and told the whole sad, shameful story, and ended by expelling the foolish writer of it from his class. He had put the pleasant thing first, the right thing last. He wanted honour and a gold medal, and his name printed in letters of gold; but what he got was disgrace, and an evil name that followed him all his days.

V. I have just one thing more to say to you. We have all got to put the right thing first, even when no good can come to us in this world. God will still bless us for doing it; but the blessing may not appear till we are in His presence in heaven.

One of our English poets has a beautiful ballad, in which he tells the story of a little nurse who acted in this heroic way. On the 31st of May, 1868, at Newcastle, this girl, Margaret Wilson, was playing beside the railway, not far from the station, with three younger children who were in her care. While they were in the midst of their play an engine and its tender came gliding up.

The dreadful weight of iron wheels
Among them in a moment steals,
And death is rolling at their heels!

Maggie, seeing the danger, ran at once with a little boy to the platform. But when she looked behind for her other two babes, she saw them in the very pathway of the engine. In a moment, without thought of her own safety, she ran back. She had just time to snatch them out of the advancing wheels. And then, as with the quick thought of a little mother, she planted them in the one possible spot of safety there—close up against the sunk breast of the platform, between the platform and the rails. She put the children inside. And she covered them with her own body—standing like a wall between them and death. They were saved. She was killed. The pleasant thing for Margaret Wilson would have been to have got on the platform herself. The right thing was to save the children who had been put in her care. She put the right thing first. She was killed. But it was a Christ-like deed she did that day. Although it was done by a little nurse girl, an angel could not have done it better. She saved the children whom it was her duty to save: that was her glory. In doing that, she had to die. But she died putting the right thing first. No wonder the poet, who has lifted her story into song, ends his ballad with this burst of praise:—

My little heroine! Though I ne'er
Can look upon thy features fair,
Nor kiss the lips that mangled were;

Yet thy true heart and loving faith,
And agony of martyr death
God saw—and He remembereth.<sup>1</sup>

THE PEARL-OYSTER

'Neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they tramp<sup>e</sup> them under their feet.'—MATTHEW VII. 6.

I. What is a Pearl?—It is a well-known gem found in several shell-fish, such as the common mussel and the oyster. How it came to be there was a long puzzle to man. In ancient times they imagined it was formed from the dew of heaven. The sparkling dewdrops and the shining pearls were so like each other that they adopted the beautiful fancy that the pearl was begotten from the dew. To explain the shining lustre of the gem this other detail was added, that just at the moment when the conception was taking place there was a vivid flash of lightning, and the pearl caught something of the fiery gleam. All these fancies are read together by one ancient writer, when he says regarding the pearl of great price, 'This Pearl is Jesus, whom the virgin conceived from the Divine lightning'.

II. The Value of Pearls.—The most valuable pearl-fisheries are to be found in the Persian Gulf and on the western coast of Ceylon. The annual produce of the former is said to be over £200,000; while that of the latter is set down at even a higher sum. The value of single pearls has sometimes been enormous. Those who have read Rider Haggard's books will remember the graphic way in which he describes an incident in the life of Cleopatra. That unscrupulous woman, at a supper with Mark Antony, took from her ear one of a pair of pearls of the value of £80,000, and having dissolved it in vinegar, swallowed the absurdly precious draught; and she would have done the same with its fellow had it not been rescued from her wanton pride.

But however valuable pearls may be, there are other things more valuable still. Holy Scripture mentions three.

1. Wisdom.—'No mention shall be made of coral or of pearls; for the price of wisdom is above rubies' (Job xxvii. 18). The wisdom here referred to is the Divine wisdom—the plan or purpose of God exhibited in the universe. But the same truth applies to human wisdom—the gaining of knowledge and discretion in human affairs. The price of this is far above rubies. It is not to be had for pearls. How then shall a boy get it? Only by hard work and diligent application. He must shun the company of the idle and the frivolous, and give his time and thought to the companionship of books. He must show diligence at school, obedience in the home, and reverence in the church. All his lessons must be faithfully learned, every task must be faithfully performed.

2. Good Works.—'In like manner, that they adorn themselves . . . not with gold or pearls, but with good works' (1 Tim. ii. 9). The wisdom must show itself in outward action. If the fountain be pure, so also must the flowing stream. The hand must follow the heart.

And all this in the way of adornment—the adornment of a good woman; and girls especially will not miss the lesson that brodered hair and golden trinkets are not the only kind of ornaments. Peter speaks of the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price; and Paul points us here, in 1 Timothy, to the beauty and excellency of good works. She who is arrayed in meekness and kind-hearted generosity has no need of flounces and finery. She may even say of all other ornaments, 'Unadorned, adorned the most'.

3. Salvation (Matt. xiii. 46).—Both wisdom and good works must show themselves in religion. The beginning of wisdom is the fear of God, and the best of good works is to believe on Him whom He hath sent (John vi. 29). Till this is done, we are like the merchantman seeking goodly pearls. He found a great many; for this beautiful world in which we live has many precious secrets to reveal to the earnest seeker. But not until we find salvation through Jesus does the great Eureka, 'I have found it,' burst from our lips. This is the treasure which all the wealth of the world cannot buy. Not all the thousands of Cleopatra could lay it at her feet. And yet, wonder of wonders, it is given to the penitent soul without money and without price. Jesus says, 'Buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayst be rich; and white raiment that thou mayst be clothed'. 'He that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat, yea come, buy wine and milk without money and without price.' This is true wisdom, and this is the soundest morality, to come and find in the salvation of Jesus the Pearl of Great Price.—JOHN ADAMS, Kingless Folk, p. 103.

THE THREE 'PHONES'

'Ask, and it shall be given you.'—MATTHEW VII. 7.

PRAYER is a very wonderful thing. Who are we that we should enjoy the privilege of talking with God as a man talketh with his friend? He is King of kings and Lord of lords. We are but as grasshoppers in His sight—so weak, so insignificant, so short-lived. How strange that we should be able to speak to Him as simply as I speak to you! And yet it must be so, or Jesus would not have taught us to pray. When He said, 'Ask,' He knew that God would hear.

I. There are three modern inventions which are very marvellous in their way, and which have been used as illustrations of this great privilege. I call them the three 'phones,' because their names are all taken from a Greek word (phonē), which means sound.

1. One is the telephone, which enables us to converse with people a long way off. The Psalmist said, 'From the ends of the earth will I cry unto Thee'; and prayers have arisen from the strangest places possible. Hezekiah lifted up his voice from a sick-bed; Jeremiah from a deep and miry pit; Daniel from the den of lions; John from the bleak isle of Patmos; Paul as he was tossed about in the ship. And in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, God heard. Nay, He tells us that 'while we speak, He will answer; and before we speak, He will hear'. It is not possible for us to imagine how quickly our voices reach His ear.

2. Another is the microphone. You all know what a microscope is. It is an arrangement of glasses and tubes through which we look, and by which whatever we gaze upon is magnified many times. A spot of water is placed beneath it, and we see a host of creeping things which were invisible to the naked eye. Now the microphone is to the ear what the microscope is to the eye. When a child's heart is full of sorrow, and the whisper rises, 'O

Father in heaven, have mercy on me!' though no human ear can catch the sound, it is as plain as a mighty shout in the ear of God. A little girl was once asked, 'Do you think God will hear your feeble voice? Why, the hosts of angels continually sing before Him, and it is not likely that you will be heard.' 'Ah!' she replied, 'but when I pray, God says to the angels, "Hush! a little girl is crying to Me, and I want to hear her voice."' And her thought was true. Our Father listens for the feeblest tones, the faintest whispers, the lightest sigh of prayer.

3. Then there is the phonograph, which registers sounds. Did you ever hear of that wonderful frozen horn? The trumpeter had blown it in the frosty air, but no sound could he evoke. He played upon it his choicest tunes, but the music was silent. The melodies froze as he blew. But when the day's march was ended, and the horn hung above the fire, the warmth thawed its music, and the airs he had played so vainly came forth one after another, to the wonder of all who heard. That was only a fable, but the phonograph translates it into fact. For whatever you speak into this wonderful instrument is recorded against you; and years afterwards, when the maker wills, it will repeat the words you speak in the tone in which you speak them. So are our prayers written in heaven. Not one is lost; not one is forgotten. They are all treasured up in the wonderful book of the memory of God. We may forget all about them; He will remember when time shall be no more.

II. So then, wherever we are, and however feeble may be our speech, God hears and remembers our prayers. It is very wonderful, and the wonder grows upon us as we think of it, but it is true. Yet it is only half the truth. For in my text Jesus promises much more than a hearing for our prayers. He assures us of an answer. He gives us a blank cheque upon God's bank, and tells us it shall be honoured upon presentation. 'Ask, and it shall be given you.' These words are the Great Charter of Prayer.—G. HOWARD JAMES, Talks to Young Folk, p. 85.

PRAYER

MATTHEW VII. 7.

THE secret why we do not have our prayer answered is when we ask earthly things first.

But our Lord bids us 'Seek first the kingdom of heaven and His righteousness,' and all other things shall be added. If we put God's honour first, God will answer always at some time, although perhaps not in the very way we expected.

Here is a story which was told one Sunday in an Arran pulpit by one who knew the persons it concerned.

There lived in a quiet village a godly man. And he had a wife and three sons. His wife died, and the burden of bringing up these sons fell on him. He cried to God to help him.

Now, it so happened, that in that house there was a rush-bottomed chair, the only chair of that sort in the house, and it was at that chair this good man knelt when he prayed for his boys as well as at family prayer.

But often when alone he spent long while on his knees praying for their conversion. But he saw no change in his sons; they were hard, selfish, and worldly.

At last one by one they all left him, and went into business in some great city of the land. They prospered in business, but not in religion. But business prosperity is not joy, and prosperity was making them hard.

The father still prayed the more earnestly that they might gain their own souls, although they should lose the whole world.

But at the end of his days they were not saved.

There was an old servant who lived in the house, and to her he said when he was dying, 'I will pray now that my death may be used by God to save them'. Then he died.

The three young men came home to the funeral. And when all was past, they said: 'What shall we do with the house and the old furniture?' One said, 'Let them go to the old woman who has taken care of him'. But the eldest son said, 'Well, I consent if only you will allow me to get the rush-bottomed chair. I never heard prayers like those I heard there. I hear those prayers still when I am at business. I think if I had the chance I would not live the prayerless life I am living now.'

And the other two were softened. And with that the Spirit of the Lord came upon the eldest brother, and he said, 'Let us kneel around it once more and pray'.

And they did. And with great crying and tears they spent that afternoon together. And the end of all was, that the two younger brothers gave up their business and offered themselves to the mission-field. And they are well-known as missionaries now. And the eldest brother is one of those whose praise is in all the churches.

Jesus is seeking for you, to find you and to bless you. He is always better than our prayers.

Once I heard a very interesting proof of God answering prayers from the Rev. Mr. Campbell of Bangalore. He had been preaching to the soldiers one Sunday evening, and his text was, 'God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son,' etc. And at the close of the service a young soldier came forward, and after a little conversation asked him whether one who had been very bad might be saved. Mr. Campbell told him that it was just sinners that Jesus came to save, the very worst. By and by, after meeting together many times, the young soldier became a Christian, and joined the Church.

But what fixed the story of this young man more than any other on the preacher's mind was a word he said: 'I have found Christ, and that will be good news to my old mother at home'. Well, Mr. Campbell was telling this story once at a missionary meeting, and giving it as a proof that foreign missions often sent back fruit of thanksgiving to the people at home, and he closed by saying: 'If anyone had been beside that mother when the good news came, oh, what joy!' And there was sitting on the platform that evening a gentleman who rose and said, 'I was beside that mother when the good news came home, for I was her minister'.

The story was this. She was a Christian mother, and she had this only son—this child of her heart, whom she loved. Well, after much trouble and sorrow, he enlisted, and she saw him no more. But she prayed for his conversion; she kept on praying for him night and day. Many a time she asked the minister to join with her in prayer. She prayed for her son for nine years without once omitting, and one morning early she hurried to the minister's house with an open letter, and in great excitement said, 'Our prayers are answered'.

The first words of the letter were these: 'I had read mother, I send you good news; Jesus has found me, and has folded me to His breast at last!'—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 98.

THE FRUITS OF FAITH

'By their fruits ye shall know them.'—MATTHEW VII. 20.

Our Christianity begins at the cross, but it by no means ends there. The cross is to us the source of all our hopes for time and for eternity, but at the same time if we fail to let the Saviour of the cross be also the guide and strength of our lives, if we fail to follow Him in our daily walk, of what good is our Christianity to us? The cross of Christ is the basis and fountain of our true life, but it is also the great sign-post set at the parting of the ways, pointing on the one hand to the heavenly city: 'Jesus, remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom,' and the wondrous answer of the Crucified, 'This day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise'; on the other, warning men from the way of destruction. 'One of the malefactors which were hanged railed on Him;' on the one hand, life and good, on the other, death and evil. There is something terribly real about those two thieves. There is something terribly real in our Lord's death upon the cross. As we look upon Him suffering there, we realise that it is not sufficient for us to come and gaze. We must go away and live for Him.

He died that we might be forgiven,

He died to make us good;

That we might go at last to heaven,

Saved by His precious blood.

I. And so, while the cross teaches us of our acceptance before God, it also tells us of the necessity to go forward, to be true, to ever strive to know more and more of Christ. Ah! would to God that we could live more truly, more faithfully. Our efforts are so feeble. We so constantly feel our weakness. We so constantly find ourselves giving way to some temptation and dishonouring Christ. It should not be. Let the great lessons of our Lord's Passion make us more careful to live as He would have us live. And this brings me to consider the words of our text, 'By their fruits ye shall know them'. What fruits are you and I bringing forth in our lives? On the answer to this question depends the reality and depth of our Christianity. Every good tree bringeth forth good fruit. If we are living for Christ it will be so with us. We can only call ourselves 'good' because of His merits, for we are made the 'righteousness of God in Him,' and it is only by His Spirit working in us and controlling our every thought, word and action, that we can bear good fruit. All comes from Him, 'Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them'. Sometimes when we enter an orchard we see a most beautiful tree covered with leaves of the richest green. It is to the uninitiated the perfection of growth, and yet no tree in the orchard is more useless. It simply cumbers the ground, and you hear the owner passing beneath its shade say to his gardener, 'That tree must come down soon, it is only in the way'. Yes, it looks all right outwardly, but it bears no fruit. How often does this tree find its complement in the lives of man! 'Not every one that saith unto Me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of My Father which is in heaven.' It is easy enough to say, 'Lord, Lord'; it is not easy to live the Christian life. There are so many times when we find ourselves opposed to the rest of the world round about us. There was once a little ship's boy. The ship on which he was serving was captured by a pirate craft, and one by one the crew were overpowered. They were marched on deck and given their chance of life. 'Here,' says the Pirate Captain, 'is the plank, overhanging the ocean. Either you will swear allegiance to us and form part of our crew, or you will march to the end of that plank and be shot.' I know not how the crew decided, but I see that little ship's boy, with death staring him in the face—I see him choosing a terrible death rather than dishonour his God. I see him standing with face uplifted in prayer, waiting for the signal which meant his death; and I see the poor lad's body, covered with bullet wounds, disappear beneath the waves. Yes, it is easy enough to say, 'Lord, Lord'. It is not easy always to act up to the profession of our lips by consistency in our lives. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' But there is no likelihood of you or I proving our faith and trust by such an experience. There is no likelihood of our having to die for the Lord Jesus. No; it is only the few nowadays who are called to lay down their lives for their Lord. But surely this principle can be applied to our lives in a most real way.

II. We are not called to be faithful only in the great crises of our lives. We are called to be faithful in that which is least. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' We are called to render a willing obedience in all things to the claims of the Lord Jesus—we are called to stand true in regard to our every action, and thus to bear fruit. Think what this means—it means that every time we violate our consciences we are in a very real way doing despite to the Spirit of Christ. It means that we must be whole-hearted in regard to what we deem little things. It means that we must be guided not by the Spirit of man but by the Spirit of God. We are too apt to make excuses to ourselves for what we call our failings. We are too apt to seek the advice of men rather than go down on our knees and seek the counsel of God. In other words, we want to have our own way and not to follow the way of God. Now, Christ never tells us to go our own way; in fact, He lays down a rule exactly opposite to this when He says, 'If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself'. This self-denial in our life is a very real thing. The flesh is constantly lusting and striving against the Spirit, and what we as Christians want is for the Spirit to have the mastery; self-denial is in this way the keynote of true life. If you want to live a life, then, which is not a Christian life, the way to do so is very simple and easy to follow. All you have to do is to please yourself in everything. Let your life be a continuous struggle to get the best of everything—to get the best apple on the dish, and then to go away into a corner and eat it by yourself. Let the thought of others be far away from your life—just please yourself, that is all. But what a contrast this is to the command, 'If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself!' Now let us sum up the whole matter. If we deny ourselves, we follow Christ; if we please ourselves, we deny Christ. In some of your lives there has been going on lately a sort of pitched battle between the armies of the flesh of self, and the armies of the Spirit of Christ. How can you expect to go ahead in the Christian life if you are consciously encouraging the powers of the flesh? How can you expect to learn more of Christ's power if you are consistently violating your consciences and submitting your lives to the power of the enemy of your souls? It is impossible for you to grow in grace when grace is lost sight of in the pursuit of self-pleasing. I would place before you a remedy for this. Every spiritual ill has a remedy. I know you want to meet your faults, to conquer them. Here is the means that God has provided. You have your conscience, which has too often been silenced in the past. Let it no longer be silenced. Follow it exactly.

Straight is the line of duty,
Curved is the line of beauty;
Walk in the first, and thou shalt see
The other ever follow thee.

Exactly means with absolute precision, not swerving a hair's-breadth from what you know to be right and true. I put before you a hard standard to live up to, but it is the only true standard of life, and unless we strive after it we shall not attain much in our lives. No, let us take this standard, and by a careful attention to the details of our lives, let us strive after this great end.—NORMAN BENNETT, Be True: And Other Sermons for Boys, p. 21.

PERSEVERANCE TO THE END

'He that endureth to the end shall be saved.'—MATTHEW X. 22.

OUR Lord was here speaking of events in the near future. Jerusalem was doomed. The armies of Pagan Rome would in a few short years surround the Holy City, and its streets and walls were destined to be the witnesses of the most dread horrors the world has ever seen. If we read Josephus we see what those horrors were. Jerusalem is planted with crosses on which hang the quivering victims of the soldiers' fury, thousands of Jews are perishing by the sword, mothers are even eating their own children to allay the pangs of hunger when the siege is at its height, and at the end of the siege Josephus says that no less than 1,000,000 Jews must have perished. Of these times our Lord says, 'He that endureth to the end shall be saved'. But there was also surely another thought in our Lord's mind—a thought of His coming again, and of this coming He gives the same warning, 'He that endureth to the end shall be saved'.

Endurance is one of the first principles of life. In the thought of it are bound up all the true aims of life. There are two ways in which we may approach endurance. We may approach it as embodying in itself the principle of growth in the sense of our being made harder and thus more able to withstand trial. Or again, we may take endurance as expressed in such words as continuance, lasting. 'He that endureth to the end shall be saved'. What, then, does this mean to each one of us as Christians? The second meaning of the word endurance is of course by far the most frequent. Let us look at endurance in its two meanings. First, growth, increase in durability or hardness.

Spenser described this for us when he wrote :—

And manly limbs endured with little care
Against all hard mishaps.

I. Here we have a lesson in regard to physical strength, but we can also surely apply it to spiritual strength as well. Just as the hard life of the blacksmith hardens his muscles and sets his frame, so that Longfellow could write of him :—

The smith a mighty man is he,
With large and sinewy hands ;
And the muscles of his brawny arms
Are strong as iron bands,— so must man in his inner being be built up by the difficulties which surround his path. The boy when he first goes out from the world of home into the world of school finds out how true this principle is. He must grow, and in order that he may grow he must endure hardness. If he works badly he must suffer for it; and so through suffering the penalty of his own neglect he grows more careful in the future. If he tells a lie, his conscience convicts him of the wrong, even if he be not found out, and so the thought of it should impel him into the paths of truth and honour. So everything that he does acts upon his life in a most real way, and he grows, he becomes harder. But do not forget that this growth of his may be a backward growth. It may be that he neglects his work, and is punished, and yet, nevertheless, the punishment brings no thought of amendment. It may be that the lie will be followed by many others instead of being the source of dishonour in his life. It may be that he puts away the principles of truth and purity. Ah! then we see the hardness, but it is the fatal hardness of unresisted sin, and the life becomes seared and ruined. It is possible for any one of us to do this if we will, and thus to frustrate the grace of God and the love of Christ. I ask my readers, are any of you thus forming your lives? For if so you are building up a future of misery and failure. I pray God that it may not be so, but that you may each one grow in grace and in the knowledge of your Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Perhaps the best simile that we can have is that which St. Paul uses in writing to Timothy, 'Thou therefore endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ'. The soldier's life is one of peril, of trial, of difficulty. He has to go through much before he is counted a good soldier. It is not one engagement, but many that prove him and bring out his true worth.

II. Yes, endurance means, in a very real sense, growth. So may each one of us endure to the end, and thus work out our own salvation through the power of Christ our Lord and Saviour. But we turn to the second thought of endurance, namely, continuance, something lasting. It is used in this sense many times in the New Testament. We have it in our text from St. Matthew's Gospel. St. Paul gives us the same thought when he writes to the Philippians (III. 14), 'I press toward the mark of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus'. Or, once more, St. John the Divine, in his Revelation, has the same message given to him for the Church at Smyrna, when he is told to write, 'Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee the crown of life'. In all these cases the main suggestion is identical and parallel. Endurance in this sense is a very real outcome of Christianity—nay, it is the essence of it. Before I wrote this sermon I thought I would light the fire; I put the lighted match to the paper in the grate, but it burnt up and then went out. Again I tried with another match, and this time thought I had succeeded in getting the fire alight. But no, only a few red embers were left to tell of the flame that had been there but a few moments before. It wasn't sufficient that the blaze should but last a moment and then die out. No, what I wanted was for the fire to endure, to continue, to last; and so a third time I tried to light the few remaining sticks. Very carefully I placed them so that they would the more easily light each other, and soon I saw the coals ignited, and the fire began to warm the room. Now, do you see my point? You and I are very like that fire—we do not endure. There comes a special time in our experience when we feel, 'Oh, I wish I could do better'. Confirmation is such a time, and then, when that special season has passed, the old difficulties crop up, the old sins beset us, and we hardly seem to be Christians at all—in other words, we lack endurance. And yet it is true that only 'He that endureth to the end shall be saved'. We cannot be saved apart from endurance. We cannot be Christians without endurance—there is no true life without endurance; so whether it be the endurance of growth, of increase in hardness, and strength, and grace; or whether, on the other hand, it be the endurance of continuance, of lasting effect, let true endurance be ours. Time passes quickly; every to-morrow brings us nearer to that bourne from which no man, no boy returns. The ship of our life is sailing swiftly over the relentless seas of Time.

To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow,
Creeps in this petty pace from day to day,
To the last syllable of recorded time;
And all our yesterdays have lighted fools
The way to dusty death.

—NORMAN BENNET, Be True: And Other Sermons for Boys, p. 57.

THE FOES OF SHAME

'Loyauté n'a honte'

'Every one therefore who shall confess Me before men, him will I also confess before My Father which is in heaven.'
—MATTHEW X. 32.

THERE is a great charm about the very sound of the word loyalty. Have you never found yourself walking rather lazily and wearily along the street, when suddenly the strains of a military band playing a stirring march have fallen on your ears. At once you changed your gait, your carriage became more erect, and your feet moved at once more quickly and without conscious effort. The music had brought with it new life. Just so; there are words, I think, that come to us like clarion calls or martial music, with a thrill of power and a pulse of strength. Surely loyalty is one of these. It is a soldier's virtue, but we have all to be soldiers. It speaks of subtle dangers to desert, to be slack, to relapse into indifference to our Captain's commands, to be subject to many inducements to unfaithfulness to our Leader's standard. Dangers lurk behind the word, for it is shadowed by a dark companion—disloyalty. Shame dogs the footsteps of the latter, but the loyal heart is a stranger to shame—his hideous form can never enter there. Loyalty does not speak to us of what we do, but of what we are. It is not certain that the loyal soldier on the field of battle will always obtain mention in his general's dispatches, or be decorated with the Victoria Cross. He is not proof against wounds, defeat, or death. Indeed, he is more likely to meet with these than is his disloyal comrade. Loyalty is a temper of the heart—an attitude of the soul. The loyal boy or girl will be always loyal, no matter where placed or what the work on hand may be—and the highest type of loyalty is loyalty to Christ. That is the source and fountain of every other form of the virtue. Loyal to Him, 'we cannot then be false to any man'.

There is a beautiful story about one of the Kings of France, Louis IX.<sup>1</sup> You will read about him one day, if you are not already acquainted with some of his brave deeds. You may see the beautiful church which he built in Paris—the Sainte Chapelle, which is like no other building of its kind I have ever seen, so richly decorated, yet so solemn and holy. When he was a very young man he was married to Princess Margaret of Provence. On the wedding ring that he wore from that day he caused three words to be engraved, 'God, France, Margaret,' and he used to say to his friends, 'I have no love outside this ring'. That was the secret of his being known to history as Saint Louis. To be a saint never means to be a milkop. It means to be the truest, best man or woman, boy or girl, that it is possible for any of us to become; and when Louis came to die, and a great preacher spoke in that lovely church about the king, he said of him, 'He was the most loyal man that ever lived in this age,' and even of a king no greater word could be spoken. He never forgot the vows he made when he knelt alongside his young bride—the words were written not only on the ring, but on his heart. If we are loyal also to God, our country, and our home, we too shall live lives that may be truly called kingly and queenly.

I. First, you see, there is Loyalty to God.—All brave men have begun there. The great heroes of the Old Testament all made that their starting-place. Moses forsook Pharaoh's palace, but he clung to God. Joshua was willing to let all the nation choose whom they would for leaders, but for himself and his household there was only one choice, 'We will serve the Lord'.

The great judges that were his successors only accomplished their difficult tasks when the same spirit animated them. In later days David, Elijah, Jeremiah, Daniel are all conspicuous instances of a like loyalty. In stories that may be less familiar to you about the times of the Maccabees, we find brave fathers and sons who fought and suffered terrible hardships for the same faith. They would not bow the knee in idolatrous worship, nor suffer the sanctuaries of their fathers to be defiled, and so their loyalty saved once more the nation they loved. It was the same with the first disciples of Jesus, when brought before rulers and courts. 'Whether we ought to obey God rather than men, judge ye,' was their defence in speaking in the presence of those who acknowledged the precepts but neglected the practice.

II. Second, Loyalty to our Country.—This is an easy duty to most people. They are patriotic. At such a time as this, when we are at war with another nation, the spirit of love for our country runs higher than ever; men dare not be disloyal. Yet there are always some people that either are or pretend to be dissatisfied with their own land. They are ashamed of it, and say they wish they were natives of some other country, or else profess indifference to any country, and call themselves citizens of the world. There is always something disgraceful in such conduct. Patriotism is not a feeling to be ashamed of, it is one of which we should be proud. Jesus Christ was a great patriot, He loved His own countrymen before all else. Paul was a great patriot, and would have been willing to suffer anything at God's hand, if thereby he might have benefited his fellow-Jews.—G. CURRIE MARTIN, Great Mottoes with Great Lessons, p. 72.

PREPARING THE WAY

'Behold, I send My messenger before thy face, which shall prepare thy way before thee.'—MATTHEW XI. 10.

I. The King Coming.—[King on his way to Parliament—crowds to see—out-riders on before to give notice and clear the road.] So when King of heaven came to earth; only, way not blocked with people, cf. Isaiah XL 3, 'wilderness,' 'desert'; blocked with other obstacles; still, a messenger sent before to clear the road and give notice. [Picture out John Baptist, work he had to do, and how he did it.]

Same King coming again—way needs preparing as before. Who will do it? 'Ministers and stewards' of God's 'mysteries'. But not only they, others also; every one can do something—even you. [Cf. Party of navvies making a road—all work together under the supervision of one. Ministers are, in some sort, supervisors; but the smallest child may be a navvy in that band which prepares the road for Christ.]

II. The Road by which He Comes.—Palace in heaven; has to come down into this world and find His way even into men's hearts. Once the way was open. How it got blocked up. What like now? [Cf. Cottage with bolted door in some weed-grown garden, reached off an obstructed highway. So with our hearts: pride and selfishness bolt the door. Bad habits overgrow the path. The highway is blocked up by worldliness of all kinds.]

III. Work of the Heralds.—Are you one of Christ's navvies? If so, how work?

1. Tell others that the King is coming and they ought to get ready.

2. Each must begin with himself. Is the door of your heart open? Are you diligently rooting up the weeds of bad habits? overturning the rocks of worldliness, so that Christ can get to you? Particularise the obstacles: idleness, self-will, etc.; all such need removing: if you would help to prepare Christ's way.

3. Tools.—Faith and prayer are the two most important. [Boy trying to lift iron slab by ring fastened to it. (1) Pulls and pulls with both hands—instead of pulling it up, it pulls him down. (2) Holds by one hand the hand of a strong helper and pulls with other. (Faith.) (3) Asks strong helper to help him pull. (Prayer.) So at last succeeds.]

Conclude.—Christ is coming, way terribly blocked up. Would you like to be one of His navvies and help to prepare the way? Then be earnest and use the right tools, Faith and Prayer.—C. A. GOODHART, Hints and Outlines for Children's Services, p. 14.

CHILD-VISION

'Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes.'—MATTHEW XI. 25.

THERE is such a lot of things God hides from the 'wise and prudent'—from learned folk and those who think they are very clever—but which He shows to the little ones.

I don't know what a real baby sees when it is smuggled quite 'comfably' in its cradle, but I expect it sees things a thousand times more beautiful than anything we can see. I have watched its eyes when it didn't know I was watching, and I have seen it look steadily at something in the air; then such a big, wondering look came over it, and after that there would be such a sweet, sweet smile, and then a gurgle as if the little thing were speaking a language better than my own—the language of the soul rather than that of the lips; and I have thought—What wouldn't I give to see what baby is seeing? But he is a deep little fellow; he is a foreigner, and has only come on a visit to our world, and he hasn't gone so very far into it yet but he can still see some of the glory that he came from; and he has a language of his own different from ours, and he is not going to tell us strangers about the country of the King. He keeps that all to himself, the sly little rascal! He is a foreigner to us, but that would be nothing if he didn't treat us so provokingly as being foreigners to him, and be always bidding us to mind our own business.

Or, again, some of you little ones, have you ever looked into the fire on a quiet winter's evening? What wonderful things you have seen there! Lakes of silver and mountains of ruddy gold; armies with glittering swords, and forests thick with gloom; deep caverns where the wild beasts were crouching, and ships that sailed in the air! I have seen them all, too, so I know; and, would you believe it? I sometimes see them all yet. For I never grow old: I only kiss the years as they come, and bid them good-bye. But I keep my young eyes and my young heart still, and that is why I can talk to you.

Yes; wonderful things God reveals to the little ones, which He hides from all others. And do you know why? Just because the little ones are very simple, very trustful, and very affectionate. Yes, it all comes out of that. When we grow up we think we are bound to grow very wise and be very suspicious, and be slow to believe and quick to question, and we become very cautious, very 'prudent,' and we boast that we know a thing or two, and that people will have to get up very early in the morning to take us in. What blunderers many grown-up people are, to be sure! They become proud about dust and iron, and every day they go on losing more and more of the gold and silver. Their sight grows shorter and shorter, so that they can only see the grubby things that are within arm's-length of them, and they lose sight of heaven, and the power to see one another's hearts. And they call that wisdom, or experience, or prudence! Wisdom? If that is wisdom, it has got a fool's-cap on its head! What a wise set they were in Jerusalem long ago, but they didn't know that the little Babe that was born in a manger was yet going to change all the world. And when the Apostles went about preaching the Cross, the philosophers and poets, the men who studied the stars, and the men who wrote books, all laughed at them. But who ever hears about these men now? Who even knows their names? And yet the Apostles! Why, you know them all; and, what is more, we are here to-day because their work is lasting still! But the wise and prudent saw nothing of this; they only saw the field that was being ploughed, and broken up, and sowed with seed; they didn't see the vision of the harvest that should follow. But humble folk did. God revealed to simple souls what was hidden from those who were too clever.

And that's the way He always works. It is the simple, loving, trustful heart that sees God, sees what He is doing, and sees what He is going to do. So keep your hearts fresh, fresh and trustful and loving, all your days. Think all the good you can of other people. Try always to see the good that is in them, or the chance of the good you can do them. Keep your heart as the heart of a little child, even though you live to ninety years. It is the way to be always happy yourself; it is the way to make all others happy; and, better still, it is the way to keep the eyes of the soul clean and bright, so that they shall always be able to see what God is wanting to show.—J. REID HOWATT, The Children's Preacher, p. 47.

ONE OF GOD'S MIRRORS

'In minimis Deus maximus'

Thou didst reveal them unto babes.—MATTHEW XI. 25.

I. THE words of this motto stand above the entrance door of the classroom in the botanical garden of a university town in Central Germany. They tell us how God shows Himself to be greatest in the things that are least, and have an obvious reference to the wonders that the science of botany discloses to us. Every little plant has its own special and peculiar beauties, some of which, indeed, we can see with our naked eye if we are only careful to notice them, but others require the aid of the most powerful of microscopes to reveal. Have you ever looked at the centre of a daisy?—many of you perhaps think that the familiar flower with its yellow centre and ring of white petals is a single blossom, but the fact is that every separate part of that white fringe and yellow centre is an individual flower. If you look at the yellow part with an ordinary magnifying glass, you will find that there are little cup-shaped flowers in great quantity scattered over it. This is only one of the commonest instances of how the wonderful minuteness of nature, the more we examine it, shows us the greater beauty. But it is not until we take a really fine microscope, and by its help examine the leaves and stems of flowers, and seeds of plants with the greatest care, that we come to know how wonderful are the least of the works of nature. We shall discover then that there are many plants so small that we cannot even see them with our naked eye, and that even the tiny hairs on the stems of others are exquisite in their form and variety. What is true of plant life is true of every other form of the physical universe. It is often a question whether the wonders that the telescope displays in the heavens above us, or those that the microscope shows in the world about our feet, are the most marvellous. We need not trouble ourselves to decide that question, however, for both are beautiful, and in both we can, if we choose, see God. One of the greatest astronomers used to say that he loved to study the stars and discover the laws that controlled their action, because he felt that he was thinking God's thoughts after Him.

II. But the words our Lord Jesus used, and which I have placed alongside the motto, give it an even wider application. Jesus was fond of telling us how God loved the little things. The lilies of the field, the birds of the air, and the beasts of the forest were His special charge. Those little sparrows of which men thought so slightly, that if one were to pay the price of four of them in the market-place he would have one thrown into the bargain: 'Those little birds,' said Jesus, 'have their life-history known to the Father in heaven, and nothing happens to them without His loving and watchful eye noting it, and His heart understanding its meaning'. Then the life of Jesus is itself an illustration of the principle this motto teaches. Men sought for God only among the great things of earth. They thought when the Christ came He must come with the pomp and glory of an earthly king, with the wisdom and dignity of the learned teachers with whom men were acquainted. But when Jesus came it was in the form of a little child—a baby, not only weak, but poor. Greatness and riches and learning did not appear to Jesus to be passports into the kingdom of God. His disciples did not understand this, neither did the multitude, and when women brought their little ones to Him these men would fain have driven them back; but Jesus had to become the children's champion, and say that in the face of a little child men could best see what God would have them become. We get a new thought about God when we learn not only that He loves little things, but that we see Him more clearly in little things than in great. I suppose all little children are more or less afraid of big things, a strange kind of horror often haunts us in the mere overwhelming size of an object. The big, gaunt, grim trees of the forest with their tossing giant arms, the huge city with its whirl and noise and tramping multitudes, the vast, wandering solitary house—all these things breed terror in us. But the little things are our friends. The flowers, the animals that we can fondle and can take care of, the little babies that we love to nurse, the dainty things that we delight to have about us for their very smallness—'dear little things,' as we call them—these are what we love. And does it not help us to understand God, to find Him near, to find Him real, to find Him loving?—to be told that in such little things God becomes more clear to us than in the big, strange, unfamiliar and great ones. Mere grandeur might overwhelm and stun us, though it might be great to look upon, but we could never feel comfortable to live with it. God wishes us to feel at home with Him, and He says that nobody can understand Him so easily as a little child. Let us not, then, have any fear of God, that is, not be afraid of Him because we think He is far off and too terrible to approach.—G. CURRIE MARTIN, Great Mottoes with Great Lessons, p. 80.

THE PARABLE OF THE SOWER

MATTHEW XIII. 1-9, 18-23.

THE parables of Jesus have always been great favourites with children, and indeed with all the world. Many of them are known by nearly every person in the world who can read. They are more widely known than any other words in the Bible or out of it. Who does not know the Prodigal Son, the Lost Sheep, the Good Samaritan, the Pharisee and the Publican? Where will you find such stories, so simple, so perfectly beautiful? Do you not wish to know more about them? Won't you say, 'Well, I'll try to understand all the parables'?

Take the first of Christ's parables, 'The Sower'. A great crowd has gathered to hear Jesus. Stepping into a boat, He pushes out a few yards into the Lake of Galilee. The sloping strand looks like a gallery crowded with thousands of eager listeners, who can easily hear every word of the Preacher. With the boat for His pulpit He faced the audience, and began with 'the sower'.

I. The Heedless Hearers. II. The Shallow-Hearted Hearers. III. The Double-Hearted Hearers. IV. The Honest Hearers.

I. Heedless or Hardened Hearers.—Their hearts are not fenced in, as your garden is, but lie open like the highway. Rude bad thoughts make a common or thoroughfare of such a heart. The wheels of traffic and pleasure make it hard. Every foul foot may trample over it, all evil thoughts may find a passage through it. Such an one 'heareth the word of the kingdom, and understandeth it not'; that is, he does not take it in; it lieth on the outside. 'Some hearers,' says Boston, 'are like a sand-glass, that let what enters at one ear pass out at another, hearing without thinking.' No hearts are harder than those that are 'gospel-beaten' and 'gospel-hardened'. The hungry black fowls of hell are ever on the wing, hovering over God's seed-field, ready to sweep down and take the good seed away. Large flocks of birds in the East follow the sower, and so the emissaries of hell, the thieves of the Word, follow the preacher. These are the bad thoughts which spoil good impressions and defeat the Word of God. These seeds are the germs of life in the soul, but often they do no good at all. The spell of a hopeful impression is often broken on the way home from church by some funny saying about the minister. On the outside of Gothic churches monsters are carved in stone, their wings outspread as in flight, and their backs upon the church. The fancy is, that evil things flee away from the place of the holy. I once saw these monsters inside a church with their faces towards the hearers. It was the artist's mistake the pastor told us; but he added that practically it was no mistake at all, whatever it might be artistically. It is not enough to be a hearer: Judas was one of the most favoured hearers of his day. Try to understand the Word, for the Word not understood is like uncovered seed, which the fowls soon devour. It is like seed sown on the rock; it perishes as if it had never been spoken. You are not hardened yet, for you are young, but you may be hardening.

II. The Shallow-Hearted Hearers.—'Some fell upon stony places, where they had not much earth' (vv. 5, 20, 21). These stony places are rocky knolls or hillocks with a thin skin of earth. As the rock won't let the seed grow downwards, it soon rushes upwards; but when the fierce sun of the East beats upon it, all its sap is dried up, and its despairing roots lie down on the bare heated rock, and wither and die. I have seen a mower coming to such stony places in our own cornfields: in scorn and anger he cuts two or three heads of the dwarfed grain, and passes on. Verses 20 and 21 are the short and pathetic history of some who are called revival converts. They are charmed but not changed; much excited, but not truly converted. These are they that 'have no root in themselves, and so endure but for a time' (Mark iv. 17). Their root is in the crowd, the fine music, the lively stir, the hearty companionships of the gospel-meeting. The Moravians every Sabbath offer up this prayer, 'From light-minded swarming, deliver us, good God'. Herod, and Demas, and nearly all in the crowds who thronged around Christ, belonged to this class. Some have such a history every week. The Word springs up in them every Sabbath, and withers away before Saturday. A young man once said to me, 'Every Sabbath evening I am almost a Christian, but I go back a little on Monday, a little more on Tuesday, and by Wednesday I am as careless as ever. I am like a four-day clock that's wound up every Sabbath and runs down on Wednesday; and I can't find out the reason.' 'I often see you dashing past on your velocipede,' I replied; 'are you as earnest about your soul as about your velocipede?' 'No, I am not,' he said, 'and it's a great shame.' That was the reason: he was more anxious to be a good velocipedist than to be a good Christian.

Time tests us. I have read that when a boy, William Burns, the great preacher and Chinese missionary, one day came home from church and said, 'Oh, mother, I'm converted now'. 'Wait a little, Willie,' she quietly replied; 'time will tell.'

III. The Double-Hearted Hearers.—We might also call them the half-hearted, or the divided in heart. The thorny corner of the seed-field is a parable of the heart that receives the Word and wishes also to harbour wrong desires. The thorns grow up as rude, sturdy rivals of the grain. They shut out air and sunshine above and strangle the grain beneath. The thorns represent 'the cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things' (Mark iv. 19). The thorns grow apace, for the earth is the stepmother of the seed, but the mother of thorns; and the curse that lighted on the earth fell most heavily upon man's soul. Double-hearted hearers wish to be both religious and worldly; they are undecided and unfruitful. King Saul, Ananias and Sapphira, the Galatian converts, and indeed nearly all the children of Israel in the wilderness belonged to this unhappy class. You must be whole-souled in dealing with God's Word.

David in Psalm xii. 3 draws the portrait of those who have 'a double heart,' or 'an heart and an heart' (see the margin). They wished to have a heart for God and also a heart for God's foes. Every such man is opposed to himself, distracted, disabled, and cannot bring forth fruit to perfection. He is between two opinions, and is good for nothing but halting. The warriors of Zebulon, who made David king at Hebron, 'were not of double heart' (1 Chron. xii. 33). The Hebrew again is, 'They had not an heart and an heart,' an heart for David and an heart for his rival. The two-hearted come no speed in anything. Friendship, it has been said, is one heart in two bodies: indecision is two hearts in one body, the one filled with earth's thorns, the other with heaven's seed. Your heart can hold many things at once, but you should never place side by side in it the seed and the thorns. Your whole soul must receive the seed as the ark received the law, leaving no room for aught besides.

IV. The Honest-Hearted Hearers.—'That on the good ground are they, which in an honest and good heart, having heard the Word, keep it' (Luke viii. 15). The good soil is unlike the other three; it is not hard like the first, nor shallow like the second, nor weedy like the third: it is soft, and deep, and clean. All the good qualities of the heart are summed up in one word—honesty, sweet sincerity. On man's side that is everything. Every year of my life adds to my belief of this one truth, on which Christ lays all the stress in His first parable. Put from you every false-hearted thing; be true and honest in handling God's Word; receive it gladly; try to understand it; and pray to the Lord of the harvest, and you will be fruitful. When the boy Zwingle, who became the great Reformer, began to read the New Testament he made this resolution, 'I will be true and upright before God in every situation in which He may place me'. He soon brought forth fruit one hundredfold. The Psalms agree with this parable in recommending honesty of heart to us in the strongest possible way. 'O blessed,' David exclaims, 'is the man in whose spirit there is no fraud and guile,' and times without number he declares that God's best gifts are enjoyed by the upright in heart. In the sloping fields of Galilee there were many soils, all of which were good, and thus the fruit was in some cases 'an hundredfold, some sixty, some thirty'. And some Christians are more fruitful than others, but all aim at the hundredfold increase.—JAMES WELLS, The Parables of Jesus, p. 3.

SOWING AND REAPING

'A sower went forth to sow.'—MATTHEW XIII. 3.

Just so: and it might have been you or me! For everybody is sowing seeds of one sort or another, even when he doesn't know it. How are the tiniest islands on the loneliest seas covered with grass and trees and graceful ferns and creeping plants? Because the bees and the birds have carried seeds with them when they didn't know it. And whether we mean it or not we are always planting something, and that something grows. If we have planted what is bad, bad will come of it; if we have planted what is good, good will come of it. The good or the bad things which we speak and do are the seeds we are sowing, and they grow!—they grow!

The first thing, then, we must look to is—to choose good seed. We can have it: it is all stored up for us in God's Book—for every good word it gives us, every kind thought it puts into our heart, everything it says which can cheer and help us and cheer and help others, all that is good seed which God gives. Then we must sow it, and must try to sow nothing but it.

The best time for sowing is when the mist is on the ground. The wisest sowers will tell you this. They don't see where the seed is falling, but they scatter it about; they know that the mist which hides from them where the seed has fallen is yet a very kindly, motherly mist, which will kiss the seed with moist and loving lips, and kiss it into life. And so they sow—in faith.

You must learn to do the same. Be kind wherever and whenever you get the chance, not only to the people you know and meet with at home or school, but also to strangers and the poor folk you must meet everywhere. Sow your seed in the mist: 'Scatter seeds of kindness' even when you can't see where they are going; sow in faith, just for Jesus' sake. When the harvest comes your heart will be rich—rich beyond anything you can dream of now.—J. REID HOWATT, The Children's Preacher, p. 88.

THE HID TREASURE AND THE PEARL OF GREAT PRICE

'Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto treasure hid in a field; the which when a man hath found, he hideth, and for joy thereof goeth and selleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field. Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a merchant man, seeking goodly pearls: who, when he had found one pearl of great price, went and sold all that he had, and bought it.'—MATTHEW XIII. 44-46.

THESE two parables are twins, though not exactly alike in every feature.

I. The Soul's Treasure.—What is it? It is some one thing compared with which all other things are cheap, a chief good which is better than all other goods, and better than all our thoughts. In the East men worshipped treasures and women jewels; and the ambition of kings and queens was to get a rare pearl, the like of which nobody else could have. They did not grudge giving a fortune for such a pearl. Hence the history of the great diamonds of the world reads like a romance. In the market for eternity there is one queen of pearls, one imperishable jewel. Get that, and you get all; lose that, and you lose all. One sage counts up two hundred and eighty-eight opinions about the highest good, or that which gives solid happiness; but you know better than that. It is one; and it is not a thing but a person. It is Christ, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom. The Bible is the field in which the treasure is hid. Sir Walter Scott on his deathbed asked his son-in-law to read to him. 'From what book shall I read?' said he. 'And do you ask?' Scott replied; 'there is but one.' The fourteenth chapter of John's Gospel was read, and the dying man was greatly comforted. The treasure is hid in this field, that is to say, you must find it within, not without, in the spirit, not in the letter. It is hid as 'the milk in the breast, the marrow in the bone, the manna in the dew, the water in the well, the honey in the honeycomb'. It is hid that it may be used; hid so as to be within your reach; hid for the earnest though hid from the lazy seeker. It is hid as in an open field, not as in a frowning fortress. It is not hid as shipwrecked treasures are hid, at the bottom of the seas, far beyond the diver's utmost skill. The Word is nigh thee. Christ is not far from any one of us.

II. The Seeker.—The true seeker is like this merchantman, travelling by sea and land, from city to city, putting his whole soul into the search, testing every pearl he finds, and careful that he be not deceived. He needs great care, for many pearls are cheats. There is a precious stone in the Portuguese treasury which is called the Braganza, and is as large as a goose's egg. It is worth £3 or £5,500,000 according to its quality. The king will not allow anyone to test its value. With the merchantman seeking is no by-job but a business; he never was more earnest about anything all his life. If you wish to know how men search for treasures read Prescott's History of the Conquest of Mexico. This has been called 'the century of treasure-seekers,' because so many buried cities and new mines have been discovered in it. Such a book as Mackenzie's America, a History, tells how men have searched for gold in our day. In 1848 an old settler was peacefully digging a trench near the Sacramento River, not dreaming that the next stroke of his spade was to influence the history of the world. His wondering eye discovered certain shining particles among the sand which he lifted. They were gold! Gold was everywhere. It was the land of old fairy tale. The bewildering news thrilled the heart of America. That season thirty thousand Americans crossed the plains, climbed the mountains, some of which were as lofty and rugged as the Alps, forded the streams, bore without shrinking all that want, exposure, fatigue, and the bloody Indians could inflict, and plodded over more than two thousand miles of unexplored wilderness to the land of promise. Four thousand of them left their bones in the desert. Fifty thousand came by sea. From all countries they came—from quiet English villages, from the cities of China. Before the year was out, eighty thousand treasure-seekers had reached California. They who seek heaven's treasures as eagerly shall surely find them. 'And ye shall seek Me, and find Me, when ye shall search for Me with all your heart' (Jer. xxxix. 13).

III. The Finder.—Of the two men here one finds without seeking, the other seeks till he finds. Many of earth's greatest treasures were found, as this treasure was, by one who sought them not. History preserves the name of the slave—Atahualphi—who, seizing a shrub on a hill-side to aid his ascent or break his fall, and pulling up the shrub with his weight, discovered the silver mines of Potosi, the richest in the world. The silver mines of Kongsberg were first revealed to a Norwegian cowherd who watched a restless bull scraping the earth with his hoofs. Behold two ways of coming into the kingdom. The woman of Samaria, the thief on the cross, and the Philippian gaoler were like the treasure-finder; the Ethiopian eunuch and Lydia were like the pearl-seeker.

Watch the finder in the first parable. He needs not to travel into his neighbours' fields for the treasure, but finds it in his own, where he was ploughing every day. Daniel O'Connell, when the hand of death was upon him, was grieved for the sins of his youth, and longed to reach Rome, hoping to find repose there and healing of soul. The poor man somehow fancied that Rome was nearer heaven than Dublin, and that the treasure could more certainly be found in the field of Italy than in the field of Ireland. He set out, but died at Genoa. Thank God that you may find heaven's treasure at your own fireside.

IV. The Seller.—Our two parables are like two streams, flowing apart at first but meeting at this point, and uniting their waters during the rest of their course. They who find without seeking and they who find while seeking equally sell all that they may buy and possess the chief good.

To sell all for the one treasure is a very strong way of saying that if you don't love Christ more than all, you don't love Him at all; that the true seeker will part with everything else, if need be, for His dear sake. And he does this 'for joy'. He does not grudge the price, for he knows that the eternal pearl of his soul is cheap at any money, and that he can never buy it too dear, as he must be a gainer by the exchange, cost what it may. Without an idea of a hard saying or a hard bargain, 'for joy thereof he goeth and selleth all that he hath and buyeth that field'.

Buy thou the truth
And sell it not again:
Count thou no price too great for it,
Part with it for no gain.

V. The Owner or Possessor.—'Treasure-trove' or found treasure with us belongs to the Queen, but there it belonged to the owner of the field in which it was found. He had every right and title to it, and no one could take it from him. Christ here teaches that the treasure becomes our very own, quite as much as if we had bought it and all belonging to it—quite as much as if the purchase-deed had been signed and sealed and registered without one single flaw. The poorest can buy the pearl, as it is a gospel-buying. 'Ho, every one that thirsteth, and he that hath no money, come, buy.' Notice the business-like thoroughness of the owners. Each was determined to have it, and really make it his own. Go thou and do likewise, and heaven's pearl shall become thy possession unto eternity.

The treasure-finder made sure of everything connected with the treasure. He was like a coal-owner who must buy the whole field, and every house upon it, and everything under it down to the centre of the earth. But some people wish to get off with as little religion as possible. Bare salvation is all they care for. Their religion, like Lazarus, gets only the crumbs of life:—

Saving, as shrewd economists, their souls
And winter pork, with the least possible outlay
Of salt and sanctity.

Such people cannot be true treasure-seekers. And their little religion will make little hearts and little lives. It will give them little comfort on a dying day, and little satisfaction on the judgment-day. You despise niggardliness in common things; won't you despise it also in the things of Christ?

Children are born merchants. To buy and sell and keep shop is one of their most popular amusements. Come to heaven's market and buy and sell for eternity.

You are in the field every day, for the Church is around you and the Bible is in your hands. But the Red Indians roamed over the gold-fields of California and were the possessors of them, and yet remained as poor as poor can be. I believe that many of them saw the gold ore with their own eyes, but yet did not discover it, being blind to its value. Have a care that you be not like them. 'Search the Scriptures.' That Californian ditcher, up to the day when his spade turned over the particles of gold, got some good from the field. It yielded him potatoes, and vegetables, and grass, but no gold. And the Bible may do you much good; it may teach you morality, and earthly wisdom, and so on, without enriching you for time and eternity with the one thing needful. If you have not found the treasure of the kingdom yet, think, 'There is only a thin crust, an invisible partition, between me and it'. Put forth your hand, and then the glad shout that bursts from your lips won't be 'I have found it!' but I 'have found Him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph' (John 1. 45).—JAMES WELLS, The Parables of Jesus, p. 47.

THE PEARL

MATTHEW XIII. 46.

A PEARL is a very beautiful jewel. It is generally found inside an oyster shell. The largest and most perfect pearl known is about 1 inch in width and 1½ inches long, worth about £50,000. If you have read the parable, you find a merchant-man sold all that he had to purchase this treasure.

I. The Pearl is Precious.—'Christ loved the Church and gave Himself.'

To obtain a pearl, a diver has to risk a great deal; a long voyage, deep sea, currents, rocks, sharks. It means a test.

To obtain Christ we must go to Calvary and surrender all that we may win Him.

II. The Pearl is Beautiful.—So is the Church to Christ and Christ to the Church.

If we possessed a pearl we could only do two things with it—wear it or sell it.

Now if we possess Christ and Christ possesses us we can use Him in many ways—for meat, drink, clothing, ornament, help, wisdom, riches, medicine, strength, light, joy, life, pardon, peace.

If I've Jesus, Jesus only, I possess a cluster rare.

III. The Pearl is Pure and White.—Behold the Lamb of God. 'By His stripes we are healed.'

Evil communications corrupt good manners.

Heart.—Edmund Burke, a wise man, once said, 'Safe bind, safe find'.

Would you, as Nelson, like to be victorious at the end of life's fight? Then listen to the voice of our Lord Jesus, 'My son, give me thine heart'.

Let this be your response to the appeal—

Here's my heart, Lord; seal it for Thy courts above.—A. G. WELLS, Sunday Gleams, p. 38.

THE DRAW-NET

'Again, the kingdom of heaven is like unto a net, that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind: which, when it was full, they drew to shore and sat down, and gathered the good into vessels, but cast the bad away. So shall it be at the end of the world: the angels shall come forth, and sever the wicked from among the just, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth.'—MATTHEW XIII. 47-50.

I WONDER that Christ has taken only one sea-story and made a parable of it. The most of His ministry was spent on the shores of the Sea of Galilee, the Twelve Apostles were fishermen, and the most of His hearers saw the sea every day. His boyhood was spent in one of the loveliest inland villages in the world, and His youthful mind was peopled with its images. All speakers draw their best illustrations from the scenes that most delighted them in youth; and hence, perhaps, Christ, who was made in all things like as we are, drew the most of His illustrations from the land and not from the sea. In this I think we have a touch of His true human nature. The Sea of Galilee, 'the most sacred sheet of water the world contains,' was then swarming with fishes. The bounty of the sea-harvest was so great that many were engaged in its ingathering. Hence Christ's Apostles were fishermen. Often the merry youngsters on the beach helped a crew of fishermen who were 'partners' to launch the boat. At first it sinks in the water up to the gunwale with the weight of a big heavy net. Two of the men row very leisurely, and two or three pay out the net. It has stones or bits of iron at the bottom, and corks or bladders at the top, so that it stands up in the water like a wall. After the men have rowed out a little way, they turn the prow of their boat slightly to the south, and then due south, and after a while to a point on the shore a few score yards south of the spot from which they started. Then their work begins in earnest, and all the boys about gladly lend a hand. The net makes a sort of half circle in the sea, and, seizing it at both ends, with much tugging and shouting they draw it to the shore. Everything in the bit of the sea inside the net is hauled to the shore. How the boys watch the frightened, leaping fishes as their speckled white bellies appear in the shallow water. At last, with a long pull altogether, they bring the net and all in it out of the water, and then a wet moving heap lies on the sand. There they see the carp, and perch, and sole with which the lake abounded, and among them worthless and dead fish and sea-animals, and snail-shells and mud. The fishers plant their pails and baskets by their side, sit down, and carefully pick out the good fish and cast the bad away, as you have seen a fisher indignantly fling from him the dog-fish or devil-fish, that had broken his nets and mocked his toil, leaving them to rot neglected on the sand. I shall now take up the parable bit by bit, and we shall occupy ourselves only with 'the lessons that come easily, like ripe fruit when the branch is slightly shaken'.

I. The Sea.—In the Bible the sea is often used as a picture of the great, raging, restless mass of mankind. David tells us that 'God stilleth the noise of the seas, the noise of their waves, and the tumult of the people' (Ps. lxxv. 7). And the poet says:—

Man's yesterday may ne'er be like his morrow;
Nought may endure but mutability.

The great sea remains, though parts of it are always returning to the clouds whence it came, so men are always perishing, but the race remains, just as the forest survives though its leaves are always fading away. The sea is broken up into oceans and bays, but is still one sea; so all the nations make one family. The net is cast not into a brook, or pool, or river, or bay, but into the mystic surging ocean of humankind, whose waves are the generations of men.

II. The Net in the Sea.—It would take me a long time to tell you how many difficulties writers have had about the net. The best explanation, I think, is one which I have not found in any book. The net here represents the kingdom of heaven not as a society or agency, but as an influence. The parable speaks not of many little nets in the hands of men, but of one great net in the hand of the Great Fisher. Christendom or Christ's dominion in our day is far wider than all the visible churches in the world if added together would be. As the net encloses fishes, so that influence encloses many in our land who are outside the Church of Christ, and who are even stark infidels.

III. The Fishes in the Net.—These represent all who are in any way within Christ's influence:—

1. They are of all sorts of people.—The net reaches from the very top to the very bottom of the social sea. Christ's kingdom reaches the highest and lowest, great and small, sage and savage. Its aim is to surround and catch all men. None wearing the human form are so low as to be beyond its sweep, thank God, as no fishes in the sea are outside the net that rests upon the bottom and floats on the surface. We should let out the wide net of the gospel, and give it a far-reaching sweep, and expect that all kinds of people will be found within it.

2. Many are in the net without their choice and against their will.—Some are in the net without their knowledge even. Some of our lochs have fishes that won't take a lure or bait, and they are caught with such a net as Jesus has His eye on in this parable. So many men won't enter a church or listen to a sermon, and yet the meshes of the divine net are around them. They are caught on all sides by Christian ideas and influences. They fancy that they are only in the sea of humanity, but they are caught in the net of Christianity.

3. Those within the net cannot escape out of it.—I read some strange letters written to a friend by an educated Indian. He was sorry that he had been born an Indian, and wished to become entirely an Englishman. He struggled hard to get out of the Indian net, but could not. His birth, his ancestry, his blood, his very skin, proclaimed him an Indian. He must live and die an Indian. So you are in an unseen net held by an Almighty hand, and in that net you must remain. Thank God you must, for it is Christ's gracious net. During the last Turkish war the Russian army crossed the Danube and planted itself right in the heart of Turkey. The Circassians rose in rebellion against their sovereign, Alexander II.; the Rumanians boldly went over to his side; while the Servians hesitated and gave no sign. 'Be ye sure of this, that the kingdom of God has come nigh unto you' (Luke x. 11), as the kingdom of Russia came nigh unto these Servians. The words mean, it has come down upon you from above, just as the air and sunshine are upon you, just as the net is upon the shoal of fishes within it.

IV. The Shore.—The fisher's work is not finished till the spoil of the sea lies in a glittering heap upon the shore. We are in, and a part of, that ever-changing ocean, of which eternity is the stable shore. Eternity is the Great Fisher's home, whence He started when the fishing began, and to which He returns when the net is full. To our eye there are many drawings of the net ashore—every death is an instance of it—but to Christ's far-reaching eye there is only one landing of the great net, when its heap is laid before the judgment-seat. Man cannot seize the net, or roll backwards the wheels of on-rushing time. By invisible and invincible hands the net is drawn without noise to the place of separation.

V. The Vessels.—When the net and its treasures were laid on the shore, the fishermen 'sat down' leisurely, and 'gathered the good into vessels'. The good are the sweet and wholesome fishes that are fit for food. 'So shall it be at the end of the world; the angels shall come forth and sever' (ver. 49). They are the drawers of the net and the dividers of the fishes.

Mixture here, separation there, is one of the laws of the kingdom of heaven. The dividing and discovering day is on the shore which we are approaching. The good who are to be carefully gathered and preserved are 'the just' (ver. 49). They have been justified by faith in Christ; and by God's grace they have been just in their lives before their fellow-men. They only are good in the eye of God and in the light of eternity.—JAMES WELLS, The Parables of Jesus, p. 61.

OUR HELP IN TEMPTATION

'Then came she and worshipped Him, saying, Lord help me.'
—MATTHEW XV. 25.

WE will think of Jesus as our Help in Temptation.

Can we stand against Satan in our own strength? No.

No, 'we have no power of ourselves, to help ourselves,' so we have to look to Jesus for help.

Those words, 'Then came she and worshipped Him, saying, Lord, help me,' were said to Jesus by a woman in great trouble. She knew that no one could help her as Jesus could, and so she went to Him; but did Jesus give her what she asked for at once? No.

No, He seemed to discourage her at first, and the disciples asked that she might be sent away, and yet she did not leave off praying, for she knew that if Jesus did not help her no one else could, and then, after He had tried her faith by making her wait for a time, and He saw how thoroughly she believed in His Almighty Power, He granted her prayer, and said, 'Be it unto thee even as thou wilt'.

We can learn two things from the story of the woman going to Jesus for help in her trouble.

I. Where to go for help.

II. The duty of perseverance in prayer.

When Satan makes your resolution so hard to keep, what is it that you need most? Help.

Yes, and it is to Jesus that you must go for help, as no one else can help you so well as He can. He wants to help you, He won't get tired because you come to Him so often; He says, 'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest'. So who is it you must go to for help against Satan? To Jesus.

Yes, Jesus tells you to come to Him because 'He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him'. And Jesus is the only one who can help us, for 'there is no other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved'. So what is the first lesson we learn from the woman going to Jesus in her trouble? Always to go to Him for help.

Yes; and the second lesson she teaches us is to persevere in prayer, when the answer does not come at once. Although she did not get the answer she wanted at once, she did not give up in despair, and at last Jesus did give her what she prayed for.

What is the second lesson from the woman going to Jesus in her trouble? Perseverance in prayer.

Yes; so you see you must ask for His help about your Lent resolution not once only, but many times, as often as you are tempted to break your resolution, and then Satan will at last leave you as he left Jesus.

Now that we see we must go to Jesus for help in our temptations and troubles, let us think of the help we need.

Our Master's strength is the help we need in our fight against Satan, for 'we have no power of ourselves to help ourselves'. Sometimes soldiers have been killed by their enemies through being too confident in themselves, and as an officer in Christ's army, I give you His command, 'Watch and Pray'.

Long ago, when the English and French were fighting in North America, a sentinel was found dead one morning, stabbed in the back with an Indian knife. The soldiers thought he must have fallen asleep and then been killed, and they said it was a just punishment, for if a sentinel sleeps while he is on duty his carelessness might lead to the destruction of a whole army. But on the next two mornings the sentinel at that place was found dead, stabbed in the back, like the first. A young officer asked the General to allow him to watch there, and the General consented. The officer was very watchful, and between two and three o'clock in the morning he noticed a large black hog. Before long he noticed that the hog kept coming nearer to him, so he shot it, and an Indian sprang up and fell dead. The Indian had disguised himself in the skin of a hog, and so he had deceived those other two sentinels and killed them.

Satan deceives us, that he may murder our souls, so we must always 'Watch and pray'. I have told you how St. Peter warns you to 'be vigilant, because your adversary, the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about seeking whom he may devour'.

Our evil nature makes Satan's work much easier.

If you set some straw on fire you might not be able to put it out before it had done a great deal of harm. I have heard of fields by the railway being set on fire in dry weather by a spark from the engine of a passing train. Jeremiah speaks of our heart with its evil nature as being 'deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked'. It is always ready to listen to Satan.

What words are there in the Lord's Prayer asking Him to keep our souls safe from sin? 'Deliver us from evil.'

Yes, when we say those words we ask God to 'keep us from all sin and wickedness, and from our ghostly enemy, and from everlasting death'.—J. L. SMITH-DAMPIER, Christ's Little Citizens, p. 206.

'JESUS ONLY'

'They saw no man save Jesus only'.—MATTHEW XVII. 8.

I HAVE one message for my readers. It is the message on this text, 'Jesus only'. It is the message that the heavens bent low to whisper to the listening earth over eighteen hundred years ago, 'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill towards men'. It is a message that comes ever fresh to us at all times of our life, and under all circumstances. Whatever we may be doing, wherever we may be, it is ever a true, living, real message, 'Jesus only'. It is no mere sentimental message; on the contrary, it is an eminently practical one. All those in the past who have followed it in the truest and highest sense have been great men, men inspired of God. Their thoughts, their words, their deeds have been handed down to posterity as the true thoughts of those who were filled with the Spirit of the living God. Yes, it is indeed a message of love, of practical effect, of power. Anyone who receives it as a fact receives at the same time a power to live, a strength in trial and adversity which the world cannot give, a triumphant victory over sin in all its forms, a living experience of the true faith in Christ, Jesus only—'The same yesterday, to-day, and for ever'.

The message is a twofold one. It is one which is deeply spiritual in that it enters into our innermost being and becomes the means of our living communion with a living God. It is at the same time eminently practical in that it enters into the very foundation of all our Christian life, of all our daily experience, whatever that experience may be. Let us, then, look at the message first as concerning our inner spiritual relationship to God.

I. 'Jesus only.' Three of the disciples have gone up into an high mountain apart with Jesus, and as they are away out on the mountain-top Jesus is transfigured before them. 'His face did shine as the sun, and His raiment was white as the light.' The disciples were overpowered by the glory that was revealed to their wondering gaze, and, like Moses before the burning bush, they fell on their faces to the ground. They hear His voice. Never before have they been so near to their Creator; surely, then, there is a deeply spiritual significance in this wonderful scene on that mountain-top. It seems to show us how practical, how real, should be our knowledge of the Lord Jesus, inasmuch as without Him we cannot enter the Father's presence. It is Jesus Himself who enables us to pray; it is through Him alone that our prayers are accepted of God. It is through Jesus that our actions (mixed with sin as they are) are able to be called good. Our thoughts, words, and deeds must always pass through the Lord Jesus into the presence of God. We want, then, to follow Him and to be His in such reality that it may be said of us, 'Ye are Christ's and Christ is God's,' and then by way of corollary, 'Ye are God's'. Christ Himself is the great link between our souls and God. Now let us see in what way 'Jesus only' can be the very keynote of our lives in this spiritual sense.

We look back on our lives this day, and as we do so we become conscious of very many failures. We see a past filled with all sorts of sins, sins of omission, sins of commission. We have left undone those things which we ought to have done, and we have done those things which we ought not to have done; our own hearts condemn us. We can see all sorts of thoughts of evil which have entered into our minds unchecked and found a resting-place there. We can see our lips framing those words which to our inner consciences were degrading and sinful. We can see those actions in the past which we would to God we had never done and we would fain put away from our remembrance. How true is it, then, that we are weak and sinful. The best of us are, after all, but miserable sinners, as we so often say, but rarely mean, when we join together in the Litany. What then is our hope? 'Jesus only.' This is the remedy for our spiritual destitution and shortcomings. What a grand fact it is, and how much we thank God for it when we read in His Word, 'Being justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, whom God has set forth to be an atonement through faith in His blood to declare His righteousness for the remission of sins that are past'! Here we have the blood of Christ purging our consciences from dead works to serve the living God. Here we have the blood of the everlasting covenant applied to heart and life so that we may understand as a fact, that through Jesus is declared unto us the 'remission or passing over of the sins that are past'. Thus it is that Jesus by His blood-shedding brings us into the presence of His Father, and presents us faultless before His presence with exceeding joy. We have, therefore, brethren, 'Boldness to enter into the Holiest by the blood of Jesus' (Heb. x. 19).

II. 'Jesus only' in the practical everyday life of experience. Jesus must enter into everything. Our life is composed of many units—of small atoms. Just as the body is formed of numberless cells, through which all the life permeates, and round which it revolves, even so is our daily life composed of numberless duties and difficulties, and in each and all of these must Jesus appear, direct, and control. Your life here is composed of Latin and Greek, of Virgil, of Thucydides, of Euclid and Algebra, and of all the different forms of classical and mathematical life. Let us all strive to remember that if we are true followers of Christ, Christ must enter into each part of our daily work. We must do it the better for being Christians, we must realise that we are doing it for Him. Then again, all our recreation must be His. Christ must be with us in the football field, He must make us good cricketers. His influence must be felt in whatever we are doing. How glad I was, the other day when I was down at Cambridge, to hear about a certain boat captain, 'He won't stand any swearing in the boathouse'. That is what we want—a practical, living Christ, controlling thoughts, words, and deeds.—NORMAN BENNET, Be True: And Other Sermons for Boys, p. 30.

THE SWITCH

'Notwithstanding, lest we should offend them.'—MATTHEW XVII. 27.

PEOPLE do not like paying taxes. When the tax-gatherer comes round they are 'out' as often as possible; and when they have to meet him at last they pay, but pay with a grumble. That is not right, for if there were no taxes we should have no policemen to protect us from robbers, no soldiers to fight for our country, no place in which poor old people could find rest at last; we should not even have a vestry, and what a dull, dull parish that would be that hadn't a vestry! We should be as polite and civil to the tax-gatherer, then, as we would be to any other gentleman who is doing his duty and trying to teach us to do ours.

It was one of those tax-gatherers who was asking about Jesus now. Jesus was staying at Peter's house in Capernaum at the time when the tax for the Temple came due. Every Jew above twenty years of age was expected to pay that tax. He was not compelled, he was only 'expected'. This is what your father or big brother would explain as a 'voluntary assessment'. So the sharp tax-collector went to Peter about the matter. It was very polite and very proper of him to go to Peter rather than to Peter's guest, for it was Peter's house. He wanted to find out something about which he was not quite sure. He had heard enough about Jesus to know that He did a good many things differently from other people, possibly because He did them better, and He wondered if He was willing to pay His taxes. Some people are quite willing not to pay these, just to prove that they do things differently from other people; but that cannot be because they are better than others—not always!

Peter told the man he was quite sure his Master was willing to pay the Temple-tax, but, if he would just wait a moment, he would go and ask, so as to make certain. But before Peter had time to ask Jesus, Jesus asked him a very straight question. It was like this: 'Do kings pay taxes for their own thrones?' Of course they do not. 'Do their children?' Of course not. Then He was not bound to pay the tax for the Temple, for it was His. He was the Lord of the Temple; it was the earthly throne of His glory. 'Notwithstanding,' he added, 'lest we should offend them the tax shall be paid.'

Do you see what the meaning is? It is this: Don't press even your rights if they would put other people wrong. Jesus had a right not to pay this tax; but if He had insisted on His rights, He would have given the impression that He cared nothing for the Temple—how it was maintained, or whether it was maintained at all; and that would have done great, great harm, for it would have made people think that, in spite of all Jesus said, He was not a religious man. For the people did not know yet exactly who He was—the Lord of the Temple Himself. And Jesus saw that, and understood all that; and so, though He had no right to pay the tax, He paid it rather than, by pushing His rights too far, give a bad impression to those who could not rightly understand.

He went off, in fact, on a switch for the time. You know what a switch is? When you are riding on a tram-car on a single line of rails, while your car is going in one direction, another car is coming the opposite way. What is to be done? You have a perfect right to go straight on, and the other car has a perfect right to go straight on. Very well, keep to your 'rights,' both of you, and in a minute or two, there will be a fine collision and smash, and, as likely as not, somebody will be injured. Would that be wise? Would that be really right? Wouldn't it be wicked and foolish? Very, very wicked and foolish indeed. The one or the other is bound to give way a little; which shall it be? 'Oh!' you say, 'the other, of course.' Yet if you stood midway between the two cars, and heard the one conductor say, 'The other, of course!' you would at the same time hear the other conductor say, 'The other, of course!' and then you would be puzzled why it should be the one or the other of course.

It is that 'of course' that does the mischief—it is so stupid, so dogged, so proud, and so blind. When two people are in their rights, and their rights clash against each other, then the grand one, the really great one, is the one who is willing to go aside on a switch till the other has passed. You know the switch—the little line of rails placed here and there beside the main line to let the one car go upon while the other passes by. The one has no more call upon it than the other to go off its straight path, but then, some one must do it, and that one is the best that does it first and does it best.

That was what Jesus did. He had the best of all rights to refuse to pay this Temple-tax; but if He had stood on His rights somebody else would have been put wrong—wrong in his thinking, wrong in his spirit, wrong in his understanding of things. And so Jesus stepped aside from His rights, as it were, to let others pass smoothly on. He paid the tribute.

There are a great many single rails in the world, where you and other people will have to meet, and where somebody must be loving and humble, and be ready to yield a bit, or else there will be great trouble. You have quite a right to think for yourself, and act for yourself alone; but what a poor, miserable, wretched, selfish world this would soon be if everybody thought for himself only!—J. REID HOWART, The Children's Pew, p. 169.

THE SAVIOUR'S OMNISCIENCE

'Go thou to the sea, and cast a hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up: and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money.'—MATTHEW XVII. 27.

THERE is a very wonderful history connected with the text, a history which will teach us some important lessons. I shall go on, therefore, to relate these remarkable circumstances, and then endeavour to make a suitable application of them.

Our Blessed Lord, accompanied by St. Peter, and others of His disciples, was returning to Capernaum. This is called 'His own city' (Matt. ix. 1), not because He had been born there, nor because His childhood and youth had been spent in it, but because when His fellow-townsmen of Nazareth rejected His message and cast Him out, He had taken up His abode in it. Indeed, Capernaum was His home (so far as He had any) during a large portion of the three years of His public ministry. For this reason we feel some interest in the place, and I therefore pause in the narrative long enough to say, that the city stood on the north-west corner of the Sea of Tiberias. It was once a town of considerable importance, and the capital of all Galilee; but now we are not even quite sure of the exact spot which it occupied. Some years ago, an American missionary travelling in those regions, found a few wretched Arab huts covering, as he believed, the ruins of the once famous Capernaum.

It was concerning this proud and wealthy city that our Saviour once uttered the fearful prediction, 'And thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell' (Matt. xi. 23), a prophecy which was fulfilled during the wars between the Jews and the Romans.

So much for Capernaum and its eventful history. It was to this city that our Saviour was returning from one of His missionary journeys, attended by several of His disciples. On the road, the Apostles had been disputing among themselves which should be the greatest personage in the temporal kingdom which they thought that their Master was about to set up. From the opening verse of the eighteenth chapter of Matthew, it is plain that the incident of the tribute money, of which I shall presently tell you, had some connection with this unpleasant discussion.

The tax demanded was the temple tax, which all Jews were required to pay every year towards meeting the expenses of public worship. (Exod. xxx. 13.)

Jesus had lately performed a miracle, in the cure of the poor demoniac, and the tax-gatherers were puzzled to know in what light they ought to regard Him, and whether it would be proper to demand from Him the usual tribute-money or not.

I ought to state that the men who collected this temple tax were respected, because it was for the support of the ordinances of God's House, whereas the publicans who gathered the revenue for the Roman government, which then held the Jews in bondage, were uniformly despised and hated.

As the Saviour and His Apostles passed along the streets of Capernaum, one of these collectors spoke to St. Peter, who was probably a little distance behind his Master, and said in an undertone, 'Doth not your Master pay tribute?'

St. Peter would have done well to have gone and asked for directions from the Saviour, but, with his accustomed impetuous haste, he answered 'Yes'; and thus in a manner committed his Master for the payment of a tax which could not properly be claimed from Him. Thus far Jesus had not heard what was said, but being God he knew. When they came into the house, He inquired of Peter, 'Of whom do the kings of the earth take custom, or tribute? of their own children, or of strangers?'

Peter (no doubt amazed that the Saviour knew what had been passing between the tax-gatherer and himself) answered, 'Of strangers.'

Jesus said, 'Then are the children free. Notwithstanding, lest we should offend, go thou to the sea, and cast a hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up: and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money: take that, and give unto them for Me and thee.'

What He meant was, that as the temple was His Father's house, He, being a King's son, had no occasion to pay towards keeping up the worship in His own sanctuary. To avoid all needless offence He quietly yields the point, and even provides, by a wonderful miracle, for the settlement of the accustomed tax.

How poor our Saviour was in His character as Man! The tax demanded was only about fifteen pence; and yet even this paltry sum could not be paid out of the meagre purse which the Apostles carried. He might have borrowed it, or got it in some other way, but He chose rather to work a miracle that those about Him might see that while, as the Son of Man, He was thus utterly destitute, He could, as the Son of God, do what He pleased.

The circumstance I have thus related was a miracle. Many stories have been told of fishes which had swallowed various sorts of things, not very wholesome or nutritious; but they will not help to explain this case. St. Peter was told to go at once to the shore of the Sea of Tiberias and cast in a hook, and the first fish he caught was to have in its mouth just the sum needed to pay the temple tax.

Now, in whatever way we look at it, the incident proves that the Lord Jesus Christ was a Divine Being—proves that He was God.

If He knew that the first fish which came up would have precisely such an amount of money in its mouth, it was convincing evidence that He knew everything. And if it be said that He made the coin, and placed it there, this also would be proof that the same power which the Almighty Father had belonged alike to Him.

This is the point which I wish to impress upon your minds, that the Lord Jesus Christ knows all things, and, therefore, that the Lord Jesus Christ is God.

How it perplexes and astounds us to think of a Being who knows all things! When a murder has been committed in a sly and secret way, how long it is often a profound mystery as to who is the author of the dreadful deed! It sometimes requires long years before the facts of the case are unravelled. What care and thought, and spying out of suspicious people's actions; what arraignment and cross-examination of witnesses; what anxiety and perplexity to judge to get at the truth! The Lord Jesus Christ knows all about it in a moment.

In the case of the application which the tax-gatherer made to St. Peter the Saviour was not obliged to wait for the Apostle to come and tell Him of the conversation which had taken place; for He knew it without being told.

Wicked people sometimes say when they propose to commit an evil deed, 'Well, let us go off where nobody sees us, and then we can do as we please!' And so they skulk away from the observation of their fellow mortals, and commit thefts and forgeries, and make counterfeit money, and adulterate the groceries which they sell in their stores; and flatter themselves with the notion that it is all a profound secret. Alas! what a grievous mistake—God sees them. The Lord Jesus Christ, who gave that wonderful proof of His omniscience, He sees them.

Among Jean Ingelow's Stories told to a Child, there is a beautiful one called The Grandmother's Shoe, which I wish I had time to repeat. It would take too long to do it, so you must get the nice book and read it for yourselves.

My purpose will be answered now by reciting a very small portion of it. A mischievous little girl has been at high play on Sunday afternoon, when a good old Quaker lady had sent her to an attic room to learn a parable. All at once she espies something on a chair in a corner of the room, and in her fright she fancies it to be the grandmother, who had thus caught her in her frolic. She recovers her spirits and begins her romping again, when a gentle young Quakeress quietly opens the door and administers a mild rebuke.

'After all, there was no harm done,' said the child.

'No harm!' replied the other. 'What dost thou mean?'

'Why, you know,' said the little girl calmly, 'you know the grandmother did not see me!'

'Thou heedless child,' she answered with a look of pity, 'art thou really so much afraid of my grandmother, and dost thou wholly forget the ear that did listen to thy talking, and the eye that was upon thee all the time? What wouldst thou have done if, when I drew back the curtain, thou hadst seen the Redeemer standing there?'

And now, here is the lesson which I beg you to remember; that the Saviour always sees you. Try your best, by the help of God's grace, to let Him see you doing right.—JOHN N. NORTON, Milk and Honey, p. 89.

THE UNMERCIFUL SERVANT

'Therefore is the kingdom of heaven likened unto a certain king, which would take account of his servants.'—MATTHEW XVIII. 23.

I. THEREFORE; and so we have to look back and see why St. Peter had come to our Lord and had asked him: 'Lord, how oft shall my brother sin against me, and I forgive him? till seven times?' And if it seems strange to us his thinking that seven times was so often to forgive, you must know that the Jews thought thus: If a man offended his neighbour three times his neighbour was bound to pardon him; the fourth time there was no longer any duty of forgiving him. So at all events St. Peter, even then, long before the Holy Ghost had come down upon the Apostles, felt that the law of our dear Lord was a law of love, far beyond anything that was written in the law of Moses. Therefore, because of this question, our Lord tells us this story: 'The kingdom of heaven is likened to a certain king, which would take account of his servants'. Now, here the kingdom means that new kingdom which He had come to set up on earth; that kingdom into which we have all been baptised, and in which we all hope to die. 'His servants'—now we must not look on these as if they were household servants. No; they were the governors under him of great countries: just as we read in the Book of Daniel that 'it pleased Darius the king to set over the kingdom an hundred and twenty princes' (because there were a hundred and twenty provinces). It spoils the parable to think of these servants as we generally think of them, as if they were household servants. No, they were great princes; and all the revenues, that is, the money which came in from their provinces, they were bound to keep, not for themselves, but for their king; and in due time he would call them to account for it. And so he did; and we find what happened at the very beginning of this reckoning. 'When he had begun to reckon one was brought unto him which owed him ten thousand talents.'

II. And then see what this servant had to pay. 'Forasmuch as he had not to pay'; that is, had nothing. And so you know very well that of ourselves we could do nothing at all for God's service. You see one parable cannot tell us everything. This does not teach us at all about our dear Lord's death, or our baptism—about those we hear in other parables. Here we are only told that this poor miserable servant who owed this immense sum of money had nothing to pay at all.

And then see what he did.

'The servant therefore fell down and worshipped him, saying, Lord, have patience with me, and I will pay thee all'—that is, he really felt in earnest then; and he determined to do what he could in future. 'That was right; but when he said, 'I will pay thee all,' it shows how little he knew of that which he owed. 'If thou, lord, will have patience with me, I will pay thee all.' And so you, if you think for one moment that anything you in yourselves can do in the future can make up for the past, you would do what, as I suppose, this nobleman intended to do: 'for the future, all that comes in from my province I will pay thee; but as to the time past, I can do nothing: I only trust in thy mercy'. That time those opportunities are gone, we can never bring them back again; we can only pray very humbly that God will forgive us for our past sins; nothing but His mercy can blot them out.

And so you know very well that if any of you from this time forth set yourselves with all your heart and soul to pay your King all you owe, you can but bring Him a very poor imperfect little fragment, which, however, He will accept, because it is your best.

III. Well, and now see something else. When this servant had been so forgiven, what did he do—the very first thing? You have heard this parable a hundred times, but perhaps you never noticed the first action of the servant. The same servant went out—went out, that is, went away from his lord, and therefore he fell into sin. And notice this too: the king sent for his servants because he had a right to send for them; but this unforgiving servant found one of his fellow-servants which owed him an hundred pence: that is, he went out of his way and took pains to search for him. Just as we sometimes put ourselves out of our way to take offence and quarrel with somebody who meant us no harm at all. When we think how much, how very much God has forgiven us, how much He forgives us every day, who are that we should be quarrelsome and unforgiving towards those about us?

See now what that was which the fellow-servant owed—one hundred pence. If we compare the other great debt with that, it is as if we compared one million two hundred and fifty thousand three hundred to one—which means that the debt we owe God is something beyond all comparison greater than all that anyone can possibly owe us. We have sinned against Him every day and many times a day: and we ask Him to forgive us; and then we go away from our prayers, and find some one who has done us a little trifling injury, and straightway we are angry and cannot forgive, and must have amends. Now this it is that our Lord would warn us against in this parable. See how it goes on: the fellow-servant besought his creditor in the very same words that he had used to his lord, and yet those words did not remind him how lately he had been in trouble himself, nor make him more gentle towards his debtor.

The very same words! Yes, except that the fellow-servant did not call him 'lord,' as neither did he worship him; he spoke as man to man, a debtor indeed, but a debtor to a man his equal, nor to the great lord of both, having power of life and death. But there was neither mercy nor sense of justice in the heart of the cruel creditor; 'he went and cast him into prison'.

'So when his fellow-servants saw what was done, they were very sorry.' Sorry—not angry. Because good Christians are not angry, but sorry, when they see the sins of their fellows. And what did these do then? What you ought to do; what I, what every priest, what every Christian ought to do, when we see anything or anybody going wrong: 'they went and told their lord all that was done'. We are not to go and waste our time in idle complaining to this person and that; we are to go to our Lord, and tell Him; just as the disciples did when St. John Baptist had been beheaded: they went, you remember, and told Jesus.

'Then his lord' 'called him' (and you see, tyrant as he was, the unmerciful servant had to obey at once) and 'said unto him, "O thou wicked servant" (he had not called him wicked before), "I forgive thee all that debt, because thou desiredst me: shouldst not thou also have had compassion on thy fellow-servant, even as I had pity on thee?"' And his lord was wroth, and delivered him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due unto him.'

So you see this wicked man was now condemned to far sorer punishment than he had bestowed on his own poor debtor; and to far sorer punishment than his lord would have inflicted on him that other time. We heard nothing of tormentors then. But now we do; and they are to torment him till he shall pay all: and as he never can do it, so they will never cease their torments.

This, then, is clear, that if, when God has forgiven us, we will not forgive our fellow-creatures, we shall displease Him more than ever. There is no heaven for the unforgiving: nothing but a certain fearful looking for of judgment. And so our dear Lord, our own Elder Brother, who tells us so lovingly elsewhere that His Father is our Father too, does not speak of Him so here. 'So likewise shall my Heavenly Father do also unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every one his brother their trespasses.' His Father will not be our Father—will not own us for His children, unless we forgive as He forgives. Not just saying we forgive, and feeling angry and hurt all the time; but really and truly, from our hearts forgiving, and ready to love those whoever they may be that offend us, and show them our love by doing them some little kindness as soon as we can.

So, and so only, can we be the children of our Father which is in heaven. So, and so only, shall we share the blessings promised to the meek, and the merciful, and the poor in spirit.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons for Children, p. 24.

A NEIGHBOUR

'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.'—MATTHEW XIX. 19. In the days of the great King Agathos many wonderful things took place. Young men saw visions, and old men dreamed dreams. Many that were poor became rich; many that were rude became gentle; and towns and villages that were almost deserted and in ruins were rebuilt and filled with happy crowds.

Just on the outskirts of this great King's kingdom, in a hollow among lofty hills, lay one of those ruined villages. Everything in it had a broken-down and decaying look. The houses were old and mean and bare; grass grew upon the streets; and the inhabitants were ignorant and sad and poor.

One morning in early spring, a stranger entered this village. It was noticed that he walked from one end of the main street to the other, looking to this side and to that, at the houses; but more eagerly still into the faces of the people who were passing by.

The labourers began to come out from their homes to go into the fields: the stranger examined every face as it passed. A little while after, the young women came out to the wells for water; the stranger went up to these and questioned them one by one. By and by, he turned aside to a blind old man, who sat at his door to enjoy the heat of the morning sun, and he put many questions to him. But neither the old man nor the young women could give him the information he wished. A look of distress and disappointment came into his face. The villagers saw him turning away into a back street that had long since been deserted. Then they noticed that he sat down on the stones of an old wall, with his face towards a roofless cottage, which had neither window, nor fireplace, nor door.

This was the cottage in which the stranger was born, and in which he had spent his early years. As he sat gazing on its ruins, the old forms he had known so well in his boyhood seemed to come back again. He saw his father working among the flower-beds in the garden; and his mother, now knitting and now cooking, beside the kitchen-fire. The very laughter of his brother and sisters, as he had so often heard it long ago, seemed to come back again and fill his ears like a song. And there came back also the memory of a day when that laughter was stilled; and along with that the form of a beautiful sister, who on that day was carried out to her grave. Tears began to trickle down his cheeks.

And then one of the strange things I mentioned at the outset happened. Behind the cottage rose up the great sides of the hills among which the village was nestled. Far up the huts of shepherds could be seen like little dots scattered here and there; and on the green pastures flocks of sheep. As the stranger was gazing across the roofless and broken walls of his early home, his ear caught little snatches of a song which some one was singing among the hills behind. Then he beheld the singer—a little girl—stepping down as if she were coming from the shepherds' huts. Her feet were bare, but she stepped downwards as if she had wings. Her yellow hair was blown out behind her with the wind. She was coming directly to the stranger, and almost before he knew she was at his side, and singing the song he had heard:—

Friend and brother wouldst thou find?
Hearts of love around thee bind?
Be thyself a heart of home;
To gentle heart, hearts gentle come.

Then she stopped singing, and fixing her eyes earnestly on him said, 'You are in pain, my brother?' And although she was but a little child, and one he did not remember to have seen before, the stranger could not help opening his heart to her.

'I have come from the most distant shores of our King's country to find my brother and sisters, and they are not here. When I left this village I was poor. I am rich now, and would share my riches with them if I could find them.'

While the stranger was speaking the little girl seemed to grow more and more beautiful. Her eyes shone like bits of the blue of the sky, and sent their glance into his very soul. As the morning sunlight fell on her hair it seemed like a crown of gold around her head. And then, as she stood before him there in her exceeding beauty, it flashed upon him that somewhere or other in other years he must have seen that face. And then in a moment more he knew that this was the very face of the dear sister who had died. Then she said, 'Come with me, brother; your brother and sisters are found.'

She took him by the hand and led him back into the main street of the village, and said, 'Do you see that blind old man whom you questioned? That is your father.'

'But my father is dead these many years.'

Without stopping to answer him, the beautiful child went on, 'Do you see those young women you spoke to coming from the wells with water? They are your sisters.'

'But my sisters must be old and grey-headed now.'

And once more, without replying to him, the child said, 'Do you see those labourers in the fields, whose faces you looked into so eagerly? They are your brothers.'

'But I had only one brother.'

While he was saying this the children began to go past to school.

'And there,' exclaimed his young companion, pointing to them, 'are your children.'

The stranger was perplexed. Everything about him seemed to swim in the morning light. The children, the young women, the labourers, and the blind old man appeared as if they were drawn up into the light. And into the same light the beautiful form of his child sister also passed, smiling towards her brother with a tender grace, and singing her gentle song. And then everything disappeared.

When he came to himself he was still sitting on the stones of the broken wall. The roofless cottage was on the other side of the way, but the little girl was gone. And from where he sat he could see neither children nor grown-up people of the village.

He was never quite certain about what had taken place. Sometimes he fancied he had fallen asleep, and had dreamed a happy dream. Sometimes it seemed as if he had seen a vision, and as if the beautiful child stepping down the hill-side with her song and her words of teaching had been real. But nobody else had seen her; and the shepherds in the huts did not know of such a child.

But whether what he saw and heard was real, or only a dream, it was the turning-point of life to this rich stranger.

The song of the fair-haired child took possession of his heart, and by means of it God changed his heart, and made it gentle and neighbourly; and the light of the neighbourly heart came into his eyes, and he saw in the ruined village a new world and new duties there for himself. Long afterwards he used to tell that he saw that day what John had seen in the Isle of Patmos—'a new heaven and a new earth'. He knelt beside the ruined cottage and lifted up his heart to God, and said, 'O my Father, let the heart that was in Thy Son Jesus be also in me! All that I have is Thine; from Thee it came, to Thee it shall return. Help me to fulfil Thy will.'

He rose up a new man. He said to himself, 'I will abide in this village and build up its ruined walls, and make the people of it the sharers of my wealth.'

So he abode in the village; and he became a neighbour to old and young. The inhabitants became his children, and his brothers and his sisters, and his parents. And light arose in their dwellings, and prosperity came back into their streets, and songs to their lips. The rich man was happy, and the poor were blessed; and in his old age, when young people were setting out in life, and came up to him for his blessing, he used to repeat to them the song which the fair-haired child of his vision had sung to him, and call it 'the secret of a happy life'.

Long years have passed since those things took place. The ruined village is now a large and prosperous city; but in the centre of it stands to this day a granite cross with the portrait of a beautiful child cut on the stem, and underneath the words of the song:—

Friend and brother wouldst thou find?
Hearts of love around thee bind?
Be thyself a heart of home;
To gentle heart, hearts gentle come.

That is the monument of the rich stranger who shared his riches with the people of the ruined village. His name is unknown. But in the histories of the city you will find that the founder of its prosperity is described as 'the man with the neighbourly heart'.—A. MACLEOD, The Gentle Heart, p. 37.

HOSANNAS OF THE CHILDREN IN THE TEMPLE

'And the multitudes that went before, and that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna to the son of David! Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord! Hosanna in the highest!'—MATTHEW XXI. 9.
'The children crying in the temple, and saying, Hosanna to the son of David.'—MATTHEW XXI. 15.

LET us try and think what it was that led these young ones thus to welcome Jesus. I cannot suppose it was because they believed Him to be the Son of God, or the Messiah promised to their nation. They knew little or nothing about, and pondered little or nothing about, types, or prophecies, or miracles. Moreover, there was no appearance of greatness or majesty in that lowly Man of Nazareth. He wore neither crown, nor sword, nor royal bracelet, like the old Kings of Judah and Israel; so that if they called Him, like the other worshippers that day, 'son of David,' it was with no thought of a throne, or palace, or kingdom. I believe then, surely, in the case of most, if not of all these child-worshippers, that they raised their Hosannas just because they saw in Him whom others were welcoming with Divine honours, One so loving, and kind, and good. Goodness has a wonderful attraction. I dare say some of you have a magnet at home. If so, you know how it attracts to itself small steel and iron filings, and makes them cling to it. Well, goodness acts exactly like that magnet; especially when manifested towards the weak and the feeble. And the greater the goodness is, the more powerful is its magnet-attraction. Have you never seen this even in the lower creation? I will give you a story to illustrate what I mean. A thousand years ago, not long after Christianity was brought to Britain, there lived a very saintly man in the fens of the south-east of England. In a lonely spot there he had built himself a hut or cell in the midst of reeds and alders, the haunt of various birds and of a few timid deer. Guthlac was specially kind, and loved whatever was gentle and good and holy. One day he was talking with a person called Wilfrid who had come to visit him in his solitary retreat. While they were conversing, two swallows flew and perched themselves, now on his knee, now on his shoulder, now on his hand. His friend expressed his wonder at their tameness; but Guthlac replied, 'He who leads his life according to the will of God, to him the wild birds and the wild deer draw most near'.

Was it not so in a higher, holier, diviner sense in the case of God's Holy Son—the kind and gentle and loving Jesus: He who was goodness itself, without one spot or flaw in it?

I. There was something in His very look and ways which at once attracted these Temple children. I doubt not all of you I now address have felt that there are people you take to at once, directly you see them; and others, again, you don't like or care so much for. I have often observed a kind man, though quite a stranger, coming into the room where little ones are playing. They are almost immediately pleased with him; they like his winning voice and ways. And though at first perhaps they may hang back, as if not quite sure whether to approach him or not, in a few moments they are climbing up his knee, and with dimples in their cheeks stroking his forehead, and telling him all about their games and playthings. As we say, 'they are at once at home with him'; the genuine, real, loving heart is there. On the other hand, there are some grown people, who in their own way when they get among children, smile upon them, and attempt to stroke them, and show an interest in them; and yet they might be in their company for months and years, and they would not get a bit better acquainted. The children would not take any more kindly to them : they would even turn away, they hardly know why. I believe this is the key to the picture now before us, of Jesus and the Children in the Temple. These children saw nothing whatever in the outer garb of that lowly Pilgrim to indicate the great coming Deliverer—whose name was to be called 'Wonderful—Counsellor—the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father—the Prince of Peace'. They may have heard of Him indeed, as the gracious and Holy Prophet of Galilee, who went about continually doing good, who had cured by a word the sick, the diseased, the dying, and even raised the dead. But it was when they saw for themselves His gentle look, and met the glance of His kindly eye, and heard the tones of His tender voice that their little hearts were attracted towards Him.

II. Let me draw from the scene just one lesson for you, it is this—that all may do something for Jesus.

In the beginning of this same twenty-first chapter of St. Matthew we read of a farmer or villager, at Bethphage, who on that Palm Sunday had lent two animals—an ass and its colt—for the procession across the Mount of Olives. On one of these, as King, the blessed Saviour rode in triumph. Perhaps the man could give nothing else, and be of no other service. But these he willingly made over whenever he was told by the disciples, 'The Lord hath need of them' (Matt. xxi. 3). Grown-up men and women, as we have seen, took off their garments and cast them in the way. Some who could not do this, who had no befitting mantle to provide, went into the groves and gardens of palm, and gathered branches from what was called 'the tree of victory'. Children whose little hands were perhaps unable to break down boughs or gather the fronds of the taller tree, would be content with sprigs of olive, or wreaths of wild flowers. And if they could not get even these, they could at least assemble around the blessed Jesus as He entered the Temple gate and cry with their young voices, 'Hosanna! Hosanna!'

This then, I repeat it, is the lesson you may learn from this passage of sacred Scripture: that all may give something, and do something, for the Saviour. It tells you too, that you are not too young or too little to glorify Him. That Temple, beneath whose white pillars these children stood, had its small stones, and small cedar-beams, and small rafters, as well as large ones. So it is in God's spiritual temple. There are 'vessels of small, as well as great quantity; vessels of cups, as well as vessels of flagons' (Isa. xxii. 24). You remember in a beautiful Old Testament story I know you much love to read, that Benjamin, 'the youngest,' had his share in taking balm and honey and spices and myrrh to his brother Joseph in Egypt. You may do the same to the true Joseph, that Elder Brother whom we have all sold by our sins; but who is now exalted on a throne of glory. The very youngest of His brethren may help to bring Him presents. The youngest among you may imitate

Mary the sister of Lazarus; break your little alabaster-box of ointment, and cause the fragrance to be wafted all around.—J. R. MACDUFF, Hosannas of the Children, p. 8.

HOSANNAS OF THE CHILDREN IN THE TEMPLE

'And the multitudes that went before, and that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna to the son of David! Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord! Hosanna in the highest!'—MATTHEW xli. 9.

'The children crying in the temple, and saying, Hosanna to the son of David.'—MATTHEW xli. 15.

Do you see that little town nestling amid some green mountains?

I cannot tell you its name, as it is not given. Perhaps it may have been in a valley with a stream running through it. For among these hills of Peræa, with oaks and olives dotting their slopes, a great number of rills sang their way down to the River Jordan.

Jesus and His disciples are there. He is just going out of the town, passing perhaps under the shady trees that were usual at the gates, when He is suddenly made to stop. A number of mothers have gathered around Him with their children, some of them carrying tiny infants.

What do these mothers want?

They wish, before He goes away, to get His blessing for their little ones. I cannot now dwell on the beautiful picture. But Jesus does what they ask Him to do. He laid His hands upon their children's heads; first on this one, then that one, and then another; and declares that the kingdom of heaven is peopled with such (Matt. xix. 13-15).

It was His last journey to Jerusalem. He was then on His way to the cross of Calvary, on which He was to be nailed, for you and for me. We might well have imagined that His thoughts would be quite taken up about His own sufferings, and that He would have no time to think of others; least of all about infants and children. But the words spoken by the Prophet Isaiah (xl. 11) are again fulfilled, as I believe they had often been before in the course of His ministry, the Great and Good Shepherd is seen 'gathering the lambs with His arms, and carrying them in His bosom'. Can you not call up before you His winning smile? Could these children ever forget, when they had grown to manhood or womanhood, the music of that voice of tenderness and love, which sounded that day among their native glens—

Let the little ones come unto Me!

But attractive as this scene is, more touching and more beautiful still is the one which so shortly followed it, described in our text. Let us go back in thought to that first 'Palm Sunday,' and try to imagine what took place on so specially joyful a day.

It was the 'Sunday,' if we may call it so, preceding the death of Jesus. He had come in triumph along the steep road from Bethany across the Mount of Olives. A great crowd of people had gone out to meet Him.

It was a Royal procession. Perhaps some of you may have heard, from the lips of those old enough to remember, about the Coronation, now very many years ago, of our own gracious Queen in London. How the trumpets sounded, how the cream-coloured steeds bore her along in her carriage of state. How every window had its banners and loyal devices, and the air rang with the shouts of a loving people.

In the passage from which the text is taken, we have brought before us the entrance of 'the Prince of the Kings of the earth' into His own Jerusalem. It must have been a similar stirring and exciting scene: for we read 'the whole city was moved' (Matt. xxi. 10). Great triumphal processions were common in that age of the world. Rome witnessed many such. War chariots, with horses in rich trappings, ascended to her Capitol. In these were seated heroes with garlands on their brows. Gold and silver vessels were borne before them by slaves, fragrant incense was wafted, and brazen trumpets rent the air. You can see in slabs brought from the ruins of Nineveh now in our British Museum, and more vividly still in later sculptures and paintings, representations of warriors celebrating their victories. In most of these cases, however, they are pictures of cruelty. Captive kings loaded with chains are yoked to the victor's car. Heads are carried or borne aloft, which the sword has severed from the body. Weeping women, bowed with grief, are tearing their hair as they lead along their fatherless children.

In the triumph spoken of in the text, Jesus had no such doleful cries entering into His ears; no such victims of misery and torture were borne before Him. No chains, nor slaves, nor swords, nor battle-axes, nor spears, were seen adorning this hour of earthly glory. His only weapons were palm branches, emblems of peace! When angels yoked His chariot to bring Him down from heaven, they blew their golden trumpets, and said, 'Peace on earth, goodwill to men'. His name was 'The Prince of Peace,' and His whole life on earth bore witness to the truth of the title. Oh, if the princes of this world would only follow the will and the example of Jesus, the din of war would never be heard. He would 'break the bow, and cut the spear in sunder, and burn the chariot in the fire' (Ps. xlv. 9).

But let us follow the procession from Bethany. I see old men there, reverend Jews with long flowing beards, who like Simeon had waited for the consolation of Israel. I see strong middle-aged men there. Some have climbed up the tall palm-trees, and are cutting some graceful fronds to be carried in their hands, or weaved into green leafy carpets to be strewn on the way. Others have broken boughs from the olive with its sombre leaf coated at the back with silvery grey. Others are taking off their cloaks of brown and white stripes, such as I have seen the people wearing at this day in Palestine, also to spread on the road for their King to pass over. I see women, too, there, like Mary Magdalene: not improbably would Martha and Mary of 'the town of Bethany' be among the number, full of love to Him who had raised their dear brother from the dead.

Loud were the voices, both before and behind, which cried, as the Divine Saviour 'in lowly pomp rode on to die,' Hosanna! Hosanna! Hosanna! He crossed the brook Kedron; ascended the steep road that led to the Temple; and there the reception awaited Him of which St. Matthew speaks. The grown-up people had sung their joyous song of welcome on the public road across the Mount. But a new band of worshippers now take it up. New voices in the Temple court break on His ear.

Tell me, who were these?

Yes! it was 'the children'; and mingling with their Hosannas, I almost think, as they look across the valley on the green slopes of Olivet, and see the King of Zion coming to His own City and Temple, I almost think I hear them singing the very words of their own great Prophet—'How beautiful upon the mountains (the Mountain) are the feet of Him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace; that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation; that saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth!' (Isa. li. 7). These little children were, doubtless, of varied ages; some older, some younger; but they all too had their tiny palm and olive branches, gathered probably from the gardens around; and as they saw the meek and gentle Jesus enter 'the Beautiful Gate,' they crowded round Him, and joined together anew in the joyous shout 'Hosanna to the son of David, Hosanna in the highest!' Some sang with their clear treble voices; others waved their palms; others their olive branches; perhaps some threw at His feet handfuls or wreaths of the red anemone, and other flowers which would then be in full glory. Look at that child with its fair face and dimpled cheeks: how he clings to the Redeemer's gracious hand! See that other dark-eyed boy with raven locks kissing the hem of His garment! See these others pressing eagerly through the throng, that they may bow at His feet, and, like the Peræan little ones, get His blessing! The eyes of Jesus were still wet with the tears He had shed on the brow of the Mount, when He wept over the city; but I think that loving scene and loving welcome would dry them. There were others at that moment in the Temple besides the children. Among these we read of 'the blind and the lame' that 'were healed'. They, doubtless, gathered around with their songs and offerings, 'walking, and leaping, and praising God'. But I am very sure that no voices which that day sounded in His ear, no garlands which that day adorned His triumph, would be so pleasing as the voices of these child-worshippers, and the tiny branches and flower-wreaths cast by them at His feet.—J. R. MACDUFF

THE TWO SONS

'But what think ye? A certain man had two sons; and he came to the first, and said, Son, go work to-day in my vineyard. He answered and said, I will not; but afterwards he repented, and went. And he came to the second, and said likewise. And he answered and said, I go, sir; and went not. Whether of them twain did the will of his father? They say unto Him, The first. Jesus saith unto them, Verily I say unto you, that the publicans and the harlots go into the kingdom of God before you. For John came unto you in the way of righteousness and ye believed him not; but the publicans and the harlots believed him; and ye, when ye had seen it, repented not afterward, that ye might believe him.—MATTHEW XXI. 28-32.

THE last seven of the parables, of which this is the first, form Christ's farewell address of caution to the Pharisees and His disciples, as John xiv.-xvii. is His farewell address of comfort. The last of these seven, the Parable of the Pounds, was spoken on the Friday before His crucifixion, and the remaining six seem to have been all spoken on the Tuesday before the Friday on which He bore our sins in His own body on the tree. This fact should throw a tender interest around all the following parables. The strange shadow of the cross is over each of them. This parable was spoken to the leaders of the people, whom Christ charges with double-dealing, for they had been trying to say both yes and no about the baptism of John (vv. 23-28).

It reminds us a little of the Prodigal Son. The father in it is a small farmer who wrought his own farm with the help of his family. The question Christ asks in verse 31 is self-evident; to state is to settle it. The first son represents the publicans and harlots, the second son the Pharisees. We have here—

I. God's Call.

II. Two of Man's Replies.

1. God's Call.—The Rabbis used to say that there was a mountain of meaning in every word of the Bible, and their saying applies to the words of God's call. Fix each of them in your mind.

1. The call is personal.—'And he came to the first, and said, Son' (ver. 28). 'And he came to the second, and said likewise' (ver. 30). While the call is the same to all, it comes to us not in the mass, but man by man. It singles each out, takes each aside, and speaks to him. As God spoke to Jacob at Bethel, so the God of Bethel speaks to you, and to the out-cast at the lowest step of the ladder, with only a stone for his pillow. There comes to you not merely a noise, nor a word, but a voice, and, if you listen, you may distinguish it from earth's harsh voices which fill the air, and strive to drown or mock the voice from heaven. The God of Samuel still speaks to every listening child, and calls him by name. As the lamb in a bleating flock knows its mother's voice, so Christ's sheep and lambs hear His voice, and follow Him.

2. It is a loving call.—'Son' is the first word in it. Everything here is fatherlike. The father did not send, but came; he did not shout or thunder at a distance, as a tyrant does; he used no hard name; he did not say boy, or servant, or slave, or hireling, but son, or rather child, dear son. God speaks unto us as unto children. He pardons us, makes us His sons, and then asks us to serve Him from love. His grace gives us the glad spirit of a son, and the child's heart leaps up at the father's voice. No man ever works well in His vineyard, ever works at all, till he becomes a son. The law of the kingdom is, first sonship, then service.

3. The call comes to us with authority.—'Son, go,' not, 'You might go, or, Will you go?' It is the voice of our Father, but He is also our rightful owner, and our God. His authority is not melted away in His mercy. His justice is as great as His mercy. He has every right to command, and we have every reason to obey. His invitations are commands, and His commands are promises which appeal for our consent. If you don't obey, you insult and provoke the Almighty. The preacher has a right to bid you go in God's name, and you have no right to refuse. What think you about going? You are to go not like a trembling beggar venturing unasked into a lordly hall. You are to go with a humble mind, no doubt, but with a firm step, as having God's authority for going.

4. It is a call to work.—'Son, go, work,' not 'go, hear, wish, dream, resolve, profess, rejoice'. God has real, solid work for every one, and work at hand, at the door; for God's vines touch our homestead, and their tender shoots twine around our door and windows. God's vineyard needs work, and your work. A child's ambition is to work, and to do the very work his father does. Our little children very often amuse and entangle us by insisting on doing our work, and often a father can give his boy no higher honour and joy than by allowing him to share his work. This honour and joy God offers to all His children. He does not treat them as babes, or invalids, or imbeciles; to each He says, 'Son, go, work'.

5. It is a prompt call.—'Work to-day.' To-morrow may be too late, or you may have no to-morrow. The child's evening prayer suits us all well:—

This night, when I lie down to sleep,
I give my soul to Christ to keep.
If I should die before I wake,
I pray Thee, Lord, my soul to take.

6. It is a call to vineyard work: 'Work to-day in my vineyard'.—A vineyard needs to be nursed almost like an infant. Some fields we call nurseries because the young plants in them must be tended like young children. Leave a vineyard to itself, and the despairing vines soon fall down and are strangled under luscious weeds. But a rich crop rewards the diligent vinedresser. He needs great diligence, when he works as a true son in his father's vineyard. For diligence is the Latin word for love, and that work is well done which love does. This vineyard was the family inheritance; both father and son ate its fruits, and drew their wealth from it. A proprietor's son told me that he was making money, and that he used it all in improving his father's estate.

His father's interests and his were one. The vineyard in which you should work is your Father's vineyard and yours. The way of God's glory is the shortest, surest way to your own good. He who forsakes God forsakes his own mercies. He who does most for God does most for himself. People speak of ministers having a corner in 'the vineyard,' but you have a corner in it as much as the most favoured preacher. For to you the call comes, 'Son, go work to-day in my vineyard'; and of you, if you are His, Christ says, 'I have chosen you and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit' (John xv. 16).

II. Two of Man's Replies to God's Call.—Four replies are possible, of which two are simple, Yes and No, an unchanging Yes and an unchanging No; and two are double, No-and-Yes, Yes-and-No.

1. No and Yes.—The first son said rudely and bluntly, 'I will not'. He did not soften his 'I will not' by 'I am sorry I cannot'. His reply was No, without phrases. 'But afterward he repented, and went.' Here is a perfect explanation of repentance.

2. Yes and No was the reply of the second son. His 'Aye and No too was no good divinity'. He said Aye and No to everything his father said to him. 'I go, sir,' was his reply, or rather, 'I, I, sir'. It is a strong phrase for eager and entire consent. But he did not repent or change his mind, for he never meant to go. We wonder why it is not written, 'He said, I go, sir; but went not'. It is, 'I go, sir; and went not'. Yes with him really meant No. His lips lied, but his life spoke the truth. His going not was the consequence of the spirit in which he said Yes, and so there is no disjunctive particle in our text. The grammar of such assent requires an and instead of a but.

This son is the representative of the Pharisees, who made a great show of obedience, and politely said Yes every day of their lives. But when John and Christ brought God's call to them they refused it, while the publicans who up to that time had rudely said No and only No, repented and entered the vineyard.

'Yes and No are for good or evil the giants of life,' and they are the makers of our eternity. Here is God's call, 'Son, go work to-day'. Do you accept of and close with the call? The Church on earth waits, the angels in heaven wait, the Holy Spirit waits, Christ waits, the Father waits for the reply, 'Yes, I do'. Give God your eternal Yea, as He has given you His, for 'all the promises of God in Christ are Yea, and in him Amen'.—JAMES WELLS, The Parables of Jesus, p. 269.

STARVING SELFISHNESS

'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.'—MATTHEW XXII. 39.

LET us try to think if we can starve selfishness. Then it will be a good Lenten fast if we do that. It is such an ugly thing.

Do you know when they were hunting King Charles, like a hare, all about the country there was a certain nobleman, and he said, 'I will be your friend; I will come and fight for you'. And there was a battle, and the nobleman didn't come; so King Charles said to him afterwards, 'Why did you not come, as you promised?' And the nobleman said, 'I could not get out of bed. I never can get out of my bed in time enough for anything. I am so fond of my bed. I should have had to get up at six o'clock; but I could not. I could not conquer myself to get up in time enough.' A poor friend to King Charles was that nobleman! That was self.

There is a lake in the Holy Land; everything runs into it, and nothing runs out of it. It is 'The Dead Sea'. The water runs into it; but it waters nothing else again. So it is a Dead Sea. Everything about it is dead. Don't you be a dead sea! I hope your heart won't be a dead sea, filled with self; everything coming in, nothing going out. Don't be a dead sea!

Now I want to help you, if I can, to starve and kill this monster, this great, ugly thing, self, self! Shall we try how we can do it?

I. There is a beautiful little word, made up of four letters. I want you to spell it. Can you spell? The first letter is L, the next is O. What is the third? V. What is the fourth? E. That is it—LOVE. A beautiful little word, much better than self. That has four letters in it too. SELF. That is very ugly. LOVE is a beautiful thing, I want you to write it, not in ink, but somehow or other in very large letters. I should like it to be written in the kitchen, and in the parlour, and in the drawing-room, and in the schoolroom, and in the nursery, and in church, and in the streets, and everywhere. LOVE written up everywhere. And I think we might almost write it in heaven. What is love? Heaven. They are almost the same thing. Love—heaven; heaven—love. Try and write it everywhere. See Love everywhere. Love in my heart; love all around. It is beautiful to love. 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.'

I have not asked the question 'Who is my neighbour?' have I? 'Who is my neighbour?' Do you know what 'neighbour' means? 'neigh' means nigh, it is an old word meaning near; and 'bour' means a person who dwells; 'so neighbour' means a person who dwells near to you. Then, 'who is my neighbour?' The person who lives next door to me? Yes, he is 'my neighbour'. Are you kind to the person who lives next door to you? Does everybody know the name of the person who lives next door to him? Were you ever kind to the person who lives next door to you? If they have been in trouble have you been good to them? I think I ought not to say it, perhaps, but the poor do beat the rich in this matter, the poor do know who lives next door to them; but I am afraid the rich do not know who their neighbours are. But certainly we ought to know who lives next door to us.

But do you think it means only the person who is 'a neighbour' to us. I will tell you who is 'a neighbour'—anybody who is in any way brought near to you.

Supposing there were a man in China that in some way you could do good to; that you could send to that person in China a Bible, or a missionary; then that man in China is 'your neighbour'. There is a sort of bridge from him to you. He is brought near to you. Everybody who is so brought into contact with you, that you can speak to them, or pray for them, is 'your neighbour'. Therefore it takes in nearly all the world; not quite; but everybody to whom in any way you are brought near—who is your 'neighbour', who is near you, is 'your neighbour'.

Do you know what the word 'kind' means? Take the word 'kin'. The meaning of that is a relation. 'Kin' means your relation; and then put the 'd' to it, it means 'kind'; you are to treat him like a relation. You are to be kind to everybody because everybody is related to you. Everybody is your brother and sister. In all the world we are brothers and sisters, all of us. Therefore all men are 'your kin,' you must be kind to all, be like a kinsman to all. 'Kind' means 'kin'; and everybody almost is 'your neighbour,' because you can get near to almost everybody. If you like, you may say everybody is your kin. Therefore you must be kind to your neighbour; kind to everybody.

In a street of a town there was standing on the top of a hill that went down the street, a wagon, and there were four fine strong horses harnessed to the wagon, and in front of the wagon a board ran across from axle to axle, and on this board was sitting a little boy. The driver of the wagon got away for something, and there was nothing left on this large board but this poor little boy. While he was sitting there something frightened the horses, and they set off full gallop down the hill. There was a terrible cry; the poor little boy cried, and everybody was alarmed and frightened. But there was a woman there, and this woman, though she was very much frightened, she cried out, 'Stop the wagon! stop the wagon!' Some men ran after it, and tried to stop it. And there was an old man there, a cold-hearted old man, like an icicle—a cold, old icicle—and this cold old man said to the woman, 'What are you making such a fuss about it for? Is he your child?' 'No,' said the woman, 'but he's somebody's child. That's the same thing.' That woman had 'love to her neighbour'. It was not her child, but she was kind to one brought near her, just as if it were her own child.

II. Now if we look at this commandment—'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself,' there is one rather strange thing about it: will you think what it is? You are to 'love your neighbour as yourself'. Am I then to love myself? That is a puzzling question. Do think about it. Am I to love myself? Yes or no? I am to love myself, for how could I love my neighbour rightly as myself if I did not love myself. Then I must love myself. I think so. I would not give a fig for a boy or girl who did not deal in self-respect. If I saw a boy or girl going about anyhow, did not care about dress, with dirty hair, dirty skin, torn clothes, slipshod, not caring at all how they looked, or what people thought about them, I should say that boy and girl will come to no good. We must have self-respect. Then may I wish to get the prize? May I wish to get to heaven? Is not that loving myself? I love myself enough to wish to get to heaven. Well then how is it? Is not it wrong to love myself? Haven't I just been saying self is a great monster? Must I like that monster? What shall we say? I will tell you. The way to be sure that you love yourself rightly, is to love everybody as you love yourself. That will balance things. If you obey that command you will be right. You must love yourself if you love everybody as yourself. Do you understand me? It is rather difficult. It is quite true that you may love yourself as much as ever you can, if you love everybody just as much as you love yourself. Try to do both.

I want you to consider some ways in which we are to do it—how we are to 'love our neighbour as ourselves'! Can you think of some ways in which you are to do it?

I. Now the first thing I shall say is this, I think we are very ready to forgive ourselves, if we have done anything naughty, and we are very tender to ourselves. When a person has just cut his finger, how tender he is to himself, how he pities himself. 'I have cut myself; I have hurt myself.' And if he has done something wrong, he soon says, 'It does not much matter'. He soon forgives himself. Don't you think that it is so? And perhaps we forgive ourselves a little too soon; and we are too tender to ourselves. I have seen a monkey, when wounded, hugging his own wound, and crying over it! And I have seen boys and girls do the same thing, when they have a little hurt; they pity themselves; cry over themselves. Now that is the first thing I should say, Do to one another the same, be as tender to everybody, and as forgiving to everybody as you are to yourself. Be tender and forgiving to everybody. Forgiveness is such a beautiful thing.

Shall I tell you what somebody says forgiveness is. He was asked, 'What is forgiveness?' and he said, 'It is the sweetest smell which a crushed flower gives'. There are some flowers if you trample upon them they give a sweet smell; and forgiveness is the sweet smell of a trampled flower. Do you like that thought? Forgiveness—the sweet smell of a trampled flower!

Some time ago—it was when we had slaves—we have no slaves now—it was in the West Indies, and there was a slave named Tom; he came from the north of Africa, he was a very good slave, and he became a Christian; and after he had been in his master's service some time, his master bought some more slaves, and amongst them was a poor little old man, an old black man, and when this old black man came, Tom looked at him very kindly, and smiled at him. It was wonderful how kind he was to this old slave. He gave him half his dinner, and let him share his bed, and when it was very cold, he would take him out and put him in the sunshine; and when it was hot he would put him under the cocoa-nut trees. His master could not help noticing his conduct. 'How is it,' said he to Tom, 'you are so kind to that old man. Is he your father?' 'No, massa, no, I am sure he is not my father.' 'Perhaps he is your elder brother?' said his master. 'No, massa, he is not my elder brother.' 'Is he your uncle?' 'No, massa, he is not my uncle. He is no relation of mine. He has been no friend to me. He has been my worst enemy. He sold me to you. That is the man who sold me to be a slave. But I read, "Love your enemies!" therefore I forgive him on that account.' Be as tender and forgiving to others as you are to yourselves.

2. I will tell you another thing I find you are to do, if you 'love your neighbour as yourself'. Go shares with him; always go shares. It is a very good thing to do with everything you get; if it be something to eat, or something to drink, or something to play with, or a bit of knowledge—go shares, give some of it away. It is a good rule.

I think I told you about those two little noble-minded boys, who, when going through the streets of New York, a gentleman watching them heard one say to the other, 'Look here, Billy, aren't we in luck's way, here's half a peach, 'taint very dirty, you are the youngest, you shall have the first bite'. And little Billy was a modest little boy, so he took only a very little bite indeed; and the other boy said, 'Billy, bite bigger'. He let him have the largest share. He was a noble-minded boy.

3. The third thing I would advise you is this: do not be a great friend to-day, and then a cold fellow to-morrow. Keep steady to your friendships. I have known many boys, and a great many more girls, who, in school-time, are going to be friends for eternity, never going to forget one another; be such chums, such friends, nothing should separate them. By and by where are they? Where's so and so? They are not friends now. They have given it up. Stick to your friends. Go on with your friendships. If you wish others to do that to you, be a good close friend yourself. Be honourable.

Somebody has said something like this: 'Love is the morning, and friendship is the evening'. Do you understand it? Think of it. 'Love is the morning, friendship is the evening.' Which is best—love or friendship? Perhaps you and I should not think the same. Which is best?

There was a great man of the name of Elliott; he was a missionary to the Indians—a wonderful man! He spent his whole life in doing kindness to the Indians; and when eighty-one years of age, they found him one day in his bed—for he was obliged to keep his bed then, and a little black child was busy by his bedside, and Elliott was teaching this little black child his letters. Somebody wondered, and said, 'I wonder at you, old man, caring about teaching that little child his letters'. He said, 'I have loved them all my life, and I cannot do much now in my bed, but I can teach a little child!' That was steadfast love. That was like Christ, 'Having loved His own which were in the world, He loved them unto the end'. Take care your love is steadfast.

4. One more thing, and only one, about 'loving our neighbour as ourselves'. That is something like what I have already said—care about another person's soul as much as you care about your own. Do you want to go to heaven? Do you? Then 'love your neighbour as yourself,' and like him to go to heaven too. Do all you can to get him to heaven. If any good thought comes, pass it on. Always pass it on. Do good with it. Spread it to another; then he may become as good as you. What would have become of us in England now, if people had not laboured in the past to do us good? Pass it on. Do good to somebody.

Don't be veneering.—Do you know what 'veneering' is? It is when you put on some common wood some little pieces of precious wood, and cover it all over. Sometimes you see a deal table that has got a thin piece of rosewood or mahogany put over the deal, so that it all looks like rosewood or mahogany. The veneering is very beautiful, but very thin. It makes plain things look pretty for a time, but it won't last, it is not so good as the solid mahogany, or the solid rosewood. It only does for a time. Don't you veneer. Don't put on the surface. A great many people put on a surface of love. They smile so sweetly at you; they say, 'My love!' 'My darling!' such lots of loving words; but what is it all worth? Do they do anything really for you? Do they care for your soul? Does their friendship stick to you? Is it real? Don't veneer! Don't put on a surface of love. Let it be very deep. Perhaps you say, 'It is very difficult to do this, to love everybody'. So it is; but if your watch goes badly, if the hands do not go right, it is of no use your fumbling about with the hands, you must go inside, look at the mainspring; look at the works. The hands won't move rightly till you get the inward works all right; put them in order, and the hands will go all right. What is the inward work?

St. Augustine, that holy man, had a great friend. In one of his letters he says to him in Latin (I will give it to you in English), 'We are glued together by the blood of Jesus'. They were great friends, and when he would explain their friendship, he said, 'We are glued together by the blood of Jesus.'—JAMES VAUGHAN.

PERSEVERANCE

'But he that shall endure unto the end, the same shall be saved.'—MATTHEW XXIV. 13.

ONE of the stories that Jesus told was this: 'Late one night a weary traveller came to a house where he was not expected, and his friend, having nothing in the house to give him, felt that he must find some food for the hungry man somewhere, even if he borrowed it. So he went next door, where, all in darkness, he knocked as loudly as he could. And all he heard was a surly voice saying, "Oh, don't bother me; I am in bed, so go away". But he did not give it up. He knocked again, as loudly as a policeman does at our door if we leave a window open at night. He knocked so loudly that the man, not being able to sleep, came and gave him the leaves he asked for to give to his friend.

'So,' said Jesus, 'if you want to do a kind thing just as that man did for his friend, or if you want to do a good thing, do not let anything in the world discourage you. Try, try, try again.'

I read the other day a story, which I own that my own children do not appreciate very much, which seems to me to be a good one. A little Spanish boy who found it very hard work at school, ran away. He sat down by a well, and there he saw on the stone side of that well a furrow—a long mark—worn in the stone; it had been worn there by the slipping of the rope. That was all. And this boy said to himself, 'What! can that soft rope wear away that hard stone? And I thought that I could not do my work because it was hard. If I try I can learn anything.' And that boy went straight back and he became a great and famous Spaniard named San Isidore. Pegging away does it.

When you go to Switzerland to climb your first mountain, you will want to go very fast indeed to get to the top; won't you? Don't do it. The Swiss, who know, go very slowly, and they keep on and on. That is the best way to get to the top, not with great bursts.

Dr. Arnold, the great schoolmaster, said, 'The boys who get on in the world are not the boys with the most talents, but with the most energy'. To keep on, unceasingly on, that is the secret of living. Don't be ashamed whatever it is God has given you to do, or your duty bids you do. Don't be ashamed of it.

There was a boy from one of our big public schools being taken round a big store in London by his father, who was a General. They were going through the meat department when he said to his father, 'Father! there is Smith Primus from our school'. And there was a boy scrubbing away at a meat board for all he was worth. The General took in the situation in a moment, and went over to the boy scrubbing the meat board. 'Smith Primus, I believe, aren't you, of such and such a school?' 'Yes, sir,' he said. 'Then his face flushed up as he added, 'My father is going to give me his business, and I shall have to learn it from the start.' 'Well,' said the General, 'I hope you will dine with us at eight to-night. Will you?' And that was a good lesson to his boy, truly! Whatever you have to do, don't be ashamed of it. If it is scrubbing stones or meat blocks, do it in the best way you possibly can. That is the only way to do something better.

I had the pleasure of meeting a small boy who has a great aptitude for telling Scripture stories in his own way. He told me one of them about David—how he was a little boy and one day his father said to him, 'Now, my boy, the shepherd is ill, and I do wish you would look after the sheep. It is a long, long way off, but you can saddle the donkey and go.' David was a good boy, and although it was so far away, he went. And in the bag he put ham sandwiches and beef sandwiches; and pears and bananas in the basket, you know. And David, just when he got where the sheep were, saw a lion seizing a little lamb. David was a brave boy, and he said, 'Here; just you leave that lamb alone, or I'll hit you with a stick'. And he killed that lion, and of its skin he made a rug for auntie's sofa in the drawing-room.

During the first American war there was an officer who had given to his men great balks of timber to move, and there were not enough men to do the work. And as they were striving, there came by a man of majestic appearance who saw that this officer was urging his men on whilst he stood by. 'You don't seem to have many men on the job!' 'No, there are not enough; we can't get any more.' 'Why don't you help a little yourself?' 'Me! Me! I am a corporal, sir!' 'Ah! I hadn't noticed that.' Then he got off his horse himself and helped to move those timbers until all was finished. And then he said to the corporal before he went away, 'Corporal, when you have any hard work, and not enough men to do it, you had better send to the Commander-in-chief. I will come again.' That was General Washington; and that is one of the reasons why they love him so in America. He was ashamed of nothing, where duty lay beside it. He put his best into what he did. And that is what you and I must do.

I have rather wandered from the line of the moral which I want to point out. It is a moral which was in Christ's own mind when He told the story. Suppose there is something wrong in your heart or in your life, suppose you have a sharp temper and you sometimes say bitter words, and you are ashamed of yourself afterwards and would like to cure yourself of the habit. Sometimes you pray and say, 'Oh! it's no good my praying. God won't give me a sunny temper. I did pray yesterday and He hasn't.' No! He cannot all at once. You must try yourself, and pray again and again. By and by, God doing His best and you doing your best too, you won't be unkind, you won't be bitter, you won't be naughty. But you must try and you must pray, that is what Christ said.—BERNARD J. SNELL, The Good God, p. 108.

THE LESSONS OF WINTER

'Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter.'—MATTHEW XXIV. 20.

THE name winter is given to this season of the year on account of the prevalence of winds and storms.

The coldness of these dreary months is owing, in part, to the shortness of the days, or the time that the sun is above the horizon, and to the oblique direction in which his rays fall upon the portion of the globe where winter reigns.

In the torrid zone, as you know, there is no winter in the ordinary sense of the word; but a rainy season without ice, snow, or frost takes its place. This is also the case in tropical regions, both north and south of the equator.

One of the marked features of winter in our latitude is the snow which covers the face of nature with a beautiful white mantle. This is nothing more than the vapour of the atmosphere congealed by cold.

Snow-flakes often appear in most striking forms. Some of them, called snow-crystals, are extremely beautiful, and have engaged the attention of scientific men. When examined through a microscope, snow is one of the most wonderful things in nature, and after having scrutinised the pure, shining particles in this way, we can better appreciate the language in the Book of Job, where 'the treasures of the snow' are spoken of (xxxviii. 22).

There is, perhaps, nothing which strikes the native of a warm climate more forcibly, on passing his first winter in a colder region, than the sight of snow. You have all heard of the little girl from the East Indies who had been sent to England to be educated, and who, waking up one morning, and seeing the ground covered with this white sheet, clapped her hands in delight, declaring she had never seen so much sugar before! Wonderful, wonderful indeed are the works of God, and, as in the old hymn in the Prayer Book, called the Benedicite, we may well call on the frost and cold and the ice and snow, to praise and magnify Him for ever.

However disagreeable a very severe winter may be, in some respects it yet serves most important purposes. The sap retires from the extremities of shrubs and trees, and takes refuge in the roots, thus giving them a time to rest and recuperate.

The covering of snow which is spread over the earth protects the grass and the grain, and keeps all things which grow out of the ground snug and warm.

You would be astonished how much warmth there is in this snowy blanket; for it really deserves the name.

A few years ago a woman in Yorkshire was overtaken by a terrible snowstorm on the open moors, and was buried under the great drifts for forty-three hours. By keeping a little breathing place open above her head, she saved herself from suffocation, and, on the second day, a man crossing in the dreary region, espied a bonnet on the top of the snow, and came to her relief.

A more remarkable instance still was that of Elizabeth Woodstock. In the winter of 1799 she was returning on horseback from Cambridge to her home in a neighbouring village; and having dismounted for a few minutes, the horse ran away from her. At seven o'clock on a dreary winter evening, she sat down under a thicket, weary, chilled with cold, and completely disheartened. It soon began to snow, and being too weak to rise, she was obliged to occupy her uncomfortable seat on the frozen ground, and by the morning the snow had drifted up two feet above her head. By a great effort, she tied her handkerchief to a little stick, and thrust it through the snow, partly for a signal for anyone who might chance to pass that way, and partly as a breathing hole.

The poor woman soon fell into a deep sleep, and day and night followed each other without her being conscious of anything, except that she now and then heard the church bells, and other familiar sounds. It was not until the eighth day that the handkerchief fluttering at the end of the stick was discovered, and the unhappy sufferer released. Her only substitute for food during that period was one single pinch of snuff.

You see, therefore, that a covering of snow is a pretty warm and comfortable one after all.

Those who are disposed to grumble when pinched by the cold of winter, would do well to think of the luxury which it secures for us in the shape of ice for the warm weather.

Moreover, the nipping frost kills off the myriad hordes of insects; dries up the seeds of infectious and deadly diseases; improves the blood, on which our very existence depends; and gives new vigour to the worn-out and wasted system. Consumptive patients are no longer sent to gasp and faint beneath the orange-groves of a debilitating southern clime, but uniform and invigorating cold weather is found much better for them.

Winter, besides being a useful season, is certainly a very beautiful one. The earth spread smoothly over with its white coverlid; the icy tracery of the trees; and the fantastic pictures which the frost draws on the window-panes—what could be more beautiful than these? The goodness of our Heavenly Father is plainly discovered in the provision which He makes for the lower orders of creation to protect them from the rigours of winter. The more delicate birds are instructed by their instincts to fly off to warmer latitudes. The creatures which are to remain behind need not go to clothing-stores for thick coats! The fur, and hair, and feathers on their bodies are made abundantly warm to protect them; and the colder the winter which is approaching, the better does their gracious Creator provide for them.

In the text, our Saviour was speaking of the awful calamity which was about to be sent upon doomed Jerusalem; its long siege by the Roman armies; and the famine and the pestilence which would follow. A flight in the winter would only be heightening the colouring of so terrible a picture. Hence the advice which He gives, 'Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter'.

Many of you will remember an instance of such a flight, which was disastrous in the extreme. In the autumn of 1812, Napoleon entered Moscow with 120,000 soldiers, intending to pass the winter in comfort. On the 13th October (three weeks earlier than it had ever been known before) snow began to fall. The proud Emperor looked out of his window in dismay, and decided to hasten back at once, and establish his winter quarters in the friendly cities of Poland.

It was a march through a dreary and desolate region of more than a thousand miles; but he put on a bold front, and the troops began to retire in good order. A week later, and the grand army was in full retreat. Bleak, chilling winds howled through the leafless trees; the weary soldiers were blinded by the flakes of snow and sleet; their embittered enemies attacked them in every unguarded point; order and discipline were forgotten; the ranks were broken, and each man struggled on as best he could; the dead and the dying were trodden down; hundreds of horses were slain for food; all ideas of conquest were banished; Napoleon himself left the army to its fate; and each day's weary march was marked by heaps of broken wagons, and abandoned cannon, and white hillocks of snow, beneath which the frozen bodies of man and beast were buried.

With such a dreadful picture of misery before you, it will be easy to understand the tender compassion which prompted the Saviour to say, 'Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter'.

The poets have taken delight in sketching scenes of home comfort during this season of frost and cold. Thus Cowper, in his old-fashioned way, exclaims:—

O Winter! ruler of th' inverted year,
I crown thee king of intimate delights,
Fireside enjoyments, home-born happiness,
And all the comforts that the lowly roof
Of undisturbed retirement, and the hour
Of long uninterrupted evening know.

These, and other mercies, God has bestowed upon us, and the least we can do in return is to show our gratitude, not only with our lips, but in our lives.

Especially ought we to remember those who are suffering the sad privations of poverty, and be glad to relieve their wants when we are able. No one can claim to have the love of God abiding in his heart, who is willing to see a fellow-mortal destitute of food and clothing, and make no effort to help. The more merciful we are, the better shall we deserve to be called God's children.—JOHN N. NORTON, Milk and Honey, p. 53.

THE TEN VIRGINS

'Five of them were wise, and five were foolish.'—MATTHEW
XXV. 2.

This marriage took place very long ago, and in a country far from here, and was not like any wedding you have ever seen.

It was a very grand marriage. The bridegroom was young and rich; the bride good and beautiful; the company was large; the banquet was splendid; and it was a great honour and a great pleasure to have an invitation.

In that country weddings always took place at night, and I will tell you the order of the ceremony. The bridegroom had all the boys and young men who were to be at the marriage collected at his house. He was gaily dressed, with a bright-coloured turban wrapped round his head, and above it a golden crown or a garland of flowers. When the sun went down, he and his companions set out to go to the bride's house and fetch her home. They went along through the darkness, the boys carrying flambeaux, and a band of music playing before them.

The bride was waiting. She was crowned with a chaplet; her long hair flowed freely down her shoulders; her dress was white, scented with sweet perfumes, and bound at the waist with an embroidered girdle; and over her whole body there was flung an ample veil, which was the chief feature of a bride's attire.

When the bridegroom and his companions arrived at the house, she was ready to go with them; for the feast did not take place at the bride's home, as it does in this country, but at the bridegroom's. They conducted her along with music and joy; and half-way on the road the bridesmaids were waiting to join the procession. They carried in their hands lamps, without which no one was permitted to enter the house.

It is about these bridesmaids I am going to tell you.

There were ten of them. They did not live either in the town the bridegroom belonged to or in that where the bride lived, but in two villages which lay between them.

Three of them were sisters. They were overjoyed when they got the invitation to the marriage, for they loved both the bride and bridegroom very much, and were glad to hear of their happiness. They began to prepare a long time beforehand, getting their dresses ready and everything well arranged; for, they said, we must do everything we can to make it a bright day to our two friends. The eldest of the three sisters was tall and full-featured. Her eyes were large and full of repose, and her hair hung down her back in heavy golden curls. Nothing seemed ever to disturb or annoy her. She never took offence or spoke a spiteful word. She never seemed to think about herself at all, but always had smiles for everybody. She was the confidante of all her companions; and when children were hurt or other girls were in trouble, they always came to her. Everybody liked to be near her; for, they said, there was sunlight in her face. Her name was Love.

The second sister was very much attached to the eldest, and liked nothing better than to be near her and cling to her; for she was a timid girl, quiet and thoughtful. Often she would sit with her hands clasping her knees, and look into the fire or away over the landscape; but had you glanced at her eyes, you would have seen that it was not the fire or the fields she was seeing, but some inner vision that made her happy and solemn. She could not bear noise and bustle, but was fond of reading and thinking; and people used to say she did not live in this world, but in the inner world of her-own thoughts. Her name was Faith.

The third sister was the brightest of the three. She was not tall, like the others, but little and active. She had not the repose of her eldest sister, nor the shyness and thoughtfulness of the second.

She liked to be in a bustle and among people. She never could be idle a minute. Her fingers were always busy with something. She talked a great deal, in a clear, ringing voice; and her laughter fell continually like a merry cataract. She was demonstrative in her affection, and used to rally her second sister when she was timid and unhappy; for she always took a bright view of things. She visited a great deal; and people used to smile when they saw her nimble step hurrying along the street, and say she was ubiquitous. However gloomy the poor people she visited were when she came in, they were smiling before she went out, and thinking the world was not such a bad place after all. She was just a restless, darting, laughing beam of sunshine. Her name was Hope.

You might often have seen these three sisters all clinging together;—Love in the middle, with her peaceful look and large-hearted smile; Faith on the one side, clinging to her shoulder like a vine to a tree; and Hope on the other side, holding her hand, but with her bright eye full of some project she had in her mind.

It was Hope who had most to do in getting things ready for the marriage. She had a great time of bustle and work. But she would have forgotten ever so many things, in her hurry, if quiet Faith had not reminded her of them. One of these things was the lamps; and it was Faith herself who got them ready and filled them well with oil, putting some also into the little vessel which hung below each of the lamps to supply them if their own oil went done.

In the same village where these three sisters dwelt there lived other two of the bridesmaids, who were cousins. One of them was the shyest girl in the whole village. When she was going along the streets, she used to walk swiftly, with her eyes on the ground; and if anyone spoke to her, it made her blush and get confused. She never expected anybody to do anything for her or think about her; but was willing to serve every one, and believed everybody to be better than herself. Yet people thought a great deal of her, and were very willing to serve and honour her. She was glad to get an invitation to the marriage, yet terrified at the thought of appearing in so great a company. She kept thinking how she would be able to get into a corner, or hide behind somebody's back. Her wedding-dress was exceedingly plain; her hair was quite plainly combed down on her brows and tied in a knot behind; and she had not a single ornament. Yet somebody who saw her said she had the best of all dresses, for she was clothed with lowliness; and the best of all ornaments, a meek and quiet spirit. Her name was Humility.

Her cousin was very like her in appearance, and of the same size, only her features were pale, while those of Humility had a good deal of colour. She was sometimes called the lily-maiden. When her eyes were closed during the prayer in the synagogue, she almost seemed carved out of marble. There never was a speck of dust on her clothes; and on wet days she seemed to have a miraculous power of keeping her very shoes clean. Her marriage-dress was of such spotless white that, when she appeared in it, it seemed to sparkle like snow. Her name was Purity.

On the morning of the marriage day, Faith, who knew both Humility and Purity well, for they were great friends, called to see if they were remembering their lamps, and brought some oil with her to put in the vessels, as they might have to wait long for the bridegroom.

At last the five set out together for the place where they had been appointed to wait. Their lamps shone brightly through the darkness; they talked about the bride and bridegroom, and were very happy as they went along, and sometimes they sang a hymn to shorten the road.

The other five bridesmaids lived in the other village. Two of them were sisters. One of the two was a pretty girl, with pink cheeks and blue eyes; but she knew it too well, and liked nothing better than to look at herself in the glass, turning herself round, and moving her head about to get different views. Her mother was sorry for this, and would not allow her to have a looking-glass in the closet where she slept. But she had an old broken one hidden there in her drawer, along with cheap ribbons and ornaments, which she used to stick all over herself in secret, and look at herself for an hour at a time. She was not a good scholar, never having patience to learn anything thoroughly. Her spelling and handwriting and arithmetic were wretched; but she could sing and play two or three pretty things, and was a good dancer, and she liked very much to show off these accomplishments. When she got the invitation to the marriage she was delighted, not because the bride and bridegroom were to be made happy—she never thought of that—but because she should have a new dress, and appear in so large a company, where she had no doubt she would be the admired of all admirers. And when she put on her new dress, she was so proud and pleased with herself that she actually went up to the glass, and, putting her lips to it, kissed her own reflection! Her name was Vanity.

Her sister was not a good-looking girl. Her face was thin and sallow, and her shoulders were high. She half-suspected this herself, but strove hard not to believe it, and was very angry when she thought about it. She was always criticising other girls, and speaking about their faults, and would never allow that any companion was good or beautiful. She was not glad when she saw others happy. She liked very much to hear stories about her companions, which she circulated industriously, always adding a little to them. When she heard of the marriage, she was angry with the bride for being married before her; and when pretending to praise her, secretly dropped suggestions which reminded everybody of her faults. Hearing who the other bridesmaids were, she thought with anger of their beauty, and hoped they would not look well. Her name was Envy.

When starting for the place of meeting on the marriage day, Vanity was so engrossed with the thought of her own beauty, and Envy so annoyed with her own plainness—for her dress would not go on right, do what she would—that they snatched up their lamps hastily, with never a thought of whether they were well supplied with oil or not.

Next door to these two lived another of the bridesmaids. She was a pretty girl, with black eyes, a dark complexion, and crisp, curly hair. But there was something unpleasant about her mouth, and a sort of threatening look on her brow, as if a cloud were resting on it. She had a bad temper, and used on the slightest provocation to burst out crying and stamping, till her little body was convulsed with rage and her face made hideous with tears and passion. Sometimes she would sulk and refuse to speak for half a day, for no apparent reason whatever. People were afraid of her, and she often made those who loved her unhappy. On the very marriage morning she burst out into a rage because something went wrong when she was putting on her dress, and cried till her face was all swollen and stained with tears. She had to begin her dressing over again, and, after all, a big tear-drop fell on her pretty white dress. All this made her too late; and, in the hurry to get off, she quite forgot to put the oil in the vessel with her lamp. Her name was Anger.

The same mischance happened to the fourth bridesmaid, though her hurry was not due to the same cause. She was a tall, soft, sprawling girl. She was always too late. She was too late in getting up in the morning, too late in arriving at school; she never had her lessons ready in time. She had no order or neatness; her hair was always wrong, and her dress untidy. She used to go to sleep on Sabbath during service, and forget messages, and loiter everywhere. She was continually being scolded, but it did her no good. And on the marriage day she was true to her character; for her companions were all at the door waiting for her long before she was ready. Her name was Indolence.

One who came in to hurry her on I have not described yet. She was a strange-looking girl. When you looked at her, you saw that there was something wrong, but could not tell what it was. She had a stealthy step like a cat's, and an uneasy eye. Her lips were thin, and her brow low and narrow. She had two big jewels hanging in her ear; but if you had looked closely, you would have detected that they were sham ones; and the patch of red on her cheek was painted on. She delighted in inventing lies, and pretended to be what she was not.

It was with thinking of a made-up story about her father's wealth, which she intended to tell to those she met at the wedding, that she forgot the oil for her lamp. Her name was Falsehood.

These five all set out together. Their lamps were burning; they laughed and talked, but their words were full of selfishness, spite, and lies. They met the other five at a cross-road, and all went on together; but the two companies could not amalgamate, for the second five were jealous of the others, and whispered among themselves.

When they came to the waiting-place, the parties separated a little from each other, and sat down each under a tree. It was late, and they began to get sleepy, but were resolved to stay awake. The first five, remembering that it was their usual time for evening prayer, knelt down together on the grass, and, with their arms round each other, committed themselves to God. But the others, seeing it, laughed at them. It grew very late, and they looked along the road, but still the procession did not come; and at last, after many efforts to keep awake, they all slumbered and slept.

At midnight their sleep was disturbed with the cry, 'Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him'. They started to their feet, the flambeaux were flaring in the distance, the music playing, and the tramp of feet coming rapidly along. They seized their lamps, and, taking out the needle attached to them for the purpose, trimmed the wick. They found that they needed oil. Those that had brought it poured it out of the vessels into their lamps, so that they burned more brightly than ever. But whenever those that had none began to stir the wicks, the lights went out. They came running in consternation to the other five, crying, 'Give us of your oil; for our lamps are going out'. With pitying looks these gazed for a moment in the terrified faces; but they could not help them, they had no more than enough for themselves. They could only tell them to hurry off and buy some. The procession was upon them: those whose lamps were burning joined it; the others shrank back, terrified and ashamed, out of sight. The light, the joy, and the music passed on, and they were left in the darkness.

What was to be done? They ran for a little in the direction of the nearest town. But soon their courage failed; they saw they would not be in time to make up with the procession.

Anger burst into a fit of tears and rage; Indolence flung herself on the ground and wept; Envy gnashed her teeth at the joy which had passed her by. But Vanity cried, 'I am sure they must let me in'; and Falsehood cried, 'I will tell a story which will induce them to let me in'.

So up they all started and ran after the procession. But it was very dark, and they stumbled and hurt themselves. Still they ran on, mad and weeping. At last they came in sight of the procession again. They saw the banqueting-house shining afar off; they could hear the music and the din of happy voices. They saw the door thrown wide, and there came rushing out a burst of welcome and song. The procession passed in. They cried, and shouted, and ran; but the hinges turned heavily, and with a crash the door was shut. The rest is told in this beautiful song:—

Late, late, so late, and dark the night and chill ;
Late, late, so late, but we can enter still.—
Too late, too late, ye cannot enter now.

No light had we, for that we do not repent ;
And hearing this, the Bridegroom will relent.—
Too late, too late, ye cannot enter now.

No light, too late, and dark and chill the night,
Oh let us in, that we may find the light !—
Too late, too late, ye cannot enter now.

Have we not heard the Bridegroom is so sweet ?
Oh let us in, though late, to kiss his feet !—
No, no, too late, ye cannot enter now.

You know the meaning of this story. That banquet is in heaven. We are invited to it, every one of us. We should all like to sit down at that eternal marriage feast. But the vain and arrogant, the selfish and envious, the false and the bad-tempered, cannot enter there. It is only for those possessed of faith, and love, and hope, and for the humble and pure. Are you not ready yet? Can you recognise your own portrait among those of the foolish virgins? Do you feel that faith, love, and hope, humility and purity, are not in your soul yet? Then call on God to make you ready.—JAMES STALKER, The New Song, p. 51.

ON TRIMMING LAMPS

‘Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps.’—
MATTHEW XXV. 7 (with PSALM CXXI. 105).

I. The lamp spoken of by the Psalmist is The Word of God. How dark would the world be without it! The great difference between us and the heathen is that we have this light, and they have not. We rejoice in the light which God has graciously given in His Word; whereas they despairingly sit in darkness and in the shadow of death. To all who have accepted it, it is a lamp unto their feet and a light unto their path. That lamp has gladdened the hearts and brightened the lives of many present. It has shown us how dearly God must love us; how near the loving Saviour is to aid, guide, and save us; how all our friends are the gifts of God, and all the love that our dear parents have towards us is derived from the Source of all love—our Heavenly Father’s heart. Others need this same glad news. Then

Shall we, whose souls are lighted
By wisdom from on high—
Shall we, to men benighted,
The lamp of life deny?

II. If we are to keep this light burning brightly for our own guidance, and also for the benefit of others, we must ever Keep it Well Trimmed. God in olden times attached great importance to trimming the lamps in the sanctuary. There were men set apart for that special duty. The fire with which the wick was kindled in that temple was God’s sacred fire, yet even that could burn brightly only when, in addition to sufficient oil being supplied, the wick was kept clean.

In the other verse which we have read, ‘all those virgins’—even the foolish who had neglected taking sufficient oil with them—realised the great importance of having their lamps trimmed for meeting the bridegroom. I will not dwell now upon the great folly of the foolish virgins in neglecting to obtain sufficient oil. I want to call your attention to what even they, notwithstanding their folly, thought a very important duty—Trimming their lamps.

Now God has given to us the lamp of truth, and kindled it from off His own altar; all that we have to do is to keep it burning brightly. They had no lamps in the streets of Eastern cities, but each one had to carry his own lantern through those dark winding passages. David refers to this, or possibly to a traveller crossing an uninhabited tract of country at night, needing a lamp to trace his path and to guide his footsteps. There is a story told of a man crossing a mountain—in Carnarvonshire, I think—on one stormy night. It was so cold that the man, in order to shelter his hands from the biting wind, put the lantern under his cloak, and as the moon shone dimly through the clouds he thought he could trace his way without the lantern. All at once a gust of wind blew aside his cloak; the light shone forth and suddenly revealed the edge of a large slate quarry, over which, in another moment, he would have fallen and have been dashed to pieces. He soon retraced his steps, but he did not hide the lantern under his cloak that night again. Ah! there are many who think that they can go through life—dark and dangerous as the way often is—without this lamp of God’s Truth; they therefore hide it out of sight, or neglect to trim it by constant and prayerful study. In many instances they do not find out their mistake and folly until it is too late. Others have had this light unexpectedly cast upon their path, to reveal to them some great danger; thus their steps have been suddenly arrested, and they have learnt never to try to do without that light again.

Finally, children must watch and pray that as they advance in life, and miss the training they once had from parents, they shall keep their lights still burning for God. He who was the Word of God, and the Light of the World, said to His disciples, ‘Ye are the light of the world’. If our hearts and lives are kindled with love and truth by His Spirit, we too shall be worthy of that name. ‘What if this light were to go out?’ asked a visitor one dark night of the watchman of the lighthouse off Calais. ‘Why,’ replied the man, ‘if for one brief hour that light were to go out, many vessels would be wrecked and precious lives lost, and from all parts of the world for months to come the news would return that at such an hour the light off Calais was not burning. Sir, lives and property, the character of this lighthouse and my character are all at stake: as long as I am here that light shall burn.’ May that be our resolution throughout life, God helping us!—

THE PARABLE OF THE TALENTS

MATTHEW XXV. 14-30.

THE Lord is the Lord Jesus: the far country is heaven: the departure is Christ's ascension: and the return to all is His second coming, and to each the day when His work ends: the 'long time' of the master's absence means that Christ would not at once return in glory, as many in the early Church expected: the servants are all who profess to be Christ's, whether true or false: the master's goods embrace everything with which we can serve Christ on earth.

Or, if we think that this parable is specially for the teachers and rulers of the Church, we may say that the goods are the word and Gospel of Christ, which we are not only to defend but also to extend, not only to preserve but also to propagate by the winning of souls. The whole parable is fitted to fill us with the dread of uselessness.

I. Our Talents.—Money and power of mind are often called talents, and a famous scholar is said to be very talented or to have great talents. But the grandest talent is not money or scholarship, though both of these are of great use in the Service of Christ. It is not something in your head or hand, but something in your heart. It is your spirit, your life, your power of knowing, loving, and serving God and the Saviour. God has put into your hands, without your choice, the sacred trust of an immortal spirit, and you can never lay it down.

In some ways the young are the most talented. Youth has its five talents, middle age its two, and old age but the one. When a war-ship is sinking, our sailors march out of the jaws of death into the boats in 'funeral order,' as it is called, the youngest first, and the oldest last. The reason is that the youngest carry with them more talents than the rest, and are worth more to their country. Don't say, then, 'I am only a child; what can a child do?' What can a child not do? You have a great God-given capacity for religion. You live in a Christian land. God's grace and Spirit are within your reach, and your talent is not yet lost or wasted, for its bulk is not broken. The Bible respects and prizes you because you have so many talents. Angels rejoice over the conversion of a child as men rejoice who find great spoil, for they know that you can be profitable to God. But life is short, and the art of serving Christ is long and difficult; therefore begin at once, and be thankful that you have not to begin trading without capital.

II. The Two Good Servants.—1. They agree with their master's views.—They are like him intellectually, and accept all his ideas. They agree with him in thinking that they are his servants. They agree with him about the use to be made of his goods. Thus Christ's true people count themselves His servants and the guardians of His interests during His absence. They regard His goods as a talent, an honourable trust, a great responsibility. They are glad that they are not degraded into nobodies, and that they are not licensed to be idle, but that they are to trade with the Lord's money. Their lives are shaped by Christ's mind and will.

2. They have a fine spirit.—They love their Lord and His service. Each of them can say, 'Mine and Thine are the same; all mine is Thine, and all Thine is to me as if it were mine.' They thus put their heart and life into their trading. Working for Christ is their proper trade, to which they are apprenticed; it is their end of ends, all else being as a by-job, a sort of eddy at the side of the main current of their life. Thus they trade with zeal, and each of them is what an old writer was called a 'labour-lover'.

3. They were richly rewarded.—Christ likes well the way and work of His true-hearted servants, and His grace says 'well done' to that which the rigour of the law would condemn, and which, I dare say, the faithful ones condemned themselves, as they considered 'the petty done, the undone vast'. 'Well done' is His word; not well begun, not well intended, not well learned, not well exercised, but 'well done'. The doing is the crown and proof of all the rest. 'Good and faithful servant,' not great and famous, not able and successful servant.

'I know I should believe all the words of Christ,' I once heard Dr. John Duncan saying, 'but, gentlemen, there are some words of Christ which I do not yet see how I ever can believe. These are His words in the last day, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant". My poor bungled work is not well done.' Is He as 'an hard man,' who gave the two (apparently) all they had gained, and their capital too, and His praise, and an eternal share in His own glory? How men wrong Christ with their little thoughts!

III. The Bad Servant.—We must not make him worse than he was. He professed the true religion, and was at pains not to lose his one talent, and wished to be good. 'He went, and digged in the earth, and hid his lord's money.' He did not rob his master like the Unjust Steward, he did not waste all he had like the Prodigal Son, he was not openly wicked like the thief on the cross. Like those decent church-goers who never inquire what their talent is, and how they may use it well, he was very selfish and slothful. That was his double sin. As he buried his talent in the earth, so he buried his spirit in his lazy body. Like every self-seeker, he deemed his master a self-seeker also.

Your life will be made up of the service of man and the service of God, and this parable gives you the secret of these two services. Christ here praises and ennobles the true service of man. 'There is no fear of him,' a merchant once said to me when I asked him about one of his clerks; 'he is a perfect servant. He is as much interested in my business as if it were his own.' He had the spirit of the two servants in the parable. The boy who does most for his master in this spirit does most for himself. He is kept from a thousand temptations; he is strong, glad, and healthy-hearted, and is on the highway to true success. He is more likely than his selfish neighbour to become a Christian, and the mood in which he serves his earthly master will help him to serve his Master in heaven.—JAMES WELLS, The Parables of Jesus, p. 331.

THE MAN WITH ONE TALENT

'And unto one He gave five talents, to another two, and to another one.'—MATTHEW XXV. 15.

I THINK we have always a kind of pity for the poor fellow who received only one talent. Does there not seem to be some sort of favouritism on the part of the master in this story, who gave some of his servants five talents, and gave only one talent to another? Might not the poor fellow who had but one talent have done far better if, like his brother-servant, he had been entrusted with five talents?

I. Now, it is very clearly explained to us why the master gave more to one and less to another. We are told that he gave to every man 'according to his several ability'. That is, he knew exactly the ability of each of these servants, and he gave to each one the amount which that one had the ability to use. One man had shown himself able to manage more of the property than the other. This other man had shown himself, in the way in which he did his work, not capable of doing very much on a large scale, though fitted to do a little. So it was from consideration and tenderness that the master gave five talents to the one who had the ability to use so large a sum, and only one talent to the man who had not the ability to use more.

II. What do we mean by a talent? When this parable was spoken by our Lord, a talent meant a certain sum of money; but now, when we no longer have sums of money called talents, we have taken the word from this very parable, and we use it to express what the 'talents' in the parable represent. If I say a boy or girl has a 'talent for music,' or a 'talent for languages,' what do I mean? Of course I imply that that boy or girl has a gift for music or for languages—has an ease and facility in learning music or languages which does not belong to everybody. So we have come to apply the word 'talent' to express those gifts of mind which God has given us. To some God has given several gifts or talents, to another only a few, to another only one. But you may be quite sure that in every case He has, in love and wisdom, given each just the talent which he or she is able to employ. I dare say many of us often think, 'Oh! if only I was in some other condition in life; or if I had some other disposition, some other nature, some other talent, I would do better'. Or we think it is easy for that person to lead a useful and true life, for he is so talented—has so many gifts of mind and spirit. Now, all these thoughts are wrong. The question at the last great day—and on every day in our coming life when we think seriously of these things—will not be how many or what kind of talents have I? but how have I used the talent, if it be only one, which the Great Master entrusted to me?

III. Unused talents! Oh! what a long, sad history might be written of these! What a terrible thing it is to look back even upon two or three years of useless life! Your talent may seem a little one. Never mind; use it. You don't know what wonderful results may follow from it. A common match when you strike it gives a small flame indeed; a man lights a taper from that, and then with the taper he lights the great lamp in the lighthouse; then it shines out through glasses that increase its brightness, and some ship out at sea, with the storm pelting on it, steers by the welcome light on into the harbour and is safe. You never know what the smallest deed may lead to. You never know what may be lost by allowing the gift God has given you—the pity, the tenderness, the wealth, the talent for anything—to lie unused.

Some years ago a well-known traveller found a vase near some mummies in Egypt. It was tightly sealed up. He sent it home to the British Museum, and there, one day, when it was broken open, there were found inside it some hard, dry wrinkled beans. These had probably been there for three thousand years. They may have been some of the very seeds of the great harvest which Joseph had caused the people to treasure up against the years of famine. They were quite old enough to be so. On the 4th of June, 1844, they were planted under a glass, and they grew! Now, just imagine, if on that day three thousand years ago, instead of having been sealed up in that vase, they had been planted, and the seed they bore planted again, and so on through the years since, how many myriad miles of wonderful harvests might these seeds have been bearing to-day!

So it is with the seeds of truth and love which we try to sow in your hearts. They may abide alone, lie useless in the dry chambers of your memory, or they may be used and produce harvests which shall one day wave in their golden glory in the Eternal Sunshine.—T. TEIGNMOUTH SHORE, Saint George for England, p. 111.

THE TALENTS AND THE POUNDS

'And unto one he gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his several ability; and straightway took his journey.'—MATTHEW XXV. 15.

THIS parable, you know, immediately follows that of the Ten Virgins. There the virgins are represented as waiting for their Lord; here the servants as working for Him. And the order is meant to teach us this, that it is no use trying to work for Christ among others, unless we are waiting for Him in our own hearts.

We must always take this parable and that of the Ten Pounds in St. Luke together. They are not only different in themselves, but they were spoken at different times, and to different sets of persons. St. Luke's was delivered in our dear Lord's last going up to Jerusalem, but before His entry into the city on Palm Sunday; and it was spoken to the multitude, 'because they thought that the kingdom of God should immediately appear'—the Apostles probably thought so themselves. No; that kingdom would come, would come gloriously at last; but many a long century had first to pass by, many a suffering to be borne, many a brave act of love to be done by the Church first. And the servants were not to sit idly waiting their Lord's return. His command—His fitting command—to His servants is exactly what He says to all of you now: Occupy till I come. Make the best use of all the powers, all the advantages, all the help I give you, while I am absent, that so, at my return, I may receive mine own with usury, and you may inherit the crown of glory that fadeth not away.

The other parable was spoken to the Apostles, and to them alone, while He sat on the Mount of Olives on the Tuesday in Holy Week. We shall hear more about this presently.

'Unto one He gave five talents, to another two, and to another one; to every man according to his ability.' You know, that that is true of you. One never can go into a school of any kind, without being reminded of this parable. Some of you are cleverer than others; some of you have had greater advantages before you came here; some of you have better health and more strength. And one other talent God—who foresees all things—has given to each one of you differently, though how, and how differently we shall not know in this world—I mean, longer or shorter life. But by your talents more or less, still it is, 'Occupy till I come'. I hope that some of you, at all events, have been trying to keep that in mind during the last half-year; that you have been trying to do your best in your lessons of whatever kind; that when you go out into life, you may be able to do Him the better service who may come at any moment, and who certainly will come at last. Then it matters comparatively little who has the five talents, who the two, who the one. Whichever of you it may be that has the one, I earnestly pray that, when her Lord calls her, that beautiful verse of one of our poets may be true of her:—

His virtues walked their narrow round,
Nor missed a space, nor left a void;
And sure the Eternal Master found
The single talent well employed.

St. Philip, the slowest of all the Apostles, will not sit on one of the twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, less than St. Paul, the ablest of them.

I. Notice that in St. Luke they all receive the same. So the two parables put together teach two different lessons, which could not so well be taught in one story only: that of the Talents; that as our dear Lord has given us, so He will expect from us; that to whomsoever much is given, of him shall much be required; that of the Pounds; that with the same powers, different persons, even among God's true servants, will make, some more, some less, use; and that he who makes the most of what he has here shall have the higher reward there. One star, you know, differeth from another star in glory.

II. See something else. Why in one parable do we read of talents, in another of pounds? A talent of silver was worth two hundred and forty-three of our pounds. A pound of silver was worth four of our pounds. The difference between what the first servant received in St. Matthew, and all in St. Luke, is therefore enormous: the one had £1215, the other only £4. Now, as we saw just now, the parable of the Talents was spoken to those Apostles on whom He bestowed greater graces and gifts than on any other of His servants; to them, therefore, He speaks of talents. The parable of the Pounds was spoken to the common multitude, to whom He had given His common gifts only, and to them He therefore speaks of pounds.

III. The next thing is that the Lord of those servants straightway took his journey. Here the parable does not keep quite close to the order of things. The Lord first, you see, gives his gifts and then departs; our Master first departed on Ascension day, before He sent down His gifts on Whitsunday.

In St. Luke, where the master was a nobleman, gone to receive for himself a kingdom, we have something else. His citizens hated him, and sent a message after him, saying, 'We will not have this man to reign over us'. Now, we may sometimes learn a great truth from the writings of a wicked man. A certain infidel, trying to turn the parable into ridicule, says: 'Why, what a fool this nobleman must have been—if he was in such danger from his fellow-citizens—to give his servants pounds instead of swords!' Exactly. That is the way in which the world looks at the question. That was the way St. Peter looked at it before the day of Pentecost, when he drew his sword and smote the high priest's servant, and cut off his right ear. But we know, or ought to know, that it is still, quiet work that our Lord chiefly demands from us. The weapons of our warfare are not carnal.

Well, two of the servants went and traded with their lord's money. Let us leave them for the present to what—we all know it—must be a work of time; to their being instant in season and out of season; to their ever remembering that great and strict account that they would some day have to render. Now, as to him that had received the one talent. Take the two parables together. The one went and digged in the earth, and hid his lord's money: the other laid it up in a napkin. In the first place, this beautifully comes in with the story. A talent was far too large a mass of silver to be concealed in a napkin. If it were to be hidden at all, it could only be so hidden by being buried. But there is a far deeper meaning than this. The talent was hidden in the earth—that is, the gifts God gives such and such a man are employed about the things of this earth: the cares of this world, and deceitfulness of riches, to quote our dear Lord's words in another place. But the pound was delicately, softly laid up in a napkin. And this refers more precisely to that which is so common a temptation to girls. St. Paul says to St. Timothy, 'Thou, therefore, endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ'. Now, when any of you allow yourselves to lie in bed to the very last moment, because it is so very comfortable, thereby perhaps giving up altogether, or anyhow shortening, your morning prayers—if any of you in the winter, when the time has come for some active duty, won't get away from lingering over the fire, because, you know, it is so very cold; if any of you, engaged in reading a story, won't lay it aside at the exact time, because, 'anyhow, I'll just finish this chapter'—this is not enduring hardness, this is laying up your pound in a napkin. And yet notice that the account of the servant went far beyond this. By reason of the frailty of our mortal nature, we cannot always stand upright. He did not, just now and then, lay that pound aside. His own words were, 'Lord, behold, here is thy pound which I have kept'.

And see the two faithful servants go out, as it were, to meet him. This is what St. John means, where he says, 'Herein is our love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment'. This is what St. John's blessed Master means when He says, as we have so lately heard, 'When these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh'.

And next compare the speech of the servants as given in St. Matthew with that in St. Luke. In St. Matthew it is, 'Behold, I have gained'. In St. Luke, 'Lord, thy pound hath gained'. Is not this exactly what St. Paul tells us where he says, 'I laboured more abundantly than they all: yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me'?

IV. 'Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.' It has been very beautifully said that here on earth, when we are happiest, joy enters into us as wine into a glass or bottle; there we shall enter into joy as a ship into the boundless sea.

Then, hanging back to the last, comes the slothful servant. And he begins with an excuse: 'Lord, I knew thee that thou art a hard man, reaping where thou hast not sown, and gathering where thou hast not strawed'. Let us first understand his words. The first part, 'reaping where thou hast not sown,' is clear enough. The last means this: gathering in the grain on the barn floor, which thou hadst not winnowed out. See how he not only tries to excuse himself, but throws the blame on his lord. Was it not so in the first excuse ever made in the world? Hast thou eaten of the tree? Adam not only throws the blame on his wife—The woman gave me of the tree; but he casts it partly on God—The woman whom Thou gavest to be with me; as much as to say—If Thou hadst not given me Eve, I should not have fallen into this sin.

'Lo, there thou hast that is thine.' Nay, not so. His lord had indeed what once was his, but what ought to have been his now? All that that talent might have brought him in was due to him exactly as much as that first original talent. But it is much more than so. It could scarcely have been taught in this parable; but we know how true it is. In the dreadful day of judgment no man will be able to say: These, Lord, are my talents. It is true, I have done no good with them; but neither have I done any harm. If you have not done good, you must have done harm. Our Christian life is not like ascending a mountain, where, if you sit down to rest, though certainly you are not getting on, neither are you going back. No; it is like a man rowing on a swift stream, and against the stream. If he leans on his oars, he does not make way manifestly; but is that all?—no; he is drifting down.

There is an Eastern allegory which sets out this truth very beautifully. A man who was about to take a long journey had two sacks of corn. He gave them into the charge of two friends—one to one, one to the other—requesting these friends to take care of them for him. In due time he came back. Going to the first friend, he said, 'Where is my corn?' 'All safe,' he answers; 'I tied up the mouth, and put it in a cellar. Take it again.' It was brought out and opened; and there it was, mildewed, rotten, and utterly worthless. He went to the second, 'Where is my corn?' 'Come out with me, and I will show you.' He took the man into a field all waving with golden wheat: 'There is your corn'. Then said the owner to the first friend, 'Take your reward; the sack of mildewed wheat you gave to me'. To the second, 'Give me back one sack of corn when the grain is thrashed out, and all the rest is your own'.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons for Children, p. 9.

'SEMPER FIDELIS'—ALWAYS FAITHFUL

'Well done, thou good and faithful servant.'—MATTHEW
XXV. 21.

THE motto which I have selected to read with my text to-day was given by Queen Elizabeth to the city of Exeter. The people of that ancient city naturally place great value upon it. They could not receive a higher commendation from their sovereign than this.

We all value fidelity, and none of us would be considered faithless. It is wonderful what opportunities there are for faithfulness in all directions, and how often it is to be found in directions where we should least expect it. The lower animals, even the beasts of the forest, often show very striking fidelity to each other. How often the parent risks its life, and even sacrifices it, in defence of its young or of its mate. Then when we come to domesticated animals, what an amount of fidelity we find? How faithful, for instance, is the dog! That is perhaps the chief reason why we like him. My nation—the Welsh—love to record the fidelity of Prince Llewellyn's dog, the noble Gelert. Every Welsh child knows how he protected the royal infant and killed the wolf that came to devour it, having first of all turned the cradle over the child to protect it from the wolf. It is true that at first Llewellyn mistook the situation, and seeing blood all over the nursery concluded that Gelert had killed the child, and in a moment of mad despair plunged his sword into Gelert's heart. But when the brave dog was dead at his feet, ill-requrited for his noble service, and he saw the wolf's mangled body in a corner of the room, and, turning over the cradle, found his child asleep, the brave prince was fit to break his heart. He could not restore that life, or say one kind word to Gelert—it was all too late for that; but he gave him honourable burial, erected a stone, and on it a record of faithfulness, over Gelert's grave. And still Bedd-Gelert (or Gelert's Grave) is a well-known and oft-frequented spot. As men cut a twig from the tree that keeps vigil over that grave, and take it to their homes as a memento, they do all in honour of the memory of a faithful dog. Faithfulness, even in a dog, is a noble thing.

Then, when we come to men, women and children, fidelity is specially prized. We do not think much of anyone who is not faithful. A faithless one is despised and avoided, although he may be gifted in other directions. The first thing necessary in the character of a servant, or workman, is that he is faithful, and therefore trustworthy. The soldier who forsakes his regiment is branded as a deserter and submitted to humiliating punishment. He is despised by all who see him because he has been faithless to his country. In every position 'it is required that a man be found faithful'. The closer the relationship the more importance do we attach to faithfulness. I am told that in Exeter people value so highly their motto Semper Fidelis that they not uncommonly have it engraved on wedding rings. It was this faithfulness that is referred to so tenderly in a familiar song, 'Darby and Joan':—

Always the same to your old wife Joan.

There is another equally familiar and tender song that ends with the words:—

John Anderson, my jo, John, we clamb the hill thegither,
And mony a canty day, John, we've had wi' ane anither.
Now we maun totter down, John, but han' in hand we'll go,
And sleep thegither at the foot, John Anderson, my jo.

Then again, how sweet it is to see brothers and sisters faithful to each other. I remember some years ago that all Bristol was thrilled with the story of two children being lost in a neighbouring wood. The two were out all through a cold wintry night, and when found in the morning the younger child was alive, for the elder one had taken off her dress and wrapt it round the child, and thus had saved its life, although by so doing she had sacrificed her own—for she lay dead by the side of her loving charge. What could be more pathetic than that sight? And who could help shedding a tear over the body of that brave, devoted, and faithful sister.

But, above all, Jesus expects us to be faithful, and rewards with His own approval and blessing all those who are faithful to Him. The city of Exeter may well be proud of its motto, for it was given to it, as a reward of its faithfulness, by Royal hands. But far greater than the approval of even Queen Elizabeth is the approval of Jesus our Lord and King. There is a very fine painting by Sir Noel Paton, in which a young Roman lady is represented as refusing to put one grain of incense upon Caesar's altar. It was a touching sight, for her young lover looked anxiously at her, hoping that for the sake of saving her precious life—yea, and for his sake—she would cast but one grain upon the altar; but no, not to save her life, nor yet for her lover's sake, would she do it: but for Christ's sake she would suffer a martyr's death. Oh, with what a welcome she was received into her Lord's joy! And to each of us He exclaims, 'Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life'. May our motto in Christ's service ever be, 'Semper Fidelis'—'Always Faithful'.—DAVID DAVIES, Talks with Men, Women, and Children, p. 280.

AN INHERITANCE IN HEAVEN

MATTHEW XXV. 34.

THERE is just one drawback to our joy in the possession of the inheritance of which I spoke to you in the last chapter. We must one day leave it. There is no such drawback to the second inheritance I am to tell you of now. This is that inheritance 'reserved in heaven,' into which God's children enter when they die, and in which they remain for ever.

By what rich names it is named in the Bible! It is the heavenly country, the city of God, the new Jerusalem, whose streets are gold, the many mansions in the Father's house, and Paradise. Every child who loves God is an heir of this country. It belongs to him now, although his eyes cannot see it. It is to that country he will be carried when he dies.

How shall I describe to you the grandeur of this better land, as it is set before us in the Bible? Earth has nothing so fair, so real, so good. It is the home of goodness and of truth.

When Joshua was describing the good land to which God had brought the children of Israel, he said, 'It is a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills; a land of wheat and barley and vines and fig-trees and pomegranates, a land of olive oil and honey; a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass'.

But the good things in the heavenly country are different from these. They are things that belong to the soul. They are the things that give pleasure to God. Innocence and peace and joy and truth and love in the hearts of the people of the country; these are some of the good things. And the throne of Christ is there. And Christ Himself. And those who live there have His friendship, and meet Him and serve Him every day.

It was to gather citizens for that country that Jesus came down from heaven. By His churches and ministers He is gathering citizens for it still. The citizens He gathers are the best, the most loving, the truest of mankind. The fighters for God, the speakers of the truth, the helpers of the poor are there. So are the souls whose sins have been forgiven. Many who were poor on earth are rich; and some who were slaves. In heaven they are rich and free and happy. It is the country of those who have been on God's side, and have been soldiers in His armies and workers in His workfields. The holy men and women of whom we read in the Bible are there. And the prophets and singers of psalms, and the disciples who followed the Lord upon the earth. And the Apostles who spoke for Him after He went back to heaven. Mary, the mother of Jesus; Elizabeth, the mother of John; the poor woman who broke her box of ointment and poured it on His feet; and Dorcas, who made little coats for widows and orphans; and the Elect Lady and Gaius, who opened their homes to the travellers who went about preaching the Gospel; they are all there. And the missionaries of our own time who have gone to heathen countries to turn their people to God: Robert Moffat, Henry Martyn and Bishop Mackenzie, David Livingstone and William Burns, the missionary to China, and thousands more whose names I do not know. They are all there.

It is a rich, fair land, filled with things rich and fair, and with people whose hearts are filled with the love of God, and who love their neighbours as themselves. There is no quarrelling there. There is no envy. There is no hatred. It is a country where the people are of one mind and one heart. They strive to help each other, and serve the Lord who died for them, all they can.

And you, my dear boy, and you, my dear girl, if you love God, are heirs of this happy land. It is yours now. But you will enter it and be happy in it more fully when you die.

People—even the people of God—do not think of this inheritance as often as they should. The beauty and sweetness of God's gifts to us in our earthly country blind our eyes. We are placed here in a world so fair that we do not care to think of the world in heaven that is fairer far. It is often only when trouble and sorrow descend upon us that we turn our thoughts to the better land. But it is one of the blessings of trouble that it inclines our heart to think of it. Many and many a time since the world began there was no comfort for the children of God except the vision of that better land.

The thirteenth century was a very wicked time in Europe. Troops of lawless soldiers went about overturning and destroying and working cruelty. The roads and woods were infested with robbers. The poor were trampled. No one was safe. No one was happy. Good people had to hide themselves in houses of prayer to escape from the robbers. And it seemed to many that the end of the world was at hand.

In that dreary time arose two men of the same name who, looking through the awful gloom and misery, had a clear vision of the better country, and called on men and women to seek after it. The one was a poor monk, who lived in a cell at Cluny; the other was a great man, a ruler of monks, who lived in a great house at Clairvaux. Bernard was their name.

What Bernard of Cluny saw, as he peered through the darkness, was heaven itself. He saw it in glorious colours, all golden, all joyous, with Christ and the holy angels, and filled with holy men and women.

But what Bernard of Clairvaux saw was better still. It was the King of the fair, heavenly land. It was the dear Saviour who died for us. What he saw was the Person of Jesus. He saw the head that was crowned with thorns, and the feet that were pierced with nails, and His hands and His side.

And each of them put what he saw into a hymn.

The poor monk who had only a cell to live in made the hymn you have so often sung:—

Jerusalem the golden!
With milk and honey blest:
Beneath thy contemplation
Sink heart and voice oppressed.

I know not, oh, I know not
What joys await us there,
What radiance of glory,
What light beyond compare.

The rich Abbot of Clairvaux saw just that glory, and fixed his great heart on Jesus Himself:—

Jesus, the very thought of Thee
With sweetness fills my breast;
But sweeter far Thy face to see,
And in Thy presence rest.

Nor voice can sing, nor heart can frame,
Nor can the memory find
A sweeter sound than Thy blest name,
O Saviour of mankind.

I hope days so dark as those in which the two Bernards lived may never again come to the earth. But if, as you go forward in life, a time of sorrow should come to you, do not forget this better country in heaven.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 212.

A MAN ON A CROSS WHO FOUND GOD

MATTHEW XXVII. 38 ff.

I HAVE been speaking to you about the finding of God, and you will remember I promised to tell you of one who found Him in the shadow of death. And now I have to tell you it was the Thief on the Cross I had in my mind. And what I want to show you about him is, not only that he found God, but also the way by which God led him to Himself. This is the story I am to open up to you this evening.

Of the man's previous history we only know what is to be gathered from his own words and from the circumstances in which we find him. He was one of two men who were thieves and who were put to death when Jesus was. To look at, he did not seem to differ from his companion. No one could say that the one was that day to find God and the other not. He was a thief, just as his neighbour was. And there would be in him and about him all that habit of thieving puts into a man, or draws up out of a man. There would be scorn of law, lawlessness; there would be coarseness and perhaps brutality. He was really a thief: a man who belonged to the thieving class. A poor, miserable form of a man. If you could enter a criminal court when the judges are sitting and see the people who come up to be tried, you would see the kind of man this was. Idleness and debasement are written on their very faces, and on their looks and movements and words and deeds. They are like a sheet of paper written all over with evil signs. The thief on the cross was just one of that class: a man acquainted with gaols and chains and whipping-posts. A miserable creature. A thief. That and nothing more.

But no. I recall that word. He was something else besides a thief. He was a man, with a man's nature, with a man's wishes, with a man's heart. His face, although crime had put its bad marks upon it, once nestled on a mother's breast. Beneath the wretched form of his thieving life lay a real human story—a story of love and sadness, of tears and sins; a story that might have been of a different and better kind if he had had the advantages you and I have had—if he had had the half of our chances.

The first thing, then, in this story is that he was a man who had lost his way, who had got into bad ways, had fallen among bad companions, and was now an outcast and a thief. By his own confession he was an unjust man, justly condemned to die.

But the next thing which I have to mention to you is the surprising joyful fact that thief though he was, and bad though he was, he was still related to God, that God was remembering him, and that it was in the heart of God to bring this lost soul to Himself before the day was ended.

I have no words good enough to say how good this second fact seems to me. It is the everlasting wonder of the Gospel, the mercy and pity of God for sinners, the heart of God yearning to bring sinners back to Himself. God knew the man's badness better than anybody else did. He also knew how bad his badness was. But He also knew that although he was bad, and very far gone in badness, he yet was neither a monster in human shape, nor a fiend, but a man, the work of His own hands, a man with a lost soul, a man sorely needing to be saved. To tell the story rightly I must take you back to the day when the Lord Jesus was put to death. I take you back to the old city of Jerusalem, in which the death took place—the city over which Jesus wept, and which only a few days before He had entered as a King. And I want you to follow me along the streets of Jerusalem, beginning at the door of Pilate's judgment hall.

It is morning. Three prisoners are brought forth by soldiers to be led to the place of execution. Each has been beaten with the cruel scourge. Each, weak though he be with the scourging, has to carry the crossbeam of the tree on which he is to die. A procession is formed; the soldiers and prisoners begin to move. There is the usual crowd on the sidewalks. The day is hot; the air is stifling. One of the three prisoners is the thief whose story I am about to tell. He has his own sorrow that day; but he is struck by the demeanour of one of his companions. He notices as the procession advances and this companion comes into view that there is a murmur among the crowd. He sees that He is not like a common criminal. He observes that He is silent. But ever as they advance he catches words spoken about Him by the crowd. One said, 'This is the man who called himself a King'; another, 'That is He who said He was the Messiah'; a third, 'There is the man who said to Pilate, "I was born to bear witness to the truth"'. And a fourth said to his friend by his side, 'Behold the man who put His trust in God and said He could build the Temple in three days if it were thrown down'. Other words, more wonderful still, fell on his ear. One who was weeping cried, 'That is the gentle one who opened my eyes'; a second answered, 'He raised my brother from the dead'; a third struck in, 'I was possessed of evil spirits, and He cast them out'. 'Who can this be by my side?' the poor thief cried in his own heart. He did not know that all he heard that day was spoken in his hearing because God in that way was bringing the things of Christ, by which he was to be saved, near to his soul.

From the Sufferer Himself, whose approach brought out those words, no word fell. He continued silent. Worn, weary, as a sheep before her shearers, as a lamb brought to the slaughter, He was dumb, opening not His mouth. But by and by the murmured words on the sidepaths changed into bursts of sorrow. As the great Sufferer passed, grateful women in the crowd, and mothers and sisters whom He had blessed, burst into sobs and wailing. And then the silence of the Lamb of God was broken. But it was broken only to turn the sorrow of the sorrowing women to themselves. 'Daughters of Jerusalem,' He cried, 'weep not for Me. Weep for yourselves and for your children, and for the days of evil which are about to be.'

The poor thief was more and more filled with amazement; and more than ever the question kept rising in his soul: 'Who can this Sufferer and the Speaker of such words be?' Then he noticed that the Lord grew faint and sank under the burden of the cross. Then he saw the beam laid on Simon the Cyrenian, who was standing by. At length the procession arrived at Calvary. And once more he was struck by the silence of Jesus. He could see that loving friends were present and in tears. His mother was there, and friends of hers, and some of His disciples. And perhaps he heard some of their sorrowful words of grief, and what they said about the innocence and goodness of the Beloved One who was about to be put to death. He saw the title nailed on the cross of Jesus: 'This is the King of the Jews'. And then the terrible nails were driven in, through feet and hands, and the Innocent One and the two thieves were hung up on the crosses and left to die.

To die in that way, on a cross, with nails driven through the tender flesh of hands and feet, is one of the most horrible deaths. The sufferings are terrible. And it is no wonder if the sufferers are made mad by what they suffer, and in their madness break out into curses and reproaches and evil words.

But the wonderful thing which the poor thief I am telling you about noticed in Jesus was that He began to pray. Not only so. It was a prayer for the very people who were putting Him to death that he heard: 'Father, forgive them; they know not what they do'. Although he would be suffering the same terrible pains as the others, he was arrested by this prayer. It was prayer to a Father; it was prayer for enemies. More than ever rose in his soul the question: 'Who can this be who on the very cross prays for the men who put Him there?'

Perhaps it was the madness caused by the pain he suffered which made the other thief break out into reproaches against the Lord. But it was wicked, inhuman cruelty which led the priests and scribes standing by to take up the reproaches and cry in mockery: 'He saved others; Himself He cannot save. Let Christ, the King of Israel, descend from the cross, that we may see and believe.'

The evil men who uttered those words did not know that their words were to bring light and salvation to one of the sufferers there that day. But it was so. They were—without intending it—lifting up the glad tidings concerning Christ to the thirsting heart of the listening thief. Everything he saw and heard that day went to his heart and became a preacher of Christ to him. Christ's own conduct, the title on the cross, the prayer to His Father, the prayer for His enemies, and now the words 'He saved others; Himself He cannot save,' and the other words 'Christ, the King of Israel,' went to his heart.

Racked by pain though he was, his spirit was stirred by what he heard. Ideas that had lain slumbering in him from his childhood rose to the surface of his soul. His whole being was moved. Through the prayer of Christ there came to him the vision once known, long lost, of a Father—a Father, a Hearer of prayer, a Father who had forgiveness even for enemies. And in Christ he was near to One different from everybody he had known, One who could pray for His enemies. It was a revelation of things that had been hidden by his sins from his eyes. And higher than ever rose the question: 'Who can this be by whose side I am here to die?'

Two things were made by the Spirit of God to bring light to him. First of all the inscription on the cross of Jesus: 'This is Jesus, the King of the Jews'; and next the words of the cruel taunt: 'If Thou be the Son of God, the Messiah, come down from the cross'.

Little by little, over the waves of pain he was suffering, dawned the grand truth which was to save his soul. It was borne in upon him that this Sufferer so near, so silent, so blameless, was really the Son of God, and the promised Messiah and King of Israel. His eyes were opened. He saw God in the suffering Lamb of God. The things that were that morning unseen to him opened their gates and drew him gently within their light. And in that light he found God.

Be sure this was not the first time God had tried to bring him to Himself. More likely it was the last stage in a long journey by which God was leading him to the Saviour. I always think, when I read the prayer he addressed to Jesus, 'Lord, remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom,' that behind its words shines, although dimly, the fact that he was a poor Israelite, not a heathen; that he knew the Israelites' hope of a Messiah; that perhaps he had been taught it when he was a child, by his mother; or by his father when he was still an innocent boy. And there it lay, from his early years until now, in his heart, a light shining in a dark place, a light that only God could have kindled and kept burning. And it is this very light that came out in the prayer: 'Remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom'.

There is just one thing more in the story. Could the holy Jesus listen to such a man? Was there any hope that a man so lost, so stained with crime, could have favourable answer to such a prayer? It was great faith that spoke in him; his faith made him very bold; but could there be any answer to his faith?

The answer was the granting of his prayer. The Saviour did not repel him, did not put his prayer away. He pitied him. He accepted him. He assured him that on that very day he should be with Himself in Paradise. 'This day, O stained life, O broken heart, thou shalt be with Me in Paradise.'

That is the wonderful story. In the shadow of death, amid the pains of the cross, this poor lost one found God. He found God, and his soul was saved. His life was lost. There never could come a time when he would not regret that his life had not been lived to God. But he himself was saved. He found God, and finding God, found heaven. That very day he was admitted into the joy and fellowship of the eternal world. And he found God—to God be given the glory!—because God in His great mercy had watched over him, perhaps through long years had sought after him, and amid the very shadows of death found him.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Children's Portion, p. 329.

ST. MARK

OUR EXAMPLE IN TEMPTATION

'And immediately the Spirit driveth Him into the wilderness. And He was there in the wilderness forty days, tempted of Satan.'—MARK I, 12, 13.

WE will think about Our Saviour's Temptation, for He is our example.

Suppose you hear that some one has enlisted, what does that mean? He has become a soldier.

Yes, and whose army have we enlisted in? Jesus Christ's army.

Yes, and we have a battle to fight 'under Christ's banner, against sin, the world, and the devil'.

Jesus is the leader of that army, and the clergy are officers who give His messages and commands to the soldiers. The stole is the officer's uniform. It shows that he is sent by Jesus to give His message to the soldiers. When I preach to you I don't come in my own name but in His, and the message He has sent me to give you is to tell you to pray to Him to help you to follow His example in your temptations, and then you will be victorious.

Would you think much of a soldier who ran away from battle, because he was afraid of getting wounded? No.

No, we should think him a coward. A soldier must be ready to bear suffering. There was once a great soldier called Sir Henry Havelock who served in the Indian Mutiny and other battles, and he became a General; and on his memorial tablet, in the chapel of his old school in London, are these words, 'Thou, therefore, endure hardness, as a Good Soldier of Jesus Christ'. You see, a soldier in Jesus Christ's army has to be brave and to endure hardness as much as a soldier in the King's army; and we will think of the example Our Leader sets us in this matter.

I. Let us think of the enemy Jesus is leading His army against. When an army is going to battle a strict look-out is kept all round to watch the movements of the enemy, so that he may not attack them when they are off their guard. In the same way Jesus Christ's soldiers must be on their guard against that enemy who is always ready to attack them. Who is that enemy? Satan.

Yes; and directly we begin to think we have overcome him, and get off our guard, he will attack us and get the best of us when we are least expecting him; so we must pray that we may never be off our guard. 'Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.'

Can you tell me the name of one of the Apostles who fell through thinking he stood, and getting off his guard? St. Peter.

Yes; although St. Peter had protested that he would never deny Jesus, even if he had to die with Him, he denied three times ever knowing anything about Him.

This is just what happens to us. We get off our guard, and Christ's soldiers are conquered by their enemy.

If St. Peter had been more on his guard, I am sure he would never have denied Jesus, for he loved Him so much; and I am afraid we often have all St. Peter's weakness without the deep love he had for his Master. You must never give way to despair when you have yielded to temptation, but you must try, in Jesus' strength, to do better in the future; St. Peter did not give way to despair, but he learnt not to trust in his own strength; and he warns us, 'Be vigilant, because your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about seeking whom he may devour'. Lent is the special time for us to be vigilant, and to be finding out what our temptations are, and to be making resolutions about them.

A man in great danger made a vow that he would sacrifice a thousand bulls to Jupiter if he would rescue him from his danger. Jupiter did rescue him, but when the danger was over the man thought a thousand bulls were too many, and he said he would sacrifice five hundred bulls, and then he came down to one hundred, and then he made up his mind he would only give Jupiter one bull. But it was a very hot day and he altered his mind again, and said he was sure Jupiter would like a bunch of grapes better than a bull, so he bought a bunch of grapes to offer to Jupiter, but ended by eating them himself. So you see although he began by determining to offer a thousand bulls to Jupiter, he ended by giving him nothing at all. This shows how our Lent resolutions will end, unless we constantly pray about them.

II. How long has Satan been our enemy? From the beginning.

Yes, from the very first; ever since he tempted Eve to disobey God in the Garden of Eden. St. John speaks of him as 'a murderer from the beginning'. He murders our souls. He is fighting always against God.

Does it make Satan angry to see Christ's soldiers do wrong? No.

No, it pleases him, because he knows they are getting more into his power, and becoming more like himself. Satan hates everything good, and so he is always tempting us to do wrong.

Does God ever tempt us to do wrong? No.

No; but he allows Satan to tempt us, so that He may see whether we will give way to Satan, or remember our promise 'to continue Christ's faithful soldiers and servants unto our life's end'.

It is very hard to stand against some of Satan's temptations, but we could stand against them if only we trusted more in God, for the Bible tells you that 'God will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able,' but will, with the temptation, also make a way of escape.

Jesus is the example for us to follow in resisting temptation. Satan tempted Him just after He had been baptised, and when we have been baptised, and have promised 'to continue Christ's faithful soldiers and servants,' Satan tempts us to give up our Master's service.—J. L. SMITH-DAMPIER, Christ's Little Citizens, p. 201.

JESUS AND ANIMALS

'And He was there in the wilderness forty days . . . with the wild beasts.'—MARK I. 13.

THE most regal thing God has given us in all the many, many glorious gifts of His goodness is a heart—a heart to love with. Living, as we do, in a world where so much is thought of swords and guns, and metal crowns, and the kingdoms which such things win and rule, we almost naturally think little or nothing of the conquest of the heart and of the kingdom of love. Of course we have a heart; everybody has a heart, and of course we must love with it; but that it can do what guns and swords and thrones do, win a kingdom and rule it—that we do not so clearly see. Yet love is the crown of God; He wears no other. Love is the throne of God; amongst His creatures, with hearts at least, He sits on no other. And His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom only because all its subjects are subjects of love.

We read in history of the young child of a king who, while his father was sleeping, lifted his father's crown to his own brow, and said, as he felt its rim pressing on his head, 'Now I'm a king'. Be this as it may, whenever you make any creature of God see your love, when you lift your heart to your brow, you are putting your Father's crown upon your head—the crown of God.

Now, let us see Jesus wearing His Father's crown and sitting in a kingdom of love. 'And immediately the Spirit driveth Him into the wilderness, and He was there in the wilderness forty days, and was with the wild beasts'—bears, hyenas, wolves, and lions; for such were the wild beasts of that desert in His day. He was there five weeks, rather more, alone, without gun, or sling, or bow, or staff, and He spent all this time without one fear, and left at length alive and without one wound, without even one single scratch. How was this? I think I know. To wild beasts God has given hearts; He has made even them to know love. The she-wolf loves her whelps, and the lioness wails for the hunger of her cubs, and the bear turns a hero when defending his wife and home; they have all hearts and are all capable of love, and Jesus, too, had a heart, and such a transcendent heart that the wild beasts could feel its spell. It gave them a new experience; it cast out fear of man.

They gladly yielded themselves to its charm, and bestowed in return their rude confidence and affection. They felt He wore the golden crown of love upon His brow, the crown of God, and they felt trust, reverence, and worship. And that is how it was that Jesus was with them unharmed. 'Perfect love casteth out fear.'

A few years ago there was a man who astonished the world with his marvellous power over horses. The very wildest of them, those that were mere savage beasts, became as enthusiastic to him as loyal people are to a king. Some of these had thrown their riders, trampled on them, torn them with their teeth, and were given up as utterly hopeless, and were allowed to live only for the sake of their splendid form and looks; yet even these just yielded themselves to him like a playful kitten to a little child. There was one magnificent animal, a soldier's horse, which stood chief amongst these terrible brutes. It was like the man living among the tombs we read of in the Gospels. No man could tame it, nor could it be bound. Its name was 'Cruiser,' but it was also called 'Savage'. Yet Mr. Rarey undertook to subdue it, and in spite of all warnings as to the risks he ran, had it turned loose in its stall, then without one fear and with the calmness and dignity which is given by greatness of heart, he began his taming work. The extraordinary sight of his perfect love raised in the mind of the horse an altogether new emotion. What had it to fear in him? Tamer and horse looked at each other, and their eyes met and told tales; the man's of deep pity and love, the horse's of losing fear, till the horse got fully to believe in the man; the arms of their hearts met and clasped. At length the brute gently lay down at Mr. Rarey's bidding, and Mr. Rarey lay down on it like a fond child leaning on his brave big dog. No language can convey the intensity and entireness with which these two trusted one another. And the amazed soldiers gave the creature a new name, a redeemed name, they called it 'Darling'. The word was wrung from them as, through tears of pure manly joy, they saw the very same kind of power binding those two which bound themselves to their baby child, and their baby child to them. And this name for the horse came unconsciously, just as when looking into the charmed and captivated baby's face, the delighted exclamation, 'Darling!' sprang to their lips; and some of them were heard to say, with more feeling than they cared to show, and for want of something better, 'God bless the brute!'

And what was it that was this tamer's marvellous strength? It was his heart. He had lifted the Great Father's crown to his brow. The brute saw it, felt its charm, fell down before it and worshipped. The kingship of love was within it, its King had come, and it was mere pleasure to obey.

God has put the animal world 'under us' by giving us larger hearts than theirs. But we may rule in the kingdom of the lash, instead of in the kingdom of the heart, with a black crown of terror, not a bright crown of love. With the lash and terror, we are usurpers and tyrants; with heart and love we are the rightful sons and daughters of the Most High. The divinest thing the world has yet seen, or will ever see, is the influence of one living heart upon another.—BENJAMIN WAUGH, Sunday Evenings with my Children, p. 73.

SEEDS

'So is the kingdom of God, as if a man should cast seed into the ground; and should sleep, and rise night and day, and the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how.'—MARK IV. 26, 27.

CHRIST in boat—bright spring day—fields by lake's side—picture out. Took His text from plants, sowers, etc. Our text part of His sermon.

1. His Text—Seeds.—Walk through garden early in year—everything coming up—'Spring' (springing time). Why?

1. There was seed sown.

2. There has been moisture to water the seed—rain, dew, etc.

3. The sun's warmth. If in hot-house, still warmth came from the sun first—coal heats fire, and coal is preserved sunshine.

II. Seed Sown in us.—Each of us is a garden—seed sown—teaching—Bible—sermons. I am sowing now, or trying to sow. Plenty been sown in time past. Is it coming up? Has it made us do anything?—more obedient?—helpful?

What makes it come up?

1. Holy Spirit—moisture to plant (John vii. 38, 39; Hos. xiv. 5).

2. Love of our Lord Jesus; like sun's warmth. See what St. Paul says (2 Cor. v. 14), 'constraineth us'.

III. Ourselves as Seeds.—Walk in another garden, just by church—ever seen them sowing seeds there? Yes, seeds our bodies (1 Cor. xv. 42). They too must all come up. How? As weeds or plants? For God's beautiful garden, or to be cast out?

If want to be among the good plants, then must take care now that we are good gardens. The way we treat the seed sown in us, makes us as seeds, good or bad.—C. A. GOODHART, Hints and Outlines for Children's Services, p. 62.

THE GROWING SEED

'And He said, So is the kingdom of God, as if a man should cast seed into the ground; and should sleep, and rise night and day, and the seed should spring and grow up, he knoweth not how. For the earth bringeth forth fruit of herself; first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear. But when the fruit is brought forth, immediately he putteth in the sickle, because the harvest is come.'—MARK IV. 26-29.

The man in this parable casts the seed into the ground, and then sleeps by night, and during the day attends to other matters. He leaves the seed alone, for he can do no more for it. He is not blamed for sleeping, as his sleepless anxiety could do no good. The earth does the rest, for the seed grows up without his help, and in a way he does not understand.

The seed is the word, and the sower here is man. It cannot be Christ, for He knows how the seed grows. The lesson is that Christ's kingdom is a growing kingdom, that it grows like grain, and that man's part after all is small.

I. The Seed.—The Word of God is likened not to grass that grows of itself, but to grain that would die if not sown every year. As the seed suits the soil, so the word suits the heart. 'God does not make half hinges.' He makes whole hinges, of which the parts exactly fit into one another. The seed and the soul have the same Maker, and were made for each other.

II. The Sowing.—Without sowing there is no harvest, and yet the sowing is a very simple thing. It is not like the planting of a tree which needs much skill, but it is 'as if a man should cast seed into the ground,' as a sower of corn simply throws the seed from his hand. Chance-sown seeds scattered by the wind often grow well. I have seen seeds sown in a little child's garden by a child's unskilled hand, and they grew beautifully. And often the seed dropped into a heart by a child's hand has ripened into a rich harvest. You too can be a true sower, for you have not to create but only to scatter the seed. A tiny hand can do that, and the earth will bring forth fruit of itself. A grand harvest may spring from a servant's or a child's poor sowing.

III. The Growing.—The growth of seed is among the greatest wonders in the world; it is an everyday miracle. It goes on during the silent hours of night, and lies quite beyond the ken and power of man. The power of growth in the tiniest plants is beyond belief. Christ sets it forth by a double phrase, 'should spring and grow up' (ver. 27). A seedling will burst the solid rock. Some seeds hollow out marble in their hunger for food and growth; and in a new book called  Rays from the Realms of Nature  (p. 43), I read that a single growing mushroom can raise a flagstone. God's Word is a seed of a growing and thriving kind which triumphs over all hindering things. God has given it a life and power of its own, and without the sower's aid it grows of itself from within. The two chief lessons of this parable are, that the seed grows slowly and gently, and that its growth, in its beginning, middle, and end, is always without man's help and beyond his knowledge.

Christ bids the sower be thankful, for he is a worker with God, who needs and honours Him. The harvest comes not without His aid.

Be humble.—How little man knows about the growth of the seed in the dark earth, and how little he can do for it!

Be patient—not like the child who pulls up the flower to see how the roots are growing. Don't expect the growth of grace in your own heart to be over in a day. The law of harvest is 'first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear'. You must begin with the A B C of grace, and go on step by step. And in Christ's work among others, be not over-busy, or fussy. Do not give out that you know all about it, that you have secrets which other people have not, and that you know how to make the sown seed grow. Do not vex yourself in vain by taking the whole burden upon yourself, and forgetting God's part in it. Pray that you may have great reverence.

IV. The Grain.—We catch a tone of joyous wonder in the words, 'After that the full corn in the ear. But when the fruit is brought forth, . . . because the harvest is come' (v. 27, 28). This abundance and perfection of harvest teach that every Christian should ripen into strength and beauty. God's seed has a self-improving power, by which it grows towards its best state. It is not enough that the seed sown live and grow: it should reach the full corn in the ear, the round healthy fruit. Sowing is not all, conversion is not all, a little growth is not enough. I have been reading with great pleasure the life of a good man. When I had done I said to myself, Why has this life so delighted and satisfied me? The reason was that the history of that man was just the history of the seed-corn in this parable. Year by year he was growing stronger, and wiser, and more beautiful. His failings passed away one by one. He gradually got the better of his gloominess and his bad temper. He threw himself with more joy and heart into all his duties; and he came to his grave in a good old age as a shock of corn fully ripe. Be this the story of your life, 'First the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear'.—JAMES WELLS, The Parables of Jesus, p. 75.

LITTLE SHIPS

'And there were also with Him other little ships.'—MARK
IV. 36.

WE are not told that these little ships crossed the sea to the other side. If they did, they would have to face the storm which came suddenly upon the sea that night, but they would also share in the calm and peace that the Saviour spoke. It does say, 'There were also with Him other little ships'. Linked with Him, and all is well.

The larger ship, in which the Saviour and His disciples were, supplies us with a very striking illustration of the Church preserved and guided by Jesus, and 'the other little ships' may be taken as a picture of the children under the love and protection of Christ.

These 'little ships' suggest a few solemn thoughts about individual responsibility. We need to be watchful, careful, and prayerful, or the storms of life will overcome us.

I. Little Ships Carry Precious Cargo.—Little ships carry both treasure and life: so do little folks. The soul with all its precious powers. The mind to know the Lord. The conscience to feel the Lord. The heart to love the Lord, and the memory to remember Him. This treasure is of more value than the whole world (Mark vii. 36, 37).

II. Little Ships Need Guiding.—These little ships would require a great deal of managing on the sea that night, for a great storm broke upon them, and if not guided well they would have gone to pieces. And on the sea of life there are storms, rocks, and quicksands, and dangers of every description. There is sin, selfishness, forgetfulness of God, and fatal indifference, all of which will sink the soul if they are not overcome, and only Jesus can save us from our sins (Acts iv. 12; Matt. 1. 21).

Every ship, small or great, requires a captain, chart, cable, and compass, if it is to cross in safety over the wide ocean. 'So every person, young or old, needs a sure Guide to steer him to the harbour of eternal rest, and all is provided for by Divine grace (Psalm cvii. 7).

The pilot guides the vessel out of the harbour, and past all the dangerous rocks and shoals, and only when she is safe in the deep ocean does he leave her in charge of the captain, who is well acquainted with the ocean, and is capable of taking her safely to the other side. So it is the duty of parents, teachers, and preachers to steer the children safely past all the dangers of youth to the great Captain of our Salvation.

III. Little Ships can be Useful.—They often do more business, in proportion, than larger ones, because more easily managed. And how very useful little people can be, if they have the right spirit.

Think of little Samuel lighting the lamps, and opening the doors in the Temple, how useful to Eli the Priest.

Think of the little maid who told Naaman of the prophet Elisha in Israel, how useful she was to Naaman.

A little boy once said to his mother, 'I should like to have lived in the time of our Saviour, that I might have done something for Him'. His mother replied, smiling, 'Why, what could a child of your age have done to prove your love to Him?' 'I would have run errands for Him,' answered the boy. Children can do that for Jesus now.

IV. Little Ships must be Careful.—All who manage ships have to be careful, because there are so many dangers, and certain rules and regulations must be observed or disaster will overtake them; therefore, all who are responsible must be acquainted with the rules for sailing, the lights of warning, and the flags of communication. So in the great voyage of life there are rules to observe, warnings to note, and lights to follow, or we shall go wrong.

A country lad, who was leaving his Sunday school and home to go up to London to take a situation there, was accompanied to his starting-place by a Christian friend, who kindly said to him, 'Now, my boy, recollect you are going to launch your craft on a dangerous ocean'. 'Yes, I know it,' said the boy; and taking a Bible out of his pocket and holding it up, he added, 'But you see I have got a safe chart to steer by.'

V. Little Ships may be Lost.—Ships of all kinds may be lost through leakage, fire or collision, rocks or storms, and sink with all hands on board; and oh, how sad the loss. The vessel, the treasure, the lives all gone, to be recovered no more in this world; and if the owners are not insured it means bankruptcy and ruin. And how true this is with regard to our lives, both old and young. Sin may overcome us; Satan may overturn us; the world may overwhelm us, and our own evil hearts deceive us, and we may be lost. As with the ship, so with ourselves. Ignorance, carelessness, or neglect may lose us everything, and what a loss! The soul lost; life lost; salvation lost, and heaven lost. Oh, how sad the thought of being lost!

One dark wild night in the month of October, 1863, two men and a boy were clinging to the rigging of a stranded vessel off the city of Toronto. They had lashed themselves to the vessel to keep from being washed overboard by the heavy swells that every moment broke entirely over them. Amid the darkness of the night and the fury of the tempest Death came riding on the billows and took the spirit of one from its tenement of clay. He was the captain's son, a boy of fourteen years. Just before he died he said to his father, 'Father, are you afraid to die? I am not, and oh, I know I shall die, I am so cold.' Then his spirit passed away to be with Christ.

Are you ready if death should come to you? If not, let the Captain, the Lord Jesus, come on board your soul, and then He shall save and guide you.—C. EDWARDS, Tin Tacks for Tiny Folks, p. 60.

FEARFULNESS

'Why are ye so fearful?'—MARK IV. 40.

I. SINFUL fear is always unreasonable. It does not know what it is afraid of. Is there a storm? It fears the storm. Do the waves fall? It fears the power that stilled them. Is to-day provided for? It fears for to-morrow. Is to-morrow secure? It fears for next year. And is next year assured? It fears for old age. And this is fearfulness. When we become so full of fear that there is room in us for nothing else. No room for love! No room for hope! No room for kindness and doing good! Only room for the blind selfish spirit of fret and fear. Godly fear humbles. Sinful fear benumbs. Godly fear thinks of another. Sinful fear only of itself. Godly fear leads to goodly living. Sinful fear to trickery, meanness, and deceit. Which fear is yours to-day? Is it the latter? Master, awake! carest Thou not that we perish? Why are ye so fearful, O ye of little faith?

I take it that this sinful fear is far commoner than we commonly imagine. Unless it were very common, 'twould be hard to see why we should admire courage so heartily. Let but a lad show a brave heart, and we are all drawn to him. Let but a man cross Africa, or make for the North Pole, or fight the flames, or do gallant things in the battle, and we shall forgive him almost anything. So hearty is our admiration for courage. Now if you have lived with open eyes you must have noticed by this time that it is not the way of human nature to admire what is common. We set a low price on what we all possess. We value the diamond which is rare, and not the dewdrop which is everywhere. We prize the lily which is scarce, not the abundant daisy. What is rare we value, and what is common we despise. So by the value set on courage, learn its rarity. The very applause we give it shows that it is uncommon. If every one had it no one would think twice of it. So take this comfort. Don't think yourself a timid lad in a great world of heroes. That will discourage and dispirit you. And the facts are not so. In every heart there is some strain of fear. And these alone become truly brave and truly moral men, who, knowing that, set out on life determined to master it, and to be strong in spite of it. And that is always possible when we set out in life with Jesus. For in His fulness of grace (and grace is always brave) there is enough for you and me.

II. Now whence does this fearfulness spring? What is its origin? To learn that, as to learn all like things, I turn to the Bible. Can we catch fear as it comes skulking on the stage of human life? Let us go to the first chapter of the first book and see. In the beginning was a great deep, and on the face of the deep, darkness. Darkness, deeps, chaos, and yet in angel or in seraphim we do not read of any fear. The earth is formed, the waters gather in their beds, the sun looks forth to gild them. The moving creatures come. The air is startled by the sound of wings. The cattle browse over the unfenced meadows. And yet there is no fear. And then comes man, fearless in presence of sun and moon and cloud, of precipice and mountain, of behemoth and great leviathan, until—until he ate the fruit, and sinned, and fell, and hid himself. And then God called unto him, and said, Adam, where art thou? And he said, I heard Thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid. So fear comes sneaking on to the stage of life, not with the sun and moon, and with the mighty beasts, but with sin. I heard Thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid.

III. Well now, what of the conquest of this fearfulness? How are we to get rid of this that galls us so? I take some facts from the outward world, and put it to you in these ways.

Fear is conquered by companionship. That which we fear when alone, we laugh at when in company. To have the conquest of our fears we want a comrade in the house, a comrade in the way, a comrade in the battle. Keep that in mind, and take this text.

Fear is conquered by knowledge. As our experience grows, our fears grow less. When we know all, fearfulness will be gone. A little child begins by fearing almost everything, just because it begins by knowing almost nothing. Every worm may be a snake; every dog may be a wolf; every man may be a robber; in every dark corner may be a ghost. And so worm, dog, man, corner—all are fearful. But as life lengthens, it learns better. It enters so many dark corners and finds no ghosts there that it loses faith in them. The more it learns the less it fears. Until when it has learned about as much as any of us learn, it fears about as much as any of us fear. So knowledge conquers fear.

Fear is conquered by health. The sick man's mind is full of fears. Shadows begin to dance before the eyes in sickness. Let but a man be strong and healthy, and he can face wellnigh anything. It is in hours of weakness or prostration that the fears creep out. And there is no conquest for these fears but just to get the health again. Now holiness is just spiritual healthiness. Until the life be holy it is sick. And till the life be holy 'twill always be surrounded by these fears of ill-health. To be free from fears then, there must be spiritual health. And as the life grows holier, so will the fears grow less. And yet again.

Fear is conquered by faith. Faith is the great enemy of fear. Much fear and little faith; much faith and little fear. Faithless and fearful—these twain go together. As faith brightens, fear sets. As fear rises, faith sinks. 'Tis thus in all our life. You go to bed in faith that the sun will rise. No man can give you any assurance of to-morrow's sunrise.

Comradeship, knowledge, health, faith, these things you need for a brave and noble life. And all these things we offer you in Jesus Christ the Saviour. You need faith? That is the Master's gift. You need spiritual health? Christ is made unto us sanctification. You need knowledge? He is the Teacher. And you need comradeship? He is the Friend that sticketh closer than a brother, and He has said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee.—G. H. MORRISON, The Oldest Trade in the World, p. 88.

ANSWERS TO PRAYERS

'And all the devils besought Him, saying, Send us into the swine. And they began to pray Him to depart out of their coasts. He . . . prayed Him that he might be with Him.'—MARK v. 12, 17, 18.

HERE are three prayers, one of them good and two of them bad. Maybe they will teach us something. The disciples were good men who wished to be better, so they came to Jesus and asked, 'Lord, teach us to pray'. They had to learn how to pray aright, and had to learn from the best of all teachers—from Jesus Himself. So should we: there are things we need to be wise about if we would pray properly, and these three prayers may help us to this.

Here is what brought the three prayers together. Jesus had just crossed the stormy lake to save one soul. Yes, He went all that way, and took all that trouble to save just one. How precious every soul must be to Him when He counts nothing a labour if it can only be saved! This was a poor man who was like a madman, he was so wild and wicked; all manner of evil spirits had taken possession of his heart. Ah! there are people still who have unclean, very unclean spirits dwelling in them; all their thoughts are filthy, and all their doings are vile. Everybody turned away in fear from this man, but it was just because he was so bad that Jesus sought for him now. It is always His way; as doctors go where the sick are to make them better, Jesus goes where the sinful are to save them if they will let Him.

The devils that were in this poor man trembled when they saw Jesus. They knew Him; they had seen Him in heaven before He came to earth, and now they were afraid of Him—afraid that He would cast them out from their dwelling in this man's heart, and would leave them homeless to shudder and drift in the winds. So they prayed; yes, the devils prayed!—but what a prayer! It was that they might be allowed to go into some swine that were near, and wallow with them. Their prayer was granted!—and they and the swine both soon came to a bad end. It was a prayer they should never have made.

The people who owned the swine were greatly troubled at their loss. But they were in an awkward fix; if they summoned Jesus before the magistrate to make Him pay for the loss of the swine, they would be punished themselves, for they were Jews, and it was against the law for them to keep swine. They had been breaking the law all along, so they could not now ask the help of the law. But they were determined to stick to their sin and their swine, so—what do you think?—they also prayed! Yes, but what a prayer!—it was to ask Jesus to go away from them and never come back! They would rather have their sin than their Saviour! And their prayer also was answered; Jesus went away and never returned. Could you bear that thought?—that Jesus had gone away from you, and taken His Holy Spirit with Him, and had abandoned you to your sins? Then take care how you want Him to keep out of the way that you may get doing the thing that is wrong. The worst thing we can do is to pray Jesus to leave us, because we prefer our sins, and the worst thing that can happen to us is to have that prayer answered.

But the third prayer is perhaps the strangest of all. It was the prayer of the man from whom the evil spirits had been cast out; he was now healed and in his right mind, and his heart was full of gratitude and love to Jesus. His prayer was a very beautiful and loving one: it was that he might go with Jesus and be with Him wherever He went. But that prayer was refused! He was told to stay where he was; he would do most good there, by telling others what Jesus had done for him. Two bad prayers were answered, while a good one was denied.

When we are bent on a thing and are determined to have it or to do it, it is not true prayer we are saying then, whatever words we may use, for true prayer always says to Jesus, 'Grant this, please, if it is good for me, and good for others, and if it is what will please Thee; if not, then please do not answer it: Thou knowest best'. This is true prayer, and the kindest, most merciful thing Jesus can sometimes do is not to let us have what we want.

It was for judgment He answered the two bad prayers, but it was in love He denied the prayer that was good. This man was saved, and if he remained where he was, and did what Jesus told him, you may be very sure it was that somebody else would be saved by him. Jesus needed him to be a missionary at home instead of abroad, and so did not answer his prayer to go with Him, but left him where he was—and left him in love. By and by they would meet again in the glory, and there, maybe, there would also be those who were saved by this man.

Learn the lesson, then; don't be disappointed when your prayers are not answered as you would wish. Just think—it is the best prayer that is sometimes denied, and denied in tenderest love; and they are the worst prayers that are sometimes answered, but are answered in judgment and anger. Then leave it all with Jesus; tell Him what you would like to be or to do, but leave it with Him to decide what shall be best.—J. REID HOWATT, The Children's Preacher, p. 123.

NIHIL TETIGIT QUOD NON ORNAVIT

'He hath done all things well.'—MARK VII. 37.

A FEW yards back from the ceaseless traffic of the London Strand, in the quiet precincts of the Temple Church, there lies buried the body of Oliver Goldsmith. His monument is in Westminster Abbey. And on his monument are these words, bad Latin but goodly praise, 'Nihil tetigit quod non ornavit'. They mean, 'He touched nothing which he did not adorn'.

I wish these words to be our motto to-night. I wish to carry you back eighteen hundred years to the man Jesus. I want to bring you out of your homes and out of your town into the roads and villages of Galilee. I would have you mingle with the throngs of folk just at the time when there was moving among them that wonderful personality, Jesus of Nazareth.

And I desire to do this in order that we may understand a little better than we usually do, how everything that Jesus touched was by that touch adorned. All of us influence what we touch. As the light radiates from the sun, so influence for good or ill ceaselessly streams from you and me. Most of us think far too much of our abilities. Few of us think half enough of our influence. Few men are half so clever as they fancy. Most men are far more influential than they deem. And to-night I wish to speak for a little about the influence of Jesus of Nazareth.

When you and I begin to open our eyes upon this world, three mysteries arrest us. The first is language, the garment of our thought. The second is nature, the garment of our God. The third is character. These three mysterious agencies and ends impress us, and are in turn by us impressed. These three were touched by Jesus. I wish to show how, touching, He adorned them.

I. Language.—You can tell a lad by his language just as you can tell him by his friends. I never found a prurient mouth joined with a pure heart. I never heard of a foul tongue keeping company with a fine soul. There is no chemical test for an acid so sure as the tongue-test for the acids of the heart. If thou wouldst play the hypocrite, do it in silence. Thy speech betrayeth thee. The dullest ear detects the ring of it far sooner than thou thinkest.

Now there is no better sign of lad or girl or man, than just the power to take our homely words, and fill them with new and nobler meaning. I suppose every family circle has its own idioms and tricks of speech. That is all natural and harmless. But there are homes where every second word has got some mean or foolish or corrupted association. That is not wise nor right. It is debasing a sacred thing, and some day the habit will recoil upon the speaker. But to respect, exalt, ennoble homely words, that is good work for a man, and good work for a language too.

Be jealous of your words. Put noble meanings into them. Let love, and life, and work, and play, and home, and school be royal words for you. To deal with common speech like that is to follow in the steps of Jesus.

II. Now let me turn to Nature. The world of mountains and of hills, of rivers and of plains, of trees and flowers, lay around Jesus as it lies round you and me to-day. Our Lord touched that too, and in touching He adorned it.

There was the water, for example. Nothing so common as water in all nature. And in some little measure we have learned to use it. We make it work our wheels. We turn it into steam and make it carry us. And so with the thought and labour of nineteen hundred years we have uplifted it a little. We have impressed it into the ministries of man. But Jesus—He was ahead of us all nineteen hundred years ago. He found it at the marriage-feast, and when He left it, it was wine. And He found wine on His last supper-table, and when He touched that it was stamped for ever as the sign and seal of His own blood. Water to wine, wine to blood, see how He lifts upward what He touches. Such common things are glorified when brought within the sweep of Jesus.

But still more wonderful is Jesus' treatment of the mustard-seed. It is the smallest of the seeds, and you could put, I fancy, ten thousand of them on an inch. Tell me, what do you see there? A speck, a grain, one of a thousand particles, that is all. Apply your strongest glass to it. And now you see its linings and its fissures. Now take your eye away, and let Christ put His eye there. What seest Thou, O Jesus? I see the kingdom of God in it, blind child! For the kingdom of heaven is like unto a grain of mustard-seed. Yes! burst thine integuments, thou little seed, and grow till thou art big as the whole world! For Peter is off to Babylon, and Paul to Rome, and Augustine to England, and Livingstone to Africa, and nations are overthrown, and Christ is conquering! And it is all in the mustard-seed. Always in the mustard-seed. Only it needed the eye of Jesus to see it there. Were ever flowers and seeds so glorified before or after? Was ever nature so wonderfully interpreted as that? Did you ever hear of one who pressed the common things into such royal service, or set such a crown on them as that?

III. Lastly, let us think of the influence of Jesus upon Character.—We judge a soil by its crops. We judge a tree by its effects. We judge a force, a person, a gospel by its fruits. How did the touch of Jesus affect the men and women whom He met?

I take two instances, a man and a woman. Across the Lake of Galilee there is a hill-side, and cut in the limestone rock of the hill-side there are tombs. And in the tombs, dwelling and howling, a man possessed by devils. He is the terror of the neighbourhood. The fishermen at their nets shudder as his cries come sounding over the water. The mother in the village draws her little one closer to her breast at night, as the fierce blasphemies of the man come borne on the wind over the cottage-roofs. No man could bind him. He snapped the chains like flax. Every man shunned him. Till Jesus appears and faces him, and meets him. And the fishermen will wonder to-night why there is no howling and moaning across the water. The mother will sing to her little one, 'The wild man is asleep'. But he never was wider awake. He never was a man till now. Clothed, sane, worshipping—that was what meeting Jesus meant for him.

What splendid possibilities for character does the Gospel of such a Saviour give! There is hope for us all when we have to do with One who could find a sensible man in a demoniac, and see a worshipping woman in a harlot. Bad as we are, there are some chances for us when we have to deal with a Lord whose eye and whose power are like that. All philosophies are blind compared with the piercing glance of Jesus. And half His grief in heaven is just that He sees what you might grow to and might become if you would but trust Him fully. And that you have never done.—G. H. MORRISON, The Oldest Trade in the World, p. 149.

HAVING SALT

'Have salt in yourselves.'—MARK IX. 50.

SALT comes from the ocean, the salt lakes, the subterranean brines, and from the rocks.

Salt is found in many parts of the earth. In our own country the most extensive deposits are to be found in the State of New York, in Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, Virginia, Michigan, Illinois, Kansas, Louisiana, and Texas. Large quantities of salt are taken from the waters of Great Salt Lake in Utah, and from San Francisco Bay in California. Over 20,000,000 barrels of salt were produced last year, the value of which was over $6,000,000.

In Europe the largest quantities of salt are found in the Cheshire district of England; at Stassfurt, Brunswick, and Hanover, all in Germany; also at Wieliczka, Bochnia, and Hallstadt in Austria; Maramaros, Hungary; the Crimea and the Donetz Basin in Russia; and at Cardona, Spain. France and Italy produce great quantities of salt from the waters of the sea.

In a single year the entire output for the world is about 12,000,000 tons.

Among the Jews salt was the symbol of hospitality; as an antiseptic it was regarded as a symbol of durability, fidelity, and purity. This gave rise to the expression, 'covenant of salt,' and at the present time the eating of salt and bread together is regarded as a token of amity. The Persians use a term expressive of a traitor which literally means 'faithless to salt'. This idea of covenant-making with salt was, probably, the foundation for the use of salt in sacrifices, which ratified the mutual understandings between God and His people. It was, therefore, one of the articles bought and sold in the Temple. Even Greek and Roman peoples used salt in their religious ceremonies. In the days of Augustine, salt was used in the ceremony of baptism as a symbol of purity.

Our Lord used the symbolic meanings attached to salt to their fullest extent. His chief lesson was upon the value of influence, and He told His disciples that they were like the salt of the earth, the savour of which must be kept fresh, as their influence must be kept, in order to be of value. The Apostle Paul used salt as a figure of wisdom when he said to the Colossians, 'Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt, that ye may know how ye ought to answer every man'.

So by your influence, you may, like salt, preserve the world from evil, as Noah did in the times before the flood when the world was so bad, and later like Abraham, and still later like the prophets and the martyrs.

See what one little boy was able to do by shedding the influence of a bright and cheerful disposition. One morning, after a three days' rain, everybody in the house felt cross. The fire smoked, the breakfast-room was cheerless, and the baby was fretful. Presently Jack came in. He had with him the morning paper which he handed to his father with a cheerful 'Here's the paper, sir'. Then he went and kissed his mother, who was very tired from having been with the baby all through the night. Then he had a bright word for his sister, who smiled back at him, and when the cook came in with a frown on her face he said something to her that made her laugh. Then he poked up the fire, and after doing a number of little, bright things of that sort, he had us all smiling and joking each other, having forgotten all about the weather and the dark days of rain we had experienced, and in fact Jack had completely changed the atmosphere of things for the rest of the day. 'He is always so,' said his mother later, 'always just so sunny.'

Certainly it is a great distinction that Christ confers upon His disciples, by calling them the 'salt of the earth'. We should be very proud of our influence for Him, and do all we can to extend it.—GEORGE V. REICHEL, Bible Truth through Eye and Ear, p. 363.

BAPTISM

MARK X. 14.

TO-DAY I wish to say a word to you about yourselves.

It is a word which I have had on my heart for a long while to say.

Have you ever thought, when you have seen a baby baptised, that you too have been baptised?

And if you have thought of it, have you wished to know what your being baptised means for you?

1. It means that when your father and mother received you at your birth, they felt that you had been sent to them from God, and they promised you back to God: the baptising was the promise of your parents to God: We will bring up this child for Thee.

2. It means: baptised into the name of God, naming you unto God; you belong to God; you are children of God.

3. It means that the Church here received you into its membership.

You are members of the Christian Church; you are members very dear to God. He likes to see you here. He likes to hear your voice in the song of praise. He likes to feel your heart going out to Him in the prayers.

4. Your being baptised is a thing outside of you as yet. It does not save you. It is Christ Who saves you. But Christ says: You have My name: be My child; worship in spirit and in truth now. Think of it, and ask whether it means anything to you.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 5.

THE SAVIOUR'S INVITATION TO LITTLE CHILDREN

'Suffer the little children to come unto me.'—MARK X. 14.

PARENTS, as a general thing, are devoted to their children.

The poet Lamartine, in alluding to his father and mother, says, 'I remember once to have seen the branch of a willow, which had been torn by the tempest's hands from the parent trunk, floating in the morning light upon the angry surges of the overflowing Saone. On it a female nightingale covered her nest, as it drifted down the foaming stream; and the male on the wing followed the wreck which was bearing away the object of his love.'

Beautiful illustration, indeed, of the tender affection of parents for their children. Much, however, as father and mother love their offspring, there is One whose feelings towards them are infinitely stronger and more enduring. I hardly need explain that I refer to our adorable Saviour.

Some of you must have seen the beautiful picture of Christ blessing little children. A crowd of people had gathered about Him, listening with rapt attention to His gracious words. In the outer circle several mothers, with children in their arms, are trying to work their way through the throng that they may ask the Saviour to bless their little ones. Even His disciples imagine that He will not wish to be interrupted, and tell the women that they had better remain quietly where they are. Jesus sees it all, and is much displeased at this attempt to keep them back. He waved His hand to the crowd that they should open the way for the mothers to draw near, and said, in His gentlest accents, 'Suffer the little children to come unto me!'

One of the most pleasing characteristics of our Saviour's ministry was his genial, gracious manner towards little ones; and when we see them gathering about His knees we discover how strong must have been the power of sympathy which united them together.

The Lord Jesus is the same now that He was when He dwelt in Judæa so many ages ago. He is still saying, 'Suffer the little children to come unto me!'

The beautiful portion of the Gospel history connected with the text is read at the baptism of children; and when we hear it, the interest which He feels in them cannot be doubted.

'O mother,' said a little girl on returning from church, and running into her mother's sick-room, 'I have heard the child's Gospel to-day!' It was the very part which I am now preaching about.

Another, about seven years old, heard the same passage read when she was near death, and as her sister closed the book the little sick one said, 'How kind! I shall soon go to Jesus. He will take me up in His arms, and bless me, too!'

The sister tenderly kissed her, and asked, 'Do you love me, dearest?'

'Yes,' she answered, 'but, don't be angry, I love Jesus more!'

Why does the Saviour show such tender affection for children? I shall give you several reasons for it.

I. The Lord Jesus loves little children Because They have a confiding Trust in God.—It has been left for grown men and women to be guilty of unbelief.

A child was asked what faith was and promptly replied, 'It is doing God's will, and asking no questions'.

Could any definition have been better?

During a recent hard winter a poor widow, with several helpless children, was almost reduced to her last crust of bread, when one of her little boys, who saw her distress and anxiety, said to her, 'Please don't cry mother; I will write a letter to the Lord Jesus to help us'.

The woman was too much occupied with her troubles to notice his singular remark, and so taking her silence for approval of his purpose, he sat down and scrawled on a bit of paper, torn from an old writing-book, these words: 'My dear Saviour: my poor mother and my little brothers and sisters have had no breakfast nor dinner to-day; please send us something to eat'. He then signed his name, with the street and number, and running to the post-office dropped the letter into the box. When the letters were assorted the clerk's attention was attracted by one directed in a child's hand, 'To the Lord Jesus Christ'. In his perplexity he showed it to the post-master, and he in turn handed it to a good Christian man who came into the office for his mail.

'I will take care of it!' said the gentleman. And so he did. He went directly to the place designated in the boy's note, and I need hardly tell you how much pleasure it gave him to help the poor family for the Saviour's sake.

II. Another reason why the Saviour is so much attached to children is Because They have a Holy Fear of God.—A wicked man, who was in the habit of going to a neighbour's field to steal corn, one day took his little son to help him carry the bag. Handing the bag to the child the father climbed up on the fence to take a good look about him, to see whether anyone was coming that way. Satisfied that all was safe he began to pluck the ears of corn and put them in the bag, which the boy held open for him. 'Father,' said the child looking up at the hardened man as he spoke, 'you forgot to look somewhere else.' The father was terrified, and asked, 'Which way, child?' 'You forgot to look up to the sky to see if God noticed you!' The reproof was too well deserved not to be received with patience, and father and son went home with an empty bag.

III. The Lord Jesus loves little children Because They have no False Shame.—Many grown people who are mindful of their prayers and other religious duties when they are by themselves, would hesitate a long while before they attended to these things if the eyes of their fellow-mortals should observe them.

Hundreds of passengers were preparing to retire to rest on board one of the fine steamers on the Hudson, but no looker-on would have suspected any of them with being religious so far as any outward recognition of God was concerned. In the midst of all this forgetfulness of Him there was one person on board who was not ashamed to acknowledge his dependence on his Heavenly Father's care. It was a little boy, who, all unconscious that he was doing any unusual thing, knelt down and prayed as he was accustomed to do at home.

IV. A fourth reason why the Saviour loves little children is Because They have the Spirit of Humility.

V. The Lord Jesus is also tenderly devoted to little children Because They have the Spirit of Love.—The punishment inflicted but a moment before for some childish offence is forgotten, and the arms of affection are ready to embrace the father or mother whose painful duty it has been to administer it. Indeed, it would often seem that love became stronger after each such reconciliation.

The love of children for their Father in heaven is a real thing. Is it any wonder, then, that He loves them so devotedly in return?

Children's prayers He deigns to hear;
Children's songs delight His ear.

Human wisdom says to a child, 'Be a man!' Divine wisdom reverses the process, saying to the man who would secure God's favour, 'Be a child!'—JOHN N. NORTON, Milk and Honey, p. 190.

THE GREAT COMMANDMENT

'And one of the scribes came, and having heard them reasoning together, and perceiving that He had answered them well, asked Him, Which is the first commandment of all? And Jesus answered him, The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel; The Lord our God is one Lord: And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength: this is the first commandment.'—MARK XII. 28-30.

Ours is almost, if not quite, the only religion which teaches us to love God? The heathen do not love their gods. They are afraid of them; they are such horrid, ugly things; they are so fierce; they fear them.

It was thought that the Esquimaux had no word for 'love' in their language. At last they found one nearly two lines long. It makes two lines in a book—you could hardly say it. But ours is very short. If I were an Esquimaux, and I had to say 'love,' I should have to write a word of two lines, made up of all sorts of words. It is a great privilege that we can love God.

I have heard it said of a man, 'That man is a grave!' because something in him lay dead and buried. What do you think it was? Love. Love was dead and buried in him, so the man was a grave! 'Love' is our great law. We are attracted to God. Love is the law of attraction; the best law.

I. 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God.' You won't love Him, you will never love the Lord, till you can call Him yours. 'Thy God.' 'My God.' 'He is my God.'

If a little girl likes her doll, she says, 'My doll.' If a boy likes his hoop, or bat, he says, 'My hoop; my bat.' We say, 'My father; my mother; my brother; my sister; my little wife; my husband.' 'My' is such a nice word. Till you can say 'thy' or 'my' you will not love God. But when you can say, 'My God!' then you will begin to love Him. 'The Lord thy God.'

When one of the Roman emperors—after a great triumph, a military victory—was coming back to Rome, he went up the Appian hill in great state, with his foes dragged at his chariot wheels. Many soldiers surrounded him, adding to his triumphant entry. On going up the hill a little child broke through the crowd. 'You must not go there,' said the soldiers, 'that is the emperor.' The little child replied, 'True, he is your emperor, but he is my father!' It was the emperor's own little boy. He said, 'He is your emperor, but he is my father.' I hope we shall be able to say that of God. He is the God of everybody; but He is my God specially. He is not only the Creator of the world, but He is my God!

I dare say you have read—I have seen it many times—an account of a little boy tossed about in a boat which his father was steering. There came on a great storm. The sailors said to him, 'Aren't you afraid? See how high the waves are! hark! how the wind roars! Aren't you afraid?' 'I am not afraid,' was his reply, 'My father is at the helm.' He could say, 'My father!'

The world's emperor is 'My God'. In all the difficulties of life, He is 'My Father'; and He is at the helm to guide me. 'He is the Lord my God.'

'Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God.'

II. Do you know how it is that we love God? What is the way to do it? I will tell you. Love comes from God on me; then it shines back again on Him. I must put myself where God can shine upon me; then His love shining upon me will make a reflection go back again to Him. There is no love to God without that. It is all God's love reflected back to Him.

Have not you sometimes seen the sun setting in the evening, and it has been shining so brightly on a house that you have thought, 'Really that house is on fire!' It was only the light of the sun shining back again the reflection. So if the love of God shines on your heart, then it will shine back in love to Him.

Did you ever go near a great high rock where there was an echo? You said a word, back it comes to you; you said, 'Come! come!' It said, 'Come! come!' It was an echo. It was your voice coming back to you. It is God's love that comes back to you when you love Him. It is not your love. You have no right to it. It is God's love shining upon you makes your love go back to Him. God's love touching you goes back to Him. That is the way. I hope you will so love God.

In one of the wars in which the Emperor Napoleon was engaged, we read that one of his old soldiers, a veteran, sustained a very bad wound, and the surgeon came to dress it and probe it. He was feeling it with his probe when the man said to the surgeon, 'Sir, go deep enough; if you go quite deep, you will find it at the bottom of my wound "emperor!"' It was all for the love of the emperor. 'You will find the word "emperor" at the bottom of my wound.' I wish I could think, in all our wounds, on everything we do, we could find quite at the bottom of it, 'I have got this wound for love of the Emperor. The love of my Emperor has given me this wound.' O that we might find at the bottom of everything, 'God!' 'God!'

I will tell you another thing. Many years ago there lived a schoolmaster in the Netherlands. It was at the time that a very wicked persecution was going on against the Protestants, when they had 'The Inquisition'. It was a very cruel thing. The inquisitors, as they were called, put this poor man to the torture of the rack. They pulled his limbs almost asunder. This rack was a horrible instrument! have you ever seen one? You may see them in some museums. These inquisitors put men on the rack, and then pulled their joints out, thus putting them to horrible pain! When on the rack the inquisitor said to this poor schoolmaster, 'Do you love your wife and children? Won't you, for the sake of your wife and children, give up this religion of yours? Won't you give it up?' The poor old schoolmaster said, 'If this earth were all gold, if all the stars were pearls, and if that golden globe and those pearly stars were all mine, I would give them all up to have my wife and children with me. I would rather stay in this prison, and live on bread and water with my wife and children than live like a king without them. But I will not for the sake of pearls, or gold, or wife, or children, give up my religion, for I love my God more than wife or child, or gold or pearls.' But the inquisitors' hearts did not soften a bit; they went on inflicting more tortures till the man died on the rack. He loved God with 'all his mind, and soul, and heart, and strength'. Do you think we could go to the death for Him? If we love Him, we shall every day do something for Him. What have you done this day to show your love to God?

III. I should like to point you to a few ways by which we may show our love to God.

Supposing you had got a very dear friend—some one whom you loved very much—should you like to be quite alone with that friend, and tell him your secrets, and for him to tell you his secrets? Did you ever do that? If you have a friend, I am sure you would like to be quite alone with him and talk secrets. That is just what you will do with God if you love Him—you will like to be quite alone with Him; you will tell Him your secrets, and God will tell you His secrets. He has promised this, 'The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him'. He will tell you things He does not tell to everybody. He will tell you things you have not heard before. He will whisper them into your heart. And you won't have a secret that you do not tell Him. If you have a naughty secret that you would not tell to anybody—you would not tell even me—go and tell it to God. If you love Him, you will be sure to do so.

I will tell you another thing. Do you know any body you love very much? if they go away from you, don't you like to have a letter from them? and when a letter does come, don't you read it from beginning to end without one wandering thought? I don't think you can say your lessons without a wandering thought; but if you had a letter from a dear friend, I think you would give it all your best attention—from the first word to the last. Well, is there a letter from God? Yes, Here it is—the Bible! It is a letter from God Himself. If you love God you will love His letter, and you will read it very lovingly and attentively, and give your whole mind to it.

I will tell you another thing. If you have a friend you love very much, don't you keep their birthday? You know when their birthday is; you will do something for them on their birthday. Now God has not a birthday, because he never was born. He is 'from everlasting'. But He has got 'a day'. Your birthday is 'your day,' isn't it? You expect to get some presents on that day. We call Sunday 'the Lord's day'. If we love Him very much, we shall love His day; and you will keep the Sunday, love the Sunday, because it is God's Day.

I will tell you something else. If you have got a friend you love very much you will like anybody who is like your friend. You will say sometimes, 'I quite like that person, she is so like my mother; he is so like my friend'. You will love other Christian people, because you can say of them, 'They are so like my Jesus, so like my God. I will love them therefore.' So you will like poor people. I will tell you why. I will tell you a little story, I do not know whether you ever heard of it.

There was a gentleman who always used to say grace before dinner, and he used to say:—

Be present at our table, Lord
Be here, and every where adored:

and his little child, his little boy, said, 'Papa, you always ask Jesus Christ to come and be present at our table, but He never comes. You ask Him every day, but He never does come.' His father said, 'Well, wait and see'. While at dinner that very day, there was a little knock at the door, given by a very poor man indeed, and he said, 'I am starving; I am very poor and miserable. I think God loves me, and I love God, but I am very miserable; I am hungry, wretched, and cold.' The gentleman said, 'Come in; come and sit down, and have a bit of our dinner'. The little boy said, 'You may have all my helping'. So he gave him all his helping; and a very nice dinner the poor man had. The father—after dinner—said, 'Didn't Jesus come? You said He never came. There was that poor man, and Christ said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, My brethren, ye have done it unto Me!" Christ sends his representatives! What you have done to that poor man, it is the same as if you had done it unto God.'

Then I am sure if you love people very much you will love to work for them, and you will not mind how hard because you love them. If you love God, you will love to do something for God. Like Jacob felt about Rachel: 'he served seven years for Rachel, and they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her'. It seemed a mere nothing, the time passed so quickly! He did not find it at all hard, because he loved her so much. Love makes everything easy.

I will tell you one more thing. If you love a person very much and he has gone away from you, you will love to think he is coming back again. You know there was a little boy whose bedroom window looked towards the east, and every day of his life, as soon as the little boy awoke, he leaped out of bed and looked out of his window to see if Jesus was come. He was so longing for Jesus to come, because he loved Him so much. You will long for Him to come if you love Him.—JAMES VAUGHAN.

PURITY

'And what I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch.'—MARK XIII. 37.

I WILL tell you a story, and it shall be a true one.

About a hundred years ago, when the English and French were fighting in North America, both of them wickedly used to have the savage Indian tribes to help themselves in the war. The English army was encamped on a certain plain; it was autumn, and the nights were long. The sentinels were set all round the camp, with their watch-fires as usual, to give alarm in case of any attack. One morning the sentinel at a particular post was found dead and cold, stabbed with an Indian knife in the back. It was thought he must have fallen asleep, and his comrades said that he was justly punished, for, as you know, it is death for a soldier to sleep at his post. And very justly too; because the carelessness of one sentinel may destroy a whole army. But the next morning the sentinel was again found dead at that same post, and in that same manner—stabbed in the back. It seemed impossible that two soldiers should have slept on two following nights, especially when the second one had such a fearful warning before him. And it seemed quite as impossible that an English soldier, with his loaded musket and fixed bayonet, could have been attacked and killed, if awake, by an Indian. The whole thing made, as you may imagine, a great noise in the camp. The third night one of the steadiest men in the regiment was told off as sentinel in that place, and went to his duty determined to find out the mystery. Well, what was the surprise in the camp when, next morning, he also was found stabbed in the same way. The general in command said that he could not afford to have his men sacrificed thus, and therefore that the following night, which was the fourth, two soldiers should be together in the watch. But a young officer went to him and begged to be allowed to take it himself; he said it was a disgrace that two Englishmen should be needed to fight an Indian. The general at last very unwillingly gave his consent, and the officer took his place. You may imagine how carefully he looked to the spring of his musket, and to the fixing his bayonet; and how, as his watch went on, he took care to keep plenty of wood burning on his fire. Well, in the dearest time of the night, between two and three o'clock, he noticed, about twenty yards off, a large black hog rooting up the ground this way and that after the manner of those beasts. But hogs were very common in that country, so he thought little about the matter, and quietly continued walking up and down his beat. Presently he noticed the animal again, this time about ten yards from him, very busy in feeding. Still he went on walking up and down for a few minutes more, and behold there was the creature again, this time not more than five yards from him. And moreover he observed that whatever way he turned his back in walking, the thing, though still roofing up the ground diligently, moved a little closer in that direction. 'I don't quite like the looks of that beast,' he said to himself; and so he levelled his musket and fired. And an Indian sprang with a wild yell, and fell dead on the spot. It seems that he had disguised himself in a hog-skin, and as all Indians have such wonderful power of imitating animals, he contrived to get close up to the poor sentinels without their suspecting anything, and then, when their back was turned, to leap on and stab them. 'What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch.'

I think that the hearts of every one of us are like a camp round which guards and sentinels must be set. Just as a camp contains many soldiers who are bound to serve their king, so our hearts have a great many different powers (have they not?) by all of which we ought to serve God. And I am sure we have enemies enough who seek to destroy us, and against each of these we have to set a sentinel, as it were, to keep watch.

The great danger came to those sentinels because they were not quite on their watch. Had they seen a man, then they would have been ready; but only to see a beast, and that beast seemingly feeding, what danger from that?

Now think of this. Remember that great and good king, the man after God's own heart, David. On one miserable, miserable afternoon, he who had said, 'Turn away mine eyes lest they behold vanity'—let them rest for half a minute on what they should not have seen. And what followed? That is now nearly three thousand years ago! Three thousand years! What kings and kingdoms have passed away and been forgotten? What battles have been fought that are now scarcely known by name! How many most holy and loving deeds have been done which will never be known till the end of all things! How many martyrs have been burnt, have been eaten by wild beasts, have been torn on the rack, whose names are forgotten! But not this sin. Here, up to this very day, in the writings of those unhappy men who say in their hearts, 'There is no God,' David's sin is always dwelt on. This is the man after God's own heart! This is he whose Psalms you so dearly love! Might not the prophet Nathan, speaking from God, well say, 'Howbeit, because by this deed thou hast given great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme!' And how little could David have told what that blasphemy would be!

I have spoken of our watch that we have to keep; of our sentinel that we have to set. Well; if one thing when we come to work it out, when we try to look thoroughly into it, seems so hard, what great need have we to take care of looking, as David says, to all our steps—of every hour, and every minute of our lives, trusting to God's help, and not to our own,—of remembering the last commandment of our dear Lord to the multitude while He was on earth, 'What I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons for Children, p. 70.

WATCH-GATE

'And what I say unto you, I say unto all, Watch.'—MARK XIII. 37.

I AM sure Jesus had a right to say what He did; see how He watched! You know He stayed awake all night; He prayed all night; I think I might say He cried all night. He had a right (hadn't He?) to say to us, 'Watch!' 'Watch!' He says, 'What I say unto you I say unto all'—to every boy and girl in this church—unto all, Watch!' He says it to me. Do you know what I am? Do you know what God calls me? 'A watchman.' He says to all His ministers, 'Son of man, I have made thee a watchman'. The angels 'watched'. Daniel saw them. He says, 'A watcher and an holy one came down from heaven'. And the angels are standing around us, 'watching' us now. Satan 'watches' us. Do you remember how he 'watched' Job? Satan 'watches'. God 'watches'. The angels 'watch'. There is such a beautiful verse in Daniel ix. 14, 'The Lord hath watched upon the evil'. There came trouble, and God 'watched' the trouble. How kindly He 'watched' it. And in his Epistle to the youngest person to whom a book in the Bible was written, young Timothy, though he was not perhaps so young as you, St. Paul says to him, 'Watch thou in all things'.

See now how everybody 'watches'. God watches; Satan watches; angels watch; clergymen watch; young men are to watch; boys and girls are to watch. Nine times in the New Testament we are told to watch. You may find them some other time if you like. It is a very important command—'What I say unto you, I say unto everybody, Watch!'

Let us think a little about it. If you were a midshipman in the Navy, you would have in your turn to walk up and down the deck three hours in the night. The sailors divide the night into 'four watches'; and if you were a midshipman you would have to do your 'watch'. When it came to your 'watch' you would have to walk up and down the deck, and woe betide you if you went to sleep! I fancy the first time you did so you would be flogged, and I am not quite sure, but I think that in time of war, in time of danger, if you slept during your 'watch' you would be shot! You must keep 'watch'. Why is that? Why have you got to 'watch'? Why is this called 'a watch' (Mr. Vaughan showing his watch)? Why is this called 'a watch'? It is to help me to 'watch' that I may know the time, that I may 'watch', that I may know (I was going to say) when to begin, and when to end? but I am never to end. Is it to keep 'the watches of the night? We are all 'watchmen'. I have a question to ask you. God asks the question; hear it, my boy; hear it, my girl: 'Watchman, what of the night?' 'Watchman, what of the night?' If you were a midshipman, perhaps you would be asked that question on board a ship. Now I ask you, this night—for it is not day yet, heaven will be full day—I say to you, How are you getting on now in the night? 'Watchman, what of the night?' 'Watchman, what of the night?'

Supposing you knew there were some robbers coming to your house to-night, would not you watch? Would not you fasten the door very tightly? Would not you take care to put the bar up behind the shutters?

It is a great thing to have fences. When a farmer takes a farm, the first thing is to take care the fences and hedges are all good. Are your fences good? Now, if you knew a robber were coming to-night, would not you watch against the robber? There is a thief in this church who would rob us of our peace—our heaven—our everything. Then 'watch' against the thief! Take care the fences are all good. 'Watch!'

Who is your greatest enemy? Yourself, shall I say? or sin? Or are they very much the same thing? Well, I will say sin. Let us speak first about sin, and then about self.

Sin. Now, you know I was supposing just now that you were midshipmen. Suppose now that you were all soldiers, and I was the commanding officer, and that when I came round the camp I saw one place where I knew the enemy was going to attack us—what should I say to you, soldiers? 'Put a double guard there; the enemy is coming in at that point; put a double guard!' I will tell you of one or two fences where I think we want double guard—where the 'watch' should be doubled.

In bed, before you get up. It is rather a slippery place that, when you know you ought to get up and you turn round again instead. What is the consequence? When you do get up you dress all in a hurry and say no prayers. Therefore I would come to your bedside and say, 'Watch!' Take care! Don't lie in bed too long; don't neglect your prayers.

At breakfast, dinner, tea, supper, I come by, and I say, 'Take care! Perhaps you want the best all to yourself—perhaps you are greedy. Take care! Don't take the best to yourself.'

I go to another place. You are alone in a room. Take care! There is something sweet in the cupboard; there is sugar there. Take care! It is very dangerous to be alone, isn't it? 'Watch!' 'Watch!' 'Watch!'

You take a walk, not with a good companion; or you are playing with a bad companion. Take care! The scarlet fever is very catching. Sin is more catching than the scarlet fever. 'Watch!'

There is some one in this church now who did not 'watch' this morning. Some boy or girl taught him some bad thing; asked you to do something that you know is wrong. Take care when in company. 'Watch!'

Oh! there are so many places where we must watch. There was a city in Italy, I dare say you know of it, where, more than a thousand years ago, the lava from Mount Vesuvius came all over the city and covered it completely with thick lava. I have been there and seen it. A thousand years after that happened it was discovered, the city was excavated, and they dug out many of the things that were therein. Amongst other things that were discovered there was a man, a soldier, a sentinel at his post. A thousand years before that man had been killed at his post by the lava, and there he was found, a sentinel still at his post! A lesson to us. A great deal more than a thousand years after he was found still at his post. Let us be found at our post, wherever God has placed us, when He comes; when this world is covered, as it will be, with fire, may we be found faithful at our posts!

I should like to tell you a little more about 'watching'. I have said sin is a great enemy, always coming to us; but ask yourself, Haven't you a real enemy in yourself? Has anybody in the world so great an enemy as himself? Did we ever examine, see in a microscope, the eye of a little fly? A wonderful thing is the eye of a fly. You cannot, at one time, look backwards and forwards; but a fly can look every way at once. Now you must be like that. You must look every way. This way, that way, every way.

You must 'watch'. If you do not 'watch', very likely the danger will come where you do not think. And I will tell you where you must begin. Do you think you yet know what is your besetting sin? I mean, do you think you know what sin you are most likely to do? Think. I don't want you to tell me; it is between you and God. Do you think you know? I wonder what it is—what is your besetting sin—your greatest danger? Do you think it is temper? Perhaps it is; I don't know. Do you think it is gluttony? or being false, deceiving? or pride? You are very proud. Boys and girls are quite as proud as men and women. Do you think it is pride? I don't know what it is. But this I say, I am sure you have a besetting sin. Every one has got a besetting sin. The Bible says so: 'Lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us'. Therefore every one in this church has got a besetting sin. Ask God to show you, and then, when you have found out where your besetting sin is, there set a double guard. 'Watch!' If your besetting sin is bad temper, if you are easily irritated and you know you are, then 'watch'; whenever you feel it coming, suppose you say a little prayer: 'O God! don't let me be angry. O God! keep me from this temper.' It is wonderful what that will do. Bad temper always springs from pride; you think you are not treated with proper respect. Therefore think, 'Who am I, to be angry, who have done so many wrongs?' Just set about that; keep a watch there.

Every sin comes in a little at first; then it comes in more. If you 'watch' at first, at the beginning, you will conquer it; if not, it will conquer you. Therefore, 'watch' at the beginning. Say a little prayer.

Oh! the danger may come in a very different way from the way you expect. Did you ever read Æsop's Fables? I will tell you one of a doe that was blind of one eye (have you read the story?); this doe was very cunning and clever, for she knew which eye was blind, and down the path which the doe used to go she always kept her blind eye to the sea and her good eye to the land, because it was from the land the doe thought the danger would come. So the doe always kept the blind eye to the sea and the good eye to the land. One day a poacher, who knew all about that, got a boat and went out in the boat on the sea, and from the boat he shot the poor doe; and as the poor doe was dying, she said, so the fable goes, 'Unhappy watcher! poor me! My danger came from where I never expected it, and there was no danger where I did expect it!' You may be like that poor blind doe: the danger comes where you don't expect it!

Do you know where to expect the danger? 'Watch!'

I believe a hare when it lies in the grass always tries to see out of its eyes backwards; he thinks the danger will come from behind, therefore he so fixes his eyes and puts his ears back that he cannot see what is before; he is always looking back. Your danger comes every way.

Another thing I want you to watch against is wandering thoughts. Are there any wandering thoughts in this church now? Is everybody thinking about the sermon? About good things? No, no; there are wandering thoughts.

I have heard it asked, 'If everybody had to go out of church as soon as the first wandering thought came into the mind, would there be anybody left in the church?' If every wandering thought slammed the door as it left, the noise would be like thunder! Guard against wandering thoughts. Remember what Abraham did: when he offered up the sacrifice, and the little birds came to spoil it, he drove away the birds that they might not spoil the sacrifice!

These wandering thoughts are like the little naughty birds which came down upon Abraham's sacrifice. You must drive away the little wandering thoughts.

A lady was once in company with Dr. Johnson; she said to him that she 'could not get rid of bad thoughts'. Dr. Johnson said, 'Madam, you should be always on your watch'. She said, 'We cannot be always on our watch'. He said, 'Nobody ever goes to heaven who is not always on their watch in this world'. Those were very wise words of that wise man.

Now, I must just say, before I have done, that, as I have told you what you are to watch against, we must see what we are to watch for. I shall mention four things.

Watch for answers to your prayers. Say your prayers and then look up for the answers to come. Expect answers. Look for them. When you shoot your arrows, look to see where your arrow comes down. For prayer is like shooting an arrow. Look for answers to prayer. That is the first thing.

The second thing I would advise you is, always to look for little, still, small voices. I knew a little girl who said to her mother, 'Mother, let us sit quiet and try if we cannot hear the angels singing'. Now, however still we may sit, we shall never hear the angels sing till we get to heaven. But if we are still, if our hearts are still, we shall hear voices, voices that speak in us, the Holy Spirit speaking in our consciences. And if we listen for them, you will always hear these voices; and these voices will always tell you what is right. Watch for the Spirit's still, small voices.

I will tell you another thing to watch for. Watch for God's providences. Expect there will be some providence, some kind thing God will do. Look out for it. There is an old proverb, and a good one: 'He that watches Providence will never want a providence to watch'. Do you know any very poor person in great distress? Tell them that.

And lastly, watch for Jesus Christ's coming again. 'Watch!' I do not know whether I ever told you about a little boy who had heard about Jesus coming again. He was very full of it, he thought a great deal about it. He slept in a bedroom where the window looked to the east, and as he had been told that Jesus Christ would come in the east (as I believe He will), every morning when that little boy turned out of bed, before he ever took off his nightgown, he ran to the window and looked to the east to see if Jesus was coming.

Those are my four things you should watch for. Watch for answers to prayer; watch for still, small voices; watch for kind providences; watch for Christ's second coming. Oh, won't you be glad when He comes again! Every one of you, go up to your watch-tower, hang upon your watch-tower. We read in Isaiah of a man being sent up to his watch-tower, and when there he said, 'I see a lion in the way'. If you are on your watch-tower you will see a lion. You will see a good Lion and a bad lion. You will see a bad lion, who is full of evil, who would hurt and destroy you if he could; and a great and good Lion, 'the Lion of the tribe of Judah,' He will do great things for you, so that you will become strong, like giants! Keep on your watch-tower! Be ever on your watch-tower! If you have gone wrong, it is because you were not on your watch-tower! 'Watch!' 'Watch!' 'WATCH!' 'Blessed are those servants whom the Lord, when He cometh, shall find so doing.'—JAMES VAUGHAN.

READINESS

'Ready, aye Ready.'

'What I say unto you I say unto all. Watch!'—MARK XIII. 37.

The story of the origin of this motto is as follows. It is said that when James V. of Scotland was on the eve of advancing against the English, and had assembled his nobles at Fala, none of them were willing to follow the royal standard with the single exception of Sir John Scott, who expressed his readiness to serve with his king in any circumstances. The monarch, in token of his pleasure at Sir John's loyalty, granted him the right to add a sheaf of spears to his coat of arms, and also the above motto. In Sir Walter Scott's poem, 'The Lay of the Last Minstrel,' he thus alludes to the story:—

Hence, in fair remembrance worn,
You sheaf of spears his crest has borne;
Hence his high motto stands revealed,
'Ready, aye Ready,' for the field.

I mean to take the words this morning as expressive of three things: (1) of the spirit that should mark us all; (2) of the attitude always assumed by the powers of evil; and (3) of the constant character of Christ.

First, of ourselves.

The quality of readiness is the one that more almost than any other ensures success in life. The man who succeeds is the man who is capable of seizing every advantage and opportunity. We can see in our school life how quickness tells; it is not everything, but it is a great deal. The boy or girl who not only has learned the tasks well, but is ready witted enough to apply the knowledge gained to the various questions and problems that come up for solution, wins the highest place; and in our games how true it is that the quick eye and the ready hand gain the mastery in the cricket, football, or hockey field. And when we come to the higher levels of life, we find how this quality is more than ever essential. Paul makes it part of his Christian armour, and sets it alongside truth, righteousness, and faith,—none of these great gifts of the soul can be used effectively without the quality of readiness. No one that is unprepared, no matter how highly gifted, can make the most efficient use of his gifts; it is like having immense riches all locked up in some strong room of which the owner has lost the key. One of the kings in English history has been branded with a very ugly name because he was always lacking in that quality of preparedness; he has been known to all subsequent ages as Ethelred the Unready. Let us see to it that we do not gain such a title for ourselves in the more serious and strenuous duties that belong to Christ's kingdom.

Secondly, of the forces of evil.

These, we are told, are always on the outlook seeking to surprise us; Peter says our adversary is 'as a roaring lion, walking about seeking whom he may devour'. This attitude of fierce and prowling menace is characteristic of the powers of evil. You know what travellers do in South Africa, when they camp for the night they have to take great care that watch-fires are lit all round, and beyond the glow of the fires can be heard the movements of the lions and other fierce beasts of prey. If by any chance the fires are allowed to die down, then the wild animals spring into the circle and carry away some unfortunate sleeper in their teeth. They will hang about for hours in the hope of an entrance, and nothing but the dawn will drive them back to the desert.

Now, sin is a foe of this kind, it is both merciless and persistent; it will not spare, neither will it leave us alone so long as there seems an opportunity of finding a weak spot in our armour. In the old duelling days one method pursued by the combatants was for one swordsman to harass and press his enemy until he had utterly fatigued him, and then to take advantage of his temporary weakness by a swift and sudden thrust. These are the tactics the devil often adopts in dealing with us; he wearies us until we are found off our guard, then he enters. There is great need therefore of watchfulness, for we have not only to resist the evil, but to carry the war into the enemies' camp.

Thirdly, of Christ.

Away on one of the northern shores of Scotland, where the cliff faces the wild sea, is a lifeboat house, with the words Ready, aye Ready upon it; could there be a finer motto for lifeboat men! It seems as if the boat were itself expressing the purpose for which it exists, and the eagerness with which it desires to go out on its errands of mercy. No matter how terrible the storm, how wild the night, how great the risk, the lifeboat has always its prow turned to the waves, and is in readiness to be launched. Just thus it is with Jesus Christ: you remember how when His disciples were in dire straits He appeared to them walking on the waves of Galilee, and straightway the storm became a calm, and the frightened seamen were in safety. Wherever Christ sees darkness, danger, and sin there He is always ready to put out to the rescue. The greater our need, the more certain are we of having His help.—G. CURRIE MARTIN, Great Mottoes with Great Lessons, p. 111.

ON DOING WHAT WE CAN

'She hath done what she could.'—MARK XIV. 8.

Nobody is idle in the kingdom of our Lord. Even the babes and sucklings have something to do. But so just is the King that He will not have any of His servants do more than they can. He expects us to do only what we can.

'What we can.' That is His measure for all work done to Him. What we have strength for, what we have health for, what we have cleverness for, what we have time for, what we have means for: that and nothing more. He will have us work up to that, but no higher.

He must have been thinking of little people and children when He made this the measure of work. Almost it is as if He had said, 'I will not make My service hard to anyone, but least of all to the little ones of My kingdom'.

It was this which pleased Him so well in the service which Mary of Bethany did: she did what she could. She greatly loved the Lord. He had often spoken to her about His Father. He had raised her brother Lazarus from the dead. And she wanted to show her love.

She took this way of showing it. All the money she could spare she spent on a box of sweet-scented oil. And one Sabbath evening—the last Sabbath before His death—the Lord was in Bethany and at supper in the house of Simon, Mary came in with her box. And going near to Jesus, she did to Him what was only done to kings and great people—she poured the sweet-scented oil upon His head and over His feet. And then, in her great love, she wiped His feet with her hair.

It was not much to do. To look at, it was not so much as if she had built a church, or a school, or a hospital. It was not even so much, Judas said angrily, as if she had sold the ointment and given the money to the poor. It was only pouring some sweet perfume on the head and feet of the Saviour she loved. But just this was the thing she could best do; and what she could she did. Of all His disciples then living, only into the heart of this one had come the thought to do this thing. She had love so great for Jesus, and He had become so truly her King, that it seemed to her a blessed work to buy the oil and pour it upon His head. She would have done more if she could; but this was in her heart to do, and it was done. The Lord did not despise it or think it a little thing. When Judas and others were blaming her, He said, 'She hath wrought a good work upon me. . . . She hath done what she could.' He praised her. And then, in His kindness, and praising her still more He said, 'that what she had done would be talked of wherever His Gospel should be preached'. And so it has fallen out. That evening the fragrance of her ointment filled the house where they were sitting; and its fragrance, in a still better way—the good influence that was in it—has filled the house of the Lord ever since.

II. When years had gone past, and Jesus was gone back to heaven, many other disciples showed their love to Him by doing what they could. Some sold their possessions, and gave the money they got for them to the poor. Some went about the world preaching Jesus. Some opened their houses to receive the preachers. Some spent long hours in prayer, asking God to bless the preaching. Some, more noble than others, searched the Bible besides to know what God would have them to do. Among these was Dorcas of Joppa.

Joppa was a seaport town, and full of sailors; and where sailors are there will also be women and children who are poor. Often ships went out from the harbour that never came back. They were caught by storms and sunk far out at sea, or they were driven shoreward and broken on the rocks. And day after day mothers and children on the shore would look with straining eyes to the sea for white sails which could never more be seen. And sometimes, when all hope had perished of seeing these sails again, the streets would be filled with wailing. And sometimes it might be widows would go past the door where Dorcas lived wringing their hands in agony because news had come to them that the fathers of their children had been swallowed up by the terrible sea.

And seeing these poor people by day, and lying awake perhaps sometimes on stormy nights and thinking of brave sailors perishing, even then, at sea, this Christian lady said to herself, 'Can I do anything to help?' And taking herself to task she found there was one thing she could do. She could sew. She could make coats and garments—upper and under clothes. There was another thing she could do, although she herself might not think of that. She had a heart filled with tenderness and pity. She could let forth some of that pity and tenderness on the poor people in their sorrow. And these two things she did. She drew the poor widows about her by her love. And with her own hands she made clothing for them and theirs. To some people it might not seem a very great work. It was only a little sewing and some human love; only a kind word for sad hearts and clothing for the naked. But that is work which is very dear to Christ. And it was work of this kind He had given her the power to do. And what she could, she did. And of so much worth seemed her work in the eyes of Jesus, that when she died early, and the poor widows she had clothed cried to Him, through Peter, to let their dear one—their friend—come back to them, He granted their prayer; and by the hands of His servant Peter raised her up again to life.

III. Sometimes we can only sing a psalm, or offer a prayer, or speak a kind word, or give a tender look, or a warm grasp of the hand. It is enough in the eyes of the just Saviour that we do things as little as these, if these should be the only things we can do.

I am reminded, while I speak, of two workers for Christ I once knew, who gained their bread in a cotton mill, and served Him in a very simple way. One of these, her companions used to call 'the gentle Mary'. She was a Roman Catholic. She was very tender about sick people, and spent what she could spare of her evenings, after mill hours, in visiting them. She had a way of speaking to the sick that did them good. Not that she was a great speaker. Often she would only say to them, 'Jesus loves you'. Sometimes she just pressed their hands. Sometimes she bent over them and kissed them. She never went on these visits of kindness without taking something she thought the sick people would like. It would be a little jelly one time; and a little scent-bottle next time; and now and again it would be a flower, or a little wine. The door was open for Mary into many a home where these things were to be had for the asking. I am happy to be able to add, that Mary was as gentle and loving at her own fireside as in the homes of the sick.

It was another kind of service to which the second girl had given herself. One winter evening she was going home from the factory, and in the light falling from a street lamp on the pavement she found a six-penny copy of the New Testament. It was the first time she had a Testament of her own. She took it home and began to read, and as she read, she learned, as she had never done before, the wonder of the Saviour's love, and how He had died to prove that love. She said to herself, 'I shall not have this joy to myself alone'. So she set apart, out of her small earnings, one penny every day for Christ's cause. And at the end of each week she bought and gave to some one who had none a copy of the book which had been such a joy to herself.

It was not much either of these girls did. It was not much either had the power to do. But each did what she could: that was their praise before God.

That was the praise also of a young lady I was once taken to see, whose service seemed even less than theirs. She had been thrown from a carriage ten years before, and all those years had been ill and in bed. But her hands were free. And with her free hands she knit little gloves for poor children. It was only helping to keep warm some little fingers that would otherwise have been very cold in winter. But it was all she was able to do. And it was done with a loving heart, and as a service to the Lord.

IV. No one is so humble, or poor, or weak, as not to be able to do something. Even a child can serve the Lord.

A few years back, on a Friday morning in September, three tiny little children in Australia went into a wood to fetch some broom for their mother. It was a beautiful day. The ground was covered with flowers, and the children set themselves to gather them. But when they were tired with this, and had prepared the little bundle for home, they could no longer tell on what side home was to be found. And Frank, the youngest of the three, was worn out. Taking him up in her arms, the sister and other brother looked on every side for a way out, but could not find one. Mile after mile those weary feet pattered, and every mile was taking them farther from home. They cried for father and mother. 'Coocy, Coocy, Coocy,' they called; but all in vain. There was no human ear to hear their cries. At last night began to fall. The sister looked for a sheltering bush. Then she knelt down with her other brother and said her evening prayer;—

Gentle Jesus, meek and mild,
Look upon a little child.

Then the two lay down beside Frank and went to sleep. And this was repeated on Saturday, on Sunday, on Monday, and Tuesday, the poor weary wanderers still carrying the broom for their mother, still looking for the home which they could not find, and eating berries and leaves for food. By and by the beautiful weather came to an end and rain poured down, and when night came Frank was cold as well as wearry. The sister took off her frock, and, wrapping the child in that, they once more took shelter under a bush. It was nine days altogether before they were found. Father, mother, neighbours, shepherds, farmers, miners, everybody in the neighbourhood searched for them. But some natives, going down on their knees, and looking for the marks of tiny feet on the wet ground, were the first to come on their track. On Saturday, led by these poor blacks, their father found them lying asleep under a bush, and nearly dead with weariness and hunger and cold. The first words the girl said when she was roused up were 'cold, cold,' and the next, after she had been taken to a hut and warmed and fed, were the words of her Evening Hymn.

The brave little mother that she was! The brave self-forgetting servant of Christ! She had cheered her brothers all the time. She had searched about for food for them. She carried Frank when he was tired. She wrapped him in her own dress when he was cold. And at night, when they went to sleep under the shelter of some bush, she drew them together and said her evening prayer.

That was her praise before God and man: she had done what she could.

V. It is wonderful how much can be done, and what things great in God's sight, if people would only do the little things they can.

On one of the early days of a January not long ago, a Swedish steamer was wrecked on the Northumberland coast. The fisher folk of Cresswell, a village near by, looking seaward that day, saw the strange vessel among the breakers, and knew that human lives were in peril. It is a little place, with only fifteen men in it, and of these two were unable to work. But men, women, and children turned out that day and hauled down and launched the lifeboat, and, very soon, thirteen brave fellows were struggling with the wild sea to save the lives on the wreck. But the storm was too fierce. They were driven back again and again. While they were waiting for a lull in the storm to try again, some one said, 'Let us send for the rocket'. The rocket is used when the lifeboat cannot get near. It is shot up into the air with a line of cord attached, so that the cord falls over the vessel, and those on board catch it and pull in a rope tied to the end of it, and make that fast, and come sliding one by one to land by the rope. But the machine for firing the rocket was at Newbiggin, five miles away, and the night was closing in. Would anybody go to Newbiggin? A young girl stepped forward. She would go. And in a moment she was gone. The lives of human beings depended on her speed. She ran, rather she flew. Like the fisher-girl she was, she kept the shore road, and to gain time took many a short cut through the bays on the way. The wild sea was on the one side drenching her with its spray; on the other, was the wild lonesome land, and above and around her the deepening night. But on she flew, this young angel of mercy, between rocks and waves, through the surf, through the moaning of the storm, through the darkness, till she gave her message at Newbiggin, and saw the rocket on its way. And then, alone as before, and once more through darkness, sea-wave, and storm, she fled back over the same five lonesome miles to bring the good news to Cresswell, that the rocket was on the way. It did not lessen the worth of what she had done that meanwhile the lifeboat had succeeded in its next attempt, and brought the wrecked people safe to land. Her deed was well done and heroic. She was ill next day, ill and cramped all over in bed. No wonder. But she had done a brave, noble, Christian deed, and done it well. It is fine to be able to tell that she comes of a good stock, for her father was steersman of the lifeboat that day. And for father and child, and for all in Cresswell who worked so well, it may surely be said, 'They wrought a good work, they did what they could'.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Gentle Heart, p. 47.

OF NOT DOING WHAT WE CAN

'She hath done what she could.'—MARK XIV. 8.

THE last time I spoke to you, I tried to set before you the good which there is in doing what we can. To do what one can is all that our Lord asks us to do. And it is very pleasant to know that this is all He asks us to do. It is like having His heart opened to us, and seeing how tender He is to little folks and children, and to people not strong, and poor people. And I really think it was to let us see this tenderness of His heart for the little ones that He made this His praise of Mary, 'She hath done what she could'.

I. But to this lesson there are two sides. And it is right to know that the same kind Lord Who has made this easy measure for little workers, expects all His workers, big and little, to work up to it and do for Him as much as they are able. He will not lay upon any of us more than we can do. But what we can, He will always have us to do. He does not love idlers, nor people who run away from duty. He told this story to let us know the evil of not doing what we can:—

There was once a merchant who had to go to a far country. And he called his servants and said to them: 'Here is money, and when I am away you are to trade with it and make more, and when I come back, I will reckon with you'. And he gave one ten pounds, one five, and to a third he gave one. When he came back, after a long while, the servant who got ten pounds said: 'I traded with your ten pounds, and I have made other ten'; and the servant who got five said, 'And I have made other five'. The master was well pleased with them. But the servant who had got only one, said: 'I was afraid lest I should lose your money, and have a scolding from you, so I hid it, and here it is safe'. With that servant the master was very angry. He said to him, 'You ought not to have buried my pound; you should have traded with it, and made it into two pounds'. It was for this the master was angry.

The servant was an idler. He did not do what he could.

II. And that is always and for all mankind an evil thing. And sometimes it is as cruel as it is evil.

I will tell you a little bit of the life of a boy I knew. He was not a bad boy. He was far from it. He loved good people and things that were good. He would not have told a lie, or knowingly done a mean or cruel thing. Yet once he did a thing that was very cruel through forgetting to do what he could. A friend had made him a present of a blackbird. At first, there was no end to his joy. This was his own bird: its cage was his; its song was his; and it was to him the bird looked for its food. And for a long while he was very good to it. He kept green things between the wires, and brought fresh water to its drinking glass, and kept the cage clean and sweet; and always when he came in, he would go up to the cage and speak to it and cheer it, and sometimes he would rise from his lessons and have a little talk with his bird.

It happened that the boy's mamma took ill, and the song of the blackbird became a pain to her. So the cage was taken up to an attic room. It happened at the same time that the game of base-ball came in, and my little friend was very fond of that game. He got to care for this game so much that his care for the lonely blackbird grew less and less. He had no time now for little talks with the bird. He did not gather green food for it, or bring it fresh water as he used to do. At last, one day he forgot it altogether. He had to hurry off to school as soon as he rose next day. In the afternoon his classmates took him off to the playground. He came back so hot and tired and so late that he could only get to bed. His poor bird went out of his thoughts entirely. And when, two or three days after, some one in the family said, 'Harry, how is your blackbird getting on?' a pang shot through Harry's heart. He jumped up, ran to the attic where he had left it, and found it lying at the bottom of the cage quite dead. By his forgetfulness and neglect and not doing what he could, he had killed his beautiful bird.

III. And it is not birds only that are neglected in this way.

A poor old lady, who lived where I once lived, had some trouble in one of her eyes, Scales seemed to grow over it, and she could not see. The village doctor said to her, 'It is but a little thing, and it can be healed'. They sent her to an hospital in the neighbouring city, and the doctors there said, 'Yes, it is a little thing, and your eye shall get quite well'. So she said a silent prayer to God, and put herself in their hands. They took a knife and cut the scales away. And she felt the touch of the light on her eye, and said joyfully, 'I see with this eye again'. The doctors wrapped up the eye, and said to a nurse, 'Nurse, this patient must remain in a dark room for two weeks; at the end of this time she should be well enough to go home'.

It was the duty of the nurse to whom these words were said to attend to all whose eyes had been cut, and put them at once into a warm bed, and give them food. She took this old lady to a dark room, and said, 'Rest here; I will be back in a moment and put you to bed'. But moment after moment passed, and she did not come back. Hour after hour, and still she did not come. She had forgotten all about her. At last, in the evening, she remembered her neglect, and ran up to the room where the old lady was. But it was too late. The day had been cold. The poor lady was cold, and sick, and faint. When she was put to bed she began to shiver. A fever set in; then inflammation of the eye that had been cut; then inflammation of the eye that was well. And when the sickness left her, both eyes were blind.

What had taken place? A very evil thing. This nurse had not done what she could; and, failing to do that, she had made her poor sick patient blind for life.

IV. I try to think that this nurse only forgot. I try to think that the evil she did—and what she did was very evil—was because she did not think as much as she ought to have done about her duties. But I have known of some who brought suffering on others just as she did, by not doing what they could, and who have tried to hide the evil they did by running away from the suffering they caused.

One dark night a few years ago, an emigrant ship, with four hundred people on board, was lying in the Channel on the eve of sailing to Hobart Town far away. And in the darkness, without stroke of warning, it was crashed into by a steamer and sunk. A dark night, I said, only a few stars twinkling, and those four hundred human beings were folded up in sleep. And in the darkness, and while they slept, there was this crash. And in a moment death was rushing in through the broken sides of the vessel, and almost instantly the vessel began to sink. Fathers, mothers, little babies, sailors, awoke only to be swallowed up in the yawning sea. It was one of the most pitiful things that could be—and very pitiful were the cries of the poor sufferers as they were going down into the deep. One mother came up to one on deck and cried, 'For the love of God, save my baby!' But the baby and mother had both to die. A father and two sons met in the water. The elder son said, 'Father, let me kiss you for my last; for we shall all be drowned'. And all were drowned. The brave captain sent his young wife into one of the boats; but he himself remained to help and die at his task.

And while this was going on, and the crowded ship was settling down, what was the steamer that had given the stroke of death doing? It is shameful to have to tell it. But the steamer that caused those deaths steamed past, and on into the darkness. And human hands that might have helped, and a vessel that might have saved hundreds of lives, went cruelly past 'on the other side'.

The officers of that ship did not what they could. They could have taken better care; they could have had a better outlook; they could have kept further off. And when they had, what should have been a great grief to them, the grief of striking the ship in their path, they should have stopped and done all that human beings could do to save the lives in the ship. The Lord's measure applied to them is this: 'They wrought an evil work, and did not what they could to repair it'.

And at the great judgment day that will be a terrible sorrow for them and all who have done as they did. The people who shall be condemned that day will be people who could have worked for God, and did not, and who had talents, and did not use them.

And we should all know, and lay it to heart now, that the things which the Lord will ask us about on that day are all simple things, and things easy to do. And the condemnation on those who shall be condemned will be because those easy things were not done. They could have helped when help was needed; they could have had pity on the blind; they could have saved the drowning from death; they could have given bread to the hungry, or water to the thirsty, or clothes to the naked, or pity to the sick, or help to the prisoner. And surely it will be very awful to hear the gracious and loving Jesus saying, 'Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to Me'.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Gentle Heart, p. 61.

ST. LUKE

JOHN THE BAPTIST, THE MODEL OF GREATNESS

'He shall be great in the sight of the Lord.'—LUKE I. 15.

GABRIEL, the angel, was sent by God to speak the above words to Zacharias the priest, the father of John the Baptist. It was in the Temple at Jerusalem, while he was offering incense before the altar, that the angel appeared to him. He told him that he was about to have a son, and that he must call his name John. Then he told him what sort of work he was to do. He was to go before Christ—the Messiah, as the morning star goes before the sun, to prepare His way before Him. And then he told him what sort of a man he should be: 'He shall be great in the sight of the Lord'.

And when our Saviour was on earth, in speaking of John the Baptist one day, He said: 'Of them that are born of women, there hath not risen a greater than John the Baptist'. The angel Gabriel, and Jesus, the Lord of the angels, both spake of John the Baptist in the highest terms. They show us that, up to the time in which he lived, he was really the greatest man the world had known. And in view of what is thus said about him, when we come to put John the Baptist among the 'Bible Models,' we may well speak of him as—

The model of greatness. And in studying this model, there are two points of view from which we may look at it. One of these is the negative view of it, or in what John's greatness did not consist. The other is the positive view of it, or in what John's greatness did consist.

And in looking at this model from the negative point of view, there are three things to speak of. The first is that—

I. John's greatness did Not Consist in Long Life.—He was born about six months before our Saviour. He lived a private life, till he was thirty years of age. This was the age at which the Jewish priests and prophets generally began their work in public. And it was at this age that John began his work, as the forerunner of Christ. He came among his countrymen, crying aloud: 'Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand'. He told them of the coming of the long-promised Messiah—the Saviour of the world; thus he prepared the way before Him. He began to preach, about six months before Jesus entered on His ministry; and he went on telling the people about Him, and pointing them to Him for about a year longer. Then he was beheaded by the wicked Herod; and that was the end of John's ministry. About eighteen months was all the time he had to work for Jesus. And yet the angel said he should be 'great in the sight of the Lord'. And he was thus great. But then we see that it was not long life which made John the Baptist great.

Two things that helped to make John great were—doing what he knew was right, and bringing souls to Jesus. And these things will make any one great in God's sight. But it does not require long life to do these things.

II. In the next place, this greatness does not require Great Riches.—John the Baptist was a poor man. We see this in the clothes he wore when he began his ministry, and in the food on which he lived. We are told by St. Matthew (iii. 4) that 'John had his raiment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins; and his meat was locusts and wild honey'. This was just the kind of food and clothing which the poorest people of that country had. John owned no land. He never had a house of his own to live in. He had no money with which to buy anything that was costly or expensive. And yet, in spite of his poverty, John was 'great in the sight of the Lord'. And this sort of greatness we may all have if we serve God as John did. Some men are rich without being great; and some are great without being rich.

A servant girl's greatness.—One of the best and greatest men in England was the late Earl of Shaftesbury. He was well known through all the country as the helper of the poor and the oppressed. He took an active part in every good work. He was for years a blessing to the whole country: and every one who knew him was and is always ready to speak his praises. He was not only very good and great, but also very rich; and he used his riches to help others in many ways. But the Earl of Shaftesbury owed all his goodness and his greatness under God to a poor servant girl. When he was an infant his mother had a faithful servant girl in her family, whose name was Mary Millas. His mother appointed Mary to be the nurse of the young Earl, and gave her the entire charge of him. She knew what an important position he would have to occupy when he grew to be a man, and she made up her mind to be faithful to the great trust committed to her charge. She felt very much as the mother of Moses did, when God, through Pharaoh's daughter, said to her, 'Take this child away, and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages'. She was an earnest Christian, and she determined to do all in her power to make that child a follower of Jesus. She prayed for him continually, with all her heart. She set before him a good example. As soon as he was able to learn she taught him in a simple and attractive way the story about Jesus, and the truth wrapped up in that story. She kept on doing this very faithfully till the young Earl was seven years old, and then she died. But the seed she had sown so carefully in his heart took root there, and sprang up, and brought forth abundant fruit. He never forgot the example she had set before him, and the lessons she had taught him in those early years of his life. He became a Christian when he was quite young. He grew up in the way in which he had been so early led. And for years he was known and honoured all through England. No one can tell how much good he was the means of doing. But the faithful work which Mary Millas did for the young Earl was the cause of it all. She was truly great in what she did for him. And we may well speak of that poor servant girl as an example of greatness without riches.

III. But again, The Greatness of John the Baptist did not Consist of 'the Honour that Cometh from Man'.—Men often call persons great, when they are really not so at all.

There was a famous person, of whom we read in history. He lived in the time of Henry VIII., King of England, and was known as Cardinal Wolsey. He was a poor boy, the son of a butcher. But he got into college. He entered the ministry. He was rector of several churches. He became a favourite with King Henry VIII., who made him his Prime Minister. Then he was made Bishop: then Archbishop of York; then he was made Lord Chancellor; and finally the Pope of Rome appointed him Cardinal—which was the highest office he had in his power to give to any one. Thus Cardinal Wolsey had all the honour that cometh from man. But what good did it do him? In a single day he lost it all, and all his riches too, and died—a poor, miserable, heart-broken creature. And just before he died, he is said to have spoken these words to a friend who was near him:—

O Cromwell, Cromwell! had I but served my God
With half the zeal with which I've served my king,
He would not now have forsaken me.

The greatness of John the Baptist was very different from that of Cardinal Wolsey. Men had nothing to do with it. He was great in the sight of the Lord. And this is the only greatness that is worth having.

And this greatness we can all have, if we seek it in the right way. Let us look at an illustration of this kind of greatness. The story may be called—

The name of the good Samaritan.—Many years ago a good and faithful minister, whose name was Oberlin, was labouring among the high Alps. On one occasion he was travelling on foot in the winter time. The snow was deep, and the weather very cold. Weary with his journey, faint and hungry, and overcome by the cold, the poor minister felt that he could not struggle any longer. He dropped on the snow and fell asleep. If he had been left there a little while, he never would have wakened again in this world. But he had not slept long before he was roused by some one shaking him, and calling to him.

It was a Swiss peasant, who had seen him, as he was driving by in his sleigh, and had stopped to help him. He gave him some wine to drink, and some food to eat, and then lifted him into his sleigh, and drove him to the next village.

M. Oberlin felt that he owed his life to the great kindness of this stranger; and he was at a loss how properly to thank him for what he had done. He offered him money, but he refused to take it.

'It is our duty to help one another,' said the peasant, 'and it is almost an insult to offer to pay a man for any such service.'

'Well,' replied Oberlin, 'at least tell me your name, that I may tell it to the Lord in my prayers.'

'I see you are a minister of the Gospel,' said the peasant. 'Will you please tell me the name of the good Samaritan?'

'I can't do that,' said the minister, 'for his name was never told.'

'Then let my name go with his,' was the peasant's reply; 'we'll leave them both together with the Lord.'

That good Swiss peasant and the good Samaritan had neither of them any of 'the honour that cometh from man,' but, like John the Baptist, they had the honour which cometh from God. They were 'great in the sight of the Lord,' and that is the best sort of greatness.

Thus we have taken the negative view of John's greatness, and have tried to show in what it did not consist.

It did not consist—in long life—in great riches—or in the honour that cometh from man.

And now, let us take the positive view of John's greatness, or in what it did consist. And there are three things to speak of under this head.

One thing that helped to make John great in the sight of the Lord was his humility. John was very humble. We see this in several things. We see it in what he said of himself, when the Jews sent messengers from Jerusalem, after he had been preaching some time, to ask him who he was. His answer was, 'I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness'. He did not say—I am a prophet, or—I am the forerunner of Christ. He simply said, 'I am a voice'—a little breath put in motion—that's all. How humble John was!

And we see his humility again in what he said about Christ. 'After me,' said he, 'cometh One mightier than I: One who was preferred before me; whose shoe's latchet I am not worthy to unloose.' How humble John was!

One time, when Dr. Morrison, the celebrated missionary to China, found the work there too much for him, he wrote home to his friends in Scotland, and asked them to send him out an assistant. The managers of the missionary society inquired for a suitable person to send out to China. Their attention was directed to a young man of Aberdeen, who was said to be a person of great piety and industry.

He was called before the committee who had charge of this business. They had a long talk with him. Then he withdrew from the committee, and left them to talk it over among themselves.

After he was gone, one of the gentlemen of the committee said: 'I don't think that young man will answer our purpose at all. He's too plain and rough.'

Finally, one of them suggested, that even if they did not send the young man out as a missionary, it might do very well to send him out as a servant, to help Dr. Morrison in his work. The committee all agreed about this. Then the gentleman who had made the suggestion was requested to see the young man and talk with him about it. He did so. He told him that the committee were not willing to send him out as a missionary; but they would be very glad to have him go out as a servant to Dr. Morrison, if he was willing to go.

Now many a young man would have been offended at this, and would have risen up in pride and anger, and said: 'No, I can't consent to that. If I can't go out as a missionary, I won't go at all.' But it was different with this young man. When asked if he was willing to go as a servant, without a moment's hesitation, and with a bright smile, he replied: 'Yes, sir, certainly. I am willing to do anything, so that I am only at work for Jesus. To be "a hewer of wood, or drawer of water" is too great an honour for me when the Lord's house is building.' That young man went out to China as a servant. But he was well known afterwards as the Rev. Dr. Milne—one of the best and most successful missionaries that ever was. And it was his humility which made him great.

Another thing that had to do with John's greatness in the sight of the Lord was his unselfishness.

And there was one other thing that helped to make John great, and that was his courage.

John was a very brave man. At the time when he was preaching, Herod was the King of Judea. He was fond of John, and became his friend. We are told that he took great pleasure in hearing John preach, and did many things that he told the people to do. But Herod was a very bad man. He had taken the wife of his brother Philip to be his wife. This was very wrong. It was breaking God's law. John made up his mind to speak to Herod about it.

Many a man would have been afraid to do this. He would have said to himself: 'I had better let this matter alone; for I shall surely lose the friendship of the king if I say anything to him about it'. But John was not afraid. His rule was always to do what was right, no matter what the consequences might be.

So he told the king one day that it was not lawful for him to have his brother's wife. This made Herod very angry. He had John cast into prison; and not long after, at the request of his wife, he ordered him to be put to death. But John's work was done. And when he died, he went into the presence of that Lord in whose sight he was great. And one thing that helped to make him so, was his courage.

And we must learn to follow his example in this respect, if we hope to be great in the sight of the Lord, as he was.—RICHARD NEWTON, Bible Models p. 270.

A QUESTION TO ASK AND ANSWER

'What manner of child shall this be?'—LUKE I. 66.

This is what people were asking about a little baby that was born eighteen hundred years ago amidst the hills of Judea. They had come up to what we may perhaps call his 'christening,' for when the baby was eight days old the Jews used to give it a name, as you had your name in baptism. It was a time of much rejoicing. The relations came from miles around, and the rich people made a great feast of it.

This baby's 'christening' was a very joyous one. His father and mother had no children, and were both well stricken in years when there came this little bright-eyed boy to gladden them. So all the relations felt that they must go up to rejoice at his birth. There were men and women who had come away from Galilee, and who spoke with a country brogue, like that which betrayed Peter. There were old grey-headed men with long silvery beards, talking solemnly of the times. There were rich relations for whom all the rest made way; and poor relations who tried to make themselves of some use in the preparations. There were priests who blessed the child in the name of the God of Abraham. And then of course there were children too, who wanted to kiss the little one, and who thought themselves quite big enough to nurse it.

Now the one thing that they all talked about was this—What will they call him? 'Of course he'll be called Zacharias, after his father,' said the old people. But his mother shook her head. 'No,' said she, 'his name shall be John.'

Let every John who reads this think of what this name means, and of what he ought to be—the gift of God.

The mother's name was Elisabeth, and you would like to know what that means. Only the gentlest and best of maidens should have so sweet a name. It means the promise of God.

The friends objected to the name John, because nobody of the family was called by that name. Perhaps the priest suggested that Zacharias was a good name; it meant the man of the Lord.

All this time the poor father could take no part in the talking. He had been quite dumb for months past. They made signs to him, and he showed them that he wanted to write something. They brought the writing materials, and as they watched the old man's hand they saw him write, 'His name is John'. That very moment the father's mouth was opened, and he praised God with a loud voice. Of course they were all very much amazed to hear him speak again, and as they went home, the different little companies that talked about it said to each other, 'What manner of child shall this be?'

That child became the mighty preacher, John the Baptist; and Jesus says that of them that are born of women, there had not risen a greater than John the Baptist.

Now every boy and girl might well ask about himself or herself, What manner of child shall this be? Fairy tales very often tell how people have been changed into wonderful shapes, changed to different creatures altogether. As you grow older, you will find that there is no fairy tale so wonderful as that which is really happening every day. Isn't it quite as strange as any fairy tale to think of this little maiden here, with smooth, ruddy cheeks and sunny hair, turned into an old woman, going mumbling and muttering, with the weight of eighty years bending her down, wrinkled and grey and toothless? Stranger than any fairy tale to think of this boy who finds it hard work to sit still for two minutes together, turned into an old man, stiff-kneed and bent, glad to creep along with a couple of sticks, and when he sits down hardly knowing how to get up again.

One night the house of a country parson took fire. The alarm was raised. The frightened family hurried forth half-dressed, and as they stood in the ruddy light, gathered in one of the outbuildings, the grateful father was kneeling to thank God for their deliverance, when he saw that one of the children was missing—a little lad of seven years. To reach him by the stairs was impossible, they were in a blaze. At that moment they saw him at an upper window. The flames roared and leaped in the wind. The burning masses fell on every side, flinging a shower of sparks high up against the black clouds of smoke. A few minutes more, and the fire would reach the place where the little fellow stood. Then a brave man bade another stand firm against the wall, and leaping on his shoulders, he stretched up a pair of strong arms and lifted the child out of the window, amidst the joy of the crowd. Think of the little lad of seven. His eyes full of wonder, his cheeks scorched with the heat, bewildered at the roaring flames and the half-dressed people and all the excitement, pressed to the mother's heart with tears of joy and thanks to the Almighty Father. But lo! the conjurer Time goes by, and the little lad is a great preacher stirring all the land, and blessed by God to the salvation of thousands of souls.

Now I want you to think what you are going to be. It is not chance that does all this. You are deciding now what you will be. The fruit comes out of the blossom; the flower out of the bud; the man out of the child. You are beginning now to be the men and women that you will be. You must be your own good fairies, and here are some things that you can do, or that you can get done for you. For we can go for help to One who is able to do very much more than we ask or think.

I. First, Mend the Little Faults Now.—One day two men were building a ship. As they sawed away at a piece of timber, they found that part of it was worm-eaten.

'We had better not use that piece,' said one man. 'Why, we have had trouble enough with it,' said his companion. 'Tis a pity to throw it away. Nobody will see it, and it is only a little bit gone.' So they put it in.

After a while the ship was finished. With her sails set and flags flying, and with merry strains of music, she was launched. She went across the seas, and was returning with a costly cargo. They were nearing home, and had almost reached the harbour when a storm came on. For a while she stood it bravely enough. Then suddenly every face grew pale. The ship had sprung a leak. In came the water, in through the yielding plank. The sailors struggled against it in vain. Hope is gone. Up go the rockets of distress, and the brave men of the lifeboat take off the crew just in time to see the vessel with her costly cargo go down beneath the waters. And all through one worm-eaten plank! So look after little failings. It will be too late to mend them by and by. And because there is only One who does know all the little defects, and only One who can make them right, let us go to Him with all our hearts, and pray as David prayed of old, 'Who can understand his errors? Cleanse Thou me from secret faults.' Always remember that Jesus came into the world and died to save us from our sins and failings. This is what the angel said, 'His name shall be called Jesus, for He shall save His people from their sins'.

II. Secondly, Be Now what you would Like to be when you are Grown up.—The worst kind of man and woman that you can ever come to be is a liar. I would a hundred times rather meet you twenty years hence, all rags and tatters, as poor as church mice, and know that you told the truth, than find you what is called respectable people if you could even play at telling lies.

III. Then lastly, take with you two things more wonderful than any other gifts that you ever read or heard of. The first is a golden key. Whenever you use it help shall come. It will unlock dungeon doors, and loosen iron bars, and let the heavy chains fall off so noiselessly as not to awaken the soldiers to whom the prisoner is fastened. Read the story in the twelfth chapter of the Acts, and note well the golden key that is mentioned in the fifth verse, 'Prayer was made without ceasing of the church unto God for him'. Wear this golden key at your girdle. It brings the Almighty to your help, and makes the most High God your friend. Then besides the key there is a charm that I would have you wear, not next to your heart, but in the heart itself. The charm is this, Try always to please Jesus. Think of it, pray about it, and try to do it until you get it into your hearts. Try and be thinking of it constantly, What would Jesus have me to do? You never heard of any such wonderful charm as that. It will always tell us what to do. It will weave for us a robe of sunshine that the Book calls the garment of praise. And it will make us so strong that we shall be able to carry any cross that the Lord may ask us to bear for Him.

And yet the most wonderful part remains, that if we come to Jesus and seek Him as our Saviour and our Helper, the child will become an angel of God.—MARK GUY PEARSE, Sermons for Children, p. 99.

THE CHILD JESUS

LUKE I. 80.

ALTHOUGH I have often spoken to you about Jesus, I have never spoken about Him as a Child.

But this is one of the things best worth speaking about in Jesus.

He was the pattern Child. Do you want to know what kind of child God wishes you to be? I answer: He wishes you to become a child like Jesus—like the Child Jesus.

When Jesus became a Man, there were some things about Him and in Him which many people did not like.

Bad people did not like His goodness; evil-doers did not like the terrible sermon in which He spoke against their evil deeds.

Some people did not like His poverty. Others did not like the way in which poor people and sick people came flocking about Him for comfort and healing.

But when He was a Child, everybody liked Him. All the time of His childhood He grew in favour with God and man.

I gather from that that His childhood was a beautiful time of His life, and that He was a good, true, simple, loving Child.

It is said: 'He grew and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom, and the grace of God was upon Him'.

He grew as you are growing, and it is a very beautiful sight to see the baby growing into the child, and the child growing into the girl or boy.

But sometimes alongside of that growth other things grow which are not beautiful; sometimes a naughty spirit or rude speech or self-will or self-seeking grows, and people who want to admire the lovely hair and cheeks and eyes and limbs cannot do that, because they see self looking out of the eyes, and pride tossing the head, and rudeness making gestures with hands or feet. In such a case there may be the growth of a beautiful outside, but also the growth of an unbeautiful spirit.

Now in the Child Jesus both the inside and the outside growths were beautiful. He grew, and, we are told, He waxed strong in spirit.

Another beautiful thing in the Child Jesus: He was filled with wisdom. That means, for one thing,

He began to ask: Why has God sent Me into the world?

It means that He began to read and understand the Scriptures.

It means that He began to look around and to think what the stars were saying, and the lilies, and the birds, and the wheat, and the corn, and the tares.

And there was another beautiful thing in His childhood: His obedience to His parents.

There was in Him no conceit, only humility. He was wise, and did not know it. He was wise, and was not proud about it.

Everybody liked to be near Him, I am sure, and the old people would say: There is winsome grace in this Child.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 1.

THE GREAT BIRTHDAY

(Christmas)

'Unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, who is Christ the Lord.'—LUKE II. 11.

THE birthday of Jesus Christ! What a great birthday that must be! No wonder Christians count it one of their brightest, happiest days. No wonder we make all our churches gay with shining holly, and sing our best-loved hymns, and fill our services with joyful praise. We like on our own birthdays to wish each other joy, and to give our little birthday gifts, and to keep the day in some happy fashion. But the birthday of Jesus Christ is not like any other birthday. It is the best, the brightest, the happiest birthday the world has ever known. It is a birthday for everybody; a birthday for the whole world to keep; a day of joy and gladness for all mankind; 'for unto us a Child is born; unto us a Son is given'; and so we are all glad of heart on Christmas Day; and we all wish each other 'a merry Christmas'; and I hope we do something better still, and bring to our dear Saviour our birthday presents of loving hearts and holy praise.

I. Now come with me and we will go, all in a moment, a journey together to the Holy Land. We are on a long ridge of grey rock, about six miles south of Jerusalem, and it is a winter evening. The ridge of rock runs east and west, and towards the eastern end of it there is a little town, quite a small one, built on the rocks. The houses are low and flat-roofed, and there is a synagogue among them, and an inn. Now when you hear of an inn you must not for one moment think of such an inn as you might see in any town or village in this country. There was nothing of the sort in Bethlehem, or in any place in the Holy Land. You would think such an inn as you would find there a poor place to put up in on a cold winter night. The inns are much the same there to this day. You would find a large low building surrounding an open courtyard, into which would be driven all the animals—horses, asses, camels, cattle,—for which shelter was wanted. In the building all round you would find no regular rooms, only a sort of portico, divided up into separate portions, but all open towards the courtyard inside. You would have to provide everything you wanted for yourself, even to a bit of carpet to sit or lie upon, for there would be no servants to wait upon you, and no furniture for your comfort. It would be just as rude and rough a night's shelter as you can well imagine. But on the evening we are thinking about this rough shelter is crowded. There are many strangers come to the place. There is going to be a census taken. You know what a census is. It is the taking an account on some one particular day of all the inhabitants of a land. The Jews were very particular about their family descent, and to please them the Roman Emperor, when he ordered this census to be taken, allowed the Jews to be enrolled or registered each in the place to which his family belonged. This was not the common Roman way, but the Jews made a point of it. Now Bethlehem was David's city. You will remember it used in very old times to be called Ephrath, and there Jesse 'the Ephrathite' lived, and there David was born, and there he kept the flocks of his father, and there in defending the sheep he killed the lion and the bear. David had a great many descendants, and that was why the place was so full. All those who could trace up their family to David came there for the census.

II. And now see—there come to the little town a man and a woman. They are travelling on foot, for they are poor; slowly, for she is weak. He is a good deal older than she is, and takes great care of her. And first they turn their weary steps to the inn. Alas! it is quite full. What shall they do? They must find shelter somewhere. They are told by some one, perhaps the master of the inn, that there is a stable belonging to the inn, where they can take shelter at least for the night. They go in search of it, and they find a rough cave in the rock, in which some animals are stalled. We cannot be quite sure that it was a cave, but a Christian writer about one hundred and fifty years afterwards says it was, and the people of the place may have kept the spot in memory. At anyrate, there are such caves now in the rocks there, and over one of these, which is said to be the true one, a church has been built. Well; it was the best place they could get, though poor and mean and wretched enough to look at. Ah! but how glorious did that stable become! Suppose you could have stopped some of the people of Bethlehem that evening, and pointed to the poor stable under the rock, and said, 'Something will happen in that stable to-night which will make it a far grander place than the Temple at Jerusalem; yes, make it a place to be talked of, and known about, and honoured, all over the world,' they would have thought you were mad. Yet so it was. For in that poor stable on Christmas morning eighteen hundred and . . . years ago—

Christ was Born.

It was the greatest thing that had ever happened since the world was made. 'And the shepherds returned glorifying and praising God for all the things that they had heard and seen.' And we too will return to our homes 'glorifying and praising God for all the things that we have heard and seen'. It is right we should. Nay, how can we help it, if we think of what Christmas really is? I know it is a happy day to many of you, because you see dear friends and relatives, and have many pleasant things to make you happy. Well, God will not blame that. But oh! in all your Christmas happiness, do let this be the best and truest part—that you are keeping the great birthday of the Lord.—BISHOP WALSHAM HOW, Plain Words to Children, p. 7.

JESUS CHRIST'S BIRTHDAY

'For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.'—LUKE II. 11.

ALL have birthdays. Come downstairs, first thing in the morning, what do friends say? and besides often give us something. Sometimes, too, like to keep our birthday rather differently from other days; cake made, invite friends, have birthday party or feast. Christmas day is our Lord's birthday; may keep that in same way.

1. The Birthday Greeting.—All know what we say on birthdays—'Many happy returns of the day'—really a prayer, means 'may you have,' i.e. 'may God give you,' many happy returns. Don't forget this whenever you say the words to your friends.

Remember also that Jesus Christ is your friend. He has not forgotten you because He has gone up to heaven. If we really wish Him happiness that will make Him more happy. If (Luke xv. 10) the angels can be made more joyful, surely what we think and say may make Jesus Christ more joyful.

All, however, no good unless we mean what we say—therefore must show that we really mean it by offering—

II. The Birthday Gift.

1. What can we give? Nothing ours—even we ourselves 'not our own' (1 Cor. vi. 19). All Jesus Christ's already, yet given in our keeping that if we will we may give Him all! [May illustrate from the story in Misunderstood: Little boy wants to give father a birthday present—goes into shop—chooses present—no money—father has to pay—still father, all the same, values present as his boy's gift.]

2. What would He like to have? This the main question.

(i) Our hearts. Proverbs xxxii. 26. Asks for this gift. Perhaps have given it already. If so, may give it again. [Man may give field—afterwards, when crops come up, give them as part of field—same gift, yet different.]

(ii) Our bodies—His—for His use—if we give them. Eyes, ears, feet, hands, all His—e.g., blind person—can't read—Jesus Christ wants him read to—you give your eyes, no good giving them, unless ready to do what Jesus Christ wants doing with them.

(iii) Our possessions. Cf. Mark ix. 41. 'In My name'—what it means. If we give anything for Christ's sake, because we think Christ wants us to give it, then we give it to Him. [Illustr.—Missionary money, etc.]

All this what we can do to give Christ pleasure on His birthday. But He, too, likes to give us pleasure, so invites us to—

III. The Birthday Feast.

Knows we cannot be happy without Him—wants us to be happy—so willing to feed us (John vi. 35). The food He gives makes us strong—gives us the best kind of happiness. He offers it to you to-day, will not you come to the feast?

Conclusion.—Our brother at home—we still at school. Yet, even so, can increase His happiness, and allow Him to increase ours—one of these days all at home together. How happy when all keep His birthday at home in His Father's house!—C. A. GOODHART, Hints and Outlines for Children's Services, p. 20.

A HAPPY CHRISTMAS

'Let us now go even unto Bethlehem.'—LUKE II. 15.

I. Let us; then that tells us that there are others who will not. And we all know how sadly true that is. A merry Christmas is not of necessity a happy Christmas. It is not a happy Christmas, that of those who have a holiday indeed from their everyday work, but only that they may spend it in riotous living as the Prodigal Son, in drunkenness and revellings, and worse. But, as I say, the text tells you what is. 'Let us now go even unto Bethlehem.'

II. What is going to Bethlehem? Ah me, what a joy it would be—would it not!—if we could to-morrow be carried away to that real Bethlehem, see the Church that stands over what was once the manger, see where the angel appeared, see where the shepherds worshipped! But remember what He, who cannot lie, Himself said, 'Blessed are they which have not seen, and yet have believed'.

III. We can go in thought. We can see the poor little Baby, the very and eternal God, laid in a manger, while yet sitting on the Throne of the Father. We can see what kind of courtiers He had, the ox and the ass; as it is written, 'The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib'. We can imagine, now, or when we wake in the night, what those night watches were, the sheep penned in their fold because of the wolves and bears, the shepherds lying in the open air guarding their charge; and then the great light from heaven, and then the one Angel who said, 'Behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people'; and then the multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying, 'Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men'.

'Let us now go (good advice of the shepherds to you not to put it off) even unto Bethlehem'; the 'even' showing that it is not an easy thing. It was not an easy thing for them to leave their sheep and their folds; it is not an easy thing for you to be self-denying, to follow God's will rather than your own. Easy! It is the hardest thing, the one thing of your lives; it is the thing in which that better life begins.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons for Children, p. 46.

TWELVE YEARS OLD

(First Sunday after Epiphany)

'When He was twelve years old.'—LUKE II. 42.

I ALWAYS think of this as the Children's Sunday, because in the Gospel for this Sunday we read about Jesus 'when He was twelve years old'.

I. You know that this is the only glimpse we get of our dear Saviour's life from the time when He was a little Infant until He was thirty years old, except that we are told that 'the Child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom'; and again, that He 'increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man'. These two verses of St. Luke tell us the way in which He grew up from childhood to boyhood and manhood in his quiet home at Nazareth, but of what He did, or said, or felt, or thought, we know nothing at all, except just this one thing that happened 'when He was twelve years old'. First we have twelve years with nothing told us. Then this one little story. Then eighteen more years with nothing told us. God had good reasons for not letting us know more about Jesus as a Child and as a Boy. But if God thought it good for us not to know what Jesus did and said for thirty years of His earthly life, except only for this one little story, don't you think we ought to prize this one little story very much? Surely God must have meant it to be very precious to us, if it was picked out from all that happened for thirty long years as the one thing most useful to be told us.

II. Where was Jesus sitting when His mother and Joseph found Him? [In the Temple in the midst of the doctors.] What do you mean by 'doctors'? [Men learned in the Bible.] What was Jesus doing? [Hearing them, and asking them questions.] Now I must tell you of a mistake children sometimes make about this. They fancy Jesus Christ, 'when He was twelve years old,' set Himself up as a teacher, and was teaching those learned men in the Temple. This is not at all what is meant by 'hearing them, and asking them questions'. No; Jesus was making Himself a pupil, not a teacher. He was sitting to be taught and questioned like other Jewish boys, and as the custom was He also asked questions, not to show off His wisdom, but as a scholar who wished to know more. We are not told what it was that He was being questioned about when He was found. Suppose it had been about the Passover. And suppose those learned men had asked him about the lamb that was sacrificed at the Passover. Would it not have been strange? I do not think He would have told them who He was, or have said, 'I am the true Lamb that will be sacrificed for the whole world'; but He would have known this, and many other things too wonderful to tell them. Whatever it was that they asked Him, we know He answered very wisely, for 'they were astonished at His understanding and answers'.

III. Do you remember what excuse Jesus made when His mother spoke to Him and said, 'Son, why hast Thou thus dealt with us? Behold Thy father and I have sought Thee sorrowing.' [He said He must be about His Father's business.] And who did He mean by His Father? [God.] Yes; His mother had spoken of Joseph as His father, because he had always been like a father to Him, but now Jesus reminds her that His true father is above, and that to Him He owes His first duty. 'How is it that ye sought Me?' He says; 'wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?' They should have known where to look for Him. They should have been sure that it could only be the claims of some higher duty which could make Him give them one moment's anxiety. I think they must have expected something of this sort to happen some time or other. They could never have forgotten the wonderful things that had happened twelve years before. They must often have thought of the angel's wonderful words. Was not this holy Child the Son of God? When would God make Him known to men? Ah! they must wait yet. But they have something new to treasure in their hearts, and to ponder over in their quiet home.

Love God's house. Remember how Jesus loved it. And when you are there, always be about your Father's business.—BISHOP WALSHAM HOW, Plain Words to Children, p. 18.

JESUS CHRIST GOING INTO THE TEMPLE WHEN HE WAS TWELVE YEARS OLD

LUKE II. 46.

Our subject is 'Jesus Christ going into the Temple when He was twelve years old'. Let us read the passage together aloud. Luke II. 42 to 52: 'And when He was twelve years old, they went up to Jerusalem after the custom of the feast. And when they had fulfilled the days, as they returned, the child Jesus tarried behind in Jerusalem; and Joseph and His mother knew not of it. But they, supposing Him to have been in the company, went a day's journey; and they sought Him among their kinsfolk and acquaintance. And when they found Him not, they turned back again to Jerusalem, seeking Him. And it came to pass, that after three days they found Him in the Temple, sitting in the midst of the doctors, both hearing them, and asking them questions. And all that heard Him were astonished at His understanding and answers. And when they saw Him they were amazed: and His mother said unto Him, Son, why hast Thou thus dealt with us? behold, Thy father and I have sought Thee sorrowing. And He said unto them, How is it that ye sought Me? wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business? And they understood not the saying which He spake unto them. And He went down with them, and came to Nazareth, and was subject unto them: but

His mother kept all these sayings in her heart. And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man.'

I. 'How old was Jesus Christ when He went into the Temple?' 'Twelve years old.' Now I want to tell you a little about Jesus being 'twelve years old'.

When a little Jew (and you know Jesus was a Jew), when a little Jew became 'twelve years old,' he was called 'the son of the commandment,' or 'the son of the law'. When he was 'twelve years old,' he was allowed to begin to fast. He might not fast before. When he was 'twelve years old,' it was considered that he could keep the law of God; he could do it understandingly. It was something like when we are confirmed.

And now Jesus was 'twelve years old,' and He became 'a son of the law,' 'a son of the commandment'. He might fast. He might keep the law. He was—as it were—confirmed, when He went up to Jerusalem.

Did Jesus Christ begin His ministry when He was twelve years old? 'No.' It was not right that a boy of twelve years old should begin His ministry. Boys of twelve years old are not ministers. How old was Jesus when He did begin His ministry? 'Thirty.' How old was He when He died? 'Thirty-three.' Mind one thing: Jesus Christ was thirty years preparing for three years' work. Ten-elevenths of His life He spent in preparing. How long do you spend in preparing?

Was Jesus Christ ever a little baby in a cradle? 'Yes.' Was He ever a little boy just beginning to walk and to speak? 'Yes.' Was He ever a big boy and a young man? 'Yes.' It is very pleasant to think of, that at whatever age you are—I do not know how old you are—but whatever age you are—you can think, 'Jesus Christ was exactly my age'. When I see a little tiny baby just born, then I think, 'Jesus was once a little baby'. It seems such an honour to be a little baby. I know that Jesus Christ can feel with little babies—because He was once a little baby. When I see a little child just beginning to toddle along, and saying some little word such as 'mamma,' I think Jesus Christ was just the same. He said His little words. He can feel with little children just beginning to speak. And He can feel with you when you are 'twelve years old'. He knows your difficulties and joys.

Which have greater difficulties—girls and boys, or grown-up people? Much the same, I think. But Jesus can feel with the troubles and joys of every one of every age.

Where was Jesus brought up till He was 'twelve years old'? 'At Nazareth.' Can anybody tell me what Nazareth means? 'The town of the Branch.' That is a beautiful name for it, because Jesus is 'the Branch'. Turn to the eleventh of Isaiah, and the first verse: 'And there shall come forth a rod out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his roots'. And Zechariah calls Him 'the Branch'. So Nazareth—where Jesus was brought up—was ‘the town of the Branch’.

Do you know what Jerusalem means? Some think it means ‘vision of peace’; and others, ‘the possession of peace’. Jesus was brought up in ‘the town of the Branch’; and at ‘twelve years old’ He went up to ‘the possession of peace,’ or ‘vision of peace,’ Jerusalem.

Now I want to ask you a question which I hope you will answer carefully.

Who were Jesus Christ’s father and mother? Now speak carefully, if you please. ‘God and Mary.’ Do not say anything else. He had a Divine Father, and a human mother. He had God for His Father, and Mary for His mother. So you see at once His name ‘Emmanuel,’ God and man; He brought together in one person the Divine and the human; ‘Emmanuel,’ God with us; God in our nature; because He came into our world to bring God and man together. Sin—our wickedness—had separated us from God; Christ came to bring us together. Therefore His very birth showed it. He brought God and man together, because God was His Father and a woman His mother.

But those who were called His parents were ‘Mary and Joseph,’ because Joseph became the husband of Mary afterwards.

His so-called parents then went up to Jerusalem. To what feast was it? ‘The feast of the Passover.’ Can you tell me what time of the year it was? In the spring—the month Abib; partly March, partly April.

How many great feasts were there? ‘Three.’ This was one—the great feast. It was a time when there was a great deal of grass. Perhaps you do not know why I say that. It is very important. Perhaps we shall consider why another day. There was plenty of grass for the people to sit down upon when eating their dinner. When ‘the multitude’ was fed with ‘the five loaves’ there was plenty of grass for them to sit upon. A little after there would have been no grass; but then it was the spring.

They went ‘to keep the feast’. Do you know how long the feast lasted? Seven days. The Feast of Pentecost was only for one day; the Feast of Tabernacles continued eight days. Was Mary bound to go up to Jerusalem? Was Mary ordered to go up? Joseph was, but Mary was not. Only the males went up necessarily; but she, being a very pious woman, and loving her Son very much, she went up with Him and her husband, to keep the Feast of the Passover.

And when ‘the seven days’ were over, then they set off to go home. There was such a crowd! Do you know at that time there generally were in Jerusalem a million of people? Where did they all find beds, do you think? They used to put booths all along the streets, and beds and tents on the tops of the flats, the tops of the houses. So that all the people who came thither used to sleep in booths, or in beds, or on the flat tops of the houses, for otherwise there would not have been room for them.

I mention this because it explains how it was that they did not sooner find out that the child Jesus had been left behind. There was such a crowd, they could not tell where He was. All those seven days He had been with His relations and friends, and His parents thought that He was with them still.

For how many days did they miss Him? ‘Three.’ How many days was Jesus Christ in the grave? ‘Three.’ Then Jesus Christ was lost—could not be seen for three days at the beginning, and then He could not be seen for three days at the end. Some think the one was a type, a likeness of the other. He could not at first be seen for three days, just as after He could not be seen for three days, because He was in the grave.

Because they could not find Him they came back. How far did they come back, do you think? ‘A day’s journey.’ About twenty miles? I do not suppose Mary went so far as twenty miles, as there were a great many weak people amongst them. But missing Him, they went back to the Temple and there sought for Him.

The Temple was built by Solomon, and then destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar; it was built again by?—anybody may answer who can—‘Zerubbabel’. And then it was all built again by Herod the Great. So that you may say it had been built three times.

And the Temple had three courts. Where do you think Jesus was? Would He be allowed to go into the court of the priests, the inside court? I do not think He went into the sacred enclosure then, but into the outside court. There were rooms in the building. I suppose Jesus was in one of these rooms in the outer court.

But who was He with? ‘The doctors.’ What does the word ‘doctors’ mean? Wise men. We call physicians ‘doctors,’ because they are wise men; but the word ‘doctors’ does not mean physicians, but wise men.

II. What was He doing? I want you to be careful about this. What was He doing with the wise men? ‘Asking questions.’ Was He disputing with them? No. Although we may have thought so, He was not disputing. What was He doing? ‘Asking them questions and hearing what they said.’ Did they ask Him questions? ‘Yes.’ How do you know that? It says He asked them questions. It does not say they asked Him questions. But it does say, ‘They were astonished at His answers.’ Therefore they must have asked Him questions. They asked Him some questions, and He asked them some questions, something like it is with us now.

III. I want to know what Jesus said to Joseph and Mary in the Temple. ‘His mother said unto Him, Son, why hast Thou thus dealt with us? behold, Thy father and I have sought Thee sorrowing. And He said unto them, How is it that ye sought Me? Wist ye not that I must be about My Father’s business?’ Will you tell me what the word ‘wist’ means? Do you remember any other place in the Bible where it is used? It says of the manna,

'They wist not what it was!' And of the transfiguration we read, 'Peter wist not what to say'. And St. Peter with the angel, 'He wist not that it was true which was done by the angel'. And St. Paul, 'I wist not that he was the high priest'. The word occurs very often. It is an old word 'to know'. The old Saxon word is wissen; from the word 'knowledge'. 'Wist' is the present tense of the word 'wissen'. 'Wist ye not?' 'Did not you know?'

Now I want you to tell me what we are to learn from the word 'must'. 'Wist ye not—did not ye know—that I must?' Is 'must' a good word to say? It says, 'Must is for a king, but not for his people'. Is it good for us? May you say, 'I must be good; I must love God very much; I must conquer my sins?' Is that good? Very good. And it means this, 'I have got such a feeling in my heart, I cannot help preaching to you; I cannot help trying what I can do for God. I must. I must. I must. "Wist ye not that I must"—I cannot help it—"that I must be about my Father's business?"'

Does Jesus Christ tell us to say, 'My Father'? Now answer very thoughtfully, because I am not going to treat you as little babies. Does Jesus Christ tell us to say, 'My Father'? Never. What does He tell us to say? 'Our Father', not 'my'. The reason is this: that God is Jesus' Father in a different way from that in which He is our Father. If we are Christ's people, then God is our Father; but Jesus can say 'My Father' in a different way to what we can say it. Therefore we are taught to say, 'Our Father'. He says, 'Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?'

IV. What is 'your Father's work?' 'Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?' What is 'My Father's business'? Can you think? I think of five things. Will you think of some? I mean what a boy or girl can say—(I am not speaking of old men and women)—what could they say they had to do for God? I would say, Think what Jesus did—what Jesus did at this time—and how you can be like Him.

The first is, learn wisely. He was learning. Now you may do a great many things for God while you are children; but the great thing is getting ready to be very useful men and women by and by. Everything you learn, think, 'This will make me a useful man, or a useful woman'. It will give me great influence. It will help me to speak to people better. I wish when you are learning a lesson—doing any study—you would think, 'This is our Father's business, because by and by I am going to use this bit of knowledge for God. It will make me useful.' That is the first thing.

What is the next thing? Where was Jesus? In the Temple. Are you and I 'about our Father's business' in this church? I think so. We come to church to pray; to please God; to honour God. Is not that 'our Father's business'? Then love to go to church.

Now think of a third thing. What sort of people was Jesus with, wise people or foolish? 'Wise.' Then that is being about 'our Father's business' to be with wise people—people that do us good.

And all that He had He used well for God. His understanding, all He got by heart, He used for God, not for Himself. That is 'being about our Father's business'.

And one more thing—He was obedient. He was obedient to God; and it says, He was obedient to His parents.—JAMES VAUGHAN.

THE PATTERN OF CHILDHOOD

'And He went down with them, and came to Nazareth, and was subject unto them.'—LUKE II. 51.

THERE are two lessons you can learn from this part of the life of our Lord—Patience, Obedience.

I. Patience.—There is a great deal of impatience in the present day. Children want to be men and women—to be judges of what they may do, and where they may go, and what books they may read—all in a very few years. Remember the patience of the youthful Saviour. His life of work lasted only three and a half years; his life of preparation for it lasted thirty years. Is it not just the opposite with us? We think that a short preparation of a few years is quite enough for a life which may last for even fifty years afterwards. When any of us look back on three years of our life, it seems so short if we measure it by what we have been able to do. What a wonderful three years of work those years of His life were! Is not some of the secret of the wondrous working power of them to be found in the length of the preparation for it?

II. Obedience.—Jesus was subject unto His parents. To think of that fact, to remember who and what He was, ought to teach you better than any words of mine.

We see a great many kinds of obedience to parents which are not real obedience. There are three little words I would ask you to remember; they will be finger-posts pointing you to true obedience. Always do what you are told to do; when you are told to do it; and because you are told to do it. What, When, Because.

What you are told. You know very often you are told to do something you do not quite like, and you do not exactly wish to disobey, and so you go and half do the thing, or do something else which you think will seem just the same. That is not true obedience. Do exactly what you are told.

When you are told. Do it at once. Do not wait and think whether you will obey or not. It becomes more difficult every minute; because your proud little heart rises up against the command, and the devil takes advantage of it, and suggests to you reason after reason why you need not do it just yet. Do at once what your parents, or whoever is in authority over you, tell you.

Because you are told. Do not invent some other reason for doing it. Do not say, 'Well, I'll do it because I like it'; but do it because you have been told to do it. Do not ask, 'Why am I to do it?' You are to do it because you are told to do so. That is quite reason enough.

Remember these two great lessons to be learnt—Patience and Obedience. Do not be self-willed; do not be in a hurry. These may seem small matters, quiet things which do not attract any attention. But remember whose Example we have. Remember that Christ tells us that not only through those three years of toil and work, on which the whole world gazes with admiration and wonder, but through these quiet years of preparation and obedience which are hidden from our sight, He was 'about His Father's business'.

It is no matter whether people see or admire your work or not. There is no work so small, no place so remote when you are praying or working, but God can see it.

When one of the greatest temples in Greece was being built, the most eminent sculptor was seen one day to be working with the greatest care at a figure which was so high up and so hidden away that no one could see it. He worked laboriously with his chisel at the head, carving elaborately the hair, so that it should be as perfect as any figure in the temple; and when some one asked him why he was so careful, and spent so much time on it when no one would see it, he answered nobly, 'The gods will see it'.

So it will be with you. You are the temples of the Holy Ghost. The smallest delicate traceries of daily duty are perhaps unseen by men, but God sees them. Remember that when tempted to do wrong, when struggling to do right, when hesitating to obey, when your heart urges you to think that it does not see too matter—no one will know, no one will see it—God will see it.—T. TEIGNMOUTH SHORE, Saint George for England, p. 147.

SELFISHNESS

'As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them likewise.'—LUKE VI. 31.

WHAT do we mean by selfishness?

Amongst the old Greek fairy tales there is one about a wonderful being called Proteus, who could tell fortunes and do many strange things. But it was very hard to get this Proteus to do what you wanted, for when people tried to catch him he used to change himself into all sorts of shapes—into a beast, a tree, or even fire and water.

Now, selfishness is just like this strange being the Greeks called Proteus. It takes a great many shapes and has a great many names; one of these is rudeness, and others are cruelty, injustice, greediness, and it has many more besides. But I think we may say, in whatever shape we meet selfishness, its real name is 'Too great a love of self,' and a selfish person is one who thinks of himself, and loves himself, and what belongs to him, a great deal more than he ought.

A long time ago there was an architect called Sostratus, who built a watch-tower or lighthouse for the King of Egypt. This, of course, was to warn the sailors to keep away from some very dangerous rocks, and it was kind and thoughtful of the king to have it made. But when the lighthouse was nearly finished, Sostratus had his own name cut in a stone on the wall, and then covered over with plaster, and, as soon as the plaster was dry, wrote on it in gold letters the name of the good king who was so thoughtful about others. Now, why did he write his own name under the plaster? Because he knew in time the waves would wash away the coat of plastering on which was written the good king's name, and then his own would be seen, and so people would praise him for having built this useful tower. You see he was a selfish man, and thought only of his own glory.

I am sure you have all read or heard something of the Prophet Jonah? You remember how God told him to go to Nineveh and preach to the people, telling them He was going to destroy the city in forty days on account of their wickedness. And what did Jonah do? Did he set off at once, glad to do whatever God commanded him? No, look at him; he is going on board a ship which is bound for a place called Tarshish—quite a different way altogether—what is this for? I will tell you. It is because Jonah was a selfish man. He thought if he went and told the people how angry God was with them, they would repent of their wickedness, and then He would forgive them and spare their city and their lives.

Don't you think he ought to have been very glad if his preaching would lead the people to forsake their sins? Yes, but he was only thinking of himself and what people would say of him. He was afraid that men would turn round and say he was a false prophet, and laugh at him, because the things he prophesied didn't come to pass. So, instead of going to Nineveh he fled away to Tarshish. At last, however, he did go—he preached, the people repented, and God spared them, just as he expected. And now look at him! He is sitting just outside the city walls. We should fancy he ought to be very pleased as he looks towards Nineveh, and thinks how the people have turned away from their sins and have been spared. But no; there is a frown on his face, and he seems very sullen and angry. Why? Because a tree or shrub under which he has been sitting has withered away, and he can't get any shelter from the sun, and is feeling very hot and faint with the heat. What does he care about Nineveh and all those thousands of people? Their lives are saved, but he has lost the shade of the tree. And so he is full of anger. What a selfish man, you say. Yes, but let us take care we are not like him, and get into the habit of thinking too much of ourselves.

Let us learn to be unselfish, as Christians should be, and think of others as well as ourselves; indeed we are commanded to prefer one another—that is to put others even before ourselves. You know what Christ did? He thought of Himself last. Why did He leave heaven and come down to live upon earth? Because He cared for us.

We read in the Bible that sometimes He was so busy He had no time even to eat, but we never read that He had no time to heal the sick, or to help all who came to Him.

We read that twice He shed tears, but it was not on account of His own sufferings; once it was when His friends had lost a brother; the other time when He thought of the people of Jerusalem who had rejected Him, and of the sad things that would happen to them.

And on the cross He thought of Himself last. Although He was dying a very cruel and terrible death He thought of others first even then. Do you hear what He is saying?

He is speaking to the penitent thief these words of hope and comfort, 'To-day thou shalt be with Me in Paradise'.

Again He is speaking—this time He is taking care of His mother and providing for her welfare.

And He even cares for those who are putting Him to death, and says, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do'.—R. G. SOANS, Sermons for the Young, p. 51.

THE BOY WHO DIDN'T KNOW HOW TO PLAY

'They are like unto children sitting in the market-place, and calling one to another, and saying, We have piped unto you, and ye have not danced; we have mourned to you, and ye have not wept.'—LUKE VII. 32.

God made boys and girls to play. He made them, of course, that they might do other things too, but He made them to play. Happily for those of us who live in these days we see these things more clearly than some of our forefathers did. The good men of the past did not all look with favour upon play. Even the great and kind John Wesley forbade play at all times. In 1748 when he opened Kingswood School for boarders between the ages of six and twelve, he announced that there would be no holidays, and that no time would be allowed on any day for play. He gave this as his reason that 'he who plays when he is a child will play when he becomes a man'. I don't think we should have liked to go to his school.

Boys and girls have played through all the centuries. In the tombs which have been explored in Egypt there have been found in those of the children the playthings which were theirs. Dolls and models and other toys of which they were doubtless very fond were buried with them. Jeremiah prophesies that in the Jerusalem that is to be, the children shall be seen playing in the streets of the city. Our Saviour watched the children at their games in the market-place, as we can tell from our text, and He saw how their games revealed their character. Some of our most noted men showed by the play of their early years the manner of men they would be.

I. But there are one or two important things to be said about play. In the first place play reveals our character. What we are comes out in our games. It was this fact made our Lord refer to the children playing in the market-place. Possibly He had stood and watched the children as they played. Some of them it would seem had suggested a gladsome game, such as that of the marriage festivities; but their companions were morose and would not play. Then a suggestion of quite an opposite kind was made—if not at weddings would they play at funerals? But still their friends were unyielding. So, said Christ, is it with the Pharisees; they would neither accept John the Baptist and his fasting, nor Christ and His rejoicing. The play in the market-place revealed the character of the children. But so it always does! You can soon tell who is the difficult one to please, and who the selfish one when you join others in their games.

II. Then too our games if rightly entered into are a very fine discipline. We learn to check ourselves. We have to subordinate ourselves to others and to the rules of the game. You have doubtless often heard the expression, 'Let's play the game!' The meaning is, let us do the thing properly; let us keep the rules; don't let us take any undue advantages. To play the game is good discipline. We bring ourselves under control; we work in with others according as the game requires, and that is good for us, for it is their game as well as ours.

Our games also encourage the spirit of perseverance in us. There are few games in which we can excel all at once. If at first we don't succeed, as the poem says, we try again. We learn that it is only by putting our best into what we are doing that we can succeed in our games as in other things, and the lesson we thus learn is remembered all through our life. If some boys had not been so persevering on the football and cricket field they would never have been so persevering when they got out into their business and professional life.

We also learn a certain considerateness for others in our play. A game is not only to minister to our pleasure but to their pleasure too. If the right spirit is in us we never enjoy a game more than when we see that it is also giving enjoyment to others. A good game teaches us that we have to be partners with one another in producing the happiness of all. One boy alone does not make up a cricket or a football team; he must co-operate with many others and they with him.

May our play be such that it shall reveal only those lovable and generous qualities which shall make our character the more attractive.—JOHN EAMES, The Shattered Temple, p. 60.

THE TWO DEBTORS

LUKE VII. 36-50.

In this parable Christ praises the woman, condemns Simon, and defends Himself. It is one of the most beautiful passages in the Bible, and indeed in the whole world. The mere reading of it gives us a feeling of complete beauty. Gregory the Great said, 'As often as I think upon this event, I am more disposed to weep over it than to preach upon it'.

God is the creditor, the debt is sin, and the two debtors are two classes of sinners. The religion of Jesus is like the seed which has two folded-up leaves, the one opening out into roots, the other into fruits. Or it is like the two-celled heart of man, beating with one full stroke of life. Two loves make up the whole of our religion. These are: I. God's Forgiving Love. II. Our Grateful Love.

I. God's Forgiving Love.—Sin is a debt which no sinner can pay. God has His dues, and when we hold these back, we sin and are in debt, and an entry is made against us in His recording book. As all debtors are not equally deep in debt, so all sinners are not equally sinful. Among sinners 'there is no difference' in this, that 'all have sinned and come short,' that no sinner can pay his debt to God, and that our only hope lies in God's forgiving love. Yet some are more guilty in the sight of God than others. In this parable one man's debt is ten times as great as another's, yet both were forgiven with the same frankness or freeness. Both were equally helpless in the hand of justice, and He forgave them from mere grace, or out of free favour, for that is the meaning of the word. The reason why He forgave was not in them, but in Himself: it was not because of something they had done or promised or felt. You are in debt to God, for you have kept from Him the love and service that are His due. Penitence cannot pay your debt; doing your very best cannot undo the past. Mary's tears washed Christ's feet clean, but could not wash away the sins—stains on her soul. You are to do with every self-righteous idea what the Jews did with leaven in their houses at the Passover—search it out and destroy every particle of it.

There are many ways of forgiving a debt. 'Many gifts of men are like blows.' Often a poor debtor has been stung and crushed by the way in which his creditor let him off. But the creditor in the parable forgave the debt frankly, that is, with perfect kindness. The debtor was not wounded, nor was his self-respect spoiled. The favour was doubled by the way in which it was granted. God forgives us gladly, without upbraiding. It is His joy to forgive. His very nature is forgiving love. This is the spirit or genius of the Gospel. Do you really understand it? Do you think of Christ as the woman did, or as Simon did? Which do you side with? Has Christ's forgiving love dropt down upon you?

The love of kindness kindles the love of gratitude in the most savage breast. Dr. Dwight of America tells that an Indian hunter once asked food at an inn in Litchfield. As he had no money, the innkeeper would give him nothing. An English settler, who was looking on, took pity on the Indian, and gave him a good supper. By and by the Indians rose against the English, carried them away captive into Canada and began to torture them. One night an Indian came to the English settler who had given the hunter his supper, and said, 'Follow me'. After several days' march through the forest, they came to the inn at Litchfield. The Indian, looking the Englishman in the face, said, 'I am the hunter to whom you gave the supper in this inn, and I hope I have now paid you for your kindness'. John Howard was cheered with the warmest gratitude from the wild men he found in the prisons all over Europe. We are no men but monsters if God's forgiving love is not followed by—

II. Our Grateful Love.—The debtor owing five hundred pence had no love for his creditor till the debt was forgiven. 'The very heart has been taken out of me,' I have heard a debtor say. Trying to do impossible things, goaded and irritated, his spirit was soured, and his better nature had no room for play. And such is the soul under the burden of owned and unforgiven guilt. But forgiveness roots out fear and plants gratitude. In taking away your debt of sin, it lays upon you a debt of honour and love. 'Gratitude is the memory of the heart,' that is, a never-dying sense of benefits received. Christian love is gratitude spreading itself over the whole life. The growing spirit of the forgiven is moulded into obedience in the flame of gratitude. Seest thou not in this woman the exquisite beauty of fresh grateful love? In presence of wondering crowd and scowling Pharisees she owns Christ as her Saviour. Taking the most precious thing she has, the ointment she used for herself in her days of vanity, she spends it all upon her Master. Precious ointment in the East has a value we can hardly understand, and its delicious perfume is a fitting emblem of generous gratitude. To her premeditated anointing add her 'unpremeditated tears,' her wiping of Christ's feet, and her kissing of them. How interesting and full the proof of her love! In verses 44-46 Christ notices minutely every act of it, and with evident pleasure rehearses it to Simon. Each token of grateful love is dear to Him, and He will not let it die. He must praise and reward her. He completes her joy, and speaks His benediction over her.

1. This woman teaches us that true love gives great gifts.—She gave the best she had, sorry that her best was so poor, and fain to make it more. Like her, you should count the very feet of Christ, the humblest parts of His service, worthy of your very best. Simon had not true love, and so his gifts were stunted and mean. Christ's gifts to us are very great, and in our best moods we wish our gifts to Him to be great also. Gratitude for His priceless gifts should have a generous outflow. For we may be quite sure that nothing is wasted which springs from love to Christ. Yet He prizes our love more than all the gifts of love. The precious box of ointment by itself is worth nothing to Him. It is told in Dr. Raleigh's Life that his girl, who was little more than a baby, was made happy by a monthly allowance of one halfpenny. In the joy of her great prosperity, she went immediately to her father in the study and said, 'Papa, I am going to allow you a farthing a month,' adding as she put the coin into his hand, 'And this is your December farthing'. Silver and gold could not have pleased him like that little donation, and he never parted with it. The gifts a little child can give, if flowing from real gratitude, are great in the sight of Jesus.

2. True love does new things.—This woman invented a new way of honouring Christ, while Simon coldly kept to old poor ways. True love gives a freshness to your actions. It makes all things new, and creates a life of new obedience. Very unlike the old, worn-out, threadbare, hackneyed obedience of those to whom duty is not joy, nor law love. Grateful love is not a poor copier and imitator; it is an original and a genius, striking out ways of its own, and lighting its own fires. Rather, I should say, its fires are kindled not at a neighbour's hearth, but by a live coal from heaven, and the generous flames shape themselves into new forms. Love does not need second-hand clothes.

3. True love does everything beautifully.—Great painters like Correggio have been charmed with the beauty of this deed, and have vied with one another to do justice to it. They rightly believed that her deep love gave a surpassing beauty to her features and a perfect grace to all her movements. Poured-out ointment has in that hot climate a very sweet smell, which gives a sort of rapture to the Orientals. That sweet smell is itself a parable, and represents the charm which attends all the deeds of heartfelt gratitude. For 'familiar acts are beautiful through love'. But you can never reach this heavenly beauty by striving after it. For it grows only upon those who receive all God's forgiving love, and who wish to love Him in return with the whole heart.—
JAMES WELLS, The Parables of Jesus, p. 85.

A STROLL THROUGH THE FIELDS

'A sower went out to sow his seed.'—LUKE VIII, 5.

THE seed is the Word of God—the lessons you learn from the Bible; and those who teach are the sowers. But what are the fields? Well, you are the fields.

We go out across the farm-yard, and through the gate, and here is the first field, 'the hard field'.

'Ah,' says the farmer, with a sigh, 'I can do nothing with this field, the ground is so hard'; and as he strikes it with his stick, it rings as if it were a stone. 'And yet you don't know what trouble I have taken with it. It is so hard that I can get nothing into it: more like a road than a field.'

I think you know that field. In the Sunday school, and in the house of God, and in the home, I have often seen that field. Lesson after lesson is sown, and all sorts of good seed, but nothing seems to go in. The love of God, the story of Jesus, the wickedness of sin, all seem to be lost. The heart is so dreadfully hard, that no seed can get under the surface.

This is very sad. 'Will it always be so hard, farmer?' you ask, wondering. And now listen to what the farmer says: 'No, no; I hope not. You remember what David says in the sixty-fifth Psalm, Thou makest it soft with showers. Only the rain from heaven can loosen the hard-baked earth, and open the ground so that the seed can get in and live. We must ask our Father in heaven to send that.' So there is a cure for the hard field of our hearts. He will send upon us His Holy Spirit, then the hardness is gone. The hard field becomes the good ground, and brings forth much fruit.

Leaving this field, we pass on until we come to a gate, and stop to look at the next field. 'Now,' says the farmer, 'this is my "weedy field".'

There is no mistake about that; weedy enough, indeed. As we come along by the hedge, our finger is stung by a tall nettle; and as we get out of the way of that, we are pricked by a sharp-leaved fellow with his gay red cap on his head—the thistle. But they are not all such disagreeable weeds as these. There is a patch of yellow charlock, and the pretty wild convolvulus, and the scarlet poppy, and many other flowers. Yet they are all weeds. They have no business there, and they prevent the good seed from coming forth.

'You would scarcely believe how much seed I have put into this field,' the farmer tells us. 'And now look at it! Why, if I had never sown a grain it could scarcely have been worse.'

Ah! who does not know the weedy fields? Boys and girls who have been carefully taught and anxiously looked after, and yet there came nothing but weeds. These boys with the good seed sown in them, began to quarrel afterwards; so there came nettles and thorns instead of good fruit. This girl has the good seed in her heart, but she begins to think unkind thoughts, and perhaps to say spiteful things; so comes a prickly thistle instead of good seed.

And these flowers—they were weeds because they were in the wrong place. Very good in a garden, but here, where they choked much good seed, they were very bad. Laughing is a good thing, but laughing in the wrong place is a weed. Talking is a good thing, and nothing is more foolish than to think that children should be seen and not heard. If God has given you ears and a tongue—two ears and one tongue, remember—He does not intend you to be deaf and dumb. But talking in the wrong place helps to fill up the weedy field.

We can clear the weedy field; but this must be your prayer, 'Create in me a clean heart, O God!'

Passing from that field, the farmer says in a low whisper, 'Now if you go quietly, and cross this lane, and up the bank to the next gate, you will see a strange sight. This is "the bird field".'

Directly our heads appear, up fly all sorts of birds. There are swift wood-pigeons, that go flying into the distance; there are lazy rooks, wheeling into the air, and flapping out of danger with a 'caw, caw,' as much as to say, 'We are not caught yet'. The blackbirds fly screaming into the hedge, and little birds rise up from the field in a cloud.

And whilst we lean over the gate listening to the merry lark, we can't help thinking that we know many fields just as badly off as this. How many boys and girls there are in whom all the good seed is eaten up by the fowls of the air; and who does not know the names of many of these birds?

A busy bold little bird that steals much good seed on all sides, is called Inattention. Then there is the chattering Magpie, a great thief; busy whispering here and there, and humming and buzzing; a very destructive bird is this.

Then there is another bird that is almost worse than these. He steals very much more good seed and spoils as much as he steals. Can you guess his name? He never sings. He hears the others singing on the other side of the hedge sometimes, but he himself is as dumb as the bat—it is Always late, who doesn't come in time for the hymn.

There is one bird more that I have found in Sunday schools. In some places he is so much disliked that they keep people to go round and kill him wherever they can find him. He keeps the field from getting any good seed at all. His name is Absent. Take care, and never let him come near you.

One day as I was going through the fields I met a little sharp-eyed fellow standing by the stile as if he were very glad to see anybody in that lonely place. In his hands he held two pieces of stick that he kept knocking together with a loud noise. 'Click—clack, click—clack,' went the little fellow. 'What are you doing, my boy?' I asked. He was making such a noise that he could not hear what I said. He stopped, and then I asked him again what he was doing that for. 'Why, I'm scaring the birds, sir,' he cried out. And as a rook settled at the end of the field he ran away after it with a click—clack, click—clack, that soon sent it flying. That is what we must all do. We must all scare away birds that eat the good seed.—MARK GUY PEARSE, Sermons for Children, p. 77.

BIG-HEARTED

'Who is my neighbour?'—LUKE x. 29.

Nor a very difficult question to answer, you would think. Why, he had only to go next door and inquire, if he wanted to know! Yes, but we have more neighbours than those who dwell near us; only nobody thought of this till Jesus came and taught us. Before then people asked not, 'Who is my neighbour?' but, 'Who isn't my neighbour? Whom am I not obliged to be kind to? Whom may I pass by and care nothing about?' They did not want to find out whom they should love and help, but rather to find out whom they were not obliged to love. As if you could love anybody because you were obliged! Why, the moment you say to love, or to sympathy, or to charity, 'You are obliged to do it,' it ceases to be love or sympathy or charity, and becomes duty and taxes—duty and taxes only.

Do not get this kind of religion into your heart. There is a good deal of it about, so you must watch against infection. There are people, that is, who are always asking, 'Must I do this for Christ's sake?

Must I do that?' They are always wanting to discover what is the least they can do to be saved. That is not love's way; love's way is to find out what is the most it can do, and it does not wait to be obliged at all; it simply does it because it will please the Lord. That is the right religion—the religion which asks not, 'Who isn't my neighbour?' but 'who is?—who is the one I can help and be kind to?'

And Jesus tells us: He says it isn't the person next door, just because he is next door, or the person in the next street, because he happens to be in the next street; it is that person anywhere in all the world who needs our help, and to whom we can give it.

Be big-hearted; do not ask, 'What is the least I can do to show my love for Jesus?' but, 'What is the most?'—J. REID HOWART, The Children's Preacher, p. 152.

THE BEST DISH

'Mary hath chosen the good part.'—LUKE x. 42.

THE words rendered 'Mary hath chosen the good part,' mean 'Mary hath chosen the good portion, the best dish, the Benjamin's mess'. It is as though He had said to the careful and fretted housekeeper: 'You are very kind, Martha; you are doing your best to please Me, and to give Me as good a dinner as you can: and yet it is Mary who has brought Me the best dish, the food I like most. She is nourishing and refreshing My spirit with her love and sympathy. She is giving Me an opportunity of feeding her with the bread of life and the wine of the kingdom. Our fellowship with each other is the true feast. And you, O you poor Martha, are so taken up with yourainties that you are losing the feast!'

I. First, I will tell you what I think the one thing needful is. I believe it is that love for God and man which quickens and sustains the true life within us, and redeems us from all anxieties for the many things of our outward life.

And, now, think for yourselves whether that is not true. Do you remember the Young Ruler whom Jesus loved because he was so lovable, so pure, devout, aspiring, but to whom, although He loved him, He said, One thing thou lackest? The one thing he lacked was the one thing needful, the good portion which Mary chose. What was it, then, that this young man, who had so much, had not? It was love, love for God and man. Not that he did not love them at all. He loved God well enough to keep His commandments, so far as he understood them; and he loved men well enough to win their love in return. But he was not perfect in love. He did not love them well enough to sell all that he had, and give it to the poor, in order that he might share the homeless and troubled life of the Good Master who had given up all for Him. He had not the love which casts out all fear and all care. He could not throw himself wholly on the goodness and bounty of God, and pursue what he felt to be the best and noblest aims at all risks and costs. He had not the love which breeds so true and constant a trust in God as to make all that is God's ours, which makes us rich even when we are poor, and strong even when we are weak, and glad even when we are sorrowful. And hence he left the best Man he had ever met, and fell short of the best and highest life of which he had ever caught a glimpse. In other words, the best dish was set before him, and he would not eat of it.

But what he lacked Mary had. She counted the world well lost, if only she could win Christ and follow Him. Nothing was too good for Him; nothing either too small or too great to be given up for Him, or consecrated to His use: nothing—from a dinner to the costly alabaster vase full of precious ointment. And why did she love Him with this utter devotion, this all-forsaking, all-sacrificing, all daring enthusiasm? Because she saw God in Him; because words of eternal life came from His mouth; because she felt that in Him the very loftiest and noblest ideals and aims of human life stood, 'breathing human breath' before her; because she felt that to share His life, His loving devotion to God and man, must be the highest good. Even from the little we are told of her we may be quite sure that Mary was capable of all things—all sacrifices, all toils, all heroisms; that she counted neither life nor the good things of life dear to her, if only she might engage in the service and share the love of Christ. We may feel sure, we do feel sure, that if He had said to her, as He said to the young ruler, 'Sell all that thou hast, and follow Me,' she would have sold all that she had without a pang, and followed Him to the end of the world. In short, she knew that this all-trusting and devoted love is the best thing, the best dish or portion, life has to offer; the one thing needful, the one thing sufficient.

II. Love, then, the love of God, a love so true that it breeds trust, and a trust so true that it redeems us from all care and fear—this is the best dish, the best portion, the one thing needful; the one thing, lacking which we lack all, whatever else we have. This is the dish of which Mary ate with Christ, and of which the Young Ruler refused to eat, at least for a time.—SAMUEL COX, The Bird's Nest, p. 113.

RELIGIOUS HUMBUGS

LUKE XI. 42.

I. HUMBUG is a compound of hum, to cheat, and bug, to charm falsely. The thing called humbug is always detested by honest and upright characters wherever it manifests itself, but when associated with religion it is positively loathed. It is like mixing together the odour of the honeysuckle and the stench of the sewer, or the music of the harp with the screech of the peacock. The association reveals not only an absurdity and an incongruity that jars and irritates, but a 'corruption and a putrescence that sickens and offends'. Of all the objectionable creatures on God's earth, therefore, the most objectionable is the 'religious humbug'. And of all the hateful practices of sinful and mistaken men, the cultivation and the manifestation of this hybrid thing is the most insulting to God and the most degrading to man.

II. Consider the Effect of this 'Religious Humbug' upon its Cultivators.—Man always and everywhere is the living embodiment of his religion. There is a blind weaver in one of J. M. Barrie's books who professes to tell what is the religion of every man who passes his window from the sound of his footsteps. We are not sure as to the effect of one's religious creed upon the movement of his feet, but we can testify from a life-long observation to the fact of its being reflected in one's facial expression. There are not a few downright offensive humbugs who are simply mistaken—honestly mistaken—in their views of things. Of course they are quite as hard to bear sometimes as the others, but you think differently of them, though you feel the same towards them. These have a thimbleful or two of grace hidden away in the recesses of their souls, but they have not made the right use of it. The majority of humbugs, however, are of the class which our Lord denounced as white sepulchres—they make religion the vehicle to advance their own mean and selfish purposes. In themselves they are standing insults to God, and a standing disgrace to humanity.

Young people, we appeal to you as those who will be largely responsible for the kind of Christianity that will be handed down to the twentieth century. In forming and in living your own religion, have no model but Christ! In endeavouring to live the Christ-life in the world, lay no stress upon the way this, that, and the other person says you ought to live it. Look to Christ alone for guidance, for light, and for information; then the result will be worthy of Christ. The intelligent, the broad-minded, the large-hearted members of the race will be drawn towards Christianity as you represent it, and find that they are elevated and ennobled in adopting and living it themselves! We invite you to—

III. Consider its Effects on its Witnesses.—It is a very lamentable fact that no other cause has alienated so many people, especially young people, from religion as 'religious humbug'. To be unreal and deceptive in regard to what is professed as the most sacred thing in the world, is a crime that creates one of the strongest loathings ever nourished in the human breast. The lust for wealth, the greed for power, the ambition for popularity, the desire for fame, and other similar feelings, have, from time to time, produced types of humanity we are ashamed to own as fellow-beings. But our souls have not revolted so entirely against any of these as they do against the man who affects religion. Religion, pure and undefiled, to be admired needs but to be seen. But religiosity, however thoroughly cultivated, needs but to be taught to be cordially hated. Piety, honest and unaffected, needs but to be witnessed to be ardently desired as a possession; but pietism, however good an imitation of the other, needs but to be understood to be despised and rejected. Goodness, genuine and thorough, needs but to be known absolutely to be loved passionately and universally; but goodness, however beautifully dressed, needs but to be discovered to be condemned and ostracised from all upright souls.

We call upon you not to measure the Apostles of Christianity by the Judases and the Demases, but by the Johns and the Peters. Do not measure Christians by the humbings, but by the lofty characters—the Frances Willards, the George Müllers, the William Ewart Gladstones. Christ's religion is Sunshine, Music, Love. On all this fair earth there is nothing fairer than the life which is lived after a model of Christ's own. Every flower that blooms in the face of the sun, every green leaf that spreads in the warm breezes of June, every gold-tipped cloudlet spread out on the blue expanse of heaven, every seven-hued rainbow that spans the green space between river and brook, every caressing sunbeam that writes peace and life on the face of nature—they all contain some phase of beauty which is peculiarly their own—they all reflect the highest glory on the Divine Artist which fashioned and made them; but if you want to see His highest product, His Magnum Opus, the most beautiful of all the things He delights in, you must look at the Christian life at its best. This is the life we plead that you will strive to live, the life that is life indeed.—H. ELWYN THOMAS, Pulpit Talks to Young People, p. 51.

THE WARNING AGAINST COVETOUSNESS

'Take heed and beware of covetousness.'—LUKE XII. 15.

I. The First Reason Why we should Mind this Warning is 'That Covetousness will Destroy our Happiness'.—The true secret of being happy is to mind what God tells us. This is what David means when he says: 'Then shall I not be ashamed'—or then shall I be truly happy—'when I have respect unto all Thy commandments' (Ps. cxix. 6). This proves the truth of what has just been said—that minding God is the secret of true happiness. You remember it was just so with Adam and Eve when they were in the garden of Eden. So long as they minded what God told them they were perfectly happy. But as soon as they left off minding God, and made up their minds to eat of the fruit of the tree of which God had said they must not eat, then they lost all their happiness.

And it is just the same with ourselves. God requires us to love Him with all our hearts, and to keep His commandments. If we do this it will surely make us happy. But if we let the love of money, or any other feeling which God has forbidden, take the place of His love in our hearts, then it is impossible for us to be happy.

There was once a nobleman living in Scotland who was very rich. But his covetousness, or love of money, was very great. Whenever he received any money he turned it into gold and silver, and stowed it away in a great chest which he kept in a strong vault that had been built for this purpose down in the cellar.

One day a farmer, who was one of his tenants, came in to pay his rent. But when he had counted out the money he found that it was just one farthing short; yet this rich lord was such a miser that he refused the farmer a receipt for the money until the other farthing was paid. His home was five miles distant. He went there and came back with the farthing. He settled his bill and got his receipt.

Then he said, 'My lord, I'll give you a shilling if you'll let me go down into your vault and look at your money'.

His lordship consented, thinking that was an easy way to make a shilling. So he led the farmer down into the cellar and opened his big chest, and showed him the great piles of gold and silver that were there. The farmer gazed at them for a while, and then said:—'Now, my lord, I am as well off as you are.'

'How can that be?' asked his lordship.

'Why, sir,' said the farmer, 'you never use any of this money. All that you do with it is to look at it. I have looked at it too, and so I'm just as rich as you are.'

That was true. The love of that selfish lord for his money made him think of it day and night, and the fear lest some robber should steal it took away all his comfort and happiness, and made him perfectly miserable.

Three men who were once travelling together found a large sum of money on the road. To avoid being seen they went into the woods near by to count out the money and divide it among themselves. They were not far from a village, and as they had eaten up all their food they concluded to send one of their number, the youngest of the company, into the village to buy some more food, while they would wait there till he came back.

He started on his journey. While walking to the village he talked to himself in this way: 'How rich my share of this money has made me! But how much richer I should be if I only had it all! And why can't I have it? It is easy enough to get rid of those other two men. I can get some poison in the village and put it into their food. On my return I can say that I had my dinner in the village, and don't want to eat any more. Then they will eat the food and die, and so I shall have all this money instead of only having one-third of it.'

But while he was talking to himself in this way, his two companions were making a different arrangement. They said to each other, 'It is not necessary that this young man should be connected with us. If he was out of the way we could each have the half of this money instead of only one-third. Let us kill him as soon as he comes back.' So they got their daggers ready, and as soon as the young man came back they plunged their daggers into him and killed him.

They then buried his dead body, and sat down to eat their dinner of the poisoned food which had been brought to them. They had hardly finished their dinner before they were both seized with dreadful pains, which soon ended in their death. And here we see how the happiness and the lives of those three men were destroyed by the love of money. The first reason why we ought to mind this warning, and beware of covetousness, is because it will destroy our happiness.

II. The Second Reason Why we should Mind this Warning is 'That Covetousness will Injure our Usefulness'.—One of the ways in which we can make ourselves useful is by the right use of our money. It is not necessary that we should be rich in order to be useful. If we are not covetous, we may do much good with very small sums of money.

III. Covetousness will Lessen or Lose our Reward.—We know how it is with farmers. At the close of the summer the time for harvest comes. Then they expect to reap their fields and stow away the crops gathered there in their barns. And intelligent, right-minded farmers are always very careful not to do anything that will be likely to lessen or lose their harvests. They know very well that if they do some things or neglect to do some others, the effect will be bad upon their harvest. If they should neglect to plough their ground; if they should not sow the right kind of seed; or if they should not sow it at the right time, their harvest must suffer from it. Either they will have no harvest at all, or else it will be poor and unsatisfactory.

Now we are just like farmers in this respect. The present life is our seed-time for eternity, the time for our ploughing and sowing. And the reward which God promises to those who are faithful in ploughing and sowing is the harvest that awaits us in heaven. And what that reward or harvest will be must depend entirely on how we are living, and what we are doing now. If we are real Christians, trying to serve God faithfully, and are making a right use of the money He gives us, and of the opportunities of usefulness which He affords us—then we may look for a glorious reward when our harvest-time comes. But if we are loving money instead of loving God, and are not using our money as God wants us to use it, then we are doing that which will certainly have the effect of either lessening our reward or of causing us to lose it altogether. We are making it certain that our harvest will either be very poor and unsatisfactory, or else that we shall have no harvest at all.

Some years ago, near Atlanta, in Georgia, there lived a man who was a member of the church. He was a person of some influence in that neighbourhood. But he was a covetous man, very fond of money, and always unwilling to pay his debts. He had a little grand-daughter, about nine years old, who was living with him. She was a bright, intelligent young Christian. She had heard of her grandpa's love of money, and his unwillingness to pay his debts spoken of, and it grieved her very much.

One morning, as they were sitting at breakfast, she said, 'Grandpa, I had a dream about you last night.'

'Had you? Well, tell me what it was.'

'I dreamed that you died last night. I saw the angels come to take you to heaven. They took you in their arms, and began to go up till they were almost out of sight. Then they stopped and flew round awhile, but without going any higher. Presently they came down with you and laid you on the ground, when their leader said:—

"My friend, you are too heavy for us. We can't carry you up to heaven. It's your debts that weigh you down. If you settle with those you owe, we will come for you again before long."

The old gentleman was very much touched by this. He saw the danger he was in from his covetousness. He resolved to struggle against it. The first thing after breakfast he went to his room and in earnest prayer asked God to forgive his sin, and to help him to overcome it. Then he went out and paid all his debts; and after that was always prompt and punctual in paying what he owed. So he minded the warning of the text, and was kept from losing his reward. Not long after this he really died, and then the angels had no trouble in carrying him up to heaven.—RICHARD NEWTON, Bible Warnings: Addresses to Children, p. 34.

GOD'S FOOL

LUKE XII. 20.

This man, to all outward appearance, was a spirited, enterprising man, looking well and keenly after his interests, prospering in his calling, and making the best of his possessions; and yet God, who knew him well, who saw his motives, who understood the most hidden thought of his soul, calls him 'a fool'. The question very naturally arises: 'Why?' There are at least four reasons. God calls him a 'fool'—

I. Because he Ignored his Maker.—On that memorable night of his life when he reviews the evolution of his prosperity, he ascribes all his success to himself. God is absolutely ignored. It is himself who has done it all, his own industry, his own sagacity, his own talent, his own genius. God has contributed nothing! At least, one might think so by hearing his account of it. He does not absolutely say with his mouth that God did nothing, but like his prototype, which the Psalmist speaks of, he says so in his heart. He made no declaration at all upon the subject, but simply ignored the idea as one unworthy of even a thought. The very highest insult you can offer a man is to ignore him, not only the small-souled abominably conscious manikin, who thinks the eyes of the world are made to rest on his perfections, and that it might as well have no eyes at all if it does not see them, but the large-souled, generous, dignified man of sense and worth. You cannot vex and grieve him more deeply and painfully in any way than by ignoring him.

II. Because he made Self the Centre of all Things.—Listen to his soliloquy, 'This will I do'. His ruling spirit is selfishness. He lives and moves and has his being in a capital I. His mean life's motto is 'Get all you can, and keep all you get'. How sordid and selfish it all sounds. My fruits, my goods, and my barns and my soul—all narrowed down to the limited circle of an ego. Self was his pole-star. He cared for himself, and for none besides; to please himself was his all-absorbing purpose.

III. Because he Regards the Future as his Own.—At first you scarcely thought God fair in calling this man a fool, he looked so wise, so rational, so far-seeing; but the nearer you come to him and the more you hear of his soliloquy the plainer it appears why God so branded him. 'And I will say to my soul, "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years."' Because he had the goods he thought he had the years also. Because he had, through God's grace, prospered in the past he assumes he is lord of the future. We are afraid that God's fool has more imitators in this phase of his foolishness than in any other.

When you prepare for the future there must be another by your side—He who is always the same. Do this on ever so large a scale, and God will bless, prosper, guide, and love you. God calls this man 'a fool'—

IV. Because he Attempts to Feed his Soul with Bodily Food.—This man's address to his soul is one of the most brazen utterances ever recorded among human sayings. 'Soul, thou hast much goods . . . eat, drink, and be merry.' These 'goods' really formed the whole of this man's life. Apart from them he had no thought, no property, no ambition. He was known by his possessions.

We all shrink to-day from the suggestion that a man's life consists of his 'goods'. And yet, how many live and act as if they were. How little of manhood and womanhood there is about some persons we know. Take away their goods, their gold, their land, their property, and there is nothing left, only a miserable grinning thing whom nobody likes, loves, or respects. In the midst of their wealth they are loved, courted, and admired, but by themselves they are scorned and hated, and deserve the treatment.

Young people, beware of seeking possessions and not life. Beware of so setting your hearts upon such things that you will lose yourself in them. 'What's the value of this estate?' asked one gentleman of another as they passed the wide and fertile acres around a baronial mansion. 'I don't know, but I can tell you how much they cost their latest owner.' 'How much?' 'They cost him his soul.' Alas, how many there are who have bought their property with the same price. They have lost their manhood in what they have acquired, so that they are only known to-day through and by what they have. The promising young man is lost in the athlete. The graceful young woman is hidden by the courted coquette. The thing paid for by a soul is that which gives a name and character to the man or woman who disappeared when the price was paid. And some think that there is pleasure and happiness to be obtained in this way. They may as well think that heaven is on the way to hell. Happiness, true happiness, is only obtainable when the soul is fed by the things of the soul, when the higher nature is fed at the table of God.—H. ELWYN THOMAS, Pulpit Talks to Young People, p. 84.

RAVENS, LILIES, AND SPARROWS

'Consider the Ravens . . . Consider the lilies. . . Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings, and not one of them is forgotten before God?'—LUKE XII. 24, 27, 6.

CONSIDER the ravens, the lilies, and the sparrows. Watch them closely. Observe their habits. Think about them. Learn the lessons which they teach. Holiday time is coming on. Many of you will be in the country, enjoying yourselves among the birds and the flowers. Do not forget to thank God for the enjoyment He gives you through the beauties of nature, and try to learn something from His works about your Heavenly Father and His love.

Why did Jesus say, 'Consider the ravens and the lilies'? He was teaching His disciples not to be anxious. Do you know what anxiety is? You know a little. Some boys and girls are anxious about their lessons, and anxious about their examinations, whether they will pass, or get a prize. Fathers and mothers of large families are often anxious about food and clothes for their children. John wears out his boots very quickly, and Mary is wanting a new frock, and there are a number of little hungry mouths to be fed at dinner-time. How in the world are you to provide for them month after month and year after year. 'Consider the ravens. Consider the lilies.' Did you ever see an anxious raven? The flowers are always well dressed; and the birds sing merrily, and seem as happy as the day is long. Work as hard as you can at your lessons and your business, but never be anxious. 'Do your best and leave the rest.' Boys and girls are not anxious about their clothes or their dinners, for they think father and mother will provide; and fathers and mothers might learn a lesson from their children, and remember that 'the Lord will provide'.

I. Consider the Ravens.—Why should Jesus choose ravens of all the birds of the air for His object-lesson? Perhaps because they are hungry birds. Sometimes you are ravenously hungry—that is, you are as hungry as a raven. But there is food enough in God's larder for all the ravens in the world. 'He giveth to the beast his food and to the young ravens which cry;' and even in the time of famine the ravens were so well fed that after their own wants were satisfied they brought bread and flesh in the morning, and bread and flesh in the evening, to God's prophet Elijah.

Again, ravens are very plain birds. I do not like to call them ugly, but certainly they are not beautiful. You would not make a pet of a raven as you do of a canary or a robin redbreast. And the raven has a most unpleasant and unmusical voice; he seems to be always hoarse, and does not sing but croak. However, that does not matter. He is hungry and he 'cries,' and that is enough for God. It is not the fine words of a prayer, but our need and our earnestness which go to our Father's heart, and Jesus turns to His anxious disciples and says, 'God feedeth the ravens; how much more are ye better than the fowls?'

II. Consider the Lilies.—In the beautiful months of June and July the gardens and fields are full of flowers. Lilies and lilacs and laburnums and sweet-peas and honeysuckles and roses. The country is gay with their beauty, and the air is scented with their fragrance. Little girls are sometimes proud of their smart new frocks, and princes and princesses of their rich robes and court dresses, but look at the finest fabrics through the microscope, and you will find they are coarse and clumsy by the side of the lilies of the field. 'I say unto you, that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.' Now lilies have but a very short life. They are not like boys and girls, and men and women, for whom Christ has died, that they may live with Him for ever in His glorious home in heaven. 'If then God so clothe the grass, which is to-day in the field, and to-morrow is cast into the oven; how much more will He clothe you, O ye of little faith?'

III. Consider the Sparrows.—Of all birds they are the commonest and the cheapest. 'Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings?' In Matthew x. 29 Jesus says, 'Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing?' They are each worth half a farthing, but if you take five the seller will give them for the price of four. Something like 'Oranges! a penny each, three for twopence'. Poor little birds! they are very cheap—of very little value—rather shabby to look at—they have no strength like falcons or eagles, no song like blackbirds or thrushes, no plumage like doves or humming-birds, and there are thousands and thousands of them. I wonder how many thousands are to be found in the streets of Glasgow, and in Scotland, and in Europe, and in the world, and of all these thousands and millions 'not one of them is forgotten before God. But even the very hairs of your head are all numbered. Fear not therefore: ye are of more value than many sparrows.' You are made in the image of God. Christ shed His precious blood for you. Shall not all your needs be supplied? Therefore, work hard, but do not be anxious, for Jesus forbids anxiety.—F. H. ROBERTS, Sunday Morning Talks, p. 174.

THE GOOD SHEPHERD AND HIS KINGDOM

'Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.'—LUKE XII. 32.

St. AUGUSTINE, the Bishop of Hippo, in Africa, was once sitting on the beach writing a book about the Mystery of the Ever Blessed Trinity, and he saw a little boy digging a hole in the sand with a spade, just as you might see on the beach at Brighton. St. Augustine asked him what he was doing, and the little boy answered that he was going to put the great ocean into the hole he was digging; and when the Saint told him he would never be able to do such a thing, he told St. Augustine how equally impossible it was for him to ever explain the Mystery of the Blessed Trinity in a book.

Although we cannot know very much about Jesus we can all get to know Him, for He says, 'I am the Good Shepherd, and know Mysheep, and am known of Mine'. So it must be the wish and earnest prayer of all to know the Good Shepherd. We get to know Him by always listening for His voice, when He speaks to us through our conscience, and obeying when we hear it. 'The sheep follow Him, for they know His voice.' And we get to know Him by praying to Him, and by telling him all our little troubles and our sins, and asking Him to help us. We get to know Him by telling Him our joys, and thanking Him for them, telling Him everything, just as we should tell our friends everything; and after all Jesus is our dearest friend; for He came down from His glorious throne in heaven, and died for us, to save us from the consequences of our sins, and then He ascended into heaven to prepare a place for each one of us there, that we might live with Him.

You are some of the lambs the Good Shepherd loves so well.

The Good Shepherd, once Himself a child, is the children's Saviour who said, 'Suffer the little children to come unto Me'.

So you see how much the Good Shepherd loves His lambs; and the more you get to know Him the more you will love Him; and He has sent me here to tell you about the kingdom He has gone to prepare for you.

Let us think then, first, of The Way to the Kingdom. Well, the way to that kingdom is along 'the Paths of Righteousness'. But it is not easy to keep to 'the Paths of Righteousness'.

So the Good Shepherd helps us. When He sees us straying He speaks to us through our conscience, and tells us of the danger we are in; and if we obey His voice He will lead us back into 'the Paths of Righteousness' which lead to the kingdom. We are not His sheep unless we obey Him when He speaks to us. His own sheep 'follow Him, for they know His voice'.

Then He says, 'I am the Good Shepherd, and know My sheep'. He knows you by the name given you when you became His own in Holy Baptism. He knows all about you. He knows whether you are trying to please Him. Remember that the way to the kingdom is along 'the Paths of Righteousness'; and it is by listening to the Good Shepherd's voice that you will keep to those paths.

Once when I was travelling in Wales a man in the same railway carriage told me he had just found out the happiness of loving the Good Shepherd, and had just been baptised; and when we parted he said, 'There's no life like it'. And you too, when you try hard to follow Jesus along 'the Paths of Righteousness,' will find the joy of living close to Jesus, and will be able to say from your hearts that there is no life like it.

Let us think of The End of our Journey.

It may end at any time. We ought to think of that sometimes, and to ask ourselves, before it is too late, if we are journeying along the road that leads to the kingdom Jesus has prepared for us.

Death is the end of our journey, and we can never take this journey over again. Remember there are two roads. There is the narrow way along 'the Paths of Righteousness' that leads to Life, and there is the broad way leading to Destruction. The journey will not last for ever, but the place to which we are journeying will last for ever. We shall live for ever either with Jesus or in that dreadful place prepared for those who refuse Him. It entirely depends on which road we take now, as to which of these two kingdoms we find ourselves in at last. It is 'Our Father's good pleasure to give us the kingdom'; so if we would reign for ever with Jesus in heaven, how careful we must be not to stray from 'the Paths of Righteousness' now. The end of the journey will come for all of us, sooner or later; and if we have been trying to keep to 'the Paths of Righteousness' we have no reason to be afraid of the hour of our death, because the Good Shepherd will not leave us to die alone. We can say to Him, 'Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me'.

Think of The Entrance into the Kingdom. When we have come to the end of our journey we shall have to wait until that day when we are judged.

The Good Shepherd will be our judge, and we shall none of us be able to escape from judgment.

'Before Him shall be gathered all nations.' Let us see what will happen to them. 'He shall separate them, one from another, as a shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats; and He shall set the sheep on His right hand, but the goats on His left.' He will say to the sheep, 'Come, ye blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world'. That will be the everlasting reward of those who try all they can to please the Good Shepherd; but it will be very different with the goats—those wicked people who strayed into the broad way leading to destruction, and refused to listen to the Good Shepherd's voice. Jesus will say to them, 'Depart from Me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels'.

Now which of these two kingdoms are you journeying to? You are all on your way to one or the other of them.

We shall all end by finding ourselves in one of these two kingdoms, for there is no third kingdom.

The end of the year is like a milestone on our journey. We are a year nearer to living with Jesus, or a year nearer to that other kingdom.

The Good Shepherd longs to welcome you to the place He has gone to prepare for you in heaven. But He wants you to know that it will be your fault, and not His fault, if you never get there; for He never sees you straying from the path which leads to that kingdom without speaking to you in a way that you cannot mistake, and telling you of your danger.—J. L. SMITH-DAMPIER, Christ's Little Citizens, p. 171.

THE LITTLE FLOCK ENCOURAGED

'Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.'—LUKE XII. 32.

If you were asked what commandment in the Bible comes the most often, do you think you should know? Shall I tell you which commandment God gives most frequently? 'Fear not.' He says this more than eighty times—I believe, eighty-four times; this is much oftener than any other commandment. 'Fear not.'

You know if we are afraid it looks as if we did not trust God. If anybody is afraid in the dark, if anybody is afraid of thunder, if anybody is afraid of going to bed alone, if anybody is afraid of robbers, if anybody is afraid of wild beasts, if anybody is afraid that God will not forgive him (when he asks Him), if anybody is afraid that God will not guide him all along till he gets to heaven—then he does not trust God.

Suppose you were told to take care of a little child, should you like that little child to cry and say, 'I am afraid'? You would feel yourself affronted if that child did not trust you. If anybody were leaning upon your arm for support, would not you like it? I think you would—I should; I do like it, and I think you all like to lean upon some one's arm. God likes you to lean upon His arm. God does not like it, when He is taking care of us, for us to say, 'We are afraid'. It pleases God when you trust Him, when you think what a good God He is, what a kind God He is. I do not wonder that the Lord is displeased if we are afraid, when He says 'Fear not,' eighty-four times.

Then I wonder to whom God says it? There are some people whom I shall call 'Don't-care people'. I know some boys and girls too who look as if they said, 'I don't care; I am not afraid of anybody or anything'. But I think that this spirit—that this kind of boy or girl—displeases God more than anything else. It is like Cain when he killed his brother Abel. It is like Joseph's cruel brethren who put poor little Joseph down in the pit, and did not seem to care for anybody or anything. I hope none of you are these 'don't-care people' as to what God says.

You see if God's children did not sometimes 'fear,' God would not say 'Fear not,' to show that they do 'fear'. I tell you what you are to 'fear'—'fear' to grieve God. In other respects God says, 'Fear not'.

Now we must look to see to whom it is that God says, 'Fear not'. It is called, what? 'Little flock.'

Now will you think with me what is meant by 'a little flock'? 'Little flock.'

There was somebody who once asked before us, 'Who are the little flock?' and 'where are they?' Turn to the first chapter of Song of Solomon and look at the seventh and eighth verses, and you will find something said about this 'little flock'. Somebody says, 'Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth (that is Christ), where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon: for why should I be as one that turneth aside by the flocks of thy companions? If thou know not, O thou fairest among women, go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock, and feed thy kids beside the shepherds' tents.'

If you want to know where the 'little flocks' are, I will tell you where you must go, you must watch where the 'footsteps' are to be found of all those good saints who lived before you, and you will find them all by the 'shepherds' tents'.

I hope you are a little 'kid' by the 'shepherd's tent'. I believe the 'shepherds' mean God's ministers, and the 'shepherds' tents' mean baptism, and the Lord's Supper, and praying, and all the ordinances of God. The 'little flocks' love these things, and are to be found in 'shepherds' tents' in God's ministry, and loving holy things, and going in 'the footsteps' where all the 'flocks' went before them.

So that this 'little flock,' those who walk in the 'footsteps' after having forsaken the world and all bad things, and walk with good saints, are like 'kids by the shepherds' tents'. That is the 'little flock'.

Now why is it called 'little'? A 'little flock'. Perhaps it is because there are so few in it; there are very few.

A young man told me the other day that he was seven years at Eton, and he did not believe all the time that there was one real Christian there. Now he could not tell. Very often religious boys are to be found where you do not think they are, and he might have made a great mistake. Very often God's people are hidden people. We cannot tell; but I am sure there are very few, and I never knew a school yet where there were a great many. There are but few, and so it is a 'little flock'.

If you turn to Jeremiah you will see how God makes a 'little flock,' you will not wonder it is 'little' when you read that. Jeremiah in. 14—'I will take you one of a city, and two of a family, and I will bring you to Zion'. So you see there are only to be 'two' or 'three'. Nobody naturally tries to love God; and if nobody seeks to love God, or to care about his soul, he must not wonder at 'the flock' being so 'little'.

Do you not think the reason is not only because so few love God, but because there are so many 'little' lambs in it? there are so many children in it. Turn to Isaiah xl. 11—'He shall feed His flock like a shepherd; He shall gather the lambs with His arms, and carry them in His bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young'. So you see that here are three or four things spoken of, and everything about 'little lambs'. There are some 'little lambs' in His fold if there is nothing else.

Shall I tell you about a 'little lamb'? There was a little girl whose name was Annie Lee, and she had a great many very pretty things; but the thing she loved best of all was a little pet lamb. Everybody admired Annie Lee's little pet lamb. One morning little Annie came running into the room, when her father and mother were seated at the breakfast table, with the tears running down her cheeks, and she said, 'Oh, father, father, my lamb is lost'. The father said, 'Never mind, my Annie, I dare say we shall find it. Go and tell the gardener to look for it. She ran out and told the gardener to seek for the lost lamb, and before they had done breakfast in came the gardener with the lamb in his arms, and little Annie became quite happy.

After breakfast Annie's mother took her upon her knees (she was about six years old), and she said, 'You know, Annie, you were once a lost lamb, and the kind Shepherd came for you and brought you back'. Little Annie said, 'How kind of the Shepherd to come and bring me to you'.

The day went on and little Annie kept thinking about the kind Shepherd that brought her back; but the same night poor little Annie had the croup, a very sad disease, very, very sad; and her mother came, and her father, and they cried over her, and the doctor came and gave her medicine, and everything was tried to make her well, but they could not cure her, and so she died. But just before little Annie died she said to her mother, 'Mamma, the kind Shepherd has come for His lost lamb—may He have it?' Jesus loves the 'little lambs,' and so He took her.

I should like to tell you here a thing you do not perhaps quite know. You remember the twenty-third Psalm—'The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures. He leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul.' That is what I want you to look at—'He leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul.' Now I never understood that till a Jew explained it, and I should like you to know how the Jew explained it to me.

He said in the land of Palestine—the Holy Land—they generally put the lambs in the fields in the evening, by the side of the River Jordan. There are beautiful fields by the River Jordan, and so the shepherd, as the night is coming on, puts them in these fields to lie down by 'the green pastures'. And sometimes it happens in the night that the snow melts on the top of Mount Lebanon, and runs down the banks of the river, and makes it swell and rise, and overflow its banks, and the little lambs are caught up by the water and carried down, down, down, miles and miles down the river; and when the sun rises in the morning you may see a shepherd going down the river with his crook after the poor little lambs that are struggling in the water and he will hook up the little lambs, and bring them back again to the field, and the Jew said that is what it means, 'He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; He restoreth my soul'.

Sometimes little girls and boys think they are quite safe—they are beside 'still waters' and 'green pastures'—and presently something carries them away, away; and what would become of them if somebody did not bring them back again?

One thing more. Do you not think they are called 'a little flock' because everybody in that 'flock' thinks so 'little' of himself? Everybody who is a Christian thinks 'little' of himself, or ought to do so. If anybody thinks much of himself he is by no means a Christian. Did you ever wonder what 'Paul' meant? You know Paul's name was Saul; and why was he called Paul? There are different reasons why he was called Paul, but I will tell you one—because Paul means 'little'. Saul felt himself to be such a great sinner that he left off loving the world, and lived and worked for God, and then they called him Paul—the 'little one'. Yet what a great man he was! still he felt himself 'a little one'—'the least of all the Apostles'; 'the little one'. All good Christians should think themselves so.

There was once a great Roman emperor going through Rome in grand triumph, surrounded by all his attendants, his courtiers, and his soldiers; he himself was riding in a chariot, accompanied by sound of trumpets—oh! so grand! The emperor was in the midst of that great procession, when a little child came out of the crowd and ran up to this great man, and of course he was put back—they cried out: 'Go back, little child—go back—go back! He is your emperor!' And the little child said, 'Yes, he is your emperor, but he is my father'. Oh! how beautiful it is to say of the Lord, 'He is my Father!' 'Your Father!'

How did He become your Father? If you look to Jeremiah again you will see. Jeremiah iii. 19—'But I said, How shall I put thee among the children, and give thee a pleasant land, a goodly heritage of the hosts of nations? And I said, Thou shalt call me, My Father; and shalt not turn away from me.'

I once heard of a nobleman who went up to the top of his spacious park with a friend who lived near, and when they reached the top of the park and saw the beautiful prospect, the nobleman began to show his friend all his fine estate. 'There you see those beautiful trees, those splendid fruits, those rich lands—they are all mine—as far as your eye can stretch—all those rivers are mine—all those cows and those fields are mine—and those are my houses where my labourers live.' The friend said, 'Well, but the poor old woman who lives in that cottage there can say more than you can, my lord'. 'What is that?' She has more than you, my lord, she can say "Christ is mine".

Can you say that? If you can indeed say 'Christ is mine,' you have more than that nobleman's estate. 'Ye are Christ's, and Christ is God's.'

'Fear not, little flock; it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom' at last, and be sure He will take care of your wants now.

There was once a poor man toiling up a hill with a pack on his back, and a gentleman riding up in his carriage said to him, 'Come and sit in the carriage and I will take you up the hill'. This poor man rode up the hill, but he did not take the pack off his back; so the gentleman said, 'If I carry you, I think you need not carry your pack'. Therefore remember that if God carries you, He will carry all your burdens—you need not carry them. 'Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.'

What is 'the kingdom'? Let me say a word or two about that. Remember 'the kingdom of heaven' must come to us before we go to that. He that has ever gone to the 'kingdom of heaven' when he died, has had the kingdom of heaven come to him while he lived.

In Romans xiv. 17, it is said, 'For the kingdom of God is not meat and drink; but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost'. Thus we have 'the kingdom of heaven' in our hearts when we have 'righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost'. If we have that then we have good hope, and when we die we shall go to heaven.

And do you know you are all trained to be 'kings'? I wonder how the Prince of Wales is trained. I should think he must be always thinking, 'Oh! I am going to be a king'. And that is what you ought to be thinking. You should say, 'I am going to be a king'. Yes, every child who is a Christian is going to be a 'king'. 'Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.'

You have heard of Charlemagne—he ordered that when he died there should be a chapel built just like the chapel of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem; and that he should not be buried like other men, but like a king, and so he said, 'Do not lay my body down, but set me upon a throne, and bury me like a king'. He was to have a room set apart for him at the side of the chapel, and there was to be a Bible opened and laid by his side when he was dead, and the sword of Charlemagne was to be laid on the other side, and upon his head a crown of gold, and a robe over his shoulders. So he was buried.

Years afterwards the emperor Otho went to see how Charlemagne looked; the chapel was opened, and he went in to see him—and what did he see? He was crumbled up into dust. There was the cowl; the crown was not destroyed, but was saved. There was Charlemagne, one of the greatest kings that ever lived—there he was, all dust.

Now I will tell you of another man. There was a poor miserable-looking old man who lived in an almshouse, I will not say where, and the poor old creature had the palsy, and if you had seen him you would have heard his shoes knocking together with the palsy, and he was sitting in his chair when a gentleman went to see him, and said, 'Well, my friend, how do you do?' 'Oh! I am waiting—waiting.' 'Are you waiting for me?' 'No, I am waiting for my Master; for Him to bring me my crown.' 'Bring you your crown?' 'Yes, I am going to be a king.' 'How do you know that?' 'Because Christ has said it—"Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom".'—JAMES VAUGHAN.

THE SHEPHERD AND HIS LITTLE FLOCK

'Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom.'—LUKE XII. 32.

HERE surely is a beautiful text for you!

It is Jesus who utters it. But not now as the Great King speaking to children in the Temple, but as the good and gracious Shepherd addressing the lambs of the fold.

It tells of a little flock; a fearful flock; a tenderly watched and cared-for flock; a flock which will at last be glorified and reach the kingdom of heaven.

In speaking for a short time from these words, I shall do so in reference to you and to you alone.

I. The First truth you are here taught is this, that Though Little—(a little Flock)—God Cares for You.—How often does He give proof in outer nature that though the Greatest of all Beings, He loves and takes care of what is little and weak and feeble. His sun shines on the daisy and the cowslip, as well as on the cedar and the oak. His sun shines on the sparkling stream, ay on the tiny dewdrop, as well as on the vast lake or ocean. His sun warms and gladdens the insect dancing in its beams, so small that you would need the microscope to see it, as well as the kingly lion and elephant. I have seen in the Alps the lovely blue gentian nestling and shivering at the mouth of the icy glacier—quite safe; while the mighty pine was lying with upturn roots close by. God seems to have scattered the meadows all over with little flowers—tender grasses—small mosses—just to teach us how He loves the little as well as (shall I say more than?) the great. He has paved the ocean, not with great masses of rock—huge boulders—but with pebbles, and brittle shells, and delicate seaweed.

Look at that mother! Who of her family does she care most for? She loves them all. But her sons have grown up past boyhood; they can take care of themselves. It is the child lying in its cradle—or scarce able to walk, tottering about the room in helpless infancy. And if that child be weak or sickly, how tenderly does she sit, night by night, at its little bed! When it is startled from sleep how she rushes to its side, smooths its pillow, and kisses away its tears and fears, and sings it asleep.

God turns to you and says, 'As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you'; Jesus loves all His family—all His children; but in accordance with the beautiful words of Zechariah, He turns His gracious hands specially on 'the little ones' (Zech. XIII. 7). I was struck some time ago, looking over a curious old illustrated book in the British Museum Library containing symbols and pictures of the early Christian ages, how often (how generally) Christ is represented as the Good Shepherd carrying a lamb in His arms, as if He loved the little and the feeble of His flock the most! He loves, too, not only the little ones in years, but the lowly and unknown, the unnoticed and despised, the weak and downcast; 'the poor also, and him that hath no helper'. Never say, 'If I had been a star or a planet, a sun or a moon, God would have cared for me; but I am only a little taper, a feeble glow-worm'. Never say, 'If I had been a great spreading oak with my branches shooting outwards and upwards, God would have cared for me; but I am only a dwarfed, little, insignificant shrub'. Never say, 'If I had been a lordly eagle cleaving the skies, or a bird-of-paradise with beauteous plumage, God would have cared for me; but I am only a little timid thing twittering among the branches'.

What says Jesus? 'Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings, and not one of them is forgotten before God. Fear not, therefore, ye are of more value than many sparrows' (Luke XII. 6, 7). 'Fear not, little flock!'

II. The text tells you another truth. This World is not the True Home of the Little Flock.—The Shepherd speaks to His little flock as if they were journeying on to pasture-ground on the everlasting hills. He does not say, 'Fear not; for lo! here is a quiet, peaceful fold on earth: here are green pastures and still waters: here is a sunny valley, a rich meadow, where you are to rest for ever!'

No! He points up to heaven, and says, 'It is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom'. This is not your final resting-place. You have much indeed to make you happy in this fair, beautiful world. I am never anything but displeased with those who would make this earth out to be a dismal prison-house; who would rob it in gloomy sackcloth; who would shut their eyes to its green fields and bright skies and wealth of flowers, and shut their ears to its varied songs of gladness, from the music of birds in the groves to your own merry peals of laughter at your play. Yet it is equally true that you and I, and every one of us, were born for a far better country still (Heb. XI. 16). Yes, I say again, though God has given all of us here very much to make us glad, and for which we should be very thankful, there is a voice ever heard whispering in our ears and saying, 'Arise ye, and depart, for this is not your rest' (Mic. II. 10).

And why cannot we be peacefully happy here?

I answer, because these great souls of ours were born for greater than the greatest things that this world can give.

I have often seen, near where I used to live in the country, two eagles. They had a roomy cage. But they were not happy. They were always bending down, and then glancing up with proud eye through the chinks in the wooden house which enclosed them on the blue sky; and if they had had a cage with golden bars and kings or princes to serve them, they would, I am sure, have done just the same. They would never have been contented with their lot.

Our souls are like the wings of these eagles beating against the bars. The cry of the Psalmist is that of every immortal spirit—'Oh, that I had wings, . . . for then would I flee away (to heaven) and be at rest' (Ps. lv. 6).

Little flock! I repeat it, yours is a kingdom. Are you to gather straws and lose it? Or are you to love God and serve Him here, that so when you die it may only be to pass through a gateway into His glorious presence, and become joyful members of His ransomed family for ever and ever!—J. R. MACDUFF, Hosannas of the Children, p. 42.

THE FRUITLESS FIG-TREE

(A New Year Sermon)

'He spake also this parable: A certain man had a fig-tree planted in his vineyard; and he came and sought fruit thereon, and found none. Then said he unto the dresser of his vineyard, Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and find none: cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground? And he answering said unto him, Lord, let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it, and dung it; and if it bear fruit, well; and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down.'—LUKE XIII. 6-9.

God is the owner, Christ is the vinedresser pleading with man for God, and with God for man, and for whose sake the uplifted hand of justice is stayed; the vineyard is God's kingdom, and the fig-tree is Israel as a whole, or each Israelite, or each Gentile in Christ's Church. This parable shows us God's great grace and man's poor return; it teaches the need of repenting at once, and bringing forth the fruits of repentance. The life-history of this fig-tree is soon told: it was favoured but fruitless, yet spared, and yet to be judged.

I. The Fig-Tree was Favoured.—No other fig-tree was so favoured. For it was not there by chance like a berry-bush in the woods, or a tree on the top of an old tower, the seed of which had been carried on the wings of the wind, or by a bird that, on the way to its nest, frightened by a hawk, had dropped its mouthful. The owner had deliberately planted this tree in his vineyard. Perhaps Jesus meant by this to teach the Jews that they were not as a vine, but as a fig-tree in His vineyard; that they were not the whole of His kingdom, but only a small part of it; that they had no right to occupy their favoured place for ever, and that He who had planted them there had a right to remove them if he chose; and that He would still have His vineyard after they were cast out. I may lay my hand on your head and truly say, You are that tree, you are one of God's chief favourites. No nation has a larger and better life than ours. The Briton is more favoured than the Jew ever was, and no generation of Britons has been more favoured than is ours. If you wish to feel thankful for your native land you need only to visit the other countries of Europe. And may I not say that yours is the most favoured nook in this most favoured vineyard? You are planted, not in the open unsheltered waste, but in the Church of Christ, and in a Christian home. You are not like a little dying boy who said to the Christian friend visiting him, 'Oh, sir, do ye think I would hae ony chance wi' God? ye see I canna read ony'; or like an untaught carter I kae, who used to give a boy a penny to read to him 'blads o' the Bible'. That dying boy, that carter, was like a fig-tree growing on the roadside. You are like a fig-tree planted in a vineyard. What could have been done for you that has not been done?

II. This Fig-Tree was Fruitless, though so Favoured.—Like the bramble-bushes in the rich man's garden it had the best chance in the world, yet it had not a fig to show. The fig-tree is good for figs but for nothing else, except it be shade. It has big deep-green leaves which keep out the sun, and so we read of every one sitting under his own fig-tree. It is the ample sun-parasol of the East. Thus a fruitless fig-tree did mischief in a vineyard, for it sucked the sap from the soil and shut the sun out from the vines. It is not a question of beauty; it is rather ugly, and its soft wood is fit only for the fire. Bad enough that there should be no figs, but worse that its spreading shade should dwarf the vines, by making a cave-like space in which grapes could not ripen. This fig-tree had green leaves and gaily blushing blossoms, else the owner would not have expected figs on it; yet at the time of fruit it had nothing but leaves.

The one question for us is, fruit or no fruit. 'Fruit, fruit,' is our owner's one cry. And what is fruit, do you ask? I answer, everything that springs from a healthy Christian life—repentance, faith, love, all the graces and good works. Is that tree a picture of me? Am I fair and promising outwardly, yet fruitless? Have I leaves and nothing more? Am I a barren professor? If so, you cumber the ground and do harm to others. You overshadow those near you with evil influence, and make their lives smaller and poorer than they might have been.

III. This Tree, Favoured though Fruitless, is yet Spared.—Many poets speak of trees as having life, as thinking, feeling companions for whom they cherish an almost human attachment. The trees of our boyhood are dear to us because interwoven with memories of bright days. I have known a wood spoiled because the proprietress would not permit the cutting down of trees which she regarded as the friends of her girlhood. She seemed afraid of 'wronging the spirit in the woods'. The feeling is natural. The keeper of the vineyard had planted the fig-tree and watched its growth. It is his own, and he has a longing, lingering feeling for it. He won't give up hope of it. It may, it can bring forth fruit. He will dig about it and dung it. And so he pleads that his own tree may be spared for one other year. But if it is fruitless at the year's end, even his love must consent to the cutting of it down. 'Reprives,' says Matthew Henry, 'are obtained for us by others, but not pardons. These must be sought by ourselves.'

I once worshipped in a church in front of which stood a lifeless tree. By and by it became leafless and peeled and rotten, as if all God's judgments had fallen upon it. It stretched forth its bare arms to heaven in vain. The people wished to cut it down as an unsightly thing, but the minister pled that they would let it stand as a parable of a lost soul. One day he made the tree his text, and preached with great feeling on the fruitless professor. He asked his hearers to remember his appeal every time they saw the dead tree, and I think that a sort of awe came over some of the boys and girls as they looked up to the strange object-lesson at the church-door. You do not find a true parable of yourself in a tree like that, but may you not find it in the blooming fig?

IV. The Fig-Tree, Favoured though Fruitless, and Spared, is yet to be Judged.—God's patience is most wonderful, it goes far beyond all our thoughts and dreams, but it has limits. Between the tree and the axe there is only a prayer, and at most only a year. The vine-dresser's prayer is, 'Lord, let it alone this year also. And if it bear fruit, well; and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down.' Sparring mercy, even Christ's mercy, may be worn out. So the figless fig-tree down comes at last:—

At length he'll strike the threatened blow,
And lay the barren fig-tree low.

To be fruitless is a greater calamity than befell those slain by Pilate at the altar, or buried under the tower of Siloam; it is the only real calamity, for it is to be an eternal failure. To fail for ever in life's chief end, to lose our one chance, no other failure can be named along with that.

But there is hope for you who have begun another year of grace. You may have good fruit, and the blame is all your own if you have none. God does not ask what is not possible, but He expects reasonable returns. And He gives you what he asks: will you take it from His hand? Good fruits come from a good and healthy tree. As there can be no fruits before there is a tree, so there can be no good works unless the man be first made good. A bad heart does not bring forth good fruits. You cannot make yourself good, but God has a plan for making you good. Fall in with God's plan, and gladly give up your whole soul to it. Yield to Christ Jesus and to the Holy Spirit. Let not Christ be to you as an unexplained parable, but try to understand how He saves and new-makes us. Let Him take you as you are and do with you what He wills, and then all good fruits will adorn your life. But without Christ's life in you, you are not a fruitful tree. You are only useless timber, and your toiling is a busy idleness.

Listen, then, to the consenting voices of this parable, and of this New Year. 'This year also' may be your last chance, and this wintry day may be the springtime of grace in your soul. I remember a young man coming to tell me that he had gone over to the side of Christ. On the first Sabbath of a New Year he heard a sermon on this parable. It greatly interested him, he said. Thoughts of his uselessness amid many mercies rushed in upon him and melted him quite. In the fruitless fig-tree he saw himself; God helping him, he would be fruitless no longer. He began the new life with the New Year. I found him ready for every good work. His life was like an ever-green, an ever-fruitful tree.

We cannot help feeling to-day the pathos and uncertainty of life. But if you are like the good tree you need not fear the future, for, speaking in the language of this parable, death does not cut down, but transplants the fruitful tree to the paradise of God. To-morrow was to have been a bright day to one young man who worshipped with us. Amid great difficulties he had fought life's battle like a true hero, and had won. He had gained the confidence and friendship of his employers, and to-morrow he was to have become a partner in one of our famed and wealthy firms. To-morrow he was to have entered as a master the very gate at which as a poor boy he knocked with a trembling heart, and offered his services for half a crown a week. And to-morrow we meet to carry his body to the grave. Come to Christ, close with Christ, make Christ's thoughts your thoughts, take Christ's way of living, and then you may rejoice and be glad all your days; and when earth's days are done you shall pass to better joys than earth knows.—JAMES WELLS, The Parables of Jesus, p. 129.

THE CANDLE OF GRACE

The Candle of Grace: Love (Luke xv. 8).—This candle of grace lights us to salvation and joy.

It is a Search light to seek the lost (Luke xix. 10).

It is a Divine light to find the helpless (Ezek. xxxiv. 16).

It is a Warm light to welcome the found ones (Luke xv. 22).—C. EDWARDS, Tin Tacks for Tinky Folks, p. 39.

THE PRODIGAL SON

(A New Year Sermon)

LUKE XV. 11-32.

The prodigal's history falls into three parts:—

I. From Home.

II. Homewards.

III. At Home.

We see him departing, returning, restored. Sin takes him from home, by repentance he returns home, and he finds salvation at home. He is a sinner, a penitent, and a saint; and by his case Christ illustrates sin, repentance, and grace.

I. From Home.—As nothing is said about her, I believe that his mother was dead. Probably he was like some motherless youths among us, who, at the age of twenty-one, inherit their mother's fortune, and become independent of their father. Thus he could say, 'Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me'. Anyhow he was left to the freedom of his own will; his father could not or would not hamper him. In him behold yourself. Man is the prodigal, the younger child in God's family. We are the children of Adam the prodigal, and like father like family. We are free, for God who embraces the returning does not constrain the departing prodigal. We are all wanderers from 'God who is our home'. The prodigal is thus a life-size picture of every sinner. In him we see sin in its origin, growth, and end. Fix your eye on him, and I shall read off some of the marks of sin. Sin is a restless desire for what we cannot have at home, hatred of law and restraints, the ceasing to have a son's heart towards God, the revolting against God. Sin is impatience, self-will, self-seeking. Sin is the most monstrous thing under heaven. How shockingly the prodigal treated the best of fathers! He shows that vice has its progress as well as virtue. Sin is riot and waste. He wasted his substance; that means, his being, his manhood, his proper self. Prodigal, it is said, means a self-waster. Sin is want, and woe, and slavery; it is self-wounding and ruin. He spent all, he was in a mighty famine, 'he began to be in want'. He began: worse was coming, for he was nearing the edge of an abyss. He was in want, it does not say of what, for he was just in want of everything. To feed swine was the deepest degradation to which a rich young Jew could come. 'He would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat.' These were the pods of the carob-tree, which are still used for pig-food in Cyprus. He tried to satisfy himself with swine-food, but failed. He cannot fall lower without falling into hell. Sin is meanness and brutishness, for the swine-herd was more swinish than the swine which did nothing contrary to their nature. Sin is madness. He spent all for nothing, nay for much—for rags and shame and every misery.

II. Homewards, or the Way Home.—We shall join ourselves to him sitting there in rags by the swine-troughs, his face buried in his hands. We shall thus see the human side of conversion. In his way home I notice four stages or milestones; and—

1. Thought.—And when he came to himself, he said, How many, etc. (ver. 17). He faces the facts around him, searches for their meaning, compares what he is with what he might have been, contrasts his starvation with the plenty of his father's servants. Like a drunken sailor, sobered by shipwreck, ruin staring him in the face, he comes to his senses. He is disgusted with his miseries and awakened by his sins. He converses with himself and puts things together; that is, he reasons and understands. He now sees that he has been mad. His coming to himself is the first step in his coming to God.

2. Resolution.—'I will arise' (ver. 18), or rather, I am determined to arise. His was no confused resolution, for it took in all he had to do and what he would say to his father. The thought of returning had, I dare say, often entered his mind before, but it had died almost as soon as born. Now he is thoroughly roused, and his mind is made up. Thinking is worth little unless it pass over into resolving. The first stage in the way Godwards joins on to the second. It does you good to resolve, and, like the prodigal, to put your resolution into words. For the way to heaven as well as the way to hell is paved with good intentions. Men usually reach heaven along a road, every footstep of which they have paved with holy resolutions. The New Year is one of the best times for thinking about life and resolving. The best New Year's vow is, 'I will arise, and go to my Father'.

3. Action.—'And he arose' (ver. 20). A moment ago he was sitting among the swine, utterly crushed. As the past and possible future rush into his mind he forms his resolution, and at once feels as if he were a new man, and had gotten a new body. The resolution enters his mind like a flash from heaven; and like a shock of electricity passes into his wasted frame. It runs as a quick creative impulse along his nerves, his feet and ankle-bones receive strength, and his whole body thrills with new energy. History tells us that great soldiers before their great battles, as Cæsar at the Rubicon, and Lord Clive at Plassey, looked like men inspired the moment they resolved on their line of action. An earnest resolution, and the honest effort to carry it through, will fetch you new strength. The prodigal had formed the great resolve in the greatest of all battles. And no sooner resolved than done—he is off for home. He is quick to turn his thought into purpose, and his purpose into an accomplished fact. He had often repented before in a way, and then repented of his repentance; but now he must burn his boats and break down all the bridges behind him, and make return to the swine-troughs impossible.

When I wish to explain repentance, I often quote the prodigal. In him you see what perfect repentance is. True repentance is repentance in action; it moves the whole man homewards, Christwards.

III. At Home.—The father was on the outlook for his boy, and his love-quickened eye saw him 'when he was yet a great way off'. Though the prodigal had not been long away—he was a 'fast' youth—his father's dogs did not know him when near at hand, I believe, but barked fiercely at the suspicious ragged stranger. 'You are a fine sight!' 'You see what you have brought upon yourself!' 'You left a prince and return a beggar!' 'You come home only when the world has cast you out of doors!' No such stinging words crossed the father's lips; but he 'had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him'; he rained kisses on him, it means as a mother in a moment of fondness, rains kisses on her child.

We wish each other a happy New Year, but earth has no greater happiness than this. The happiest find their happiness where the prodigal found his—at home with the Father.—JAMES WELLS, The Parables of Jesus, p. 171.

THE BLIND MAN CURED

'Lord, that I may receive my sight!'—LUKE XVIII. 41.

It is impossible for people who are blessed with the use of their eyes to form an idea how dreadful a calamity it would be to become blind. Shut your eyes for a few moments, and while the light of day is excluded, and all familiar and pleasant objects have faded from your view, think of remaining in that dreary state for weeks, and months, and years; aye, for your whole life. Then you will be prepared, in a very small degree, to thank the good Lord for His mercy towards you, in allowing you to see the faces of those whom you love, as well as to hear them speak.

Much as blind people lose by not having the use of their eyes, they have often made themselves not only useful but even distinguished. Professor Sanderson of Cambridge, England, lost his sight when only a year old, but became a great mathematician.

Dr. Blackwood was master of Greek, Latin, Italian, and French, and a poet of no mean degree.

Dr. Henry Moyes was skilled in geometry, optics, and astronomy, and he could judge very accurately of the size of any room in which he happened to be by the effects of his voice.

John Metcalf, an Englishman, was employed first as a waggoner, and afterwards became a surveyor of highways. By the help of a long staff he would traverse the most difficult mountain roads, and was able to do more than many men accomplish with their eyes open. William Metcalf laid out roads and built bridges.

Euler, the mathematician, was blind. John Gough, who was an accurate botanist and zoologist, was also blind. Lord Cranbourne, blind from his childhood, published a history of France for the young.

Huber, who has written such an interesting book about bees, was blind. Homer was blind. The sam: was true of Ossian and Milton. Zisca, the famous Bohemian general, performed great acts of valour after the loss of his sight.

The Rev. J. Crosse, vicar of Bradford, England, was blind, but as he knew the Church service by heart, he was able to conduct public worship with impressiveness and solemnity, only requiring the help of another person to read the lessons for him.

If you have an opportunity, I would advise you to read William Wirt's beautiful account of 'The Blind Preacher,' in his Letters of a British Spy.

Those who have enjoyed the use of their eyes for years, and then been afflicted with blindness, suffer much more than such as have been blind from their birth.

Blindness is much more common in far-off Eastern countries than in Europe or America. In the New Testament the blind are often mentioned; and the law of Moses taught the duty of showing kindness to this unfortunate portion of the human family.

All that I have been telling you about blind people will help you to enter into the spirit of what is to follow.

In the days when this evil world was blessed by the bodily presence of the Lord Jesus, a person travelling along the high-road east from Bethany, after passing through a dreary wilderness for several hours, would have suddenly come in sight of a beautiful city crowning a hill-top, surrounded by gardens, and shaded by graceful palm-trees. This was Jericho, sometimes called the 'City of Palm-trees'. Here King Herod had built a palace for himself that he might enjoy the bracing mountain air and the pure water.

Like all other fine towns Jericho had many poor, unfortunate people in it; and it is in one of this class that we are especially interested now. In an obscure, dilapidated dwelling lived blind Bartimeus—poor, wretched, hopeless; time had ploughed its deep wrinkles on his care-worn face, and none who saw him could help feeling pity for his state.

Our blessed Lord had been going about doing good, from place to place, working wonderful cures, but as yet He does not seem to have visited Jericho. Rumours of His marvellous miracles spread far and wide, and no doubt poor blind Bartimeus had often wished that the great Prophet of Nazareth, in some of His journeys, might bestow a blessing on him; but hope deferred, and often disappointed, had made his heart sick. Day after day some member of his family, or a sympathising friend, led him forth into the city, and he sat down in the market-place, or in a crowded street, to beg. Everybody knew him; some pitied and helped him, while others passed by him again and again, giving no heed to his pathetic tale of woe.

Our Saviour was on his last journey to Jerusalem, and had spent the Sabbath at Jericho. On leaving the city a great company followed Him, and He passed near the place where blind Bartimeus sat.

The loss of one of our faculties is apt to strengthen those that remain, and although the beggar could not see, his sense of hearing told him that the tramp of many feet and the hum of voices denoted the occurrence of something unusual. His appeals for alms were forgotten, while curiosity prompted him to ask what all this meant.

A thrill of delight shot through him when the answer was returned, 'Jesus of Nazareth passeth by!'

Presently those nearest to the Saviour heard a piteous cry, 'Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me!'

Many in the crowd were provoked that the blind man should thus address the Saviour by one of the names belonging to the promised Messiah, and with angry and threatening words they did their best to silence him. The more, however, that they tried to make him hold his peace, the more importunately he cried, 'Thou Son of David, have mercy on me!'

Soon the hard-hearted men who crowded about Bartimeus were pushed aside, and a friendly voice was heard to say, 'Be of good comfort, rise; He calleth thee!'

Yes, there the blessed Saviour stands, waiting for the blind man to be brought to Him. He is so anxious to go to the great Prophet that he casts off the loose garment that covered his shoulders, and urges those who are leading him to make more haste.

The Lord Jesus looked upon the poor blind man with tender, pitying eyes, and asked, 'What wilt thou that I should do unto thee?'

'Lord, that I may receive my sight!' was his prompt and touching answer.

Then He, who in the beginning had created all things, and who said, 'Let there be light, and there was light,' gave a fresh proof of His almighty power. 'Receive thy sight,' He said to the blind man, 'thy faith hath saved thee!'

In a moment the eyes of Bartimeus were opened, and he looked out upon the beauties of the earth and sky, and the faces of his fellow-men, and most of all upon the benignant countenance of that adorable Saviour who had extended such mercy to him.

A loud burst of wonder and thanksgiving was heard on every side, as Jesus moved onward in the way; and Bartimeus followed after Him with heart too full for utterance.

What a comfort it should be to us to remember that our Divine Master is just as He was then—kind, compassionate, able and willing to help.—JOHN N. NORRIS, Milk and Honey, p. 124.

'SHOW ME A PENNY'

LUKE XX. 24.

JESUS took every opportunity to teach plain, practical, and important truths. And every familiar object served as a text for His instructive discourses. Jesus said to His enemies, 'Show Me a penny,' and when they brought it to Him, He preached a practical sermon from it. If we take a new penny and look at it carefully, we shall see a number of suggestive lessons upon it. There are—The Image of the Sovereign, Emblems of Life, and Marks of Service.

1. Image of Sovereign.—An emblem of Divine life (2 Cor. iii. 18).

2. Inscription.—(Gra. Britt. Regina). A mark of spiritual life (Eph. i. 8).

3. Sailing Ship.—A picture of business life (Ps. civ. 26).

4. Lighthouse.—An illustration of philanthropic life (Matt. v. 16).

5. Britannia.—A figure of national life (Acts xvii. 26).

6. Date of Penny.—A token of registered life (Ps. lxxxvii. 6).

7. Value of Penny.—A symbol of valued life (Matt. vi. 28, 26).

I find the lighthouse and ship are left off the last-made new pennies.

Men make their goods, and then put their trademark upon the outside. The Lord saves and recreates His people and marks them inside.

The late Earl Cairns, when he was ten years old, heard a Belfast minister say in his sermon, 'God claims you'. Those words stuck to the boy, and kept echoing in his soul, 'God claims you'. He said to himself, 'And He has a good right to claim me. He made me and He cares for me; and He has sent His son to die for me.' And he resolved to yield himself to God at once. His motto to the end was 'God claims me'.—C. EDWARDS, Tin Tacks for Tiny Folks, p. 86.

'IN REMEMBRANCE OF ME'

LUKE XXII. 19.

IN England there are many kind people who gather poor children who have no home, no father or mother from the streets, and who take them to Canada to homes and work and prosperity.

A company of such children had arrived in America, and were just preparing to go into a train to be taken to the far West of Canada, where homes and good prospects were awaiting them.

They were all proud and glad—proud, for they had been decked out in new clothing, and glad because of the grand journey they had before them. But one boy was seen to be away from the rest busy working at the lining of his old jacket. He was cutting at it with a knife.

'What are you doing?' the leader of the party asked.

'I am cutting out this lining, sir, to take it with me.'

'And why do you wish to take that old rag with you?'

'Old rag, sir?' exclaimed the boy, and then he added, very solemnly, 'It was part of a dress my mother wore. She cut up her old dress to line my jacket with. This,' he said, taking the material into his hand, 'was my dead mother's.'

A little bit of an old gown! That was all. Worth nothing in money. But to this poor orphan and exile it was a reminder of a mother's love. The leader of the party understood, and he honoured the boy, so the little rag was carefully folded up and placed in the boy's bosom under his new waistcoat to remember his mother by.

Now that boy's feeling was very tender and very beautiful. It was a great joy to the poor mother when she was cutting up her old dress to think that it would help to keep her boy warm. How much more deep and solemn must have been that joy if she could have foreseen that it was to go with him over the sea to the New World to keep his heart warm, to be worn in his bosom in his new life in Canada, when she was no more, and in kindly remembrance of her.

We like to be remembered. A little flower there is whose name speaks the language of all human hearts, 'Forget-me-not'. However different men, women, and boys may be, they all like to be remembered. And in that longing of all of us may understand Jesus. He too longed to be remembered. When He was going away from earth, He said to His disciples, 'I should like to be remembered by you, and all who live after you'. And He appointed a little meal, a supper as it is called, the Lord's Supper, the eating of bread and drinking of wine, to be remembered by. 'This will keep Me in remembrance,' He said. 'As often as you do this, remember Me.'

And what reason have we all to remember Him? He left heaven for us. He lived for us His life of toil and love and sorrow. He died for us and for our sins. He rose again and went away to heaven to live, and pray, and labour for us.

That boy's mother loved her son; far more did Jesus love us. That boy would not forget his mother and her love; far more should we resolve that we will not forget Jesus. It was a little work in which he saw his mother's love; how great is the work in which we see Jesus' love!

It was right and noble of that boy to keep that dear heart in remembrance, and what is right and noble is always the joyful, the strengthening, and blessed thing to do; how much more right, more noble, is it to keep the heart of Jesus in remembrance, and how much more does doing so give joy, and strength, and blessedness!

It was not for His sake alone, but for our sakes that Jesus said, 'Remember Me'.

It is hundreds of years now since Jesus gave out this wish of His, but by thousands He has been kept in memory ever since. In sorrow and joy the memory of Him has been strength and gladness at home and abroad. His memory is the life and light of loving hearts.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 83.

'ICH DIEN'

'I am among you as he that serveth.'—LUKE XXII. 27.

'Whom I serve.'—ROMANS I. 9. (See also 2 TIM I. 3.)

THE first motto of which we naturally think is that of the Prince of Wales. You know the crest by sight. It consists of three ostrich feathers encircled by a coronet, and tied together by a ribbon, bearing the motto, 'Ich Dien' ('I serve'). Probably you know the history of that motto. It was adopted by the blind King of Bohemia. When he put on the armour for the great battle of Crécy, he went forth bearing high his feathered crest, and on it written 'Ich Dien'. But when the battle was over the Black Prince had taken his motto and his crest, and had appropriated them for himself and for his successors. Five hundred years have passed away since then. The crest has been handed down by each Prince of Wales to his successor, and now the crest and motto belong to the present heir to the throne. Thus the Prince of Wales' crest and motto are borrowed—to use the very gentlest term. They were the Bohemian King's, before our Prince or any of his predecessors possessed them. But even the King of Bohemia only borrowed the motto from greater ones than himself. Paul the Apostle says, 'For God is my witness, whom I serve' (Rom. i. 9); and elsewhere he exclaims: 'I thank God, whom I serve' (2 Tim. i. 3). But I go farther back than Paul, and remind you that a greater than even he used similar words with regard to Himself, and practically accepted them as His motto: 'I am among you as he that serveth' (Luke xxii. 27).

I. 'I serve' was pre-eminently the motto of Christ, and His whole life was in accordance with it. The disciples wrangled one with another—and they had done so on the sacred and solemn occasion of the supper—as to which of them should be counted the greatest. While they were striving, the Lord girded Himself with a towel and began to wash their feet. He would thus teach them the one lesson which is so difficult for us to learn, namely, that he who serves most, or is most useful, is the greatest. It is all very well to be ornamental. A figure-head is an ornament to a ship; but the man who keeps the look-out, who stands at the wheel and steers the ship, or who adjusts the sails on board, is very much superior to the figure-head. In life there are some men who are figure-heads. They do nothing. But they are not those whom we respect while they live, or whose memories we revere when they are no more with us. We honour those who have done most in the service of God, and in the interests of mankind.

II. 'Deserve' is connected with the word 'serve'. Thus desert or merit is inseparably connected with service. The man who deserves most is the man who served most worthily.

But, above all, we learn from the Master that the greatest is servant of all, and that He, their Lord and Master, was among the disciples as he that serveth. We learn, too, from the Apostle Paul what pride he took in the fact that he had been called to be a 'servant of Jesus Christ'. Now, if you could only carry this conviction into life what a blessing it would be! How glad I should be to know that not a single boy or girl here this morning will be an idler in life, but that each will be useful in his or her day.

But it is not only important that we should be useful; we should also learn that it is very important to decide whom we shall serve. Here the Apostle Paul speaks very clearly: 'I thank God, whom I serve from my forefathers, with a pure conscience'. The first thing he tells us is that he served God. He had chosen the highest service and the best Master. He next tells us that he has served God from his forefathers. It is indeed a great privilege to be taught by our parents to serve God—taught by their example as well as by their words. You know that we learn by imitation much more than even by precept or any amount of talking. If we see that our parents serve God, what a help it is to us in serving God! Therefore, when anyone can say with Paul that he has served God from his forefathers, he is indeed greatly privileged. But even when denied that privilege we have the opportunity of making a good beginning ourselves.

III. Now the service our Lord requires is a very thorough one. 'With a pure conscience,' says Paul in one passage, and in another, 'Whom I serve with my spirit'. This service must take us up altogether. A service that is begrudged is no service at all, in the higher sense. In the times when a servant begrudged his labour, and could only be urged on by the lash, the servant was called a 'serf'—and a serf means a slave. In those instances, too, the spirit of the master was tyrannical. The noblest service is that service which is asked of us in love, and rendered by us in a loving spirit. If we render a service simply because we are forced to do it, we are as great serfs to-day as any who have ever lived. But if we serve God because we love Him and His service, then His service becomes a delight to us.

The next thing is that we must not divide our services—'Ye cannot serve God and mammon'. The Saviour asks of you your undivided service. There are services which may not be purely religious, but, nevertheless, Christ accepts them as rendered unto Him. In obeying your parents, or your masters in any calling in life, or in serving your Queen and nation, you may serve Him.

But there is a service higher than all this, and that is the direct service we owe to Jesus Christ. We call this in which we are now engaged 'a service'. It is a Divine service. But there is also a service over and above this. We here receive God's blessing, and learn more of His truth and of our duty, so that when we go out to the world we may remember what we have heard in the sanctuary, and not forget to render the service of obedient hearts.—DAVID DAVIES, Talks to Men, Women, and Children (5th Series), p. 198.

A GENTLE MASTER AND HIS SCHOLAR

LUKE XXII. 57-62.

I. I INTEND to tell you to-day of a Master who was denied by a scholar He loved, and yet was so gentle that He continued to him His love.

The scholar was Peter; the Master was Christ.

It was the last evening of our Lord's earthly life. It was the evening on which He girt a towel about Him, and washed the feet of His disciples, the very evening also on which one of these disciples was to sell Him for thirty pieces of silver.

The Lord and the disciples were sitting in an upper room in Jerusalem. They had come to this room to eat the Feast of the Passover. And that itself was a solemn thing to do; for there was prayer, and there was chanting of psalms, and there was the going back of their thoughts to the awful night long before in which the firstborn of Egypt were slain, when the angel of death passed over the houses of the children of Israel.

But on this particular evening there were thoughts in the minds of all who were in that upper room which filled them with concern and sorrow. It was the last passover they were to eat together. Jesus began to tell them of His going away, and of the death He had to die. Very soon the disciples He had watched over and prayed for would be as sheep without a shepherd. Very soon the Master they had learned so much from would be taken from them by enemies, and by wicked hands put to death. The heart of the Saviour was very sad. One of His own disciples, one who had eaten the Passover with Him, was gone forth to betray Him. He had seen the traitor rising from the table and stealing out in the darkness to do his evil deed. The rest of the disciples would forsake Him too.

'Yes,' He said, putting His sad thoughts into words, 'ye shall all be offended because of Me, this night.'

But as soon as these sorrowful words were spoken, Peter cried out that such a thing could never happen. One at least of his dear Lord's disciples would never do a thing so base. 'Though all the others should be offended because of Thee,' he said, 'yet will I never be offended.'

I think I see the Lord turning to the disciple who spoke in this brave way. I am sure it was with a heart filled with pity He said to him, 'O Peter! this very night, before the cock crow twice, thyself shalt deny Me thrice.'

Peter could not bear to think that he should do a thing so bad. He hated the very thought of it. And he cried out, and I fancy with tears in his eyes, 'Though I should die with Thee, yet will I not deny Thee. I am ready to go with Thee both unto prison and death.'

And he really thought he was ready to do all he had said. For he loved his Master with his whole heart, and meant to be brave and true, and stand by Him to the end.

In a little while the meeting in the upper room came to an end. And they left the upper room and went to a place called the Garden of Olives. And into that garden Jesus went to pray to His Father for strength. He often went there to pray. And there Judas knew he should find Him. And to this place he brought a band of rude men with swords and staves to seize Him and take Him to the priests.

It was a very quiet and lonesome place. And it looked more lonesome because it was night, and was filled with trees that looked all black at night. But there was no quietness in it after Judas came. The people he brought with him were rude and noisy, and came round about the Lord to lay hold of Him. And as they brought lights with them, and the lights went moving to and fro among the trees, anyone standing near could see what they had come to do. Peter understood in a moment what they had come to do. He saw the traitor also, and saw him giving a false kiss to the Lord. And he heard the rude cries and he saw the fierce looks of the traitor's band. And perhaps he saw some one laying hands on Jesus to seize Him. Whatever took place Peter was filled with anger. His brave soul flamed out in anger. Were rude hands like these to be laid on the Lord he loved so well? It must not be. He would defend his Master. He would show them that one at least was not that night to forsake Him. And thinking these thoughts and stirred by that anger, he suddenly drew forth a sword and began to strike with it, and struck one of the servants of the high priest on the ear.

If it had been by swords the Lord was to be served that night, Peter might not have failed. But the Lord blamed him for using a sword. And then came into Peter's heart the beginning of fear, and with that an evil thought about himself. He said to himself, 'This Judas band have lights, and they must have seen me as I struck with the sword'. When the band left the garden and hurried into the city, the lights flashing on everything as they went, Peter felt that they were flashing back on him. 'If I follow I shall be found out,' he thought. But how could he refuse to follow, when he had said, 'I will go with Thee both into prison and death'? He followed, but it was with halting steps. Up through the silent streets raged the noisy band, as peaceful citizens in their homes were lying down to rest. Up through the very streets in which, but the other day, Jesus was welcomed as a king, He was now dragged as a prisoner. On from one place to another they dragged Him, till they came where His worst enemies were waiting, all athirst for His blood. It was the palace of Caiaphas the high priest to which they brought the Lord. Peter still followed, but at a distance, and hiding in the shadows behind.

The palace was built like a square of houses—an open court in the centre, the rooms all round, and an entrance-hall at one side of the square. A maid was waiting at the hall door to let them in. She held her lamp against every face as it passed. Now was Peter's first trial. Now was Peter to learn how much easier it is to strike with a sword in a dark place than to speak a brave word in the light. He shrank back. That lamp would discover him. The others would see the man who had struck with the sword. But then he looked wistfully as his dear Master was led in, and across the open court and into the judgment-hall out of his sight. Then, still looking through the gateway, he saw the men who had taken Jesus into the judgment-hall come out into the court and kindle a fire. The night was cold, the fire was tempting. He would be nearer his Lord if he were inside. At last he ventured in. And it was then, as the maid held her light to his face, and saw his troubled look, he uttered his first denial. 'Thou?' she said. 'Thou art a follower of that man?' Alas for Peter! His fear for himself came over him like a great wave of the sea, and he said, 'Woman, I know Him not'. After a while, as he stood near the fire, another said, 'Art not thou one of this man's people?' And a second time, with angry voice, Peter denied that he was.

All this time he could see the judgment-hall and the crowd of evil men who were bearing false witness against his Lord. And he could see, standing bound before them, the form of the Lord Himself. But at last the long night was coming to an end. The night clouds were beginning to break. And the grey streaks of morning were coming faintly into the sky. It was then that some word which Peter spoke told the people standing about that he was from Galilee. They said to him, 'Your very speech tells what you are. You are a follower of the Galilean there.' A third time Peter denied that he knew Him whom they called the Galilean, and this time he denied with oaths and curses. But even as he was speaking he saw a movement in the judgment-hall. And his Lord turned round and looked at him. Then sank Peter's heart within him. His Lord had warned him that he should deny Him three times before the cock crew, and at that very moment the cock began to crow. The Lord's look pierced him like a sword. He saw his cowardice, his ingratitude, his sin. And rushing out to be alone, he sobbed and cried as if his heart would break.

It was a great sin which he had sinned. He had been ashamed of Christ. It was a great fall from a good and blessed state. He had been a lover of Jesus. He was the first to see and say that Jesus was the Saviour of the world. And now, by his three denials, the fair form of his love and life was marred to the very heart.

II. That is the first half of the story of the scholar who denied his Master. Listen now to the other half, to the story of the gentleness of the Master who still kept him in His love.

I will begin this half by saying that there are two beautiful things in every gentle heart. Those two things are honour and mercy.

To be brave for goodness, to be true to friends who are good, not to be ashamed to say, 'I am on their side,' to be a hater of meanness and untruth, and to be all this, even if, in being it, one should have to suffer scorn or beating—that is honour.

To pity friends who through fear have not been brave or true, to forgive them for their want of braveness and take them back into your love, even when it is the goodness in your own life they have not been true to—that is mercy.

The story of Peter's denial of his Master is the story of one who failed in honour; the story of the Master's love to him is the story of One who did not fail in mercy.

This Master is very gentle. What is said in the old Psalm may be said of Jesus. 'Such pity as a father hath to his children' the Lord had to Peter. He knew how weak he was. He remembered that although Peter was a man in years, he was only a child in the power to be honourable and true. And therefore He was not angry with him. He did not say, 'I will have nothing more to do with this scholar'. He said, 'I will have compassion upon him, and remember his evil deed no more'.

And that is the first thing to understand both about Peter and about the gentleness of Christ.

Peter was as yet very weak. And he did not know how weak he was. If he had known his weakness, he would not have said, 'Though all others forsake Thee, yet will not I'. That is a lesson we have all to learn. And many who come to be very strong for goodness and truth in their old age are as weak as Peter in their youth. About two hundred years ago there lived in France a very holy lady, who for her holiness and goodness was by bad people put in prison. Her name was Madam Guyon. When this lady was a young girl at school she was very religious, and had, even then, a great love for God. But one day she said to the other girls of the school that she loved God so well that she could die for Him. And the other girls saw, or thought they saw, that this was only a boast, and that it sprang from pride. So they agreed to put her to a very cruel test. They went to her and said that a message had come from God commanding her to give up her life for Him. And then they led her into a room, on which they had spread a great white sheet to receive her blood. And they ordered her to kneel in the centre of it that she might be put to death. Then her heart failed her just as Peter's did. Then she found out how weak and proud-hearted she had been. And she cried out that she could not die until her father gave his consent. But it was the beginning of strength to this pious girl to have found out her weakness and her pride of heart. And it was the beginning of strength to Peter to find out how weak and full of the fear of death he was. And the gentleness of the Master was shown in this, that He put the blame of the denial and the untruth on his weakness, and did not say, 'He has a bad and wicked heart'.

Another beautiful thing in the gentleness of the Master was that although Peter failed to be true to Him, He did not fail to be true to Peter. When the Lord takes anyone into His love, He does not easily let him go. He had taken Peter into His love. And having begun to love him, He loved him unto the end. He showed that by the look which He gave Him when the cock crew. The Lord had been thinking of Peter and praying for him even when evil men were speaking and working evil against Himself at the judgment-seat. And when the poor, weak disciple had lost all his braveness through the fear which had come upon him, and denied his Master the third time, and this time with oaths and curses, the Master turned and gave him this look. It was a look of sorrow, not of anger. If the look could have been changed into words, it would have said, 'O Peter! O my poor, weak disciple! did I not forewarn thee of this?' A very tender look it would be, like the look of a mother who finds her child in a serious fault: a look with vexation in it, but also with healing and help in it. That look recalled Peter to himself. It made him see two things at the same moment—both how truly Jesus loved him and how little he deserved His love. That look made him ashamed of his want of honour and truth. It opened the fountain of tears. It led him to repent of the base words he had spoken. And the gentle Master intended that it should help His disciple in this very way.

And in yet another way the Master showed that He was true to His disciple. Peter was one of the first He thought about after He rose from the grave. So loving, so gentle was He, so truly did He wish this disciple to know that he was forgiven, that when He was sending a message to the disciples about His resurrection, He mentioned Peter, and only Peter, by name. 'Go your way,' He said to the women who came to the grave with sweet spices and found Him risen—'go your way, tell the disciples and Peter that Jesus goeth before you into Galilee.'

But more gentle still the Master not only forgave His disciple, but healed him of the evil in his heart. He did not make light of the evil which His disciple had done. He laid bare that evil, so that Peter could not but see it. He laid bare the very thoughts and feelings of Peter's own heart that he might learn how he had been led into his evil deed. He showed him the pride, the self-esteem, the over-confidence in himself, which had led Peter to say, 'Though all be offended with Thee, yet will not I'.

But He did not stop there. Jesus knew what Peter was yet ignorant of, that beneath the pride of heart lay wells of love and faith and honour which the pride of his heart kept from flowing out.

And on a bright morning by the Sea of Galilee the hour came when the gentle Saviour was to bring these to light.

For Peter it was the hour of sorrow for his sin. The thoughts of his warm and loving heart were dark and heavy with the remembrance of his sin. Often, often by night and by day he had said to himself, 'Am I the same disciple who made the proud boast, and yet so basely fell? Am I the man who denied my Lord with oaths and curses, and am yet suffered the company of the disciples?' A great cloud of shame rested on his soul. He must have shrunk from the very thought of ever meeting his Lord again. But even while this thought was troubling him, the Master he had offended appeared, as in the earlier years, on the shores of the lake.

Three times the gentle Saviour put the question to His disciple, 'Lovest thou Me?' Three times He gave the disciple who had denied Him thrice an opportunity of saying that he loved Him. At last Peter, in an anguish of humility and love, cried out, 'Lord, Thou knowest all things: Thou knowest that I love Thee'.

It is not boasting now. The day of boasting of his own faithfulness is over. He has found out how weak, how passionate, how rash he has been. He knows that so long as he is on the earth there will be outbreaks, and fallings away, and turnings from the right path. But his gentle Master has taught him also to know that beneath all his weakness and sinfulness there is a living stream of love to Christ, which if he follow will lead him right.

The gentle Saviour in the presence of all the other disciples lifted the fallen Peter into his old place of honour. He put a new heart in him and a right spirit to make him strong and bold to speak for God and for righteousness. And He put him in charge, as a minister of the Gospel, of His flock. 'Feed My lambs and My sheep,' He said to him. And Peter became brave and true, and one of the most faithful among the Apostles. It was Peter who preached the first sermon on Christ in Jerusalem, and told its rulers that by wicked hands they had slain their Lord. It was he who told the same rulers, when they commanded him not to preach in Christ's name, that it was right to obey God rather than men. And it was he who first saw that the Gospel was not to Jews only, but to the whole world, and who himself went among the Gentiles and told them of Christ's love. A brave, true, kind hearted man; a brave, true servant of God, who was made both brave and true by the gentleness of Christ.—A. MACLEOD, The Gentle Heart, p. 267.

A FLOWER OF CALVARY

LUKE XXIII.

IN some Italian pictures of the Crucifixion, the artists have drawn a little flower growing at the foot of the cross, which they called the Alleluia flower, as our forefathers also did. It has many names, but it is most generally called wood-sorrel to-day in England. Doubtless you know its cloverlike leaves which fold up at night, or before rain, and its pearly white flowers, faintly streaked with purple. The old fancy for putting it into pictures of the Crucifixion of our Lord seems to have come from a legend that the purple streaks were caused by the falling of some drops of the Saviour's blood upon the flower. Now, we may not believe that the legend is true, and yet we may see that the painters did well to give the flower a place at the foot of the cross. The truth about the streaks on the pearly bells of the wood-sorrel is more wonderful than the ancient fancy, for such marks are now known to be, in many cases at least, what botanists call 'honey guides'—that is, they are meant to point the insects which visit the flower to the place where the honey is stored, which they come to seek. It fills me with amazement that the Eternal Wisdom should, if I may say so, take the trouble to paint streaks on a little flower in order to show insects which live but a few days, or hours even, the way to the sweet food which is to nourish their little life. Does God take care that the tiny creatures should not miss their meat, or waste their short time in vainly wandering to find it? How much more care will He not take that His children should have what is good for them?

There are some other quaint old fancies about trees and flowers connected with the sufferings of our Saviour, which you may like to know. One is about the aspen, or trembling poplar. You have noticed, no doubt, that the foliage of the aspen often quivers and rustles on a calm summer day, when the leaves of other trees are still: the slightest breath of wind sets the aspen leaves trembling. And a very old story is told to account for the almost perpetual shaking of the foliage—how when the men who had to make the cross went to a wood to choose a tree, they fixed upon an aspen for their purpose, and ever since all aspen trees have trembled with the remembrance that one of them was used for the torture and death of our Lord. I suppose it was some poet's fancy which invented the tale, and it may have helped a little by the fact that aspen wood is not so apt to split, when a nail is driven into it, as are some other kinds of wood. Of course it is no more than a fancy, but it may serve to remind you, when you see it trembling in the breeze, of Him who died upon the cross.

In boggy places in the Highlands of Scotland there grows a tiny tree, not more than two or three feet high, the dwarf birch, and if you were to talk to a Highlander about the queer little tree, he would probably tell you that when the soldiers scourged Jesus they took branches of this tree, which then grew tall like other birches, but from that time forward it has been condemned to be a dwarf among its kind.

In other countries the folk believe that the soldiers used willow boughs to smite the Lord, and that the weeping willow has ever since drooped its branches in shame and sorrow that one of its kind tore the Saviour's flesh.

Better than these rather dark and sad fancies about aspen, birch, and willow, I like one, which I believe is of English growth, about the wild rose. According to this legend the briar did not bear roses until after the Crucifixion, but only poor, small flowers. But since the soldiers wove the thorny crown for the Saviour's head from the briar, it has had its beautiful, pinky blossoms, delicately sweet, in memory that it had the honour to wreath the head of Christ. It is but a fancy like the others, but a happier and a nobler fancy. How so? it may be asked. Because the trees had no choice in the matter and no guilt, being used by wicked hands without will of theirs, and so it is a finer, truer fancy that the tree which touched the sacred body should have a grace, rather than a curse thereby.

Another English fancy was that the crown of thorns was formed of hawthorn branches, and it used to be believed that a blessing came to every house into which a spray of May blossom was carried when first it flowered. For my part, I believe it too. The person who got up early enough in the sweet May morning to take a walk before the day's work began, and came home refreshed by his ramble in the fields, and bringing thankful thoughts of the Saviour's love as well as a handful of fragrant bloom, must have brought a blessing into the house. He would surely be all the more cheerful, and patient, and kind, for his walk and his thoughts, and one such person in a house helps to make others like himself.

Certainly it is wiser to try and find out the real causes of things than to make pretty fancies to account for them, since the facts of Nature are always more wonderful than the fancies of men, and you may, if you please, find out the true meaning of the shivering of aspen leaves, of the bending of willow branches, of the dwarfiness of the mountain birch, and so on, but it was wise in our forefathers to think often of our Saviour's Cross and Passion, and especially wise to think of them out in the free air, and among the green things of the earth.—JOHN A. HAMILTON, The Wonderful River, p. 259.

THE BEAUTY OF WINGS

(Preached at Christmas)

'And their eyes were open, and they knew Him; and He vanished out of their sight.'—LUKE XXIV. 31.

Of how many things in nature is this true, that you know only their full beauty and worth when they are about to leave you? The day is loveliest at its setting, and the summer at its fading, and the plant in its flowering, which is just its dying. We are always looking back upon our past and surrounding it with a halo of brightness and happiness which the present does not possess. It is the law of our nature that a thing must be taken from us, or cease to be, before we find out its true value. The present blessing that is beside our path, which we fail to appreciate, must open its dull wing-cases and flee away ere we realise how much we have lost by its withdrawal. Every nation finds its golden age in its early history, and surrounds it with the atmosphere of poetry; and all men and women find their Eden, on which they look back with the tenderest yearnings, in the years of their youth.

I. The incident of the text illustrates and consecrates this natural human sentiment. While the two disciples walked with Jesus along the Emmaus road, they were interested in His conversation, and their hearts burned within them at the glowing words that fell from His lips; but their eyes were holden, and they failed to recognise His true character. It was only when He was about to vanish out of their sight that their eyes were opened, and they knew that it was the Lord Himself who had been with them. And is not the lesson which that incident at Emmaus teaches one that you are learning all through life? Your best blessings are not recognised by you till they have vanished; your common privileges have little value to you till you are deprived of them. Your home inspires no special gratitude till you are cast homeless upon the world. Your friends, the companions of your life, the dear sharers of your everyday experiences, how little do you prize the tenderness of their love or the beauty of their character, until that quiet, unceasing ministry of goodness has ceased for ever! Barrie says in his interesting Life of his mother, 'Everything that I could do for her I have done since I was a boy. I look back through the years, and I cannot see the smallest thing left undone.' That surely must be a most uncommon experience. I did not think that any human being could possibly say that of his dead. Happy son to feel in that way towards the mother that has vanished out of his sight! For most of us death is not only a revealer but an accuser!

II. Blessed be God, it is not a Saviour vanishing from your view while your eyes are opened for the first time to know what He is, that is revealed to you at Christmas time. He appeared to the disciples at the end of His earthly life, when His work was finished and He was about to depart to the home from whence He came. But He appears to you at Christmas time as a little child born anew into the world. You are not like Cleopas and his companion at Emmaus, in the twilight shadows, asking Jesus to abide with you, for the day is far spent; but like the shepherds and the wise men at Bethlehem, gazing with reverence at the wonderful spectacle of the Word made flesh, and assuming the form and nature of a new-born babe, with the fresh, fair, morning light all around. The old and the new come together—the close of the year and the birth of your Saviour. The close of the year tells you that all its bright seasons have vanished out of your sight, and produces the sorrow and repentance connected with such loss. The birth of Jesus tells you that all old things may be made new, and so fills your heart with fresh hope and resolution. And just as the vanishing of Jesus when His work here was done revealed His true character to the disciples, so may the appearing of Jesus to you, as a little child, take your heart captive by the beauty of His lowliness, subdue your pride, conquer your selfishness, teach you true humility, and put you in the way of acquiring that childlike spirit without which you cannot enter the kingdom of heaven.—HUGH MACMILLAN, The Spring of the Day, p. 306.

GOING DOWN; OR THE LADDER TO GLORY

(For Ascensiontide)

LUKE XXIV. 50, 51.

I WANT to tell you about the Ascension of Jesus Christ. Do you know what 'Ascension' means? It means 'going up'. Jesus Christ going up into heaven, that is the meaning of the word. It was last Thursday, eighteen hundred and forty-five years ago. I wonder whether you know why I say that eighteen hundred and forty-five years ago, last Thursday, Jesus Christ went away? He had been upon the earth—after he rose from the dead—forty days, and then it was ten days after He went up into heaven before He sent the Holy Ghost, as it will be next Sunday. Forty and ten make fifty; therefore that day on which the Holy Ghost came down is called 'Fifty,' or 'Pentecost,' which means 'fifty,' because it was just 'fifty days' after Jesus Christ ascended. Let us understand the matter.

I. In the morning—I am almost sure it was in the morning; it does not say so in the Bible, but the Church says so—in the morning, before twelve o'clock, you might have seen Jesus Christ with eleven of His disciples (poor Judas was dead and gone) Jesus with eleven of His disciples going out of the east—that way—the east gate of Jerusalem; He went down a very steep place, and then He crossed a little river which is called 'the brook Kedron'; and when He had crossed the little river, He went up the hill the other side—there were a great many olive-trees on that hill; and He came to the Garden of Gethsemane, and he went on till he came to a little town 'called Bethany,' on the top of a hill. He had talked about a great many things as He walked along to Bethany; and when He came to Bethany, almost the last thing Jesus said to them was, 'You must go into all the world, you must teach everybody, and baptise everybody'. And then He said, 'If you do so, I will be with you always to the end of the world'. 'Those were the last words that we know Jesus said. And then 'He lifted up His hands' like a priest, for He was a priest, 'and He blessed them, and as He was blessing them,' with His hands lifted up, He began to rise up—His body began to rise. Yes, His own body, and there were the signs in the hands and the feet and the side that it was the same body; and so it went on rising up and up. Now the disciples must have looked on wonderingly. And as He went up a cloud came down and hid Him from their view, and then they could not see him any more. That was the way He went up.

Do you remember, in the fourteenth of Leviticus, one of the sacrifices of the Jews was this: The priest took two birds, two little birds, and he killed one, and he dipped the living bird in the blood of the dead bird, and then he let the living bird fly out into the open fields. The dead bird was Jesus on the cross; the live bird was Jesus going up into the height of glory. It was a type of Him.

So Jesus went up, and 'a cloud received Him out of their sight'.

II. What do you think was going on, on the other side? Something very grand indeed. I should think that all the angels came to meet Him. I should think there was a grand procession, and that they were all singing their hosannas to Him. Can you tell me what they said? I think it was this: Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in. Who is this King of glory? The Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle. Lift up your heads, O ye gates; even lift them up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in. Who is this King of glory? The Lord of hosts, He is the King of glory. Selah' (Ps. xxiv. 7-10). 'The Lord of hosts!' He is 'the Lord of all the armies of earth; all the myriads of creation'. 'The Lord of hosts,' Who destroyeth all His people's foes. He is the King of glory!

It was very grand when a Roman general had won a great victory, and came back to Rome, and had all his prisoners tied to his chariot-wheels, and he distributed far and wide 'gifts' to those around. So did Jesus Christ. He is gone up to heaven to give you and me now 'the gift of the Holy Ghost'.

That is the way that Jesus Christ went up into heaven.

I like to fancy it, though we cannot see it, that Jesus going up into heaven was making a ladder for us to go up. We cannot see the steps, but He has made a ladder—better than Jacob's ladder—and we can go up now. We could not go up before; but now He has made the ladder we can go up. I want to talk about that Ascension—our going up.

A little girl was seeing some pictures one day, and one was the picture of an angel. He had wings; and her mother talked to her about the golden streets of heaven, and the gates of pearl; and little Julia said, 'Mamma, when shall I get my wings, and fly up there?'

III. When will you get your wings and fly away? Let us think about it.

Now you know this is God's rule—before we go up, we always come down. If you want to go up very high, you must go down—be very humble. If I want to leap a great big height, I must put myself down, then I can spring. The way up the Hill of Ascension is through the Valley of Descent. You must go down, or you will never ascend if you do not first descend. I want to speak to you a little about that going down.

What should you think if I were to say to you, if you are a Christian boy or a Christian girl, 'You will never die'? Should I speak the truth? Is that true—You will never die? Yes, it is true. If you are God's child you will never die. You will shut your eyes to this world, to open them in that beautiful world. But you won't die. God says so. 'He that liveth and believeth in Me shall never die'. So you won't die. I am going to speak about what we generally call death—about dying.

A week or two ago I was in the Isle of Wight. I dare say you have been there. Did you go to Newport? If you go to the Isle of Wight you must go to Newport. I will tell you something about a very beautiful monument there.

Charles the First had a daughter, the Princess Elizabeth, who was a very pious girl. At the time when his subjects were very cruel and rebelled against him, the Princess Elizabeth was shut up a prisoner in Carisbrooke Castle; and there she was treated very cruelly. One morning, when the keeper came in to see her, there was the Princess Elizabeth lying dead, and her head was resting on the Bible which she had been reading. The verse she had just been reading, where her head was, was this, 'Come unto Me all ye that are weary and heavy-laden, and I will give you rest'. There was the little princess lying dead with her head on that text.

In the church at Newport there is a monument in white marble, very beautiful. It is a figure of the Princess Elizabeth, her long hair flowing down, her head lying on a Bible; all made of beautiful white marble, and inscribed thereon these words, 'Come unto Me, all ye that are weary and heavy-laden, and I will give you rest'.

I saw the room in Carisbrooke Castle and the spot where she died. I advise you to see both the church and the castle if you go to the Isle of Wight.

That was very beautiful. She laid her head on that beautiful text and went to heaven. Well, it was a very happy death.

You will die some day; you will be put into a coffin.

A little girl had a little baby sister who died, and the little baby sister was put into a little coffin, and the little girl said, 'Mother, baby has got a new cradle!' That was a pretty name for it.

But when the body is put into the coffin, what has become of the soul?

I will tell you about a little girl and her little brother. They went to see their aunt who had been very ill. But when they saw her she was dead! When they came home the little boy said to his sister, 'Sister, I was so surprised to see aunt. I thought when good people died they went to heaven; but aunt is not gone to heaven. We saw her body lying on the bed, dead. How was it, sister? I don't understand it.' His sister said, 'No, you do not understand it. I will explain it to you. It is the thinking part that goes to heaven. Aunt's thinking part has gone to heaven, because we think with the soul.'

When the body dies the angels carry the soul to heaven, because it was said so of Lazarus.

Did you ever see a balloon? It is a very beautiful thing to see. It is tied down with strings and ropes, and when the balloon is ready to go up the people cut the ropes and strings, and away the balloon goes up into the sky. Do you know why it goes up? Because the air inside the balloon is lighter than the air outside. If you put a cork into the water it rises because it is lighter than the water. So the balloon goes up because it is so light. And we go up because we have got a spirit inside us. We go to heaven because we have got heaven inside us. That is our ascension.

Now about the body. I want to speak a little about the body. It is a seed sown, but that is not the end of the body.

When Michelangelo the great sculptor was one day walking through the streets of Florence, he saw in a corner a large, ugly, dark piece of marble. He went up to it and he wanted it very much. He paid great attention to this ugly piece of marble. And Michelangelo said, 'There is an angel in that marble, and I want to let the angel out.' So he had this ugly piece of marble taken to his house, and he worked diligently at it with his hammer and chisel. His eye discovered its beauty, though no one else did, and a beautiful angel came out of that stone.

There is something wonderful in our bodies; they do not look like it, but there is something wonderful in these poor, sinful, vile bodies of ours—so vile, so wicked. God's handiwork is upon us. The spirit will come out of us, 'better than angels'. We shall be above the angels. The angels are the servants of God; we shall be saints in glory above the angels.

When He comes then the spirit will come to the body again, and they will be joined together again; and we shall be 'caught up' to meet Jesus in the air, and go with Him in the grand procession, and reign with Him in glory. Oh! who would not be a Christian?

Do you wish to get up? Are you really in earnest? Do you wish to be better? Do you wish to love God more? Then I will tell you something. How many people do you think there are now in this church? I suppose there are a thousand. Suppose you were to see a thousand little golden threads let down from God, and these little golden threads from God, each one came to each person's head, and were to draw each person up to heaven—I say, suppose a thousand golden threads came down, and each was to come to each person here, and draw you, and you, and you, up and up to heaven. What would you do with that thread? Would not you take great care of it? Would not you let it pull you up? Do you wish to have the thread? You have the golden thread now. If you trifle with it, it won't draw you; but if you pay attention to it, it will draw you up and up, and you will have an 'Ascension' indeed!—
JAMES VAUGHAN.

THE ASCENSION

'It came to pass, while He blessed them, He was parted from them, and carried up into heaven.'—LUKE XXIV. 51.

THE angels must speak to us. We have been gazing up after our ascending Lord; but they tell us we must come back to our everyday life here below, and see what we can do to get ready for His coming again. What must you do?

I. You must think of Jesus on His throne in heaven, and worship Him and praise Him.

II. You must remember the judgment to come, and who will be the Judge? None other than the same dear Saviour who died for you, and who now ever lives to plead for you.

III. You must try to be like Him by being gentle and loving and patient and forgiving.

Do you think that to remember these things will make you dull and unhappy? Oh, no! There could not be a greater mistake. What do you read about the disciples after they had seen their Master go up? They 'returned to Jerusalem with great joy, and were continually in the Temple, praising and blessing God'. It made them very happy, you see, to think of their Lord on His throne in heaven. He was their Lord and Master, but He was also their Saviour, their King, their God. They were full of joy when they thought of Him. And so should you be too. To have so loving and so glorious a Saviour should make your hearts very glad and thankful, and your whole lives very bright and happy. If religion makes you unhappy, it is the wrong sort. Your loving Father would have you serve Him very happily, with loving hearts full of joy and praise. This is the way in which even you can in heart and mind ascend up with your ascended Saviour.—BISHOP WALSHAM HOW, Plain Words to Children, p. 66.

ST. JOHN

OUR GREAT HIGH PRIEST

(For Good Friday)

'Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world'—JOHN I. 29.

WHEN the sun rises, does it make the world as light as it is at midday all at once? No.

No, we just see a streak of light first, and then the sky gradually gets lighter till we see the sun shining in all its strength.

This was just the way God enlightened the world with knowledge of Himself. He gradually revealed Himself; and just as the sun drives away the darkness, so Jesus came as 'the Sun of Righteousness,' to drive away the people's ignorance of God.

A great sculptor called Michelangelo once came across a block of marble in the streets of Florence, and had it taken to his house; and when his friends asked him what he was going to do with it, he told them he was going to set free the angel who was buried in it, meaning that he was going to carve a statue of an angel from it.

Now there was once a religion which, compared to the religion Jesus came to teach, was as different to it as the rough block of marble was different to the statue of the Angel made from it. That was the Jew's religion. It had its clergy, its public worship, and its Temple, and it had its fasts and festivals. This religion was called 'the shadow of good things to come,' and Jesus came to make that shadow a reality, and to give us all those good things, just as Michelangelo caused the angel to appear from the marble.

I. Something very special happened on the Day of Atonement. First of all the High Priest went into the Holy Place to make atonement for his own sins, and where did he go after that? Into the Holy of Holies.

Yes, the High Priest was the only person who ever went into the Holy of Holies, and he only went into it on the Day of Atonement. When he went into the Holy of Holies he sprinkled blood before the Mercy-seat. He did this to make atonement for the people's sins and to reconcile God to the people. The High Priest was the mediator between God and the people.

But all this was only a shadow of what was to come. The sacrifices, and the sprinkling of blood, and the High Priest, were all pointing to One who was to come; and who was that? Jesus Christ.

Yes, they all pointed to Jesus who was to come to be our High Priest. A priest must offer sacrifice.

When did our High Priest offer His sacrifice? When He died on the cross.

II. Good Friday is our Day of Atonement, when Jesus shed His blood on the cross to atone for our sins, and to reconcile God to us. Now we see why a lamb was the animal offered as the Passover sacrifice. What did St. John the Baptist call Jesus? 'The Lamb of God 'which taketh away the sin of the world'.

Yes, so you see the High Priest and the Lamb offered in sacrifice both pointed to Jesus.

When Jesus died on the cross to make atonement for our sins, He was the Priest, and the Victim He offered in sacrifice was Himself. When we were given to God in holy baptism, God received us as His own, because Jesus had reconciled God to us, and paid the penalty for our sins.

III. But there is one great difference between our High Priest and the Jewish High Priest. Before the Jewish High Priest could make atonement for the people's sins, he had first to make atonement for his own sins, just as a priest may make his Confession now, and receive Absolution before celebrating Jesus' death in the Holy Sacrament; but was it necessary for Jesus to do this? No.

No, there was no necessity for Jesus to make atonement for Himself, because He had never committed sin. But the Jewish High Priest was only an ordinary man, and subject to the same temptations as other men.

Is Jesus' work over yet? No.

No. His work is not over. He is 'a Priest for ever,' and He is always reminding His Father in heaven of what He did for us in the great Sacrifice on Calvary.—J. L. SMITH-DAMPIER, Christ's Little Citizens, p. 218.

MARY'S TRIBUTE TO HER SON JESUS

'His mother saith unto the servants, Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it.'—JOHN II. 5.

WE may usefully consider these words first of all in connection with Mary herself, and then afterwards as regards the counsel which they contain.

I. We have here Mary's Testimony to her Son.—'They are the only words of Mary about her Son which have been preserved. We overhear them as they are spoken to the servants: 'Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it'. Mary's testimony is given in few words, but they are full of meaning. Behind them is an experience of thirty years' intercourse with Jesus of the most intimate kind. What a tribute there is in this saying to our Lord's strength of character, to His sympathy with His people even in little things, and to His ability and willingness to help them! During His boyhood and youth at Nazareth Jesus had been 'subject' to Joseph and Mary; and He could not possibly have been a more dutiful Son. But He had gradually gained such influence with them by His purity and weight of character, that it seemed at length as if the relationship between Him and them had been reversed. His mother was probably by this time a widow; and she felt that Jesus was more to her than ever her husband had been. How she confided in His wisdom! How she leant on Him in every hour of difficulty and trial!

II. We have here Mary's Counsel to Others.—She had spoken first of all to Jesus Himself about the family perplexity; and she was not disturbed by the answer which He made to her. When he replied, 'Woman, what have I to do with thee?' His language was in no way disrespectful. And when He added, 'Mine hour is not yet come,' He meant that the moment to provide a fresh supply of wine had not yet arrived. Jesus does not reprove His mother; He only gives her a gentle hint to leave the situation in His hands; and He suggests that now, having finally gone from the home of His early years at Nazareth, and begun His public ministry, He must henceforth be always known as the Son of Man, and not as the Son of Mary.

The servants at the marriage-feast took Mary's advice, and promptly carried out our Lord's orders. The result was that the water which they poured into the waterpots was at once turned into wine. And if we also in our daily lives listen for the voice of the Lord Jesus, and practise obedience to His will, our lives will be enriched and ennobled, and He will change for us the water of earth into the wine of the kingdom. For the Son of Mary is the Christ of God, and the carpenter of Nazareth the Everlasting Son of the Father.—CHARLES JERDAN, Messages to the Children, p. 376.

THE DOVE

'And He said unto them that sold doves, Take these things hence.'—JOHN II. 16.

WE ought to be like the dove in three ways:—

I. In Character.—'Be ye therefore wise as serpents and harmless as doves' (Matt. x. 16). What the lamb is among animals, the dove is among birds. It is the Divine emblem of purity and innocence—the bearer of the olive branch of peace. The whole character of the dove is in keeping with this estimate. Its voice, no less than its disposition, is the embodiment of sweetness. It has 'a tender mournful cadence which, heard in solitude and sadness, cannot fail to be heard with sympathy, as if it were the expression of real sorrow' (Gosse). It recalls the language of Isaiah, 'We mourn sore like doves'; or those beautiful words of Tennyson—

Every sound is sweet;
The moan of doves in immemorial elms,
And murmuring of innumerable bees.

This gentleness of disposition renders the dove a defenceless creature, ill able to take care of itself, and it easily becomes the victim of persecution. Hence Hosea speaks of Israel as 'a silly dove without heart,' which shall 'tremble as a dove out of the land of Assyria'. And thus the words 'wise as serpents' have to be added. The harmlessness of the dove must be supplemented by the wisdom of the serpent. And both elements are found in the peerless example of Jesus. See how he answered the quibbling questions of the Scribes and Pharisees. They tried to entangle Him in His talk; but His wisdom was more than a match for their cunning. The wolf was utterly discomfited by the lamb. And this is the only worthy ideal for His followers: 'Be ready always to give an answer concerning the hope that is in you,' but 'with meekness and fear,' 'be ye wise as serpents and harmless as doves'.

II. In Swiftness.—The dove is one of the swiftest of birds. The carrier pigeon 'has been known to accomplish a flight of three hundred miles in little more than two hours'. Its wings are its strength. Upheld by them she can fly for many hours, and the birds of prey cannot overtake her. Homer himself mentions the dove as the emblem of swiftness and timidity. If you cannot fight like the eagle, fly like the dove, and, like the carrier pigeon, let your fight be homeward. May the homing instinct be as strong in you as in her. For it is only there, in the mountain home of God's grace, that your soul can find shelter. Speed, then, your flight 'as the doves to their windows'. 'Man's spiritual existence is like the flight of a bird in the air: he is sustained only by effort, and when he ceases to exert himself he falls' (Froude's Bunyuan). Let your spiritual advancement then be like the flight of a bird. Imitate the dove in its swiftness.

III. In Sacrifice.—The dove is pre-eminently the sacred bird. 'The dove among the Semites had a quite peculiar sanctity.' 'Sacred doves that may not be harmed are found even at Mecca.' It was to the birds what the lamb was to the animals—it derived its chief interest from its use in sacrifice.

'Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus.' He stooped to death, even the death of the cross, and we are called upon to stoop to something similar—to the great deep of self-surrender and self-sacrifice—the Crucifixion and the death of sin. This is the essence of all Christian sacrifice. We must be crucified with Christ, and rise and live through Him. We must be washed in His blood. We must be made great by His gentleness. We must be like the dove and the lamb in sacrifice.

In character, in swiftness, and in sacrifice, imitate the dove.—JOHN ADAMS, Kingless Folk, p. 26.

TWICE BORN

'Ye must be born again.'—JOHN III. 7.

WHEN a great man dies every city or village he has lived in for a time, or had anything to do with, is very proud of telling its connection with him. And if it can only make it appear that he was born there, it is prouder than ever. Did you ever hear of Homer? He was a poor blind singer who lived among the Greeks long, long ago, and who did a great deal to make the world brighter. When he died no less than seven cities wanted the honour of being his birthplace!

Seven cities contended for Homer dead,
Among which, when living, he begged his bread.

In Geneva I once saw something just as foolish as this. There was a man born there who wasn't so good as Homer—though some people like him, for there is no accounting for taste! His name was Rousseau, and on one side of the river that flows through the city there is an inscription on an old house saying—'Rousseau was born here'; but on the other side of the river there is an inscription on another house saying he was born there! Now, I didn't believe he was born in both houses, or that Homer had seven birthplaces, and why?—because we know a man can be born a man only once.

Yes, but what does the text say? It says, 'Ye must be born again,' and it is Jesus who says it of every one of us, so it must be true. And perhaps it is not so wonderful after all.

Did you ever see that beautiful insect called the dragon-fly? It is almost as large as a tiny bird, and so quick and pretty. Well, it had to be born twice before it became the beautiful thing that it is. First of all it was a little egg lying in a muddy pool down in the water. Out of that egg there came a squirmy little creature, something like a worm, which lived in the water, moved about on the water, and had its home there. But one day it crept into a hollow twig on the water, and there it sickened and died; yet after it was dead there came out from it this beautiful dragon-fly with glossy wings and deep-blue corselet, and it flew away from the pool and didn't live in the water at all for it had wings and could mount into the air, and rise above earth and water altogether. That beautiful creature, with its wings neatly folded up, was inside the other creature when it was moving about under water. But it was born again, and then it was a thing for flowers and the sunshiny air, and not for the marsh and the pool.

And that is what Jesus means when He says we must be born again. We must have a new spirit, a new life, different from what we had at the first.

It is our heaven-life, but it must be born in us here. It is the life which His Holy Spirit creates—a life that loves only what is pure and good, and loving and true. Yes, the Great Life we all must get if we would be saved is that of a holy spirit. A holy spirit is a spirit that lives in what is good, and true, and pure and beautiful—and so loves Jesus and wants to please Him. Is that your spirit? Pray Jesus to breathe on your heart His breath of life—for so we must be born again if we would see Jesus in heaven or know Him here. Ask Jesus for a holy spirit, and He will give it you.—J. REID HOWATT, The Children's Pew, p. 198.

GOD SENDING HIS SON TO SAVE THE WORLD

(For Christmas)

'God sent not His Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through Him might be saved.—JOHN III. 17.

A HAPPY, joyous day this blessed Christmas—a happy and joyous day to all the world. And well it may be. No other day ever brought better blessings to our race. Christmas is the Saviour's birthday.

Carol, brothers, carol,
Carol joyfully;
Carol the good tidings,
Carol merrily,
And pray a gladsome Christmas
For all good Christian men,
Carol, brothers, carol,
Christmas day again.

A missionary to the South Sea Islands was one day reading to a group of natives the remarkable announcement made in the text concerning the goodness of our Heavenly Father in sending His only Son into the world on a mission of mercy, when a chief interrupted him, and said, 'What words were those? Let me hear them again!' The missionary repeated them, when the native sprang to his feet and asked, 'Is that true? Can that be true? God love the world which did not love Him! God give His own Son to die that man might not die! Can that be true?'

The good missionary assured him that it was even so, and the poor islander could no longer restrain his feelings, but gave vent to them in tears of joy.

The story of God's marvellous loving-kindness towards lost and undone sinners ought never to be heard by us unmoved. We are so familiar with it that it will not startle and astonish us, as it did the South Sea islander; but our hearts must be hard indeed if they are not touched at the remembrance of what our Blessed Saviour has done for us.

Every child has heard of the odd conceit that at midnight, on Christmas Eve, all the oxen will be found upon their knees. Those who choose to laugh at the absurdity of this may at least be reminded by it how the Saviour, at His coning in great humility, should find them engaged.

Washington Irving, in his Sketch Book, records this pleasing incident in no less pleasing words:—

'While I lay musing on my pillow, I heard the sound of little feet pattering outside of the door, and a whispering consultation. Presently a choir of small voices chanted forth an old Christmas carol, the burden of which was—

Rejoice, our Saviour He was born
On Christmas day in the morning.'

Immediately after the public services of the day it used to be the custom of the country gentleman, in England, to stand at his gate and give alms to the poor. No offering to the Saviour is more grateful to Him than the remembrance of His suffering children.

One of the prettiest Christmas customs is that of the Norwegians, who on this day give a dinner to the birds. Early in the morning every gable, gateway, and barn-door is decorated with a sheaf of corn fastened to the top of a long pole, and the little feathered songsters soon discover that the treat is designed for them. Even the poorest peasant will contrive to have a handful of grain put by for the birds.

Our thanks can never be earnest and hearty enough, because we never can fully appreciate what our Saviour really did for us—when He came into the world to suffer and die for us.

I have a touching little story to tell you which will help you to do this.

Years ago a Russian nobleman, with his wife and only daughter, were travelling on important business in the interior of the empire. Although it was earlier than the winter generally set in, the nipping frost had already stripped the trees, and turned the green fields to a dingy brown.

The carriage of the nobleman rolled up to an inn, and in great haste he ordered fresh horses to be put to it that they might reach the next station before night. The tavern-keeper entreated him not to venture any farther until the morning, as the wolves were already becoming fierce and dangerous. The nobleman thought that the man only told him this to alarm him, and thus secure a profitable customer for the night. He therefore laughed, and said it was too early for wolves, and ordered his coachman to drive on.

Besides the man who drove there sat on the box by his side a faithful servant, who had been born on the nobleman's estate, and who loved his master as he did his own life.

As the carriage rolled along the hardened snow all was quiet in the fields and woods, and there seemed no prospect of danger. After a while the little girl said to her father, 'What is that strange howling?' 'Oh, nothing,' he answered; 'it is only the wind sighing through the trees.' 'The child was silent, and closed her eyes; but presently she whispered, 'Listen, father! It does not sound like the wind to me.'

The father put his head out of the carriage window, and his face instantly grew pale. Far behind in the distance, through the clear, frosty air, he heard a noise, the meaning of which he well understood. He spoke to the driver in an undertone, 'The wolves, I fear, are after us. Make haste. Let us have our pistols ready.' The horses went faster and faster, but the dismal sound behind came nearer and nearer.

The nobleman tried to quiet the apprehensions of his wife and child, and said to the faithful servant who sat by the driver, 'When the wolves come up with us, do you single out one and fire, and I will do the same; and while the pack stop to devour them, we can hasten on.'

The plan was no sooner agreed upon than it was put in execution. The horrid troop came rushing on, with a large dog-wolf at the head. Two shots were fired; two of the savage creatures dropped dead; and, while the others fell upon them, in their ravenous hunger, the carriage gained ground. The repast was a short one, and the taste of blood only made them more furious. Again they reached the carriage: two more shots were fired with the same result. The post-house was still at a distance, and as another make-shift the nobleman ordered the postilion to loose one of his leaders, and thus furnish another bait to the wolves. The poor horse was soon torn in pieces, and a second shared his fate.

The carriage now proceeded more slowly, being dragged on by only two jaded animals, and the place of safety was still far distant.

A panic seized on all, and no one knew what could next be done. Suddenly the devoted servant called out to his master, 'I have served you ever since I was a child: I love you as my own self. Nothing now can save you but one thing. Let me save you!'

In vain the affrighted nobleman besought him to desist. As soon as the bloodthirsty pack reached the carriage again, the faithful servant threw himself down amongst them.

The panting horses were pushed on at a gallop, and the travellers safely entered the post-house gate.

Greater love hath no man than this—that a man lay down his life for his friend. But God commendeth His love toward us, in that while we were yet sinners, and His rebellious subjects, Christ died for us.—JOHN N. NORRIS, Milk and Honey, p. 28.

THE DEAD SHALL HEAR

JOHN V. 25.

ONE day Jesus was preaching in Jerusalem, and He said, 'The dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live'. The people knew that He was speaking of Himself. And they were astonished at His word. Some said they were words which only a bad man would speak. Some said that He was taking words into His lips that only God should speak.

'Who ever heard,' they said to each other, 'of the dead rising at the voice of a man? The dead? They are still and do not hear us when we call. To make a dead man live again!—only God could do that. And this is a mere man, Joseph's son from Nazareth.' But when they turned round again to listen, He was repeating the words: 'All that are in the graves shall hear His voice'.

But if those who thought and spoke in that way had known their Bible better and tried to know who He was who was speaking such words, they need not have been surprised. In the Book of the Prophet Ezekiel there is a vision of this very wonder.

One day God took the prophet to a valley that was filled with dead people's bones. 'Look at these bones,' He said: 'they are dry, they are bones of the dead.' Then He said, 'My people are like these bones; they are dry and lifeless; mere dead bones; dead as these bones are dead. The prophet looked

The heap of bones lay before him. They were without sign or touch of life. The flesh was gone. The blood was spilled out. Bone was no longer joined to bone. In all the heap there was neither eye, nor ear, nor warm, grasping hand. A whole nation was pictured there, dead, turned into dry bones.

But God said to the prophet: 'Speak to these bones, and they shall live'. And the prophet spoke as he was commanded. He spoke to the dry bones, and the bones heard his voice. And bone came to bone, and sinew to sinew, and flesh covered them, and skin, and blood came back into the veins, and eyes kindled in the eye sockets, and the red came into the cheek, and there was a movement, a stir, a rising up, and out of the heap of dry bones rose up a nation of living men and women. The dead heard the voice of the prophet, and those that heard lived. Never was a more wondrous vision shown to a prophet. It was a vision of dead souls brought to life again.

Now the world into which Christ came was like the valley of dry bones which Ezekiel saw. It was a world of dead souls. Sin had killed out the life which was once in them. The vision that Jesus saw was, in a different form, the same Ezekiel had seen. When He was living in Jerusalem it seemed to Him to be like walking over open graves with dead people in them.

The Lord was perhaps thinking of Ezekiel's vision when He said, 'The dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God'. But He was thinking of a larger heap of dead people than Ezekiel saw: He was thinking of the dead of all nations and kindreds on the face of the earth: He was thinking of dead nations, dead races, a whole dead world. And in His love and to make those who heard Him glad, He said, 'The hour is coming when all belonging to the world who shall hear My voice shall live.

Of dead people there are two kinds. There are the dead people in the actual graves, the people whose bodies are dead; and there are dead people whose bones and flesh and blood are still living, but whose souls are dead. It was dead people whose souls only were dead that Ezekiel saw the vision of; it was both kinds of dead people the Lord was speaking about. Both kinds shall hear His voice: the dead whose souls are dead, and the dead whose bodies are dead.

Now we shall have another talk about this wonderful truth, and I shall try to make it all a little plainer to you.

I will tell you first of the dead whose souls are dead. The bodies are living; the souls are dead. Everything in them that should be thinking of God and heaven is dead. They can speak, they can think, they can buy, they can sell: but in everything that belongs to God they are dead. They do not know Him; they do not love Him; they do not care to think of Him; they do not live to Him. In relation to God they are just like dead people. The ear to hear His word is dead; the tongue to sing His praise is dead; the feet to go His messages are dead.

Of this kind of dead people Jesus said: 'The dead shall hear My voice and live'. And a great part of the Saviour's own preaching was preaching to the dead of this kind. The great Apostle Paul went among heathen nations to tell them about Christ. He also had to speak to dead souls. The nations he visited did not know God, nor care for Him, nor love Him. In relation to God they were just like dead people; they were like the dry bones that Ezekiel saw. But when Paul spoke to them they came to life; something in their hearts began to listen; in Paul's words they heard the voice of the Son of God, and one by one the dead souls became living souls. Companies of once dead people, joined together and became living Churches. And in Corinth, and Philippi, and Ephesus, and other cities, songs were sung to Jesus by living souls. Paul always looked upon such people as persons who had once been dead, but were now risen from the dead and alive.

The same thing happened wherever Christ's preachers went; dead souls hear the word, and those that heard began to live. Hundreds of years after Paul's time, preachers began to go into a great country covered with woods; it was a great wild country, among whose trees lived men and women, and wolves and bears. The men and women were ignorant of God; they had never heard of Him, they did not want to hear of Him: in the things of God they were just like dead people. These were the people from whom the German and English nations have come. But men filled with the spirit of Jesus went into the woods and told them of Jesus and of His love, and His pity, and His death on Calvary; and the dead souls listened and believed and turned to God, and became a great multitude of living souls.

A thousand years more passed, and in Germany and England the people of Christ began to think of nations that were still heathen, as they were once heathen, and they pitied them. They saw that they were dead souls, that they did not know God, that they worshipped idols, and were leading very poor and wretched lives. And holy men gave themselves to the work of preaching to those heathen nations. They spoke to the dead souls in those nations the word of Jesus; and the dead souls listened and heard and began to live. And now there are thousands and tens of thousands who were once heathens and are now Christians, and who are living to God and serving Him.

And this will go on as long as there are dead souls in the world; the dead will hear the voice of Jesus as it comes from the lips of missionaries and preachers, of holy men and holy women, and Christ's word will come true. Those that hear shall live; they shall turn to God and become His people.

But it is time now to speak to you of the dead whose bodies are dead. The dead who are lying in the graves shall one day hear the voice of Jesus, and shall come up out of their graves. The dear Lord, who in His preaching and the preaching of His Apostles and missionaries has raised dead souls from the dead, shall raise dead bodies as well. He is a Saviour for both body and soul.

Last year, being in London, I went to see a show of pictures in the Grosvenor Gallery. They were pictures of battle-fields and war. Among the pictures was one of a whole company of soldiers lying dead in a field. They had been attacked by enemies the night before and shot down, and they were lying where they fell. Only their heads were visible, their bodies were covered by the long grass of the field. It was a dreary picture. Desolation and death lay upon it, and it was pitiful as well. At the top of the field stood a priest with a book in his hand, and behind him a single servant. The priest was praying for the dead. It was a kindly service. But the poor fellows on the grass heard no word of his prayer; hearing and fighting were over for them for ever; they were dead, and no man could bid them back into life again.

But this which the good priest could not do the priest's Master can. The hour is coming when those very soldiers and all who are in their graves shall hear the voice of that Master and come out of their graves.

I cannot tell you what this great wonder shall be like. It is high above me; I cannot understand it. I have seen a red new-ploughed field in spring, and a seedsman stepping over it scattering the seed. I have seen the same field in harvest all covered with yellow corn. It will be a wonder as great as that. The dead shall hear the voice of Jesus, and they shall come up out of their graves.

In the chapel of the Liverpool workhouse there is a monument to a Christian lady who once lived in that workhouse as an angel of mercy. The monument is a statue of the Angel of the Resurrection. He is sitting waiting for the hour of it. Across his lap is lying the trumpet by which he is to tell the hour. The hour is coming. Every year brings it nearer. The angel shall put the trumpet to his lips and blow, and in the sound the dead shall hear the voice of Christ, and the graves shall give up their dead.

Everything in the world shall seem to be going on as at other times. Men shall be building houses, and sailing ships, and buying and selling, and marrying and giving in marriage; children shall be hurrying to schools; trains shall be filled with passengers and rushing from town to town; then suddenly the sound of the trumpet shall be heard, and all over the world people shall have a new look in their eyes: their very bodies shall be seen to be changing their forms, and every one shall be saying to his neighbour, 'The dead have heard the voice of the Son of God and are rising out of their graves.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 176.

THE MARVELLOUS MEAL

JOHN VI. 7.

JESUS commanded His disciples to make the people sit down in companies or rows of fifty on the green grass. I imagine them forming a hollow square; Jesus with His Apostles in the midst: a row of fifty men, with a few women and children seated among them, in front; another row on the right hand, another row on the left hand, and another behind. Other rows sit behind these; twenty-five rows each way; making in all '5000 men, besides women and children'. What eager bustling, what a busy hum and clatter of voices as they all arrange themselves, like soldiers, at the word of command! Then what a strange solemn hush of wondering expectation, as Jesus, taking the basket in His hand, stands in the midst, looks up to heaven and gives thanks to God. Very likely He used the common blessing which the Jews were accustomed to repeat at their meals: 'Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, Who hast brought forth this fruit from the earth!' The Jews had a good saying that a man who takes God's gifts without thanksgiving seems to steal them. God's word says, 'In everything give thanks; for this is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning you' (1 Thess. v. 18).

And now, while even the Apostles look on in amazement, marvelling what is to come next, their Master, as if He were doing the most natural thing in the world, takes one of the small loaves and breaks it, and hands the broken pieces first to Peter, then to John, and so on to each in turn; and still as He distributes—no one can tell how—the store grows. The Apostles stretch out first their hands, then the skirts of their long robes or mantles till each is loaded with as much as he can well carry. Then they hasten along the ranks of hungry people, who stretch out eager hands for the miraculous food, hardly believing it real until they taste it. Those in the hinder ranks are ready to cry with disappointment as they see the disciples giving away the last crumb; but they have not long to wait. Jesus stands ready, and as the disciples go back to Him for a fresh supply, the store is undiminished: there is bread enough for all, and likewise of the fishes, as much as they would.

'And they did all eat (says St. Mark) and were filled. And they took up twelve baskets full of the fragments and of the fishes.'

It was a very plain meal, only barley-cake and salt fish, with a draught of clear water from some cool mountain brook. Yet I would rather have been there—would not you?—than at Belshazzar's feast, or Queen Esther's banquet, or the table of the rich man who fared sumptuously every day.

This Marvellous Meal—more than five thousand people fed and satisfied from one basketful of bread and fish; and twelve times as much left at the end of the meal as there was at the beginning—is the only one of the miracles of our Lord which is related in all the four Gospels. St. John, in the sixth chapter of his Gospel, not only tells the story of the miracle, but records a discourse of our Lord when He was teaching, a day or two afterwards, in the synagogue at Capernaum, in which we see what lessons we are to learn from this glorious miracle.

For you must notice that all our Saviour's miracles contain great and beautiful lessons, for the sake of which they are recorded in the Gospels. Never did He work a miracle merely to show His power. When the unbelieving Scribes and Pharisees asked Him to do so, He refused. Every miracle had its own immediate purpose and use. Nevertheless, their use at the moment—that is, the benefit enjoyed by those who were healed, or had their sight or speech given them, and so forth, was not their chief purpose. Their noblest use was what St. John speaks of when he tells how Jesus wrought His first miracle, 'and manifested forth His glory; and His disciples believed on Him'. The Lord himself speaks of His miracles as proofs that He had indeed come from the Father, and was speaking the words of God (see John v. 86; xiv. 10, 11; xv. 24). But besides this they are illustrations—that is, a kind of pictures—of His power, pity, and love. When we see Him cleansing the poor leper, we have an image of the foulness and hideousness of sin, and of His power to cleanse us from all sin. When He opens the eyes of the blind, the mouth of the dumb, the ears of the deaf, and bids the paralytic or the maimed to walk, we are reminded that He only can open our minds and hearts to the truth and give us strength to do what is right. When we hear Him say, 'Believest thou that I can do this?' or, 'Thy faith hath made thee whole,' we are taught that if He is to be our Saviour, we must believe in Him—trust Him wholly at once and always.—E. R. CONDER, Drops and Rocks, p. 224.

THE BEAUTY OF THE KING'S TITLES

'I am the bread of life.'—JOHN VI. 35.

THESE are words that Jesus spake in reference to Himself. And here we have another of the beautiful titles by which we learn to know Him. This title is not so striking as some of the others given to Him in the Bible. It is very plain and practical, but very instructive.

We know a good deal about bread. It is on our tables all the time. We see it, and handle it, and eat it, every day. And we should be very thankful that Jesus has been pleased to compare Himself, not only with suns and stars, which are very far off, but also with things that are as familiar to us as our daily bread. 'I am the bread of life.' Our lesson from this text is—Jesus compared to bread. There are three reasons for this comparison; and in each of them we see what beauty there is in this title of Jesus our King.

I. Jesus may be Compared to Bread, in the First Place, because Bread is 'a Necessary Thing'.—If a person is hungry and starving for want of food, then nothing is more necessary for that person than bread. But until we know Jesus our souls are hungry and starving. He alone can feed them.

The worm in a circle of fire.—There was an Indian once who had become a Christian. He was so full of thankfulness to Jesus for pardoning his sins, and saving his soul, that he was never tired of talking about Him, and of telling his friends what a wonderful Saviour He was.

One day a friend asked him what it was that Jesus had done for him, that led him to be always talking so much about Him? Instead of replying in words, the grateful man took this way of showing what Jesus had done for him, and how necessary he had found His help to be.

He took some dry chips and little bits of wood. With these he made a circle about a foot in diameter. In the midst of this circle he placed a worm. Then he set fire to the circle of dry materials, and instantly there was a wall of fire blazing all round the poor worm. The worm crawled up to the edge of the fire, first on one side, and then on another. And at last, finding there was no way of escape for it anywhere, it went to the middle of the circle, as far from the fire as it could get, and then lifted its head up towards the sky, as much as to say that there was no help for it, unless it should come from above. Then the Indian put his finger down and let the worm crawl up on it, and so lifted it out from the danger that surrounded it.

'There,' said the Indian, 'you see what Jesus did for me. God was angry with me for my sins. His anger surrounded me on every side, just like that circle of fire. I had looked everywhere for help, but could not find it. Then Jesus reached forth His hand and saved me. Do you wonder that I love to tell about what He has done for me?'

II. The Second Reason why Jesus may be Compared to Bread is, that Bread is 'a Strengthening Thing'.—When we have no bread or food for our bodies, the flesh wastes away from our bones, and we have no strength left to enable us to work, or walk, or even to stand. Sometimes we hear of a vessel out at sea that has run short of provisions. All the men have been on short allowance of food for many days. Perhaps half a biscuit is all that each man has had to eat for twenty-four hours. After awhile a strange vessel comes in sight. When it comes nearer the suffering crew make signals of distress. The stranger lays to, that is, stops sailing. He sends a boat to see what is the matter. When the officer in charge of the boat reaches the deck of the vessel in distress, he looks round in surprise. He says to himself—'Is it possible that these are men? They look more like ghosts, or walking skeletons. How thin and hollow their cheeks! How wasted and shrivelled their limbs! How they totter when they try to walk! How weak they are! Hardly one of them has strength enough to hold the helm, or pull a rope, or furl a sail.'

This is the effect produced upon the body by want of food. But when we have plenty of good bread, or wholesome food, it is very different. Then our cheeks are round, and full, and rosy. Our limbs are plump and strong. We can walk, or run, or work with pleasure. We are ready for anything we have to do.

And it is just so with our souls. Jesus is the bread which they must eat. When we know Him, and believe on Him, and love Him, then we are living on Him. He becomes the bread of life to us. And as we eat this bread we find it to be a strengthening thing. It helps us to do our duty, and to find pleasure in doing it.

Cheer him.—There was a fire once in a large city. While the upper stories of a handsome dwelling were wrapped in smoke, and the fire was raging fiercely in the lower stories, a loud shriek told the fireman that there was still some one in the building in danger of being burned to death.

In a moment a ladder was reared. The upper end of it had hardly touched the heated walls, before a brave young fireman sprang to the ladder, and rushed up the rounds of it on his errand of mercy. But stifled by the smoke he stopped, and seemed as if he was on the point of going back without entering the burning building.

The crowd of people looking on watched him with intense interest, for they feared that a moment's delay might cost a precious life. That moment's pause seemed very long.

As they were almost trembling with fear, a voice from the crowd cried out—'Cheer him! cheer him!' In a moment a loud, ringing, wild 'hurrah' burst from that excited multitude. The fireman heard the cheer. He started up amidst smoke and flame, and disappeared through one of the windows. And now that vast crowd is still as the grave. Every voice is hushed; and every eye is fixed on that window. How long the seconds seem! Will he come? is the question that every heart is whispering. And now look at the window. There is the blackened form of the fireman, and clasped in his arms he has a little child. It is saved from a dreadful death by the courage of that brave fireman. Noble fellow! How loudly the crowd cheer him as he comes down the ladder! and how well he deserves it! When he paused on his way up the ladder he needed just a little more strength and a little more courage. And what he needed that hearty cheer of the crowd gave him. And what that cheer did for the fireman, Jesus does for His people. He is the bread of life to them, and gives them all the strength and courage they need.

III. But there is a Third Reason for Comparing Jesus to Bread, and this is—that Bread is a 'Satisfying Thing'.—When we are hungry the desire for food is very strong. There is a sort of gnawing feeling in the stomach that makes us very uncomfortable. But when we get as much good bread as we want, and eat it, then that gnawing, craving feeling disappears. The wants of the body are supplied, and we feel satisfied.

And it is just the same with our souls. The soul can be hungry as well as the body. And when this is the case a great longing will be felt, which will make us unhappy. And what our souls need then is Jesus. He is the only bread that is suited to our wants. And when we learn to know Jesus, and believe in Him, then we really eat the bread of life, and our souls feel satisfied and happy.

The queen and the child.—Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, had a palace at Schönhausen. One day Queen Elizabeth, the wife of Frederick, was walking in the garden connected with this palace. Her gardener had a little niece named Gretchen with him in the garden. She was on a visit to her uncle. Gretchen lived in the city of Berlin. Her father was a gardener too. He was a poor man, but he was a Christian, and he had taught his little daughter to know and love Jesus. The queen talked with little Gretchen, and was so much pleased with her simplicity, and bright intelligent answers to the questions she asked, that she told her uncle to let her come to the palace the next day and make a visit.

So Gretchen dressed herself very neatly and went to the palace at the time appointed.

One of the court ladies who knew about it saw her coming, and told the queen, who was then at dinner. The good queen was much pleased to hear that her little visitor had come. She ordered her to be brought in at once. Gretchen ran up to her kind friend, courtied to her very respectfully, and kissed her dress. At the request of the queen she was placed on a chair by her side, where she could see at once all the splendid sight which that table presented. There was a large company dining with the queen. Lords and princes, and officers of the army, and ladies were there, sparkling with gold and jewels. It was the first time this innocent child had ever seen such a sight, and the queen felt curious to know what effect it would have upon her.

Gretchen looked quietly at the costly dresses of the company, and at the beautiful dishes of china and gold that covered the table, and was silent for awhile. Then while all the persons at the table were looking at her, she clasped her little hands and closed her eyes, and repeated in a simple, touching way this verse of a hymn her father had taught her:—

Jesus, Thy blood and righteousness
My beauty are—my glorious dress;
Midst flaming worlds in these arrayed,
With joy shall I lift up my head.

The company were greatly surprised and deeply moved. One of the ladies said to the queen, with tears in her eyes, 'Happy child! We thought she would envy us, but we have much more reason to envy her.'

That little girl knew Jesus as the bread of life, and she was so satisfied with this bread that she did not want the rich and beautiful things that were before her in that great palace.

Bread is a necessary thing—a strengthening thing—a satisfying thing. Here we have three good reasons why Jesus may be called 'the bread of life'. Let our earnest prayer be—'Lord, evermore give us this bread!'—RICHARD NEWTON, The Beauty of the King (2nd edition), p. 211.

JUDGE NOT BY APPEARANCES

JOHN VII. 14-31.

EVEN a child has got to judge sometimes.

You are judging when you say: These are rude children; we will not play with them. You are judging when you say: These are good children; we will keep by them. But it is a very hard thing to judge aright. To judge aright we should see the hearts of people. And only God can see the heart. We can only judge by the appearance; the outside only is what we see. Now our Lord here tells us not to judge in that way. Those who judge in that way are sure to go wrong. Why did the Lord say this? Because the people in Jerusalem judged Him in that way.

They saw a poor man, one whom nobody even knew at school, one who had done a work of healing not long before on a Sabbath day, and looking at the appearance, the poor dress, the homely speech, they said: Oh, that man is too poor to be good. Looking also at this, that He had been working on a Sabbath day, making a man who was sick whole, they said: A good man would not do any work on a Sabbath. He must be bad. But it was the Lord Jesus they judged in that way.

Now this is a lesson much needed. There are so many who judge people by appearance, and often judge good people to be bad. They say: Oh, that person is always praying or talking about religion, speaking about the soul; it is just pretence, just hypocrisy. He's such a tiresome man that with his talk about religion.

Some young people think that everybody who talks about religion is only pretending, and is a hypocrite.

It is now a good many years ago since, on a Rhine steamer, a stranger, an Englishman, was judged in this way. He had been indeed giving away some tracts, and among those to whom he gave a tract was a company of young men playing cards. 'Such pretence!' they said. 'A regular hypocrite!' said the captain. But he had given one of his tracts to a lady, the Countess D—, and she judged him in a better way. As the steamboat went up the Rhine, the passengers came to know each other a little better, and then it turned out that this stranger was going to do a very just thing. He had once been an officer in the army, and in the wars he had bought a horse from a German officer, and before he could give him the money the German officer and himself were ordered different ways, and he lost all sight of the gentleman from whom he had got the horse. But he put the price of the horse in the bank to gather interest year by year, and after long years in some way or other he learned that the officer was still alive, and now he was going to him with the price of the horse and interest for the delay in paying.

At the end of the voyage, however, a strange thing happened. The luggage of this English traveller was not to be found. It had been stolen or left behind, and he had no money and could not speak a word of German.

Now this lady of rank, being a Christian, had been present when he gave the tract to the card-player and had after that heard the story of his life. She went up to him, and although she could read, yet she could speak no English, but she held open an English Testament at Acts xvi. 15; it reads thus: 'If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, come into my house and abide there'. So he went, and by and by the missing bags were found. Then this just man said: 'Although I cannot offer you money for your hospitality, I must give what would have been my hotel bill for your schools'.

Do not judge by appearances; do not look down on anyone or judge harshly.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 124.

FOLLY OF JUDGING BY OUTWARD APPEARANCES

'Judge not according to the appearance.'—JOHN VII. 24.

Two gallant knights met one summer's day, in the olden time, in the still greenwood, and soon got into a high dispute about a very small matter.

A broad shield hung between them, fastened to the branch of a tree. Neither of the knights knew to whom it belonged, or why it was left hanging there, and each began to ask the other concerning it.

'Whose is this white shield?'

'White? Do you call it white? Why, it is black!'

'Do you take me for blind, or a fool, that you tell me what my own eyes can see is false?'

And so words were banded about from one to the other, until the dispute became so violent that they had actually drawn their swords for a bloody conflict, when a third knight came riding towards them—a man of noble bearing, and serene, calm-judging eyes. Looking at the angry men, he said, 'You should be brothers in arms. Why do I see these passionate gestures, and hear these fierce words?'

Each knight made haste to explain the imposition which the other had tried to practise upon him. The stranger smiled, and riding to one side of the shield, and then to the other, he said, very quietly, 'Do not charge with your weapons just yet. Change places!'

They did so, and behold, the knight who had seen the white side of the shield saw now the black side also; and the knight who had been ready to do battle for the black stood face to face with the white side. Ashamed of their hot haste, they apologised one to the other, and rode out of the greenwood as good friends as ever.

The lesson taught in this story is a very important one. Half the misunderstandings and quarrels which disturb the peace and destroy the happiness of families and neighbourhoods, might be prevented, if those who engage in these disputes could see both sides of a question at once. How wise, then, are those people who are careful never to form hasty opinions, and who wait until they have seen or heard both sides, before venturing to determine which is right!

Hasty conclusions are seldom safe ones. The rule holds good in matters of everyday life, and in the more important concerns of religion; and it was with reference to both that our Saviour says in the text, 'Judge not according to the appearance'.

The early settlers of Virginia, having discovered some shining particles in a rock, nearly went mad with joy, supposing that it was gold. 'There was no talk,' as one of the old chroniclers has it, 'no hope, no work, but dig gold, wash gold, refine gold, load gold—such a bruit of gold that one crazy fellow wished to be buried in the sands, lest the refiners by their art should make gold of his bones.'

In spite of the more sober judgment of Captain John Smith, a ship was laden with the worthless shining dirt and sent home to England.

Hundreds and thousands in all ages, who have been foolish enough to judge by outward appearance, have made blunders quite as ridiculous, and sometimes with much more serious loss.

To impress this point on your minds, I shall go on to mention several reasons why it is not proper to judge in this way.

I. To judge according to the appearance Is not a True Way of Judging.—Some of the most delicious fruits are encased in rough and unsightly coverings; and one who had not tasted them before would be likely to pass them by, and go on to others which seemed to be better.

There is a homely saying which everybody has heard, when a person turns out to be more clever than was expected: 'He is a perfect singed cat!'

These everyday experiences prove the soundness of the position just laid down. I could give a good many pleasant illustrations of it, but one must suffice.

One day a man dressed in plain, coarse clothes walked into a little English village carrying a bundle tied up in a handkerchief. He made his way to the 'Red Lion' inn, and sat down on a bench in front of the house, quietly eating a bit of bread and cheese which the waiter had brought him. No one noticed him or cared for him. After a while the stage-coach drove up; the little wayside mail-bag was thrown off, and all the gossips and idlers of the village assembled about the post office window to see who had got letters, and to pick up a few items of news. The contents of the bag were soon assorted, and there was nothing deserving of notice except a formidable-looking letter, with a large seal, directed to Lord Somebody.

The postmaster examined it with great care, and then read the superscription aloud. Everybody was on tiptoe of expectation, and various plans were proposed for giving the strange nobleman a proper reception whenever he should honour the village by passing through it. One thought it would be well to have the children of the parish assemble in their Sunday clothes, and hail him with an appropriate ode; another, that the clergyman should be requested to deliver an address of welcome; and a third, that an arch of evergreens and flowers should be made to span the road near the entrance of the village.

Meanwhile, the stranger in the homespun dress sat silently watching the proceedings; and when the public curiosity had worn itself out over the letter, he stepped up to the open window of the post office and claimed it as his own. Astonishment, indignation, and a variety of other emotions took possession of the crowd. But when the postmaster, who had seen the nobleman somewhere before, and now recognised him in his plain clothes, handed him the letter, every one began to try and do away with the unfavourable impression which had been made on the stranger, by the cool contempt with which he had been treated so long as he had been thought to be only an ordinary traveller. Lord Somebody declined the honour proffered him, and taking his bundle in his hand left the village, giving the advice contained in the text as his parting legacy to its mortified inhabitants.

II. To judge according to the appearance is Not a Just Way of Judging.—Many hundred years ago, when the Tabernacle of the Lord was at Shiloh, a good woman named Hannah went in to pray, and to ask for a special blessing which she greatly longed for. It was in her heart that she spake to the Lord, and no loud word was uttered. But He who knoweth all things could hear her. Eli the priest saw her come in, and observed her at her prayers, and judging from outward appearance he judged very unjustly. Seeing the woman moving her lips but making no sound, he hastily concluded that she must be tipsy, and was rash and unguarded enough to accuse her with it.

How it must have wrung Eli's heart, when she meekly answered, 'No, my lord, I am a woman of a sorrowful spirit; I have drunk neither wine nor strong drink, but have poured out my soul before the Lord'.

People who wear the longest faces, and who talk the most religiously, have not always the most of the love of God in their hearts. As Shakespeare has strongly worded it:—

A man may smile, and smile, and be a villain.

III. Another reason why we should not form our opinions from outward appearance is because it Is not a Safe Way of Judging.—The ice on the river appears to be as solid as the earth, but how many who venture upon it pay for their temerity—some with a cold souse in the waters, and others with their lives!

Surely these are reasons enough for remembering and acting upon our Saviour's words, 'Judge not according to the appearance'.—JOHN N. NORTON, Milk and Honey, p. 181.

THIRSTING AND FINDING

JOHN VII. 32, 39.

THERE are two things here which every one of us, old and young, must take to heart. Here is the Saviour telling us there is a time coming when certain people shall seek Him and not find Him. And again a little farther on He says: If any man thirsts, let him come unto Me and drink; which is the same as if He said: If any one thirsts for Me, that one shall find Me.

It is a strange fact that He was in the world, moving along the streets, living in the houses; He was seen and heard speaking every day; yet there were crowds of people who met Him, who saw Him, who heard Him, but who did not find Him.

But side by side with these, there were others, many others, who both sought Him and found Him.

Now you might think, and sometimes you do think, it would be easier to find Christ if He were in Liverpool or London, as He was in Galilee and Judea, moving along the streets; you might think it would only be needful to go up to Him, to kneel before Him, to say to Him, Lord Jesus, place your hand on my head and bless me.

But you see it really was not easier. There were thousands who saw Him and heard Him and did not find Him.

They did not know that it was the Saviour they heard and saw; they saw only a Man like themselves, and they did not feel any need for a Saviour. It was only when their heart thirsted, when they wanted with all their heart to see Him, that they did see the Saviour in the common-looking Man. Now it is not so much different to-day.

Then a common-looking Man, now a common-looking book; the words look like common words, but they are the words of the living Saviour. It is He who is speaking them, and although now in a book, they are yet all the same as if they came from His lips fresh this very day.

And many read the words and hear them, and do not find Christ in them. How is that? It is because they do not want to find Him, they do not seek Him with all their heart. But if anyone thirsts, i.e. if He wants with all His heart to find Him, he will hear and find Jesus in His words. The hearts that find Him there are those that want to find Him, that are athirst.

But now notice the wonderful offer the Lord makes: If anyone wants something good with all the heart, he is to come unto Him and ask, and he shall have it.

If there is some good thing, some great thing, something it would make us better to have, if we come to Jesus greatly wishing it, thirsting for it, we shall have it.

I know a child who wants to be happy. There is not a child I ever knew who did not want to be happy; every child does. God made you to wish for happiness. Jesus says, 'Come unto Me, and you shall find it'.

Jesus knows that the first step to happiness is to see that God loves you, and the next is to love God. And Jesus works these two loves into the heart that you may be happy. Some people fancy that religion is to make people sad; but it is not so; it is the beginning of happiness.

I know another child, and the desire of that one's soul is to be clever. Perhaps I am speaking now to some very clever children; you are eager on your lessons, on marks, on examinations, on prizes; you thirst to be great scholars and to know things.

Well, Jesus likes that. He likes that you should be eager for lessons, and by and by learned in good things. He giveth understanding unto the simple; not to the clever only. And he says, 'Come unto Me, and come thirsting, and you shall have learning as well as happiness'.

In Psalm cxix. one says, 'God has made me wiser than the ancients, and I have more understanding than all my teachers'. Jesus teaches us to know God, and to know God is the best learning.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 91.

THE KINDLY LIGHT

'Lux mea Christus'

'I am the light of the world.'—JOHN VIII. 12.

THE words of this motto speak to us of three things. First, they tell us of light; secondly, of Him who is the light; and third, of our own need of light, each one for himself and herself.

I. Light.—There is nothing we know so well, nothing, perhaps, we understand so little. The men of science tell us very wonderful facts about light; they tell us how fast it travels—so fast that our bicycles, motor-cars, express trains, even our electric telegraph, cannot compare with its tremendous speed. They can tell us much about the strange wave-like motion by which it is scattered, and how the longer and shorter waves produce the lovely colours with which we are familiar in the rainbow, or which are perfectly revealed in the spectrum. But of light, in its own nature, we do not actually know a great deal, and that most of us must take on faith, if we know anything at all about it. Yet everybody knows what light can do. We are aware that we pass through the most lovely country on a pitch dark night, and never discover its beauty. Mountains, rivers, lakes, trees may be all around us, but we cannot see them. Let the morning dawn, however, and the sun rise, then let us go forth and look down that valley, and every detail of its loveliness stands out clearly. The blue sky overhead, with the fleecy clouds, the varied tints of the lichen-covered rocks, the dark-brown stream specked with white foam, the rich purple of the heather-clad hills, all is visible. What has wrought the change? Light. They were all there before. The light has not created them, but it has made it possible for us to know about them and enjoy them. Not only 'beauty,' but 'safety,' the light brings us. We dare not walk along cliff-paths or climb precipitous mountains in the darkness, lest we slip and lose our lives, but if we have nerve and skill sufficient these paths become quite possible in the daylight. Health, too, comes from the light. The old Greeks looked on the Sun-

God as the healer, and modern medicine teaches the same faith. Disease flourishes in this light. We have next to discover the nature of this light.

II. Our motto tells us it is Christ.—There is a beautiful picture in one of the libraries in America, which contains a group of all the great prophets of the Old Testament times. At one end of the painting are two men—Malachi and Zechariah, with their faces earnestly turned forward, their hands outstretched, their fingers pointing to some object that attracts them, and a tender clear light shines on them, the source of which we cannot see. If you turn to their books you will understand the artist's meaning. They looked eagerly for Christ, and spoke of His coming very soon after their own day. They were like men who stand on the top of some high mountain a little while before sunrise. Behind them the shadows are rapidly being driven lower and lower down the slopes, or are lurking only in the valleys. They are all silent, eager, expectant. Some have their hands outstretched toward the East, as they catch the first glimpse of the sun's disk above the horizon. These prophets knew the world was soon to be flooded with light, when Christ should show men how good and loving God is, and when He came Jesus Christ took this name for His own. 'I am the light of the world,' he told the people. The poets of Rome and the wisest men of Greece were looking as eagerly as were the Hebrew prophets for such a sunrise. People were finding everywhere that they were dwelling in darkness, or at best in the half-lights of a hazy dawn. They needed and they longed for the happy, joyous Sun. Jesus brings that light. Men were very full of sorrow when their friends died, or at the thought of their own summons to another world. Jesus bade them look on Him as the Resurrection and the Life, and to believe that when a man loved Him he would never really die.

III. Christ my Light.—You have been in a great house lit by electricity. The wires are properly laid into every apartment; the lamps are there, the little knobs to switch it off and on. You have passed from a brilliantly illuminated hall into a room, and shut the door behind you. It is quite dark. What is wrong? Has the electricity no power here? In this room, the one place in all that house, it refuses to make light? Has this part of the house no connection with all the rest? Oh yes, you have only one little thing to do, push down that little brass button by the side of the door, and the room in a single moment is ablaze with light. Sometimes I am in a company of people in a private house, in a church, or out in the country. We are all speaking about Jesus, and His goodness, beauty, and power. I see many faces glowing with joy responsive to the things said of one they love—but I notice one face in which there is no such light, only the mark of weariness or annoyance. I ask myself why? Jesus Christ has power. Jesus Christ is equally near us all. Jesus Christ is eager to make all our lives happy and full of light; but that man or woman, maybe boy or girl, has not believed it. The work of faith has not connected that life with Christ. We may say, 'Christ is the light of the world,' and be none the happier. But when we say, 'Christ is my light,' then everything becomes different. The change is as great as was that in the dark room when the little button was touched and the electric light flooded it.

The wise and good Erskine of Linlathen once wrote to a friend, 'Happy the heart that has learned to say my God! All religion is contained in that short expression, and all the blessedness that man or angel is capable of.'—G. CURRIE MARTIN, Great Mottos with Great Lessons, p. 63.

THE GOOD SHEPHERD

'I am the Good Shepherd.'—JOHN X. 11.

I. The Shepherd.—'I am the Good Shepherd,' Christ says. His words mean, I only; there is but One, and I am that One. Lay the stress on the words I and the. A minister of the Gospel is called a pastor, which is the Latin word for shepherd. He is an under-shepherd, while Christ is 'the Chief Shepherd'. Christ has no rival, no helper or partner in the shepherding of souls. We read of two flocks, Jew and Gentile, but never of two flocks, never of two shepherds. Passing strange that one to the outward eye so poor and helpless as Christ then was should calmly and boldly say, 'I am the Good Shepherd'; and should claim all Jews and all Gentiles as belonging to His fold; and should denounce as an hireling and robber every other being who disputes His claim. Ask yourself why Christ stands up before all mankind and declares Himself to be the only real Shepherd. That were utter madness were He not more than man, or angel, or archangel. We thus pay homage to Him as God. While more than man, He is also more than a shepherd. The shepherd in the East is, I may say, the god of the sheep; but for him they should soon perish. But all illustrations fail here. We must add image to image if we would rise toward the sacred height of this great truth. The Puritans said that they found in the Bible no less than one hundred and eight names of Christ.

'The Good Shepherd' is literally the beautiful, or noble shepherd; for goodness is the highest moral beauty. Surely nothing can be more beautiful than Christ's unwearying love in seeking the lost. Are all your thoughts of Him dull and cold? Have you never felt His beauty, His kindness, His surpassing grace, His excellences and attractions? Do you never heartily thank God for 'the Good Shepherd'?

II. The Shepherdless Soul.—You know that the sheep in Palestine are quite different from our sheep. In our lowland fields sheep are safe even amid the snows of winter, but the sheep of the East need a shepherd almost as much as an infant needs a nurse. If we look at a picture of the modern shepherd of Palestine we see he has a big oak club, with a spiked head, swinging from his girdle, and a long pole in his hand. These are 'the rod and the staff' of the twenty-third Psalm. With the staff or crook he guides and encourages the sheep, and with the club or rod he drives off wolves and robbers. Then every Eastern shepherd is a good bone-setter, for often his sheep backslide, or slide backwards over the sharp rocks or stones, and break their bones. The sheep must be brought into the fold at night, and by day they are often in danger, and know not where to find pasture and water. Our sheep leave only some of their wool on thorn-bushes, but in the East thorn-bushes are very many and very strong, and the sheep caught in them often cannot struggle into freedom. Even the flesh of men is sometimes 'torn with the thorns of the wilderness and with briars' (Judges viii. 7). You remember how, when Abraham was about to offer up Isaac, he saw a ram caught in the thicket. Moreover, the strayed sheep usually loses its wits, and cannot find its way to the fold. Marco Polo tells us that the Tartar robbers in the dark months used to ride on mares whose foals were at home; and when the robbers had taken their prey, they just laid the reins on the mares' necks, and they went straight home in the darkest night. But even in broad daylight the sheep has no home-finding instinct. In the desert, far from its proper good, it can only lie down and die. And such is the soul without the Good Shepherd—a lonely outcast, girt round with all sorts of dangers. I may again borrow an illustration from Marco Polo. He tells us that when travellers linger behind the desert caravan a shadowy voice calls them by their name and allures them from their route. They follow, and still it calls; and, when they have wandered from the path, a mocking silence follows more terrible than the deceiving voice. The wind of evening has lifted the light sands, and quietly covered the marks of feet and camel hoofs upon the wilderness, as the breeze smooths the wakes of ships on the yielding deep. Nothing is left for the bewildered traveller but to lie down and die.

I have known several young people who have been more deeply moved by the tenth chapter of John's Gospel than by any other words in the Bible. The picture of the lost sheep seemed to them very sad; it interested their imagination; they owned that it was true; then they felt that it was the picture of themselves. Thus God's good Spirit moved them to self-pity; they thought of the Good Shepherd; they plainly heard His voice, and gave themselves up to Him.

Dr. Samuel Johnson, in his Lives of the British Poets, tells us that he visited William Collins the poet during his last illness. Collins confessed that he then cared for only one book. Johnson took it into his hand; it was an English New Testament, such as children carry to the school. 'I have but one book,' said Collins, 'but that is the best.' During his youth he had wandered from the fold into the desert, but trial had revealed to him the miseries of the shepherdless soul. His marble monument in Chichester Cathedral is a beautiful poem and an eloquent sermon. His lyre and poems lie neglected on the ground, while his Bible lies open before him. Only in his Bible did he find the green pastures and the still waters that refresh the world-weary soul.

It is a delight to join ourselves now to—

III. The Shepherded Soul.—It is saved by the Shepherd's hand, led by His voice, is fed by Him, and follows Him. Let alone that strayed sheep must have perished miserably in the desert. Then Christ says, 'My sheep hear My voice': mark you, not My truth, nor My words, but My voice. To them He is a living, present, speaking Saviour. The gentle whisperings of His Spirit are heard in their souls, and they know for certain whose voice it is. He gives His voice for their ear-guidance, and His footprints for their sight-guidance. And it is sweetest music to them. The early Christians placed Orpheus with his lyre among their favourite symbols. Orpheus thus served a double purpose, for he reminded them of the drawing power of Christ, and he also did not arouse the fury of the heathens.

The old-world story ran that Orpheus was in the good ship Argo with the Argonauts, when, charmed by the wicked songs of the Sirens, they turned the prow to the fatal isle. Orpheus then tuned his lyre, and the music of the Sirens seemed but a rude, jarring noise compared with his heavenly strains. The sailors, moved by a better delight, at once steered away from their seducers, and were rescued from a shameful death. These fables are facts with us, the early Christians said. Christ is our Divine Orpheus, for His music has broken the spell of all the Sirens of sinful pleasure, and has moved our rude stony hearts, and charmed us into following Him.—JAMES WELLS, Bible Object Lessons, p. 151.

THE GOOD SHEPHERD

'I am the Good Shepherd.'—JOHN X. II.

WHEN Jesus calls Himself a shepherd, you know at once that He does not mean that He is a keeper of sheep, such as graze the fields and yield us wool. The trade that Jesus once wrought at with His hands (is it not a wonder that He should have done so?) was, probably, the carpenter's. But He is a shepherd in a high sense. He keeps people as a shepherd keeps sheep. His flock are men, His sheep are souls. He is a keeper of souls. And He calls them His flock, to teach us several things about their character, and about His care of them. I think there are seven views of Christ's shepherd-care worth remembering.

I. Jesus Gathers the Flock.—They are all far away at first from the place where He feeds them. And He goes after them to seek them out. He finds them in a wilderness, weary and wretched; hungry and ready to die, for want of pasture; torn and bleeding with the thorns and briars; the wolves are roaring round them, and the dreadful lion is raging to devour them. Jesus calls them to Him; but they run away from Him. He follows them, lays hold on them, and carries them home rejoicing. You can picture a shepherd doing all this.

The meaning is, that we are all at first far away in our hearts from God—very unhappy, but not willing to go back to Him. We are in danger of perishing, and Satan is watching for our destruction. Jesus sends His Gospel to us. He bids us trust Him, and be happy. But we will not. Then He sends His Spirit and changes our hearts, and brings us to repentance and peace. And when this happens He rejoices over us. Christ is happy when sinners hearken to Him and live.

There are other servants employed gathering the flock. One is very black and grim to see. His name is Death. But he never hurts even the least lamb. Behind him are bright angels, and he gives the souls of good men to them that they may carry them up to Jesus. And at last he will give their bodies too. When the day of judgment comes the angels will be seen flying forth into all the winds, and gathering the saints together to meet their Lord. And they will take good care not to leave one of the flock behind. Would not you like to be so gathered? to have an angel come and take you by the hand, as you came out of the grave, and tell you he was sent to take you to Jesus and to heaven.

II. Jesus Owns the Flock.—It belongs to Him. What He does in bringing the scattered sheep to Himself is not the first thing He does for them. He could not gather them till He had bought them and made them His own; for they were bound to death, and Satan kept them. They were like sheep sold to the knife. Justice, with a great sword, that kills both soul and body, was going to slay them. And they must all have been slain with it, if Jesus had not died to save them.

See what a price Jesus bought His flock with. Christ's people could not be bought with money. Money cannot save souls. The lives of men have sometimes been ransomed by paying a great sum; but not all the gold in the world would be taken in exchange for a soul. Christ bought His sheep, therefore, with blood—His own precious blood. So we read, after the words of the text, 'The Good Shepherd giveth His life for the sheep'. Suppose a poor prisoner lying in jail sentenced to die to-morrow. Outside they have already raised the gibbet on which he is to suffer death. And suppose, while he is expecting to be led forth, one man were to come and say, I will give all the money I have in the world to save you; and another were to say, I will go to the scaffold in your place, which of the two would show the greater love? And if the second man who offered to die in the prisoner's room were a king, how would people wonder! This was what Christ did; and He is King of kings. He found His people prisoners of God's law, for they had broken its good commandments, and were condemned. The law said they must die. And Jesus said, No; the law is right and must have its due; but I shall die in the stead of my sheep, and they shall live. And the law was pleased and satisfied. And as His reward for saving them the sheep are all Christ's own. He got them from the hands of justice, and they belong to Him for ever.

III. He Heals the Flock.—Sheep, you know, may become diseased, and need to be healed. And all Christ's flock need to be healed of a desperate disease. You know the name of it. It is not fever, it is not palsy, it is not plague; it is worse than them all—it is sin.

When Jesus paid His blood price for His people, He saved them from doom by the very paying of the price. He bought their pardon.

IV. Jesus Feeds the Flock.—A shepherd, you know, takes his sheep to the pasture where they may find food. And it is a beautiful sight to see the fleecy sheep scattered over the green meadow, or up on the hill-side cropping the tender grass, while the shepherd watches beside them, and sees them happy. In Eastern countries, and Bible times, this part of a shepherd's work was very important; and sometimes he had to lead his flock a long way to get sufficient food for them. Moses was doing this, as you may remember, and had come to the back of Horeb when he saw the great sight of the bush burning, yet unconsumed.

Now Jesus' sheep need food also. They need food for souls. And He provides it for them. The New Testament says He feeds them with His flesh. But it is a very low and foolish idea that His people should in any sense eat this with their mouths. We do not eat it as we eat the flesh of slain animals. That would not feed the soul. But Christ's sheep feed on the truth about His sacrifice; they eat with the mouth of the soul what the word of God tells them about Jesus' dying for them. They live on His word. They feast on His love.

In Eastern climates, where wells are scarce and water very valuable, interesting sights may be seen at some of the fountains. The flocks of the neighbourhood will be gathered together, and when all are collected the well will be opened and each supplied. Sometimes the shepherds quarrel about this, and fighting ensues. Do you remember any such scenes in Scripture story? Why is a Sabbath school like such a pastoral gathering round the well?

V. Jesus Guards the Flock.—The careful shepherd has two things to defend his flock against. He must keep them from the weather and the wolves. When the hot sun shines out with scorching blaze he leads them to the shade; and when the storm howls he takes them to shelter. In our country, shepherds have very toilsome work to do when a snow-storm comes. The sheep will sometimes get covered over in some hollow with the drift, and then it is very hard toil to drag them out and save their lives. Our land is not infested with beasts of prey. You know there is a place in Scotland called Wolf's Crag, because it is supposed the last wolf was killed there. But they are very many and ravenous still in some other countries. In Palestine a shepherd had to guard his flock against wild beasts. You recollect the story David told about his killing a lion and a bear that had stolen lambs out of the flock.

Now Jesus' people need to be defended. They have many trials and strong enemies. But Christ keeps them so that nothing can hurt them. There is an old fable about a man that a goddess made incapable of being wounded, except in his heel; but the people of God are really invulnerable by any deadly stroke. The storms of affliction will not injure them. The fires of persecution may destroy their bodies for a time—not their souls at all, nor their bodies finally. You recollect how the three Hebrew youths walked in the hot furnace, and got no harm, because the Son of God was with them. Satan, the great roaring lion, will not be able to devour the sheep. Nay, death itself, that seems to swallow them up, only takes them into safe keeping for a little, out of our sight.

VI. Jesus Leads the Flock.—Shepherds in our country drive the flocks before them. But in the East they go before the flock. And as they go, the sheep see them and follow. The shepherd, ever and anon, turns round to see that all the sheep keep in the right path. If he sees anyone straggling, he utters a cry that the sheep know. To many of them names are given, and they answer when called on. All this Jesus applies to himself. He leads His people like a flock.

VII. Jesus Folds the Flock.—In Bible lands you may see here and there a place in the fields enclosed with a wall all round, with a gate leading into it. Approach it at night and you may see a flock of sheep in it, gathered together for protection during the darkness. That is the sheep-fold. And when I say Christ folds His sheep, I am speaking of what He does with them when the night of death comes. He takes them into a safe place of rest. It is in heaven—a glorious fold to lie down in, where the frost cannot bite, nor the prowler get in. Jesus is there himself. And one by one He is taking His people, old and young, home to it. There was published some years ago a little book called The Folded Lamb. Perhaps you have seen it; if not, you can guess what it means. After the night passes Jesus will take His people out of the fold; the bodies of the saints will rise, and all the flock gathered together will follow Him up into the sunny pastures of the heavenly land. And there 'the Lamb Who is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes'.—J. EDMOND, The Children's Church at Home, p. 80.

THE GENERAL RESURRECTION

'I am the Resurrection.'—JOHN XI. 25.

THERE are two thoughts about the resurrection to be remembered; and two lessons from it to be learned: and in both of these we shall see the beauty of the King's work.

The thoughts and the lessons of the resurrection.

I. The first thought to be remembered in connection with the resurrection is—that it is Very Certain.

And there are two things which show how certain it is. One of these is what God teaches us about it outside of the Bible; and the other what He teaches us about it inside of the Bible. Outside of the Bible God speaks to us and teaches us many important things. The world of nature around us is like a great book in which God is speaking to us all the time. And there are many things here that seem to speak to us of the resurrection.

Day and night speak to us about it. When evening comes, and the sun sets in the west, then it may be said that the day dies. Night is the grave in which the day is buried. And when the sun rises again in the morning it is the resurrection of the day.

And then the seasons of the year speak to us about the resurrection. In spring-time the year is young. In summer the year is of age. In autumn the year grows old. In winter it dies. Winter is the grave in which the year is buried. And when spring comes back again, it brings the resurrection of the year. Then the trees begin to bud and put forth their fresh leaves, 'the flowers appear upon the earth, the time for the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle-dove is heard in the land'. And in all these things God speaks to us about the resurrection.

The insects speak to us about the resurrection. Here is a caterpillar. He spends his days in going about as a creeping thing. But when he comes to be an old caterpillar, and his crawling days are over, he weaves for himself a cocoon which is like a little coffin. Then he lies down to take a long sleep. It seems as if he were dead. He remains there awhile like a body that has been buried in the grave. But after a long time has passed by that coffin opens, and the worm, or caterpillar, that seemed to be dead, comes out from its little coffin wondrously changed. It is turned into a butterfly. And no king upon his throne was ever so beautifully dressed as he is now. Look at his wings. Did you ever see such brilliant colours? How they glitter in golden glories as he flits about in the beams of the sun! And so every butterfly that we see in the bright summer days is a little minister that God sends to preach to us about the resurrection.

But it is in the Bible that He speaks most plainly to us on this subject. Nothing in the world is more certain than that Jesus rose from the dead. But God tells us that it is just as certain we shall rise from the dead, as it is that Jesus did rise. If you wish to read what God says on this subject, you will find it in the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians, from the twentieth to the twenty-second verse: 'Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.' When it says here that 'all shall be made alive,' it means that all shall be raised from the dead.

This makes the resurrection certain. This is enough to settle the matter if there was nothing else in the Bible about it. But there is something else. There is one passage in which Jesus Himself speaks of it. His words are so clear, and so strong, that they should remove all doubt about the resurrection. I refer now to John v. 28. Here Jesus said, 'Verily, verily I say unto you, that the hour is coming in which all that are in their graves shall hear the voice of the Son of Man, and shall come forth'. This makes it so sure that nothing more need be said on this point.

II. The other thought about the resurrection is that it will be Very Wonderful.

1. There will be many wonders about the resurrection. The change itself of a dead thing, no matter what it is, to a live one, must always be wonderful.

2. And then the resurrection will be very wonderful too in the way of doing it. As Jesus stood by the grave of Lazarus and called him back to life, so it will be just as if He were standing by your grave, and my grave, and every grave, calling each one by name, to come out from the grave. And every one called will come forth. How wonderful this will be!

3. And then the resurrection will be wonderful in the beauty that will mark the bodies of those who are raised. I cannot tell anything about the bodies of those who are not Christians. But if we love Jesus I can tell just how our bodies will look when they rise from the grave. Suppose that you and I were standing on the top of Mount Tabor, if that was the place where Jesus was transfigured. Moses and Elijah have come down from heaven on a visit to Him. Look, there is Jesus sitting on that rock. And see what a change is taking place in His appearance! His clothing becomes as white as snow, whiter than anybody on earth could make it. His face becomes bright and shining like the sun, only still more glorious! And this is the pattern according to which our bodies will be made at the resurrection, for the Apostle says He will 'change our vile bodies, and make them like unto His own glorious body' (Phil. iii. 25). And in another place we are told that 'when He shall appear, we shall be like Him' (1 John iii. 2). I suppose our bodies will be in size, and shape, and general appearance very much like what they are now, so that we shall know one another as easily as we now do; only all imperfections will be removed, and they will be made to look perfectly glorious. Suppose you have the image of a little man made of iron or clay, and suppose this image were changed to silver or gold. You could tell it in a moment as soon as you saw it. And you would be ready to say, 'Why, only look; here's my old clay image turned to gold! How beautiful it looks!' And when we think how changed our bodies will be at the resurrection, when we think what multitudes of these bodies there will be, when we think of the wonderful way in which this change will be brought about, and of the great beauty that will mark them, we may well see how wonderful the resurrection will be!

These are the two thoughts we should remember when we think about the resurrection: it is very certain; and it will be very wonderful. And here we see the beauty of the King's work.

III. And now we come to speak of the resurrection as showing the beauty of the King's work in the Lessons that it Teaches Us.—RICHARD NEWTON, The Beauty of the King, p. 117.

THE RAISING OF LAZARUS

'He cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth.'—JOHN XI. 43.

I. In the Raising of Lazarus we see the 'Pity' of Jesus in His Work.—And this is one thing that shows the beauty of that work.

We read that when he saw the sorrow which the death of Lazarus had wrought upon his sisters, Mary and Martha, 'He groaned in spirit, and was troubled'. Now it must be so that the more we love a person, the more sorrow we shall feel when we see them in trouble. We are told expressly that Jesus did love this family at Bethany, consisting of Lazarus and his sisters Mary and Martha. And when he saw Mary weeping on account of her dead brother, and the Jews also weeping that were with her, His pity was stirred still more deeply; and we read these two short but very touching words—'Jesus wept'. These are wonderful words. They show us how full of pity and tenderness the heart of Jesus is. It was so then when He was on earth; and it is so now; for He never changes. And when we are in trouble or sorrow, we may be very sure that Jesus pities us and feels for us.

For me.—Little Carrie was a heathen child about ten years old. She had bright black eyes, curly brown hair, and a neat slender form. After she had been going to the mission school for some time, her teacher noticed one day that she looked sad.

'Carrie, my dear,' said the teacher, 'why do you look so sad to-day?'

'Because I am thinking.'

'What are you thinking about?'

'Oh, teacher! I don't know whether Jesus loves me or not.'

'Carrie, did Jesus ever invite little children to come to Him?'

Immediately the little girl repeated this sweet verse she had learned in the school, 'Suffer the little children to come unto Me'.

'Well, Carrie, for whom did Jesus speak those words?'

In a moment she clapped her hands, and said, 'It's not for you, teacher, is it? No; it's for me! it's for me!'

Here we see how the knowledge of the pitying love of Jesus was just the thing that drew that dear child to Him for the salvation of her soul. And multitudes have been drawn to Him in the same way, wherever the Gospel has been preached or taught.

And we need to know the tender pity and love of Jesus, not only that we may trust in Him as our Saviour, but also that we may be encouraged to go to Him for help and comfort in all our troubles.

II. In the Raising of Lazarus we are Told of the 'Prayer' which Jesus Offered.—And this is the second thing that shows the beauty of His work.

We read in this chapter how Jesus came with those weeping sisters and their sorrowing friends to the grave in which Lazarus lay dead. It was a cave, and a great stone was over the mouth of it. Jesus told them to take away the stone from the mouth of the grave. This was done. There is the great dark cave in which lies the lifeless body of Lazarus. And now Jesus pauses. Before speaking to the dead man in the grave He lifts up His eyes to heaven, and speaks to His Father there. We call this a prayer that Jesus offered. You will find it in the forty-first and forty-second verses of this eleventh chapter. But it is a very remarkable prayer. It is rather a thanksgiving than a prayer. In our prayers we always ask God to do something for us, or give something to us. But we find nothing of this kind here. Jesus does not ask the Father in heaven to raise Lazarus from the dead, nor to help Him to do it. He just thanks God for always hearing Him. He speaks to Him just as you or I would speak to a dear friend who was always with us, to whom we told all our secrets, and with whom we shared all our thoughts and plans and pleasures. Jesus seems to have offered this prayer, or thanksgiving, or whatever we call it, on purpose to show to His disciples, and to the Jews, and to all His people, how entirely united He and His Father in heaven were. They always thought, and felt, and acted as much alike as if they were one person. There are two persons indeed, and yet they are but one God. Jesus was able to do anything that He wanted to do. And yet, when He was going to do anything important, He always prayed to His Father in heaven. Before He ordained His twelve Apostles and sent them out to preach the Gospel, He spent the whole night in prayer. And before He went to meet the great sufferings that were awaiting Him in Gethsemane and on Calvary, He offered that beautiful prayer, more for His people than for Himself, that we find written in the seventeenth chapter of St. John. Jesus prayed in connection with the work He did, not so much for His own sake as to teach us by His example, how to do the work we have to do, and to bear the trials that God puts upon us. When we have hard work to do, and heavy burdens to bear, there is nothing like prayer to make that work easy and those burdens light. Let us look at some illustrations of the way in which great good has been done by prayer.

III. In Raising Lazarus we see the 'Power' of Jesus.—And this is the third thing that shows the beauty of His work.

Jesus did many things while He was on earth which showed His power, but nothing did this more than the raising of Lazarus. When He opened the eyes of the blind, when He cleansed the lepers, and healed the sick, and cast out devils, He was showing His power. When He walked upon the sea as on dry land, and when He hushed the angry storm to instant stillness by a word, He was showing His great power. But the raising of Lazarus showed His power more than anything else He ever did while he was on earth. Lazarus had been dead four days. For four days his body had been as cold as marble; for four days the blood in his veins had stopped flowing; for four days the heart had ceased its beatings, and had been still; for four days his spirit had left the body, and had been in that unseen world, where the souls of men go to when they die. But when Jesus stood by the open mouth of that dark grave and cried out—'Lazarus, come forth,' all that death had done to that buried man was undone in a moment. The cold body grew warm. The blood in his veins that had dried up and stopped flowing became liquid and began to flow again. The still, quiet heart which had ceased its beating, and had been standing still for four days, began to beat once more. And the spirit of Lazarus, away off in the world of spirits, heard the call of Jesus. In a moment it came flying back, and once more entered that dead body which had so long been its home before. And Jesus did all this by His own power.

Helped through a dream.—The late Rev. Dr. Bushnell, a well-known minister of New England, used to tell this story about a remarkable dream, and said he knew the story to be true. He had a friend living in the Far West who had been for many years, like Nimrod, 'a mighty hunter'. His name was Captain Young. He was a kind of patriarch among the hunters in that part of the country. He was well known, and was greatly loved and respected.

One night the old hunter had a strange dream. He dreamed that he saw a company of emigrants overtaken by a snow-storm in crossing the Rocky Mountains, and perishing from cold and hunger. He had so clear and distinct a view in his dream of the place where these people were that he could have drawn a picture of it when he awoke. One thing that he saw in his dream made a particular impression on his mind; this was a tall, perpendicular cliff of white rock that lifted itself up into the sky near where these people were, and which had a very peculiar appearance. In his dream he saw the men cutting off what appeared to be the tops of trees, and struggling to get out of the deep gulf of snow. He saw the very looks of the persons in the snow, and noticed what great distress they seemed to be in. When he awoke he was greatly surprised. It seemed so much like a real scene he had been looking at that he could hardly believe it was only a dream.

Presently he fell asleep and dreamed the same dream over again, precisely as he had seen it before. In the morning he could think of nothing else but this strange dream.

Going out after breakfast he met an old friend, who like himself had been a hunter in former days, and was well acquainted with the pass across the mountains, known as the 'Carson Valley Pass'. He told him about his dream, and described what he had seen in the dream, and especially the tall, perpendicular white rock. His friend told him that he recognised the place from his description of it, and then told him in what part of the pass he would find that singular looking rock. Captain Young was a Christian man. He believed what the Bible teaches about the providence of God. He felt satisfied that there were some people up among the mountains in distress, and that this was the means God was using to have help sent to them. He began at once to collect a company of men, and to send them up into the mountains with mules, and blankets, and necessary provisions. His neighbours laughed at him. 'Laugh away,' he said, 'as much as you please. I am able to do this; I have made up my mind to do it, and I will do it, for I am sure this dream comes from God.'

The men were sent into the mountains a hundred and fifty miles distant, directly in the heart of the Carson Valley Pass. There they found scenery answering to what the captain had beheld in his dream. The tall, perpendicular white rock was there, and there they found a company of travellers overwhelmed by the snow, just as the captain had seen in his dream. Some of them had already perished, but the rest were relieved and brought safely back by the help of the good captain had been led to send them, in consequence of that remarkable dream. Jesus has power to work in this way, and this power makes His work seem beautiful.

Let us learn to pity those in trouble as Jesus pitied them. Let us pray for them as Jesus prayed. And though we cannot exercise the same power that He exercised in doing our work, yet we may be sure that that power will help us, and will protect and bless us, as we work for Him. And so we may well say that in the raising of Lazarus we see 'the beauty of the King's work'.—RICHARD NEWTON, The Beauty of the King, p. 95.

WHY CHILDREN SHOULD BE GLAD FOR CHRIST

JOHN XII. 13.

JESUS once said of children: 'Of such is the kingdom of heaven'. And when He came riding into Jerusalem, it was as the king of that kingdom He came. The people had gone forth to meet Him, and bring Him in like a king. They cut branches from the palm trees and waved them in the air to express their joy. They flung their cloaks and coats on the ground to make a carpet for Him. They went before Him and followed Him through the streets, and up to the Temple, filling the air with their welcome. But when He came to the Temple the children took up the shout and cried: 'Hosanna to the Son of David!'

That would be a very sweet sound to Jesus. Jesus has a great love for children, and their praise is very dear to Him. On the outskirts of the joyful crowd that day were people who did not share the joy, bad men, with scowling faces and hate-filled eyes, whispering hard things against Him, and plotting to put Him to death. But near at hand, moving about His feet, were the children of Jerusalem. And they were crying with all their might: 'Hosanna to the Son of David!'

A thousand years before, the great King David had said in one of his Psalms: 'Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings Thou hast ordained strength because of Thine enemies'. Our Lord remembered that Psalm in the Temple when He heard the children shouting. There were the enemies with the wicked look in their eyes, with the wicked word on their lips, with the wicked purpose in their hearts. But here were the babes and the sucklings, the children of Jerusalem lifting up their voices in His praise, just as King David had said.

It was the fulfilment of David's word. The children had seen Jesus doing kingly deeds. They saw Him opening the eyes of the blind, healing the lame, and doing other still more wonderful things. And now when He came up to Zion, to the palace of the great King, they said: 'This is the great King Himself—great David's greater Son. Hosanna! hosanna!' The praise was in their hearts, and it rushed up into their lips.

It was also a prophecy of what should be thereafter. In all ages, and in other towns besides Jerusalem, Jesus shall have children who will cry: 'Hosanna' in His praise, and be joyful in Him as their King. In heaven, at this moment, there are multitudes of children who are sending up their hosannas around His throne, and are very glad because He is their King. On earth there are thousands and tens of thousands of children who are learning to take part in this joyful praise. It is the very mark of a Christian child to be ready to cry 'Hosanna' to Jesus, and to be joyful in Him as the King.

It is this I mean to speak of to-day. I intend to mention some reasons why you should take part in these hosannas, and be joyful in Christ as your King. And the reasons are these: First, He is the Saviour of children. Second, He became a child that He might understand children. Third, He is not ashamed to call children His brothers and sisters. Fourth, He is preparing a place for children above.

I. He is the Saviour of Children.—It is a great thing for children to have a Saviour. A mother was knitting under the porch of her house one autumn afternoon. Her boy was playing with other children on the village green. Beyond the green was the river, and on the opposite bank of it was a wood full of nuts and berries, and sweet-smelling leaves and flowers, and many other things which children delight to gather. 'Let us cross to the wood,' said some of the bigger children. 'I shall cross too,' said the little boy, whose mother was knitting at the door. The ford was a little to the right, and just out of his mother's view. There were stepping-stones all the way across. And the little nutting and berrying party got quite safely to the other side. But the clouds had been darkening over the sky since the morning. And now it began to rain. First it came in heavy drops, then there was a peal of thunder, then came down torrents of rain. The bigger children hurried back to the ford, and one by one got over safely. The little boy whose mother was knitting under the porch was last. The river had by this time risen. The stepping-stones were beginning to be covered. The little man took one step, then a second, then he came to a stone over which the river was flowing swiftly, and his heart failed. He wrung his hands with fear, and cried with a piercing cry. The mother heard his cry and flew to the ford. She was too late. She could not reach her child. A broad black flood of water came thundering down between her boy and her. 'My child! my child!' she cried. 'Mother! mother! come for me,' cried the boy. All the village came down to the river-side—men and women, young and old; but no one would venture to cross. They looked and pitied; they looked and wrung their hands, but they gave no help. At that moment a young shepherd, leading his flock down from the mountains, entered the village and saw the peril of the child. He left his sheep on the green and took great strides to the river-brink. The roaring of the water over the stones was terrible, but he heeded not. He stepped boldly from stone to stone. In the centre the flood had carried some of them away; he plunged into the stream. With strong arms he beat the water to the right and left. He pressed his feet against the currents and swam right over to the boy. With one arm he clasped the child, with the other he once more grappled with the flood. There was the roaring of the stream beneath, and the raging of the storm above; but the brave shepherd, partly walking and partly swimming, brought the boy to the bank, and delivered him to his mother.

That was a boy who found a saviour. And what the brave young shepherd saved him from was death. But Christ was the real Saviour that day. It was He who sent the shepherd at the very nick of time. It was He who put the noble willingness into his heart to risk his life for the life of the child. It was He who made him brave and strong to battle with the flood. And every day, somewhere, in this or some other way, Christ is saving children. Death in a thousand forms is continually coming near to children. But by brave swimmers, by faithful nurses, by wise doctors, by loving mothers, by kind friends, and sometimes by the unseen angels, Christ brings deliverance. And He is the Saviour from a death more terrible than the death which threatened the boy of whom I told. It is He who saves from the death which comes by sin—the death of everything good in the soul—the death of the soul itself. Every child born in a Christian home should be joyful in this Saviour. He has saved you from being heathen children; He has saved you from being slave children. He has come to save you from being dishonest and lying children, and idle and disobedient children. He has saved you from being ignorant of God's love. He has come to save you from spending lives without God. He has come to save you from dying without hope of going to God. He has saved you from the grave, for He has purchased resurrection for you. And He came to save you from what is worse than the grave, from being shut out of heaven; for He has made a way for every child who will walk in it, into the eternal family and home of God above.

II. He Became a Little Child, that He might Understand Children.—I once heard about a little girl who was just learning to speak. She came up to her mamma, sick and pale, and began in her broken way to tell something. Mamma could not understand. The doctor could not understand. Nurse could not understand. But still the child continued her little tale, and by and by began to cry, because nobody understood. She wished to tell where her pain was, and no one could understand. At last they thought of sending for her playmate—a child not much bigger than herself. She understood at once. It was the same cry which the Shunammite's little son cried long ago, when he was struck by the heat, 'My head, my head'.

Jesus became a little child to understand all your cries. He was hot and cold, He was sick and well, He was hungry and thirsty, just as you have been. And He had to learn to read, just as you had, beginning with the alphabet.

He knows all about children. He felt all that you feel; He thought just as you think. When He was hurt, He cried; when He was sad, He wept. He had to obey His mother just as you have. Every day He met with other children, with good children, and with children not good, just as you do. And He learned to be a good boy, and to seek good; and He grew up in favour both with God and man. He knew that He had a Father in heaven who could hear His cry; and He prayed to that Father. Before He was twelve years old He made it known that His Father had given Him a work to do. When His mother found Him in the Temple with the priests, putting questions to them, He said, 'Knew ye not that I was about my Father's business?'

He knows how weak children are; but He knows also how strong their helper is, and how willing He is to help them. When a boy or girl says, 'I cannot live as God wants me to live. I must sometimes have my own way, and sometimes I may tell a lie,' the Lord Jesus knows that that is not so. He was a child, and lived as God wished Him to live. And He never uttered a word which was not true.

At the same time, He does not forget that children cannot serve God in the very same way very good grown-up people can do. He remembers how it was with Himself when He was young; and how hard a battle He had. He knows how little you know yet, and how little you have, and how little you are. And He does not expect you to pray to Him just in the very way your parents do. And He is not angry if your prayers are simple and short. And He does not expect you to work for Him as big people do, but only as children can. He knows your frame, and remembers that you are just children still.

Ah! if you knew it aright, there is nothing better than this in the world for you. Up in heaven, there is One who understands all you think and say. When you are not able to tell your wants, He knows without telling. When you cry in broken words which even your mother cannot understand, He understands. He knows and feels every pain you have. He knows all your sorrows when you are in tears. Even the cries of the tiniest baby in a mother's arms go up into the ear of that dear Saviour who was a tiny baby Himself, and sobbed and smiled in the arm of His mother Mary in Bethlehem long ago.

'Let the children of Zion be joyful in their King.'

III. He is not Ashamed to Call Children His Brothers and Sisters.—There are many reasons which might well make Jesus ashamed to call boys and girls His brothers and sisters. He is perfectly holy; they are far from being perfectly holy. Some have bad tempers; some are rude; some are quarrelsome; some are disobedient; some are slothful; some forget to thank God for His mercies, or pray for His help.

But the Lord Jesus is not ashamed of them. He says to children, 'Ye are my brethren'. He thinks of children every day as His brethren. And every day He blesses them as brethren. He makes no difference. He loves poor children and rich children alike; and happy children and unhappy; and black children and white. Those who have parents, and those who have lost their parents, they are all His brethren. There is not a poor message boy on the streets, nor a poor newspaper boy, nor a poor foundry boy, nor a poor sailor boy, nor any poor girl, nor any girl or boy, rich or poor, in the wide world to whom He is not a brother.

Do you remember when He called His disciples 'brethren' for the first time? It was after His Resurrection—after He had endured the cross, and won the crown. It was when He was on the other side of the grave, and was waiting to go up to heaven. He said to Mary, 'Go and tell my brethren that I have risen, and that I am going back to God'. Think of the loving-kindness of that message. It was sent to the men who had fled from Him in His sorrow. It was sent to Peter, who denied Him with oaths and curses. Although they had been ashamed of Him before men, He was not ashamed of them. He called them brethren. There is nothing in all the Bible more beautiful than that. And it is just the same thing He says to you, 'Ye are my brethren'. Even to those of you who have been ashamed to pray to Him; even to those who have fled from Him like the disciples, He says, 'Ye are my brethren'. He says that, in order to make you

His true brothers and sisters. He says that, because it is in His heart to be a brother to each of you.

Lift up your hearts to God and be very thankful. You and I have a brother in heaven—the best, the kindest in the whole world. In the high heaven, where the stars shine, and the throne of God is set, this brother lives; and He is Lord of these stars, and He sits on that throne. This is the king who is continually travelling about His kingdom, and doing good to His brothers and sisters. He is near to us when we do not see Him. He is near to us now. Oh, wonder of wonders! My little brothers are king's brothers, my little sisters are king's sisters! When I enter the school, when I go among children by the fireside, I go into the midst of brothers and sisters of the King of Glory.

Nobody need go without this joy. Christ is brother to us all. We may have no money, nor fine clothes, nor books, nor food; but we all have, and we always have, this brother.

Nothing can take Him away from us. Death may take our earthly brothers and sisters, and our fathers and mothers, but it has no power over Christ.

Health and strength, and friends and joys, may leave us; but this brother will never leave you, and never, never forsake you.

IV. He is Preparing a Place for Children Above.—Some friends called on me lately who were going to Australia. I said to one of them, 'Do you feel very dreary?' He replied, 'I have a brother there'. That took away the dreariness. It would be a very sad thing to look forward to the end of life if we had no knowledge of a Brother in the life beyond. The ending of life is like leaving one's native land for Australia. The ship goes out of the river, the sea widens, the land disappears; you will never look on those hills and shores again. But there are better hills and shores in heaven. And Christ, our Elder Brother, is there before us. He will come out and meet us, and take us to our home.

In this world there are many things that are very sad. Our life is full of partings. It is like the breaking up of a school, when the top boys and girls are not to return. Perhaps they will never see each other on the earth again. One will go to India, one to Australia, one to London, one to the grave. So are the children of God scattered in the world. They do not know each other; often they do not see each other. One is abroad, one is at home; one is poor, one is rich. A thousand things divide them. How joyful to think that it will not be always so—that the Lord Jesus is preparing a place for them above, and that at the end of the world, He will gather all His brothers and sisters into one happy home in heaven.

There is just this one sad thought that comes creeping into one's mind. Some boy may be saying to himself: 'That joy is not for me; I have not been the brother to Christ I ought to have been'. And some tender-hearted girl may be thinking, that she has not loved the Saviour enough, nor tried enough to please Him.

This is the blessing of having Christ for a Saviour. There is forgiveness with Him for those who have done wrong. He is waiting to forgive you, and make you as good as you ought to be. You remember the story of Joseph—the brother who was put down into the pit, and sold for a slave into Egypt? The brothers who sold him happened, years after that, to be famishing for food, and went to Egypt to buy corn. And, lo! they found the brother they had sold a great lord there. He did not put these wicked brothers to death. He had pity on them, and blessed them, and gave them corn, and told them to go back for their father, and their wives and their children, and he would prepare a place for them in Egypt. He forgave them all their sin.

Christ is our Joseph. He is Joseph to all the children of men. Can we ever forget the treatment He received at the hands of men in Jerusalem? He came into that city which was His own, and the citizens received Him not. They mocked Him, and beat Him, and sold Him, and crucified Him.

But His heart is none the less the heart of a brother. There is forgiveness and mercy in that heart for every child of man. Even for those who crucified Him He cried: 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!' Oh, that every boy and girl before me would cry for that forgiveness! Oh, that you would turn to other boys and girls, and say: 'We have found the forgiving Brother, whom wicked brothers sold and crucified in Jerusalem long ago. He is the King of heaven. He is preparing a place there for all who love Him. Let us live to Him whilst we are here, and at last we shall go up together and dwell with Him for ever and ever.'

There is one of the Psalms in which everything that lives is called on to join in the hosanna to Christ—sun and moon and stars; fire, hail, wind, and snow; hills and trees; and beasts, wild and tame; and human beings—

Both men and virgins young,
Even young and old,
Exalt His name, for much His fame
Should be extolled.

And everything that lives—in its own way—sends up praise to Christ. The singing of birds, the glad gambolling of little creatures in the woods, the rippling of waves on the beach, express their praise. Winter and summer, spring-time and harvest, are the four-part song of the year. Every season has its own song. In the harvest, the very earth seems to take up the praise. The fields are waving with ripe corn, its pastures are clothed with glad flocks, there is a stir and movement of joy in the very air. The little hills rejoice on every side. The whole wide earth, lying in the light of harvest sun and moon, rejoices before God, who made its bosom fruitful, and ripened the wheat and the barley, and turned the little blades of spring into the yellow waving fields of harvest.

Oh, you children of the Christian Church—you who have been born in this Christian country, and have been blessed with Christian parents—you who can read the Bible, and the sweet story of Christ's love to man—what joy and praise should ascend from you!

If the little hills are glad because God's lambs are bleating on their side; and the green fields because the cattle He made are browsing on their pasture; if the valleys are glad because the corn is waving on their breast, and the whole earth because He has not left it to be a barren wilderness—there are a thousand better reasons why you should be glad for Him, who came from heaven to die for you, and went back to heaven to prepare for you a home.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, Talking to the Children, p. 237.

JESUS CHRIST GOING INTO JERUSALEM ON PALM SUNDAY

JOHN XII. 13.

THERE are two names for this Sunday. One is 'Palm Sunday,' another is 'Hosanna Day'. A long time ago, the old Christians used to call this 'Hosanna Day'. A nice word! What are the two words? 'Palm Sunday' and 'Hosanna Day'.

Do you know what 'Hosanna' means? 'Save now.' In the 118th Psalm, and twenty-fifth verse, you will find it. In the Hebrew it is 'Hosanna'. 'Save now, I beseech Thee, O Lord.' Then, in the next verse, 'Blessed be He that cometh in the name of the Lord'. We call it 'Hosanna Day,' because all the people, and the little children, cried 'Hosanna! Hosanna!'

Why do we call it 'Palm Sunday'? Because the people carried palms.

Let me tell you a little about the palm-tree. It is a very tall tree. And so we read in the fourth chapter of Judges that 'Deborah dwelt under a palm-tree,' because it is so tall. There were a great many palm-trees in that country, particularly at Jericho. And therefore in the thirty-fourth chapter of Deuteronomy, Jericho is called 'the city of palm-trees'. Perhaps the people got their palms from Jericho.

It is a very beautiful tree. Some say that it is called 'the palm-tree' because the leaves are like the palm of your hand; and you know the fruit of the tree is called 'dates'; and some say that the reason why the fruit is called dates is because the Greek word for finger is 'Dactylus,' that is 'a date'. So that the tree is called 'palm' from the palm of your hand; and the fruit is called 'dates' because the Greek word for finger is something like dates.

It is so beautiful a tree that, in the ninety-second Psalm, it is said of the righteous, 'The righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree'.

Now I want to tell you a little about that. I have read in a great many books—and I believe it to be true—that, unlike every other tree, the palm-tree grows best if you press it down. The more pressure you put upon the tree the more it bears. Do you see what is the meaning of that? 'The righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree.' When do the Lord's people do best? When they have something pressing upon them—some trouble? I think so. It helps them to bear fruit.

That is what I have got to tell you about the palm-tree. It is a very grand tree. It seems to tell of victory. It was always used to speak of victory.

I. 'He sent two of His disciples.' We do not know who they were. Do you guess? Perhaps it was the same that He sent after to get ready the room, Peter and John; and He told them to go into the village: and what should they find? 'An ass tied, and a colt with her.' Did Jesus see that colt, do you think, at the moment when He spoke? Did He know all about it? What did He say about it? Did He say it should be loose, or tied? 'Tied.' Should it be one that people had ridden on before? 'No.' He knew all about the little colt, and He told them to go and bring it. And what were they to say if anybody stopped them? 'The Lord hath need of them.'

And that is exactly the message God has sent me to give to you. I come to you, and I say to you, 'The Lord has need of you'. It will make Jesus happier if you come to Him. He has something for you to do. 'The Lord hath need of you.' It seemed very wonderful that the Lord should want the colt. And it is very wonderful that He should want any little boy or girl here. But He does; He does. He wants you in heaven with Him. He would be happier in heaven with you there.

The disciples went. Did they find it all just as Jesus had said? 'Yes.' Whereabouts was the colt—at the beginning, middle, or the end of the village? 'The beginning.' Was it tied? 'Yes.' By what? 'By the door.' Was there anything said about the roads? It was 'in a place where two ways met'. There was a door, and the colt was 'tied by the door'.

II. Why did Jesus ride 'an ass' at all? Who prophesied it? Zechariah. Look at the ninth chapter and the ninth verse. Let us read it together. 'Behold thy King cometh unto thee: He is just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt, the foal of an ass.' If Jesus Christ had come in a warlike way, come to fight, would He have ridden an ass? 'No.' What would he have ridden? 'A horse.' Then do you think it means He came peaceably? 'Yes.'

Did Jesus Christ generally ride? 'No: He always walked.' Yet it says, 'He rideth upon a swift cloud'.

Was it a disgrace to ride 'an ass'? Was 'an ass' an honourable animal? 'Yes.' Do you always treat it so? Where in the Bible is it called honourable? Where is it made the mark of being noble to ride upon a particular kind of ass? It is in a woman's beautiful song—Deborah's song. What is said of the great people? 'Ye that ride on white asses.' Therefore it was no disgrace to ride an ass! It was a great condescension in Jesus to ride anything—a camel, an elephant, a horse, or an ass. But it was no particular condescension to ride an ass more than any other animal, because the Jews did not hold the ass as anything mean. But I think it means that Jesus came peaceably. Therefore He came 'riding upon an ass'.

III. And many people were present. Was there any cause for this? Was it prophesied that there should be a great many people to meet Him? 'Yes.' Because He had raised Lazarus—therefore the people met Him. And Jerusalem was very full, because it was the feast of the Passover. Crowds met Him.

And what did they carry in their hands? 'Branches of palm.' And what did they sing? 'Hosanna! Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord: Hosanna in the highest!' So He went in triumph along.

Did He have a little river to cross? 'Yes.' He passed a small river, called 'the Kedron': He went through the valley of Jehoshaphat, and up a steep hill, and so wound His way round to the Temple of Jerusalem.

Did He go along without stopping? 'No.' Did he stop? What for? About a fig-tree. He stopped also for a strange thing. He stopped to cry; He stopped to weep! More than He did at the grave of Lazarus? Yes; there He shed tears; but now He 'wept'. It is a very strong word. What made Him weep? When He just got in sight of Jerusalem, and thought of its wickedness, and all the trouble coming upon it! Do you remember His beautiful words? 'O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!' He wept over the city; even in His triumph, He stopped to weep over the wickednesses and sorrows of the Jews.

IV. Would you like to have carried a palm on Palm Sunday in Jerusalem? 'Yes.' Can you do it now? 'Yes.' How? Think. What can you do to be like, quite as good, as any child who carried a palm and cried 'Hosanna'? Shall I tell you of four things?

If any boy conquers himself, really conquers himself,—if you want some naughty thing or other, and conquer the desire, you may cry 'Hosanna!' You have got a palm—you are a conqueror; you have conquered yourself. If you have tried to overcome some bad temper, some evil habit, you will be a conqueror; for God will help you to do it, if you ask Him; and then you can carry the palm and cry 'Hosanna! I have conquered'.

Shall I tell you another thing? Supposing you do really love Jesus Christ, and feel Him to be your own dear Saviour, and you like to sing of Him, you like to praise Him, you feel happy in thinking about Jesus, and praising Him, then you are carrying a palm, and you are saying 'Hosanna!' just like these children.

I will tell you another thing which, I think, is still better, if possible. Supposing you do something to help Jesus to ride on in His kingdom; to help on His kingdom. If you are useful to somebody—useful to another boy or girl, do something to extend the kingdom of God—then you are like the children in the streets of Jerusalem—helping Jesus to ride on in His glory; as in that beautiful forty-fifth Psalm: 'Gird Thy sword upon Thy thigh, O most Mighty, with Thy glory and Thy majesty. And in Thy majesty ride prosperously, because of truth and meekness and righteousness.' If you do anything for the missionaries, for the kingdom of Christ, then you are crying 'Hosanna!' and carrying a palm!—JAMES VAUGHAN.

DESIRING TO SEE JESUS

(For Epiphany)

'Sir, we would see Jesus.'—JOHN XII. 21.

THOSE are just the words that I should like every one of you to say now, 'I want to see Jesus. I want to see Jesus.' I am going to talk about what we shall do if we want to see Jesus.

I dare say you will guess why I took that text. Do you know why? Because yesterday was Epiphany. Therefore, I took that text. 'Sir, we would see Jesus.'

So we have just begun a New Year, and if you were all little Jews, what do you think you would do? Do you know? Do you know what you would do at the beginning of the year? You would have a feast, and the feast would be called 'the feast of trumpets'. There would be a great many men blowing trumpets. So they begin the year with blowing trumpets. Now what did that mean? Why did they blow trumpets? Well, trumpets show we are going to fight; trumpets show we are going to get the victory; trumpets show we are going to be very happy. Three things—battle, victory, joy.

Now we have not got trumpets to blow with, but we are going this year to fight a battle. Do you know with what? With what? With ourselves; to fight against ourselves; to fight our naughty sins. We are going to fight, and we are going to get the victory, aren't we? We shall get the victory if we go the right way to work, and then we shall be very happy and have joy, and so we shall be able to blow the trumpets. Battle, victory, joy! So we begin the year!

Now I am going to talk about the Epiphany. 'Sir, we would see Jesus.' The word Epiphany is a Greek word. It is almost the same word as manifestation. It means showing, showing. And you know in the Greek language they never use the word Epiphany except in this sense: God showing Himself to man. God showing Himself to man. Epiphany—God showing Himself to man.

They say that the day of Epiphany was also afterwards the day of Christ's baptism. The Roman Catholics all believe that. The day on which Christ was baptised; therefore they make it a great holiday. Not only on that day because He showed Himself to the wise men, but because He was also baptised on that day; it is a great day, a great holiday.

Now, let us think about the wise men seeing the little Baby. I cannot tell you how many the wise men were. I cannot tell. They say there were three, but we do not know that. I believe the reason why it is said there were three is because there were three gifts—gold, frankincense, and myrrh. Therefore, it is said there were three men. And some say they were kings, but we do not know that. The reason it is said they were kings is from a verse in the sixtieth of Isaiah; if you like you can look at it. It is a verse which makes us think they might have been kings. 'And the Gentiles shall come to Thy light, and kings to the brightness of Thy rising.' It only rests upon that verse. If they were not kings, they were magi, or wise men; and those were the men that first saw Jesus, who first came from the East to see the Babe Jesus. These wise men were Gentiles; that is to say, they were not Jews. Jesus first showed Himself to Jews. The first who saw the little Baby were Jews. Do you know who they were? The shepherds. The shepherds to whom the angels came by night. They were Jews. Then came the Gentiles. And that is the way God has always acted. He has given first to the Jews, and then to the Gentiles. Do you know how we come to have any blessing? Because all the promise was made to Abraham and Abraham's family afterwards. Only to him! Then how can we have any promise? Are we Abraham's family? are we Jews? No. Then how can we have any promise? Jesus was Abraham's seed, and if we are really Christians we are joined to Jesus; we are in Jesus; we are members in Jesus; and so we come to all the promises. And that is the only way by which we can take any promise in the Bible. If we are in Jesus, who came from Abraham—and all the promises went to Abraham and Abraham's seed—we come into the promises by being joined to Abraham; and we are joined to Abraham if we are members of Jesus Christ. So Christ Himself first appeared to the Jews and then to the Gentiles. First to the shepherds, and then to the wise men who came from some distant place.

Where did they come from? We do not know. Some say they came from Arabia, and the reason is because it is in the seventy-second Psalm and the tenth verse. That is a verse which makes some think it shows they came from Arabia—the tenth verse of the seventy-second Psalm. 'The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents: the kings of Sheba and Seba'—which is Arabia—'shall offer gifts'. But it is more likely that they came from somewhere about Persia, or in that neighbourhood; and the reason why we think that is because that is near where Balaam was, and he prophesied about the star coming. He said the star should come. A great Roman writer, Tacitus, said there was a great expectation about that country that Christ was coming, and it is thought the wise men came from that neighbourhood—exactly from the East of the Holy Land. It does not matter very much where they came from. They came, these men—perhaps three; we do not know;—they came from somewhere in the East to see the Babe Jesus. What made them come? They had heard of Balaam's prophecy. I think they lived in that country, and so, when they saw some very strange star, they thought this showed that the Christ was come. They saw the star!

What are stars? There are two kinds of stars—planets and stars. Planets shine by reflection; stars shine by their own light. That is the difference between stars and planets. What are stars? Do you think a little child was right when he said they were 'peep holes into heaven'? I do not think quite that, but I do think when we are looking at the stars we may think about heaven. Another person has called them 'the poetry of the skies'. It is a pretty name for them, 'poetry'. But I should think the star which the wise men saw in the East was not exactly like a star or a planet. I should think it is what we should call a meteor; something that would move, that looked like a star, the same as a star in appearance, but was really only a meteor. Such as you may have seen; a thing that moves about. They saw this, and they had it in their minds to think that that star would lead them to see Christ; would lead them the right way. I don't know whether you know; do you know this? you cannot see the stars in the daytime, but if you were to go down to the bottom of a well or a pit you would see the stars. If you could go down to the bottom of a well you could see the stars at twelve o'clock in the day, because it is dark there. You only see the stars in the dark. This star, whatever it was—like a star—led the wise men to see their Christ, their God.

In Portugal, Don Pedro, a great king, had this as his motto. He had a star upon anything he had, with words, in Latin, which meant, 'It shows the journey'; 'it shows the way'. Therefore it was the motto of the King of Portugal, 'It shows the journey; it shows the way.'

The three men set out, following this star or meteor, whichever way it would lead them, without pointing which way, but they knew it would lead them to see this great Person who was on the earth, and whom they had in their minds.

Now it is very difficult to be sure how it was, but I think it was this way. I think the star in the sky went on before them at first, but when they got in a straight road to Jerusalem, then I think the star was hid, because every one could find their way to Jerusalem. It was hid; but when they came to Jerusalem, and had to go to Bethlehem, they did not know their way till it shone again, and it is said, 'When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy'. They saw it again at Jerusalem. So the star led them wherever they wanted leading; when they could go by themselves they did not want the star. So when they came to Jerusalem it showed itself again, and it showed them the way to Bethlehem. Bethlehem means 'the house of bread'. It is really the house of the living bread to us; where Jesus Christ, the living bread, came to us. And then they came to see the Baby. How old the Baby was we are not told. They came to see the Baby! Now when a little baby comes into the house, when a little baby is born, everybody wants to see the baby, everybody would like to see it first; but, as I said, it was first shown to the Jews and then to the Gentiles. Oh, what a wonderful Baby it must have been! and though it only looked a baby that Baby was God. Wonderful Baby! I wonder how it looked! I wonder how Jesus looked! I do not know whether He was beautiful, as people call beautiful. He looked so sweet and tender and loving. I think the Baby had that true beauty. They saw the Baby.

You know they say that Turks (you know the Turks are Mohammedans) and the Mohammedans go frequently, some of them once a year, to visit the tomb of Mary—they go to Mecca. And it is told of some Turks that they went to see the tomb of Mary, and when they had seen the tomb of Mary they were so delighted to have seen it that they put out their own eyes that they should not see anything else again. They thought they would not see anything common afterwards. They put out their own eyes because they would not see anything common after they had seen the tomb of Mary. That was very foolish; but they thought that everything else was not worth looking at.

They saw the Baby! Now what I want to ask is, How shall we see Jesus? How shall we have an Epiphany? How shall we see Jesus? Can you think with me how we are to see Jesus? What shall be our star? What is the star to lead us to know Jesus? Will you look at the thirty-second Psalm and the eighth verse? I find there what I wish to say. The first thing I should say in order to see Jesus. The end of the eighth verse, 'I will guide thee with Mine eye'. What is our star then? God's eye, God's eye. The eye of God, 'I will guide thee with Mine eye.' As the star guided the wise men, the eye of God will guide us the right way to find Jesus, to find truth. God's eye! Think that God is looking at you. Think where He looks and likes to look. Where He likes to look, there I must go. God's eye! 'I will guide thee with Mine eye.' Think, think! The eye of God! where it looks. Go that way, where God's eye loves to look.

In the great battle of Prestonpans, the great General MacGregor was dreadfully wounded. While General MacGregor was leading on the troops they fought bravely; but when their General was wounded, almost dead, they flagged, they became afraid, and did not fight well, and General MacGregor, though dreadfully wounded, lifted himself up a little off the ground, and cried, 'Men, my men, I can see you still. My eye is upon you; my eye is upon you.' He bid them fight bravely, and they won the battle. MacGregor's eye was upon them; they fought so well, and they gained the victory. Wouldn't it make us fight well if we had God's eye always upon us? Wouldn't it make us love Jesus?

The next thing to guide us is the Bible. The Bible is a guide to us. Then it depends on how we read our Bible. It is said of a celebrated man that he always read the Bible aloud. It is beautiful to read the Bible aloud. At every verse he read, it was as if he had just discovered a bit of gold. He read it with such feeling, as if he had just found some great treasure. He read it so feelingly. You know David says, when he read the Bible, he felt it was beautiful; he drew in his breath as if he had seen something beautiful. Oh, how beautiful, how beautiful! Is the Bible like that to us? Like a bit of gold, or something beautiful indeed, which makes me draw in my breath and wonder. If you were trying to see something or another in a dark room, what would you do? Wouldn't you go to the window to get a little more light? When you are reading the Bible get a little more light. Go to the windows; go to the windows of heaven, and get more light; and if you read your Bible in that way, I am sure your Bible will be a star. It will be a bright light to you, and show you the way to Jesus.

I will tell you another thing. I said you must think of God's eye, and your Bible; now a third thing—think, think, think! A young man asked a very great philosopher—a very clever man—how he would be able to live a good life, a sensible life; he did not mean a religious life. He asked what book he should take with him; and what book do you think the philosopher told him he should take with him? It was not the Bible. It was a book upon which there was nothing. Merely white paper. A book of white paper. Wherever you go, whatever you observe, whatever you hear, write down in your blank book. That will make you observe everything, and you will find by writing down what you see and hear that it will give you wisdom and guide you in life. Take a blank book and write down what you see and hear. So I say think, think. You must have God's eye, and have your Bible, but you must think. You won't find the way without it.

Which is best, reason or faith? You must have both. You must be very reasonable and thoughtful, and have faith. Reason won't do without faith. You must trust. They say that one day Reason and Faith set out together to take a journey; and they came to a mountain and Reason said, 'I cannot climb that mountain,' and Faith said, 'I can'. They came to a river, and Reason said, 'I cannot go through that river,' and Faith said, 'I can'. And what do you think was the end of it? Faith had to carry Reason on his back, and a very heavy load it was. He had to carry him on his back. Let Faith carry Reason, and you will get Jesus.

One thing more—but perhaps I ought not to say this—your ministers and your teachers are stars; do you know in the Bible we are called stars? You know I am called a star, not that kind of star which shines in his own light, but a reflective light. Do you know where it is said your minister is a star, and your teacher is a star? In the first of Revelation and the twentieth verse. John is speaking of that wonderful Being who 'had in His right hand seven stars'. The seven stars are the angels; that means ministers. 'The seven stars are the angels'—the ministers. Though I am a poor, miserable, sinful man, yet if I am a minister of God He shines upon me, and I must shine upon you. So I am a star.

These altogether are stars; not one without the other. There must be God's eye, there must be the Bible, you must think, there must be faith, and you must look to your ministers and teachers. If you do that, you will have a star which will guide you to Jesus. You will see Jesus.

Only remember this in your journey. Now you are going on a journey you know to find Jesus. You are going to find Jesus. Which way must you look? Down, round, or up? You will never find a star if you look down or round there. You must look up if you would see the star. You must be always looking up. Now I know some boys and girls who are doing the contrary—who wish to be religious but who are always looking into themselves. They look down instead of looking up to God. Look up to God; don't look much into yourselves; don't look much around you on other people; don't look into yourselves, but look up. There is the star up there if you are always looking up.

And I will tell you how God will help you to see this star up there. He will sometimes make it very dark that you may see the star. You will have sickness, or some great trouble; some one you love very much will die. It will be very dark indeed, pitch dark. That is when you may see the star to guide you to heaven, to guide you to Jesus. If you do that you will see Jesus. You will see Him now by faith, and you will see Him by and by just as He is—'the King in His beauty'. But you will see Him now by faith.

Supposing we were all now to shut our eyes and fancy we saw something. Don't you sometimes do so? Shut your eyes and think of something, think of your home. Why, you see it all just as if you were there. There is mother; there is the tea on the table; she is just going to pour out the tea; there is the table, the teacups, the kettle. I see it all. Don't you know that feeling? If you can do that, that is faith—seeing in your mind the thing you cannot see with your eyes. So you will see Jesus and feel Him near. You will see Him presently. Perhaps it won't be very long; it may, perhaps it will, be before the end of this year you will see Him in His beauty; you will see Jesus.

I have only one thing more to say. What gifts did these men bring?—'gold, frankincense, and myrrh'. Gold for the King, frankincense for the God, myrrh for the dying man. Myrrh was used to embalm the dead; therefore it is thought that myrrh was given to show that He would die. Gold, the most precious thing; frankincense, a very fragrant thing; myrrh, a very lasting thing. You must give to God what is very precious, what is very holy, and what is very lasting. Gold, frankincense, myrrh. Gold for the King, frankincense for the God, myrrh for the dying man. Give three things. What! that you may see Jesus? No, that would be buying Him. Are we to be good that we may be saved? or saved that we may be good? Which comes first? We are saved that we may be good. We see Jesus, we feel forgiven and we are forgiven. We ought to feel that we could give Him everything. Our body which is precious as gold, our soul which is fragrant as frankincense, and our spirit which is the myrrh. You see the three things—the body, the soul, and the spirit. And that is to be our gift to God, because He has saved us, because He has loved us.

We cannot, perhaps, give gold, frankincense, or myrrh; but we can do as a poor Indian did. A poor Indian in North America had heard about Jesus, and he wished to be loved of God; he wished to be saved; and he came to the missionary, and he brought his beautiful belt which he valued very much, and he said to the missionary, 'I will give this belt that Jesus may love me'. The missionary said, 'God won't accept your belt; that won't do'. He went away, and he brought his rifle and some game that he had shot, and said he would give that to God. And the missionary said, 'That won't do; God won't accept your gun and the things you have shot'. He went away, and came a third time, and brought his wigwam. The missionary said, 'That won't do'. And he said, 'I will give Him my wife and my children'. 'That won't do,' said the missionary, 'that won't do.' Then he came a fourth time and said, 'I will give to God the poor Indian himself'. The missionary said, 'God will accept that gift'.

This I hope you will give. Then you will see Jesus, and love Jesus; and when you are looking for Jesus you will see Him. I hope you have followed me. That is the way we are to see Jesus. 'Sir, we would see Jesus.' Follow the star, God's eye, read your Bible, think, follow on and on, and you will see Jesus, and you will be so happy. You will feel, 'I will give Him everything'. I will give Him myself, and have Jesus for ever and ever.—JAMES VAUGHAN.

OUR LORD'S RESURRECTION

'Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit.'—JOHN XII. 24.

THOUSANDS and millions of Christians spring up and flourish, because the Lord Jesus was planted like a grain of wheat. As all the beauty and value of the harvest depend on the fact that the kernel had been put into the ground, and had gone through with this process of decay, so will the glorified bodies of God's people, at the last day, be the natural effect of our Saviour's resurrection.

An old man tells a pretty story of himself which explains the text in a very striking way: 'I had a little sister who died when I was but five years old. The grief of losing her sank deep into my heart; and weeks went by before I could be happy in the playroom where we had so often been together, or could endure the sight of her books and toys.

'Often I stole away alone to the churchyard where she lay, and sat for hours near the little mound that covered her pretty form; for I did not feel so lonely when I sat beside her there.

'I had always been a quiet child; but this sore trouble completely took away my spirits, and made me almost ill. At last my parents became alarmed for my health, and proposed to take me to the seaside. I, however, begged so hard to remain near my little sister, and was so unhappy at the thought of leaving her, that they agreed to let me stay.

"Mamma," I said, "you know you told me Teddy would come out again from under that ground—that God was going to raise her up. I want to be here when she comes."

"My boy," my mother answered, "our little Teddy is not coming back just now. God is not ready yet to bring her body out of the ground. He is taking good care of her soul now, and when you die you may go where she is."

"Must I go into the ground, too?" I asked; "and shall I come out all bright like Teddy?"

"Yes, my boy."

"But, mamma, I don't see how. How can it ever be?"

'My mother opened her hand, and showed me a little seed, telling me to take it, and bury it in the ground. She said that God meant to have the seed buried in that way, so that it might grow up and produce beautiful flowers, and that the same Great Being could also raise up our friends from their graves, and give them glorified bodies.

'Every day I loitered for hours around the spot where I had buried the seed, and even brought my book and studied my lesson there. I somehow felt that upon the coming up of that plant depended the raising of my little sister—that if my mother's word proved true about the seed, I should have a sure prospect of some day seeing little Teddy again. So I watched and waited anxiously for many days, and the time seemed very long.

'At last, one morning, after a very rainy night, I went out, and saw, to my intense delight, two small green leaves peeping above the ground just where I had buried my seed.

'To this day I can remember the thrill of joy I felt at that sight. It was not merely delight at finding that I was to have a flower of my own; but to my childish heart it seemed like an assurance straight from heaven that my little Teddy would be taken care of, and given back to me again.

'Now I was happier than I had been for many weeks, and as my morning-glory grew and blossomed my trust in God's power grew stronger, till at length all the heavy weight of sorrow was lifted from my heart.'

A graveyard ceases to be a gloomy place when we remember the cheering lessons of Easter. It is God's own garden plot, which will one day bloom and blossom.

And now, one closing thought. If a seed of wheat be sown, wheat grows from it; if barley, the crop will be barley. And so, when the Lord Jesus Christ is sowed in the earth, for a seed, Christians spring up from Him—those who are like Him, and who try to be true, and gentle, and pure, and good, as Christ was.

As we sing in one of the Easter hymns—

Soar we now, where Christ hath led,
Following our exalted Head;
Made like Him, like Him we rise,
Ours the cross, the grave, the skies.

—JOHN N. NORTON, Milk and Honey, p. 79.

GRAFTING AND BUDDING

'I am the vine, ye are the branches; he that abideth in Me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit; for without Me ye can do nothing.'—JOHN XV. 5.

THERE is such a thing as budding as well as grafting. The gardener takes a little bud, before it has opened, along with a little bit of its stalk, and he cuts the stalk down till he cuts to its heart, and then cuts a little slit in the tree and gets at its heart, and then he puts in the stalk of the bud and ties it firmly round with cord, and puts clay round about the wound; and by and by the little bud gets life from the heart of the tree, and it grows finely. You should try to do this yourself in the springtime; and so, lest you should make any mistake in doing it, let me remind you what you have to do.

I. First you must get to the heart of the bud, and get to the heart of the tree, and you must bind these two very close together.

Yes, yes, that is the way, the only way we can get life from Jesus—we must bind our heart to His heart. It won't do merely to be near Him, it won't do merely to know about Him, it is only when we set our hearts to His heart that we get His life. So if you would know how good He is, and how good He can be, you must love Him with all your heart.

Sometimes it is difficult to get at the heart, and so sometimes God has to cut down. You won't know all that that means yet, but one day you may; how God lets sorrow and pain come to us, and we think it is very hard, but by and by we find what He meant—He meant to prepare our heart to be bound to the heart of Jesus. Far better if we do not make that needless. Far better if we bind our hearts to Jesus when we are little. If the bud takes hold of the heart of the tree it grows better than it would have done if it had waited till it was a branch.

II. But the second thing to remember is, you must hold the bud firmly into its place with cord. If you don't do that, when it begins to droop a little, it will fall out. And that is why father and mother say, 'You must'. You must go to church, you must read the Bible, you must learn the text by heart, you must pray to Jesus. We do not like 'must'—it is not the nicest word—but then, the bud does not like the cord that is round about it, but it is the strong cord that saves the bud. And so for the time you must do this, and must do that, as you are told, if you are to grow right with Jesus. By and by, when the bud has taken hold of the heart of the tree, the cord is taken off—for the bud will now grow beautifully and abide in the tree of itself. And so one day you won't hear any more about 'must,' because you will yourself want to do the things that will please Jesus. Till then, however, remember the cord is needful.

III. And then, in the last place, don't forget the clay. The little bud could not forget it, though I am afraid it rather would if it could. For clay is cold, and it makes everything so dark and sad. Yes, but it is only for a little; when the bud has begun to take hold, little by little it breaks away all the clay from itself.

And it is just the same with you and Jesus. When first you put your heart to His, things sometimes seem very dark and sad. You find out then how sinful you are, how unkind you have been to Jesus, and you are sad, and religion seems a very dark sad thing altogether. Yes, but wait, keep your heart true to the heart of Jesus, and the clay will all drop off. You will rejoice in mercy, you will notice more and more the sunshine God sends to you, and religion will become a brighter thing to you every day. The great thing is—keep your life close to the life of Jesus if ever you would do things that please Him and make yourself happy.—J. REID HOWATT, The Children's Angel, p. 49.

THE SPIRIT'S GUIDANCE

'When He, the Spirit of Truth, is come, He will guide you into all truth.'—JOHN XVI. 13.

We have brought before us at this special season of Whitsuntide one of the greatest of the Bible truths. It is the companion truth to that of Ascensiontide. It is the complement of it. To the thought of the risen life is joined the way to attain unto it. There is no truth in the Bible which has not its practical bearing upon our lives, and we may always be quite sure that whatever God places therein for us to learn He will at the same time provide the means and power to carry out. As, therefore, He tells us to 'set our affections on the things above,' so also He sends His Holy Spirit to lead us and direct us with regard to such things. As He enjoins us to 'Fight the good fight of faith,' so surely He puts within our lives strength for the conflict, and He also places upon us the armour necessary to protect us against the darts of the enemy. It is difficult to see what more God could have done for us. To-day, then, we think especially of the guidance of His Spirit in regard to our life's plan.

I. When our Lord ascended into heaven He left His little band of followers to carry on His work in the world. It seemed at the time a work which was impossible and impracticable. A few fishermen is the material which our Lord uses in founding the great kingdom of God upon earth. As we look at these men, we cannot help wondering at their faith and at their confidence. Round them were enemies on every hand. In open and in secret doubtless the scribes and elders of the Jews poured ignominy and shame on the name of their ascended Lord. The Romans looked with contempt upon the humble followers of the Nazarene. The Gospel ship seemed indeed among shoals and quicksands, and there was no pilot. But all will shortly be changed. The Heavenly Pilot will come, and soon the Gospel ship will sail far away to the islands of the West, and tell its glad message of 'peace on earth, goodwill to men,' and 'the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea'. Yes, all would soon be changed. The little band would be augmented by three thousand souls, and henceforth the Holy Spirit would be spread abroad to lead and guide men into all truth.

Surely this is the truth that we want to realise today. We in our lives want to have the ruling and guidance of God's Spirit. We want to remember that we are to partake of the great benefits of Pentecost. Just as the early Church needed constant help and encouragement, so we in our lives are constantly in need of God's spirit to check us, to lead us. We find out this need at every period of our life's journey.

III. School life is filled with many and varied opportunities. There are many perplexities, difficulties, temptations. There are shoals and rocks on which our vessel may be easily wrecked if our Heavenly Pilot be not on board to guide it through in safety. Many a time the rocks are hidden by the waves. Sometimes men speak us fair. We think they are true to us, but, alas! we find that their friendship means our shame, their love our dishonour.

The true love of an honest and true heart is worth everything. David and Jonathan give us an example of this. Let us aim then at this in our school life, and all will be well. In order that this may be so our friendships must, like David's and Jonathan's, be cemented by the love of God. It is this great eternal love which makes the Brotherhood of man possible. 'As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God.' And thus as we are the partakers of a common Christianity, we are bound together by a chain whose every link is love. If men thus realised their Christian life, the world would assume a different look. Anger, strife, envy, hatred, meanness, uncharitableness, jealousy—all would go, and instead of the works of the flesh, there would spring up in every life the fruits of the Spirit. Will you think of this particularly for a few moments? The works of the flesh which are hidden within the life of every man are the natural result of our fallen nature. Apart from God this fallen nature of ours is incapable of good. We therefore see that all the good that we can do is and must always be the direct fruit of the Spirit of God. As therefore we are led by this Spirit we become the sons of God. Now, shall we apply this more particularly still to our everyday life? There is sin on every hand. Various temptations beset our path. What must we do? How can we stand to the right? We see how to attain this by our text, 'He will lead you into all truth'. As we are willing to acknowledge

God the Holy Spirit in our lives, so He is willing to lead us into whatsoever is true and pure and holy. It is God's work to do this for us. It is our duty to allow Him thus to work. If we suppress the promptings of His Spirit in our lives, we do so to our own peril and ruin. It is impossible for us as true followers of Christ to live day by day in open sin. No fellow who deliberately lives an impure life, whether it be of thought, word, or action, has any right to expect any other fruit than his own destruction. They which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God. But the Spirit is manifest to lead us into truth. We have again the opportunity of turning towards the light of God's perfect day. Again the Holy Spirit speaks to us, pleads with us, and it is for us to respond by a willing surrender of the life.

III. We are quickened together with Christ if we will, and life at school is filled with that true life which is the direct work of the presence of the Spirit of Christ in our lives. Thus do we in a very real sense realise the meaning of Whitsuntide. But we want to see in some measure how the Spirit works in our lives. This we can best understand by looking at our text, 'He will lead you into all truth'. Here is the purpose, and it is very evident that this purpose could not possibly be attained other than by a gradual process. Just as the seed, when it falls into the furrow, must, before it can reach maturity, be subject to the moisture by night and the sun by day, so, too, in the spiritual life must man be furthered by the Holy Spirit of God.

And as the growth of the seed under these influences of nature is a gradual one, so also is the growth of the Spirit. The leading into all truth is the work of a lifetime, and even then it is not accomplished. We watch the gradual growth in nature. We see first the small green shoot bursting from its brown shell, then comes the leaf, and then the flower and fruit. It is all a very regular and gradual process; each day sees some new development—so surely is man's life under the influence of the Spirit. The soul is conscious of the Divine leading, and in obedience to its dictates it gradually responds more and more to the will of God, and awakens to a more active life and a deeper sense of responsibility. A boy has only a limited sense of responsibility, but as he grows up into youth he necessarily learns more of what is required of him, and he is thus enabled to grasp more firmly the unseen which alone can avail him in surmounting the difficulties of his life. Thus does God lead by His Holy Spirit into all truth, and it will be well for us to consider whither the Spirit leads, viz. 'into all truth'.

IV. While others are being tossed hither and thither by the storms of doubt and uncertainty, we are led 'into all truth'; while others are entangled in the web of perplexity, we are rejoicing in the freedom of the Christ life, the liberty wherewith Christ makes us free; while others are on the lowlands, amid the fogs and mists, we are on the highland of God, in the sunshine of God's presence, and breathing in the mountain air of the life hid with Christ in God; while error rears its head and strives to overturn the simple faith of our Christianity, we are enabled to be true to our calling, and to show to the world 'whatsoever things are true'. We have the truth, and we are led into all truth.

There are many different ways in which the Holy Spirit works in our lives. Sometimes it is the thunder of God's wrath that is needed to awaken a man out of his sleep of death to newness of life. Sometimes it is the sunshine of His love that brings the soul nearer to Him. There are again special seasons of opportunity in the working of the Spirit in men's lives. How often do we realise this? We realise it whenever some great sorrow overwhelms us by its presence. Are we not called in a very special sense to a better and truer life at such times as these? Whenever we see the difficulties of others, whenever we see a life given over to sin, whenever we see a man striving against temptation and overcoming it—in all these things the Holy Spirit speaks to us and teaches us the lessons of life, gradually leading us into all truth.

And then there is the calling to remembrance of past sin, of past temptation, of past difficulty. This is another very real operation of the Holy Spirit. Yes, the Holy Spirit calls to our remembrance the days that are past, and words uttered perchance by one long dead bear fruit after many years.

It is often so in our lives. We hear some message from God to our souls, and it is like the seed sown in the furrow. It does not show itself at once, but after days, months—years perhaps—it brings forth fruit in our lives. Therefore I would leave the thought with you to-night, 'He will lead you into all truth,' with the full assurance that God will help you to understand it, and to enable you to grasp it practically in your lives.

AT THE CROSS: A LESSON OF FILIAL LOVE

'He saith unto his mother, Woman behold thy son! Then saith He to the disciple, Behold thy mother!'—JOHN XIX. 26, 27.

I wish to take you to-day to the most solemn spot on which your feet can stand—to Calvary, that you may learn a lesson from the behaviour of the Perfect Son to His broken-hearted mother.

I. The Broken-hearted Mother.—How terrible must have been the trial of Mary's faith as she stood at the cross. It seemed as if the angel had been a deceiver, and God's word a lie, and all the wonders of her son's childhood a dream. This was the sword that pierced deepest. It was very dark round her. She tried to keep hold of God's hand, but it was very difficult. Poor broken-hearted mother!

Yet there was one sword which had pierced many a poor mother's heart which did not pierce Mary's—the poisoned sword. One thing she was able to steady her soul upon; it kept her calm, and made her proud of her son even in this hour. She knew He was innocent: that He was hanging there not on account of His own deserts, but on account of the injustice and wickedness of others. She knew He had always been pure, and noble, and good. Perhaps through the souls of the mothers of some of you a sword will pass, when they see you dying young of some painful disease, or when you are killed by accident, or lost at sea. But there is one sword which I hope will never pierce your mother's heart. It is the poisoned sword. What is that? It is the anguish which passes through a mother's heart when her boy becomes a wrecked and ruined sinner. It is very sad when a mother sees her young son borne away to the grave. It changes her life to winter. But there is sunshine even in the dripping winter weather, when she knows he is gone to be with Jesus. Most of your mothers, I am sure, would rather see you stretched dead at their feet than hear of you away in some distant city or country living a life of sin.

II. The Perfect Son.—But now let us look at Jesus. It is His heart we want most to see. How was He affected when He beheld His mother and her grief? Here is the model for all children—the Perfect Son, the glorification of filial love.

1. His childlikeness.—Yes, Jesus was Mary's child still. Not only when He was a little boy at Nazareth, dependent on her care for the supply of His wants, did He love her; but when He became a young man, and worked at His trade and came home to His meals, He still loved her. Aye, and even now, after all His preaching and His miracles, He is still His mother's child, and remembers her. Amor descendit, non ascendit, says the proverb; that is, love descends, but does not ascend: the old love and remember the young, but the young forget. But this was not true of Jesus. Mary was faithful to Him, and followed Him with deathless love to the last; but so He remembered her, and had a look and a word for her even now.

2. His thoughtfulness.—Mary was a widow; for Joseph, her husband, seems to have been long dead, and she was poor; for Jesus, though He worked to support her, had never been able to accumulate any money. He had nothing to leave her. All He had to leave behind Him in the world was His clothing, and the soldiers got it. But He was anxious about her future support. So He left her the legacy of a new son. He asked John to be a son to her.

He fixed on the most loving of all His disciples to be her new support. What a kind arm would John's be to hang upon! He gave Mary the same loving breast to lean her grey head on as He had been wont to lean upon Himself. Peter would not have been nearly so suitable; he was too headlong and hot-tempered. Then again, John seems to have been the most wealthy, or rather well-to-do, of all the disciples, Jesus did not send Mary into a very poor home where she might be a burden.

Did I not say truly that on the cross Jesus showed him- self the Perfect Son? Look at Him, and learn how beautiful and noble a thing filial love is. Learn to love your mother tenderly, considerately, lastingly; to carry her image in your mind through life as a charm against temptation; so that she may never have to bow her head with shame on your account, or have her hair whitened by your sins, but be always proud of you, and wear your fair fame as her dearest ornament. Learn to cherish the ambition to be able, when she is old, to make her comfortable, and to smooth the pathway by which, leaning on your arm, she may descend contentedly to the grave. Would you like to be and do all this? Then become the friend of the Perfect Son, and He will make you like Himself.—JAMES STALKER, The New Song, p. 64.

THE WONDERFUL RACE

'So they ran both together; and the other disciple did outrun Peter.'—JOHN XX. 4.

LAST Sunday, exactly eighteen hundred and fifty years ago, there was a very singular and very beautiful race. I am going to speak about that wonderful race which took place eighteen hundred and fifty years ago last Sunday. The race was run by two great, good men. The name of the one was Peter, and the name of the other was John. Peter and John, or we ought to call them St. Peter and St. John. That is my text—St. Peter and St. John. They were very great friends. They were not very like each other, except that they both loved God very much. They were not very like each other. Peter was very eager and impetuous, John was very tender and loving. John was not always tender and loving, but he became very tender and loving. But though they were different they were great friends. I think that if I were to choose a friend I would not choose one exactly like myself. I would rather there was a difference; and I advise you in choosing your friends to choose a friend who will make up for what you want. That will be the best friendship, if one fits in to what the other wants; to supply what you want. That was the case with Peter and John. Peter was very unhappy because he had not done right; he had said, 'I do not know Jesus'. He was afraid, he was ashamed; he must have been unhappy. To whom would you go if you were very unhappy? You would go to somebody who was the most kind and loving person you knew. And therefore Peter went to John, because John was so loving. Therefore we find in the Acts of the Apostles that Peter liked to be with John, because John was so loving. Whom do I know very kind and loving, very good? Do I know any man or any woman, any boy or any girl, who is very kind and loving? Go to that one, go to that one!

Peter and John ran the Race.—Now I want to tell you about the race. Who do you think will win, Peter or John? I will tell you about it. That morning Mary Magdalene came very early to the grave of Jesus. She had been last at the cross and first at the tomb. What a privilege! Last at the cross and first at the tomb. And as she was going to Jesus' grave she thought in her mind, 'Oh! but there is that great stone. What shall I do about the stone?' But when she came to the grave, lo and behold! there was no stone there. It was all gone! The angels moved the stone away. I have sometimes found it so, haven't you? I have thought of something I wanted to do, but I have thought, 'Oh, it is too difficult; there is a great stone in the way'; and lo and behold, when I have gone to do my duty there was no stone. God had taken the stone away and made it all easy. If it is your duty to do it God will make it quite plain, and so He will take away the stone. When she came there was no stone, but an angel outside. And she looked in and saw that Jesus was gone. No Jesus—no Jesus! Well, what was she to do? She ran away to tell the disciples. She ran with the good news. Just what we ought to do when we have got something very pleasant; run and let others hear it, hear the good news. And she ran to Peter and John, and she said Jesus was not in the grave. There was Jesus' tomb and no Jesus in it. Then Peter and John set out on their race. They both wanted to go as fast as they could to see the wonderful thing, no Jesus in the grave! John ran the faster first; he got first to the grave. He did not go in. I wonder why he did not go in? Do you think he felt it awful? Perhaps he did. Then Peter came following; Peter went in and saw all there was there. What do you think he saw? I should like to tell you. He saw the linen clothes with which Jesus was wrapped, folded up, and the napkin neatly folded up. Who did it? The angels. I have no doubt the angels folded up the cloth so neatly and put the napkin so neat and nice. Oh! angels are neat and nice. I have no doubt in heaven all is so neat. It is sure to be. Therefore put everything away quite neat and nice in your box, or in your drawers. Is everything neat? Think of the napkin so nice and neat. When you are folding up a napkin, think of the napkin so nice and neat. The grave of Jesus teaches us neatness. That is what Peter saw. Then John followed, who had waited outside. He went in, 'he went in and believed'. We don't read Peter believed. John went in and believed, believed that Jesus was raised. Who then won the victory? Who got the race? Peter or John? Which? John, certainly, because he believed. Therefore John won the race. John got first and Peter went in, then John went in afterwards and believed. So love won the race. John was love, Love won the race.

Faith is the greatest thing we can have. A little child was asked—'What is faith?' And the little child said, 'Faith is doing what God tells us, and believing what God says to us, without asking any questions.' To believe what God says and to do what He tells us to do and ask no questions about it. To be sure it is all right, because God has said it. Faith is the right thing; that is to trust God.

I remember that once Faith and Reason took a walk. Reason is why you understand everything. One day Reason said to Faith, 'Let us take a walk together'; and Faith said, 'You cannot walk with me. I can do what you cannot.' Reason said, 'I can do all you can'. Soon they came to a river, and Reason said, 'I cannot spring over that river'; but Faith said, 'I can'. Faith took reason on his back and swam with him across the river. And then they came to a great mountain, and Reason said, 'I cannot climb that mountain'; and Faith, said, 'I can overcome mountains'. So Faith carried Reason over the mountain. Faith can do more than knowledge or reason. Trust in God to-day. 'John saw and believed.' That was the victory; John got the victory.

Now all of us are running a race. There are two places in the Bible where it particularly speaks about this—the first verse of the twelfth chapter of Hebrews, and the ninth chapter of the First Epistle of Corinthians. 'Wherefore seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us.' And we may all win. Everybody can win this race. We can all get the prize. And what is our race? We are racing for heaven.

Now what will win our race? Love, love will win the race. I will tell you how. If a person is running a race he ought to keep his eye on the person at the end—the goal. Then he will run best. Not if he looks down at his feet, or around him; but the goal. There is Jesus. I look at Jesus, I love Jesus, and that makes me run well. And so love for Jesus will win the race, just as John won the race. That is our race, and that is the way we are to win the race.

Now in every Christian church there are a great many Peters, and there are a great many Johns. There are some Peters very eager and impetuous, very impetuous; and there are some Johns, loving, tender, and kind. Which do you think you are? I know which will win the race most—the loving ones. Love will do it, love. It says here Love conquereth. The greatest of these is charity, that is, love. Love winneth the victory.

Some time ago I read of a battle where a young man fought wonderfully well. Wherever he went he conquered the enemy, he fought so bravely and nobly. And he was killed after he had won the victory. After the victory was obtained he was killed. And people wondered how it was this young soldier was so very brave, and won such a victory. When they came to look at him they found under his military suit, just close to his heart, a gold locket, and in the gold locket there was a sweet face, such a sweet face, and then they knew that it was the thought of that sweet face of somebody he loved, and whose picture he had got in that locket—it was the thought of that sweet face which had made him so brave. And if you think of the sweet face of Jesus, and love Jesus, you will be a good soldier, a good racer. You will get the victory, you will win the prize. Love is the conqueror. Oh! God gives us all love, love, love; may we love everybody, do everything for love.

Not fear love! Go through the world and love everybody.—JAMES VAUGHAN.

THE GARDENER AND HIS GARDENS

'She, supposing Him to be the gardener.'—JOHN XX. 15.

TRY to imagine what that garden was, in which was the sepulchre of Joseph of Arimathea. A spring garden; but not at all like the spring gardens which you are used to here in England; none of the flowers to which we are accustomed, no lawns such as we have here, for the grass would soon be parched up. But perhaps a palm-tree or two, throwing their heads high into the air, and making sweet music far above the earth: the tree called the datura, with its broad green leaves, and its flowers like silver trumpets; fig-trees also, with the fruit half ripe and beginning to turn a glossy brown; and above all cactuses, that strange plant which none of our English flowers at all resemble, with its clumsy, huge leaves, an inch thick, carved out as it were in green wood, covered with prickles, and sending forth lovely red flowers on a stalk three or four feet long. These were the kind of flowers which grew round the place where the Saviour of the world had lain.

The Lord's tomb was not like one of our graves dug out of the earth, but scooped sideways out of a rock, like those rocks which you see in Ashurst Wood. A great rock rising up out of the ground such as Isaiah had in his mind, when he spake of the shadow of a great rock in a weary land. To the mouth of this hollow recess the stone had been rolled which now was taken away, and there stood Mary Magdalene, wondering where the Lord's body could be taken.

And then comes the text: when she saw our Lord, she supposed him to be the gardener. Now was that a mistake or not? When Mary Magdalene, who loved our Lord Jesus Christ more than any other loved Him, excepting His own blessed mother, imagined Him to be the gardener, was she right, or was she wrong? Wrong, you will say, quite wrong. The King of kings and Lord of lords, He that was no longer the Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief, but the victorious Monarch who had conquered death and hell, how could He be a poor gardener? And I say that when we come to think, that saying of St. Mary Magdalene, if it be a mistake in one sense, may nevertheless teach us a great truth: how our dear Lord is the gardener. For notice, it does not say, she supposing Him to have been a gardener, but the gardener; and the gardener He is; and the gardens over which he watches are our souls; and the different flowers which spring up in them are the different graces which He has planted there, and from which He expects good fruit.

And you remember that in one of His parables He calls Himself by almost the same name. He calls Himself the dresser of the vineyard, who interceded for the barren fig-tree: Lord, let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it, and dung it: and if it bear fruit, well: and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down.

So that this mistake of St. Mary's was only as it were another kind of parable. Do you remember my telling you, some time ago, of the lilies which were brought to a number of children by their guardian angels, and for the well-doing of each of which each child had to answer? All that comes to the same thing. Every one of your hearts is a garden belonging to God, in which, as I said, He has planted His graces, and He now waits to see what they will bring forth. What graces? And what ought they to bring forth? Love, for example, is one grace; faith is another; hope, humility, patience, cheerfulness, truth, and so on. And what are they to bring forth? Why, if He has planted love there, He waits to see whether you will be ready to do any kind of action to those who need it; whether you are forbearing and gentle with those who are younger or weaker than yourselves, kind to anyone who is sick; above all things not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing, but contrariwise blessing. This is the kind of fruit which love ought to bear. You know that if I set a rose or a lily in an earthly garden, I can tell you what sort of flower it ought to bear when the time shall come; and so I know that when God has put into your hearts such and such graces they ought to produce such and such effects in due season. If I set a lily in a garden now, I know that by and by there will come up a flower with snow-white leaves, rising high above the ground, and with golden-coloured anthers in the middle. Again, if I set a rose in an earthly garden, I know that by and by that beautiful flower will come up with leaves within leaves of its own lovely colour, and its own delightful smell. So if God gave each of you, as He certainly did, the grace of faith at your baptism, I know also what that ought to bring forth. I know that whenever you are in any kind of trouble or sorrow or vexation, you ought still to believe that it is only a proof of God's love: that you are bound to put all your trust in Him nevertheless; that you are to be sure that He would no more send you this sorrow, unless it were necessary for you, than an earthly parent would give you bitter medicine unless you required it.

Now then the question is, whether our Lord, the true Gardener, does see the graces springing up in you which He expects, and which He has a right to expect. You remember what He says to His vineyard in Isaiah: which He had fenced, which He had planted with the choicest vine, out of which He had gathered the stones: in which He had made a wine-press, and a tower to defend it from enemies; and when it should have brought forth grapes it brought forth wild grapes, which are a deadly poison. You remember how He says that He will break down the fences, and remove the wine-press, and lay it waste; and also, saddest thing of all, that He will command the clouds to rain no rain upon it, that is, that He will send it no more grace. And so if those gardens of your souls bring forth no flowers and no fruit for Him, depend upon it He will take away the privileges you have now.

This is a happy time, this Easter-tide: but to whom? To those only who are trying to rise as their Lord rose—to set their best love, and their best desires, not on the things of this world, but on the things of that blessed place where He now is. It is but little as yet that you can understand of this, very little indeed; but what you do understand that you must try to do. Every child must try as much as every grown person to look upon heaven as their own home, as their own dear home, and every situation here, every place where they live, only as a wayside inn where they rest for a little while, and then go on to their Father's mansions. We call it keeping Easter now; but any earthly Easter is a sad, dark Easter after all: and there is but one true and real Easter, and that is any eternal one in the kingdom of heaven.—J. M. NEALE, Sermons for Children, p. 99.

LOVEST THOU ME?

'Lovest thou Me.'—JOHN XXI. 16.

I WANT you to answer the question—Do you love Jesus? He says it: 'Lovest thou Me?'

Do you remember about the little girl in the railway carriage, who travelled with a young man who did not know Jesus? They talked together for a long time, and then the little girl looked up into the young man's face and said to him, 'Do you love Jesus?' And this made him begin to think whether he did love Jesus. And that was the way he was brought to know Him. He prayed to God that he might love Him, because the little girl said to him, 'Does 'oo love Jesus?'

I. Now that Jesus asks you, 'Lovest thou Me?' what shall you say? I will try to help you. It is a very difficult question. How shall we know whether we love Jesus? Do you think, now—if there is anybody you very much love, don't you like to be alone and talk secrets? Don't you think, 'I should like to sit up all night and talk secrets?' Or if you sleep together, don't you lie awake in the night and talk secrets?

There was a poor man, and he lived in a very poor house, and he could not find a place where he could pray in; and he used to go to the church when it was empty, when there was no congregation, and nobody saw him there excepting the clergyman, and he saw how long he prayed; he was such a long time on his knees in prayer; and the clergyman said to him one day, 'John, how is it you say such long prayers? You seem to have a great deal to say to God. He replied, 'No, sir, I have not a great deal to say, but I like to stay a long time on my knees, for I look then at Jesus, and Jesus looks at me; and so there comes from Jesus to me a little thought, and then a little thought goes from me to Jesus; and so we talk together. Jesus looks at me and I look at Jesus.' He loved Jesus, I am sure. He would not care to go to an empty church, and be a long time on his knees and tell Jesus secrets if he did not love Him. That was one of the signs of his love.

Shall I give you another sign by which you can tell if you love Jesus? Will you remember them? The first is, liking to be alone with Jesus and talking secrets. Now the second thing is, if you have got anybody you love, you like to give them something—make presents. What can we give to Jesus? He has everything. What present shall I make my dear friend, my best friend? Can you think?

There was a poor Red Indian in North America and he listened to a missionary, and the words touched his heart. He talked to him about loving Jesus. And the Indian thought much about it, and one day he came to the missionary and he said, 'I want to give Jesus something. Here is my belt—I am very fond of my belt; it is a beautiful belt. I will give Jesus my belt.' The missionary said, 'That won't do'. The Red Indian went away sorrowful. A little time after he came back, and he brought his rifle, and the skins of animals he had shot, and he said to the missionary, 'I give these to Jesus. Won't they do?' 'No,' he replied, 'they won't do.' The man was disappointed and went away again. The third time he came he brought his wigwam—a sort of hut; and he brought also his wife and his children, and he said to the missionary, 'I give my wigwam, and my wife, and my children'. And he replied, 'These won't do'. Then he went away again; but presently he came again, and he brought nothing, and he said, 'Will Jesus take poor Indian man?' The missionary said, 'That will do. That is the right gift. Give Him yourself; give Him your heart!'

11. That is the second way we can tell whether we love Jesus; Do we give Him our heart?

Now I'll mention another thing. If you love anybody you would not mind bearing something for them, some pain, for their sakes; you would rather like it, because it would show that you loved them.

I could tell you a sad story of a little boy, and I believe it's true. I knew his name, but I forgot it, and I could not pronounce it if I remembered it. There were two brothers, one was grown up, the other was a little fellow. There was a terrible persecution when the Christian religion was first brought into Japan, when the missionaries came. The Japanese were very cruel to everybody who said they would not worship their gods; and this elder brother said he would not worship idols any more, but the true God, even Jesus. They treated him cruelly; they cut off his fingers, and they told him they should kill him if he worshipped Jesus. When his little brother saw his poor hand bleeding and the fingers cut off half-way, he said to his brother, 'What a beautiful hand! wounded for Jesus! Would that I could have my hand wounded for Jesus! Perhaps my turn will come!'

And his turn did come! When they heard him talk in that way, finding he was a Christian, they cut his fingers in half. There was a loving boy! he loved Jesus so much that he called the wounded, bleeding hand 'a beautiful hand!'

I will tell you one more way by which you can tell whether you love Jesus. Will you try and remember them all? If there is anybody you love going away, and you know they are coming back again, won't you watch at the windows when you see them coming down the road, and be glad to say, 'Oh! he is coming?' You would love his return.

I have heard of a little boy the window of whose bedroom looked to the East. Do you know what is going to happen in the East? I believe Jesus is coming that way. There is Jerusalem out there, and Jesus will come again to Jerusalem. This little boy knew that, and every morning when he woke he opened his window and looked out to see if Jesus was coming. Was not that very nice? He thought, 'I hope He will come to-day!' and so he daily looked out to see if He was coming.

There are only four ways by which we can tell if we love Jesus. Will you think of them? Be alone, that you may talk secrets; tell Him your secrets, and He will tell you secrets. Give Him something, the thing that you believe He would like best. If you went into a shop to buy a present, you would choose the thing that you thought your friend would like best. What would Jesus like best? Your heart. Bear something for Him; do not mind being called names; what if people say you are a saint, or a Methodist, or anything else? If they tease you and laugh at you, and are very unkind to you, it is a sign of love to endure it. And to long for His coming again. Think, 'Jesus may come to-day; oh! what a happy day it would then be. I shall be with Him for ever—oh, happy day!' Those are the four signs of love.

Did you ever hear of the battle of Prestonpans? In Scotland, many years ago, there was a great Scottish chief, MacGregor, who commanded a regiment. He was much loved by his soldiers. In the battle MacGregor, the colonel, was cut down. He was bleeding and dying. I believe he died there. When the soldiers saw him fall they did not continue to fight well. So MacGregor, though so wounded that he could not stand up, when he saw what was happening, and that the men were likely to run away, lifted himself up on his elbow, blood streaming from his chest, and he said 'My children, I am dying for you. But, though wounded, I am not yet dead. I can see you!' And he looked over them all, and there was such power, such feeling in MacGregor's eye that they felt brave again at once. The eye of MacGregor looking at them made them fight bravely again.

Think of the eye of Jesus! That is everything to us. It seems too wonderful—but Jesus, at this moment while I am speaking, is here! He is looking at you! See that loving Eye, how tenderly it looks! I think I hear Him saying, 'Lovest thou Me!'—

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES

THE FORTY DAYS THAT OUR LORD LIVED UPON THIS EARTH AFTER HE ROSE FROM THE GRAVE.

ACTS 1. 3.

We are going to think about 'The Forty Days'. They are such important days that they are generally called 'The Forty Days'. Perhaps they are the most important 'forty days' that ever were spent. 'Forty days'—between the time when Jesus Christ rose from the grave and the day when Jesus Christ went up into heaven. For when Jesus Christ began, He began with 'forty days' in the wilderness; and when He ended, He ended with 'forty days' with His Church, before He went up to heaven.

But how do we know there were 'forty days'? Can you tell me? Look at the third verse of the first chapter of the Acts of the Apostles: will you read it? 'He showed Himself alive after His passion by many infallible proofs, being seen of them forty days, and speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God.'

'Forty days.' Now look. From the feast of the Passover to the feast of the Pentecost was—how many days? 'Fifty.' The word 'Pentecost' means 'fifty'. And it was called 'Pentecost,' because it was fifty days after the Passover. Now next Thursday is Holy Thursday; the day that Jesus Christ went up into heaven; and Sunday week will be Pentecost, Whit Sunday, when the Holy Ghost came.

Now, how many days is it from Thursday to Sunday week? 'Ten.' Take away ten from fifty, and how many remain? 'Forty.' Then there are 'forty days' that Jesus Christ was upon the earth after He rose from the grave, before He went up to heaven, which was next Thursday.

Now we are going to talk about these 'forty days'. 'Forty days' between what? Between the time that Jesus Christ rose from the grave and the time that Jesus Christ went up to heaven. I wonder why. Why did not Jesus go up straight from the grave to heaven? He had said upon the cross, 'It is all done; it is finished!' Why did He come back to this poor world? Can you think? May we ask why? May we ask why God does anything? Yes, we may; but we must remember that we cannot tell half the reasons, when we ask why God does anything? We may find out one or two reasons, but there are a great many reasons that we do not know; and very likely the reasons we do not know are very much better than the reasons we do know.

Now will you try to think with me? I am going to think of six reasons why Jesus Christ came back to this world again before He went up to heaven. You must think too.

I. The first reason I think of is, to show that He loved us; to show that He loved this bad world still, and that He was not in such a hurry to leave it. He loved us, and so He came back to us. That is the first reason.

II. The next reason I think of is because He wanted to prove, and show for certain that He had risen from the grave; for supposing Jesus Christ did not rise from the grave, then what Jesus Christ said did not come true, because He said He would rise; and if Jesus Christ did not rise from the grave, then we shall not rise from the grave; but when we are put into the grave, there we shall stay for ever. That would be a sad thing! Therefore, it was very important that Jesus Christ should prove that He rose from the grave. So He came back to this world to prove that He rose from the grave. He did not show Himself to everybody. He showed Himself to witnesses appointed for that purpose, that they might witness who had seen Him; that they might be able to go and tell everybody they had seen Him, and that He was risen. That is my second reason.

III. The third reason is because He wished to show not only that He was risen, but that He was the very same Jesus that was on the cross, and put into the grave. He showed that He had got a body. How did He show that He had got a body? Twice He ate, just as we do, because we have bodies. If we had not bodies, we should not eat and drink. Do you remember when? Once in the room when the ten disciples were together, He took some broiled fish and a honeycomb, and He ate with the ten in the room. And once by the side of the lake. He showed He had got a body. It was not quite the same body that He had before. I mean it was a spiritual body. I cannot explain that. It is too deep. It was a spiritual body. We shall see a little more about that presently.

Not only did He show them that He had got a body, but that it was the same body, because when He chose He could make people see that it was the same body. They saw it was Jesus; they knew Him. Besides that He showed the wounds. How many wounds had He? 'Five.' Two in His feet; two in His hands; one in His side. He showed His wounds to Thomas. So that it was certainly the same body.

And was it the same heart? Did He love them just as much? Did He do just the same sort of things? Did He come and talk to the unhappy, and comfort them? Did He teach them, and say

He was still their Brother? Yes; He had the same body and the same heart. That is the third reason.

IV. Now we will look at the fourth reason. Because He wanted to talk to them about the things that concern the kingdom of God. What does that mean? Do you know what the 'kingdom of God' means in the Bible? Sometimes it means heaven; sometimes it does not mean heaven. Sometimes it means your heart. If Jesus is the King of your heart, if His throne is your heart, then your heart is 'the kingdom of God'. And sometimes 'the kingdom of God' means the Church, all about the Church, the Church on earth, that is 'the kingdom of God'. It is one province of the great 'kingdom of God'. Now He wanted to talk to them about that, about the Church. He told them about people being baptised, and about the minister's preaching; and that they were to go into all the world, and tell people to become Christians, how they were to keep the commandments, about the Holy Ghost, and about the Bible. That was the fourth reason. He came to tell them about the things that concern 'the kingdom of God,' i.e. the Church.

V. Now what was the fifth reason? To show us how He would be with us always. Is Jesus with us always? 'Yes.' Do we always know He is with us? 'No.' In some places He is with us, and we do not know it. So it was when Jesus appeared on those 'forty days'. Sometimes He was with people, and they did not know it was Jesus. So He is sometimes close to you, and you do not know it, till your heart tells you, till the Holy Spirit tells you, till Jesus tells you. It was so then; it is so now. Jesus is always with you, though you do not know it. Therefore it was to show, I think, how He will be with us always in the same way.

VI. And one more reason—this is very difficult. I am not sure about it myself. When you and I rise out of the grave, do you think we shall go straight up into heaven? I do not. I think that when Jesus comes again, then we shall rise out of our graves; and then we shall be, I think, a little while with Jesus upon this earth; and then we shall go to heaven, just as Jesus did. He rose from the grave, and stayed upon the earth awhile. Then He went up to heaven. I think it is to tell us we are to do the same, if we are God's children. When Jesus comes we shall rise out of our graves; we shall be with Jesus on this earth some time—I do not know how long—perhaps a thousand years, and then go to heaven.

Those are my six reasons. Can you remember them? Let us see. Try to think of them. Because He loved us, to prove that He was risen, to show that He was the same Jesus still, to talk about the things of the kingdom of God, to show us the way in which He is always with us, and to lead us to think that we shall, like Him, walk this earth when we rise from the grave.

Now we shall think about Jesus showing Himself in 'the forty days'. Does everybody know it? Can you go on with me about Jesus showing Himself when He rose from the grave? I shall name the occasions at first very quickly, and then come back to them.

The first time Jesus appeared was to Mary Magdalene. The next I am not quite sure about—what do you say? To 'some women'; 'three women,' I think, but that I am not sure of; it is not quite certain. The next to Peter, I think, but I am not quite sure. In the twenty-fourth of Luke it is said, 'The Lord is risen indeed, and hath appeared to Simon,' therefore I think so. It is simply said He showed Himself to Peter. Then He showed Himself to two men—where were they going? 'To Emmaus.' Then He showed Himself to the ten disciples in the room.

These were the appearances the first Sunday, Easter Sunday. Do you know why it is called Easter Sunday? 'Eostre,' a heathen goddess, had her festival at this season. And some think 'Easter' was on that account so named.

When Jesus rose, He appeared first to Mary Magdalene; then to three women, then to Peter (I think), then to the two going to Emmaus, then to the ten disciples—without Thomas—in the room. All that was in Jerusalem.

Did He appear again all that next week? Not till the next Sunday. Then, to how many? 'Eleven.' Who was, then, there with them? 'Thomas.' Then, back from Jerusalem, where did He go? 'To Galilee'—as He told them. And where did He appear again? 'On the mountain' that He appointed them. I am not quite sure, but I think that then He showed Himself to 'the five hundred' all at once. And then He went to the lake, and there you will remember He wrought a miracle. He made Peter catch a wonderful draught of fishes, as He had done once before. Then they came to the shore, and He appeared to the disciples, and took a meal with them; and talked with Peter; and talked about John. That was in Galilee. Then He came back to Jerusalem, and He saw them, I think, at Jerusalem, and talked with them some of those beautiful words that we have; and then He took them out to—where? 'Bethany'—to the Mount of Olives; and there, after talking with them a little, and blessing them, He was taken up to heaven.

Those are the appearances of Jesus in 'the forty days'. Can you remember them? Shall we go through them again? I will speak only of those we are certain of. Mary Magdalene, the two going to Emmaus, the ten in the room without Thomas, then the next Sunday the eleven with Thomas, then in Galilee on the lake, at the miracle of the fishes, to Peter and the others, on the bank, and the conversation; and then at Bethany, when He went up to heaven. We are certain also, but we do not know when, He showed Himself to 'five hundred brethren,' to Peter, to James, but we are not quite sure where.

Jesus said to Simon Peter, 'Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou Me?' Peter said, 'Yea, Lord; I am Thy friend.' 'I am Thy friend,' he said. Then Jesus said again, 'Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou Me?' Peter said, 'I am Thy friend'. Then Jesus said again, not 'Lovest thou Me?' but He said, 'Are you My friend?' And Peter said, 'Thou knowest all things, Thou knowest I am Thy friend'. Jesus said, 'Do you love Me?' Peter said, 'I am Thy friend'. He said it three times. When Jesus comes again that will be the question.

Will Jesus come again? He certainly will come again. Did the two angels say so? Two angels, looking like men, were there on the Mount, when the disciples were looking up. They said, 'Don't waste your time gazing up into heaven, in vision, or in idle thoughts about it, He will come again.' But how? 'The same way you have seen Him go.' In His body? 'Yes.' Blessing? 'Yes.' The last thing and the first thing to bless? 'Yes.' What will He say: 'Come, ye blessed of My Father'. The last word on His lips blessing; the first word on His lips when He comes again blessing. Such a dear, loving Jesus is He! 'Come, ye blessed of My Father!'

And who will walk with Him then? Shall I tell you? Those who have 'kept their garments white'. Have we, any of us, kept our garments white? Have you? No. But it means those who, having soiled their garments, have had them washed. If your garment is soiled, it can be washed. Washed? In what? In the blood of Jesus Christ. Those who 'keep their garments white'; those who have their soiled garments washed in the fountain of the blood of Jesus Christ; they shall 'follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth'.—JAMES VAUGHAN.

CHRIST IN THE SPIRIT-WORLD

(For Passiontide)

ACTS I. 3.

CAN you tell me why we call this 'Passion Week'? Can you tell me the meaning of the word 'passion'? 'Sufferings'. Can you tell me where Christ's 'sufferings' are called 'passion'? In the first chapter of the Acts, and the third verse: 'He showed Himself alive after His passion,' i.e. 'sufferings'.

When a person is very angry we say 'he is in a passion'; or we speak of persons having 'naughty passions'. How is that? Is it 'suffering'? When a person is angry, is he 'suffering'? When a little boy is very angry, do we say, 'Poor little boy! he is in a suffering'? That is quite true: we won't say 'he is in a passion,' but 'he is suffering'.

A great many words have changed their meaning. This has done so. Can you think of any other word that has changed its meaning? We have prayed just now in the Litany, 'O Lord, deal not with us after our sins?' Do we mean that God would have nothing to do with us when we have sinned? 'No.' What does 'after our sins' mean? 'According to our sins.'

What does it mean in the collect when we say, 'Prevent us, O Lord, in all our doings'. Is God to 'hinder' us? What does 'prevent' mean? 'Go before.' The word has changed its meaning.

So the word 'passion' has changed its meaning. 'Passion' means 'suffering'. We begin to-day the 'Passion Week'. We begin it with joy, because it is Palm Sunday. This is the day when Jesus went into Jerusalem, and all the children cried, 'Hosanna!' It is a happy Sunday. And next Sunday will be also a very happy Sunday, because that will be Easter Sunday, the day when Jesus rose from the grave.

'Passion Week' begins with joy and ends with joy. You will always find your sorrows inside your joys, you see if you do not. 'Palm Sunday'; 'Easter Sunday'. 'Passion Week' comes between: the sorrows inside the joys!

Now we are going this afternoon to talk about next Friday. You have already considered about Jesus being crucified, and about Jesus suffering, dying; and now we are going to consider this afternoon what happened after three o'clock next Friday? Why do I say 'after three o'clock'? Because Christ died at three o'clock.

And what is dying? What happened? Shall I tell you? His body was separated from His soul. Do you understand? That was dying, His body was separated from His soul. Death means separating. You have got a body, and you have got a soul; and now they are joined together, wonderfully joined together! I cannot explain how. But some day your body and soul will separate. That will be dying.

Will you separate from God when you die? No; not if you are a good child. You won't separate from God. Will you separate from those you love on earth—from your father and mother, your brothers and sisters—when you die? I do not know. I am not at all sure that you would. Perhaps you would. They would separate from you; but I am not at all sure that you would separate from them. But you would separate your body from your soul, though you won't separate from God; and I am not sure that you will be separated from anybody.

To die, then, is to separate body and soul. That happened to Jesus at three o'clock, as on next Friday. And I want to think about it.

I am going now to speak—after Jesus died—of what became of His body, and what became of His soul.

What became of His body? It was 'buried'. What became of His soul? It says in the Creed, 'He descended into hell'. And that is what I am going to talk about, that His body was 'buried,' and His soul descended into hell'.

His body was 'buried'. Do you know what we have just been calling Christ's burying in the Litany? 'Thy precious death and burial.' Quite right. That is just what I want you to say. 'Precious!' We call it 'precious'. 'His precious death and burial.' Let us think about the 'precious burial'.

There was a man of the name of Joseph. Where did he live? 'In Arimathea.' Can you tell me who was born in Arimathea, besides Joseph? It was the same person that God called when a little boy, who said, 'Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth'. 'Samuel.' It is called, 'Ramathaim-zophim'. This man, Joseph, was of Arimathea.

Was he a good man? 'Yes.' Was he a little bit of a coward? Yes, he was; for, though he was a follower of Christ, he did it 'secretly, for fear of the Jews'.

And Joseph was not the only man interested. Who was the other man? Everybody think. Who was there besides Joseph? 'Nicodemus.' Did Nicodemus go to Pilate? 'No.' Nicodemus came to Calvary; we do not read that He came to Pilate. What sort of man was Nicodemus? Had he, too, been a little bit of a coward? 'Yes.' Where do we read of Nicodemus? In which of the Gospels? In St. Matthew, St. Mark, St. Luke, or St. John? 'St. John.' In how many places in St. John do we read of Nicodemus? Three. In the third chapter, the seventh, and the nineteenth. The first time he was a bit of a coward, though a good man. The second time he got bolder, because he said, 'Doth our law judge any man, before it hear him, and know what he doeth?' The third time he became very bold. What makes people bold? What gives people a good boldness?

If you were to go and take the eggs away from a little bird in its nest, what would make that little bird fight you? Love. Love makes people bold. If you are cowards in your religion, if you are ashamed of your religion, it is because you have not love!

Nicodemus did not mind what the Jews would say. So Joseph went to Pilate, and Nicodemus to Calvary, and together 'they took the body of Jesus'.

Where did they take it to? Far—a long way? No, quite close. Which side of Jerusalem was Calvary? That side, the West. And there was the hill Golgotha on the top of it. Quite close to it was a garden, and the garden belonged, perhaps, to Joseph, certainly the tomb in it belonged to Joseph. There they took Him. It was the funeral.

Well, they put Him in the tomb sideways. It was the first time anybody had been put into that tomb. It was 'a new tomb'. Why were we told so particularly that it was a new tomb? Why was it so important? Was it an honour to the owner? That was one reason, but not the chief reason. Can you think of any other? Did you ever read of anybody being buried, being put into a grave, and he touched some bones, and when he touched the bones he came to life again? Look at 2 Kings xiii. 21: 'And it came to pass, as they were burying a man, that, behold, they spied a band of men; and they cast the man into the sepulchre of Elisha: and when the man was let down, and touched the bones of Elisha, he revived, and stood up on his feet'. Whose grave was it? 'Elisha's.' When the man's body touched Elisha's bones, what happened? 'He came to life.'

Supposing anybody had been buried in Joseph's tomb before, then they would have said, 'Jesus Christ came to life—just as the man did who was put into Elisha's tomb. Touching the bones made Him come to life.' Then they would have got rid of the miracle of the resurrection of Christ. Or perhaps they would have said, 'It was not Christ who came out of the tomb. It was somebody else.' But as it was 'a new tomb,' as nobody had been buried there before, of course there were no bones there; therefore Christ could not have been raised by touching the bones.

In Persia, I don't know whether it is so now, but it used to be the custom for people to put on black when anybody was born, and white when anybody died. They thought it was sad for anybody to be born, to come into this world of trouble; but when they died they put on white, for they thought 'how joyful it was for them to be buried!'

Is a funeral an unhappy thing? Do you really think it is? I have heard of a little child saying, 'Oh! I don't mind dying; but I don't like to be put down in the pit hole'. Do you think that?

I will tell you how it is. Did you ever sow a seed? Does the seed mind being sown? Will the seed come up again? Yes. Which will be the prettier, the seed, or what comes up from the grave? The latter, won't it?

The seed is not very pretty, is it? but the thing which comes up from the seed is a beautiful thing! Perhaps you are not very pretty now. You are not quite pretty. The prettiest person in this church is not quite pretty, because you have sinned. You are all seeds, all going to be put into the ground, and all, if God's children, will come up beautiful, beautiful!

People used always in baptism to be put into the water, put in and come up again. We do not do it so now in this country, because it is not necessary to do that; and besides it might hurt people's health. Therefore we don't immerse them, but we sprinkle them. But it comes to the same thing. We should think of the immersion. I have no doubt, if this were not a cold country, immersion is the right thing. Because if I put a little baby into the water, it is 'buried': if I lift it up again, there is the resurrection. To be 'baptised,' is to bury the old nature, and come up with the new nature; leaving the first Adam, the wicked part, buried, and coming up a good child of God. So if you are all God's dear children, and living as such, you have been 'buried in baptism'.

Now I shall not say anything more about the baptism, but about 'the descent into hell,' which is very difficult.

Christ 'went down into hell,' which? His body or His spirit, i.e. His soul? You have just said His body was put into the grave; you have seen what sort of a grave it was. Now did His spirit 'go down to hell'?

I must just explain this. Let us see if it did 'go down to hell'. Turn to the sixteenth Psalm, the second of Acts, and the fourth of Ephesians. In Psalm xvi. 10, it says, 'Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt Thou suffer Thine Holy One to see corruption'. The same thing is said in Acts ii. 27, repeated by St. Peter. Now look at Ephesians iv. 9. It is not quite the same thing, but it means the same: 'Now that He ascended, what is it but that He also descended first into the lower parts of the earth?'

Now what does it mean when it says, in the Bible and in the Creed, that 'Christ descended into hell'?

Do you think it means this: that when Christ was upon the cross, He suffered such terrible pains that it was like going down to hell; so that we say that 'He went down to hell'. Do you think it means that? No; it does not mean that, because it is something after that.

Does it mean, do you think, that His body was buried in the grave? does it mean only that? No, it does not mean that, because it is spoken of as something separate from that.

Does it mean that Christ 'went into hell,' and suffered the torments of hell? 'No.' How do you know that it does not mean that? Because it was only His spirit. His sufferings were done.

It does not mean what He suffered on the cross; it does not mean He was put into the grave; it does not mean that as the wicked, He went and suffered the torments of hell.

It means 'He went into the place of departed spirits'. What is the right word? Do you all know? Let me tell you. 'Hell' is another of the words which has changed its meaning. We saw that the word 'passion' had changed its meaning; and we saw also that the word 'after' and the word 'prevent,' had both changed their meanings. And one word that has changed its meaning a great deal is 'hell'.

Let me tell you a little about it. Will you listen? The old word is 'Hades'. Do you know how it is spelt? 'H—A—D—E—S.' Now what is 'Hades'? Is it for the happy or unhappy? For the good or the bad? For both. 'Hades' is made up of two places. There are two parts. One is happy; the other, unhappy.

What is the happy part called? 'Paradise.' Do you know what the word 'paradise' means? It means 'a park,' or 'pleasure grounds,' 'beautiful grounds,' a little different from 'a garden'. 'Paradise' is the Greek word for 'park'. Therefore we call the garden of Eden 'paradise,' a beautiful park!

What is the unhappy part called? It is called by different names. I will tell you one—'Tartarus'. That is one name for the unhappy part.

Then 'Paradise' and 'Tartarus,' the happy place and the unhappy place put together, make 'Hades'. Jesus went to 'Hades,' a place made up of the happy place and the unhappy place.

Did Christ go to paradise? Did He ever say He was going to paradise? Yes. Didn't He say to the thief on the cross: 'This day shalt thou be with me in paradise?' Therefore we are quite sure Jesus went to paradise.

I think that during those three days Christ did go and 'preach to the spirits in prison'. And the reason why He preached particularly to those who lived at the time of the flood might have been this: they had no Bible; they did not know what we know, therefore their spiritual ignorance. We do not know what the result was. That we must leave.

Then may we think, 'If I am lost, and go and become one of "the spirits in prison," perhaps Christ will come and save me out of that prison?' No. Because we are totally differently situated. That was just the time of Jesus dying and rising: great things happened then that never happened before, and will never happen again.

Besides, we are not in the same place, or in the same state, as those at the time of the flood. Therefore there is not the least reason for thinking that would happen again, or happen to us. Certainly not.

Now that is what I think it means when it says, 'He descended into hell'. 'He went to Hades, i.e. 'hell'—made up of two parts—Paradise and Tartarus. He certainly went to Paradise; perhaps He went to Tartarus. But whether he went to Tartarus or not, He went to 'hell'. If He went to the happy place, He went to hell, because Paradise was a part of Hades, which is 'hell'.

You will find our old English poets—especially Spenser—use the word 'hell' in that meaning.

You see what will become of you. I do not know how soon that body of yours will separate from your soul. But that separation we call 'death'. And then your body will be laid—like a little seed—in the ground. It will be something like going to sleep in the ground, for your body won't know anything that happens: it will be conscious neither of pain nor pleasure. And you will 'sleep' till Jesus comes again. And when He comes again, you know wherever Jesus is there is no death. Everything is life. Everything will start into life when Jesus comes again. When He was upon earth, dead bodies started into life when Jesus came near them. And then all in the sea and in the earth will come up to life!

Where will your spirit go? To paradise, if you are God's child, to that beautiful, happy place! There your spirit will be with God, quite happy. You will have no body—but you will be all spirit—till Christ comes.

But when He comes the body out of the grave will meet the spirit in paradise, and then you will be complete. Your body will be complete, and your spirit will be complete, perfectly holy, perfectly happy. The body will be without weakness, sickness, sorrow, or sin. The body will be as wings to the spirit, not to drag it down as it does now.

And joined together that beautiful body and that beautiful spirit will go into heaven, the place where we are to be happy for ever and ever!—JAMES VAUGHAN.

THE WHITE SUNDAY

ACTS II.

HAVE you ever heard why this Sunday is called 'Whit-Sunday'? There are a great many reasons given. I will tell you two; you shall tell me which you like best. Two reasons for the name of 'Whit-Sunday'.

One is this: On Whit-Sunday people used to come very much to be baptised, the grown-up people and the little babies—a great many people; and they all came dressed in white. Why were they dressed in white? Why do people dress in white? Why do people when they are married dress in white? Why do people when they come to be baptised dress in white? Is it because they want to feel that they are going to be made clean and pure? And because so many came all in white, did it therefore come to be called 'White-Sunday,' or, shortened, 'Whit-Sunday'. That is one reason. I will tell you of another.

If you count Easter Sunday one, and then count on to this Sunday, you will find that this is the eighth. Now the French word for 'eight' is 'huit'. You know a great many French words came into English. When William the Conqueror came to England, and when persons who were persecuted at the time of the Edict of Nantes came over here, a great many French words were brought in. People did not know how to spell some of them, so they spelt this word 'huit' as if it were 'white'. Which do you like best? The 'White-Sunday,' or the French 'eight' or 'huit'?

What happened on Whit-Sunday? The Holy Ghost came down. When the disciples were all assembled, 'There appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them'. Of course it would only be fitting this afternoon that we should speak about the Holy Ghost. And one of His names is—can you tell me? Tell me one of His names. Think! His sweetest name! Supposing you were to be greatly troubled, who is the person to whom you would go, above all others in the world, to comfort you? I think I know. Your mother! Would you not go to your mother to comfort you? God says that the Holy Spirit will comfort you just like a mother. You will find it in the sixty-sixth chapter of Isaiah: 'As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you'. The Holy Ghost comforts us like a mother. There could not be anything sweeter.

What does 'Holy Ghost' mean? Holy Spirit. Sometimes, when we cannot look at the sun, we look at a sunbeam; or we look at the reflection of the sun in a looking-glass. We cannot see the sun in his full lustre.

I. Now I want to speak about the Holy Ghost by an emblem. What does an emblem mean? Who can tell me? 'Emblem' means 'a likeness,' something like the thing we are thinking of. We will think of the Holy Ghost by some things that the Holy Ghost is like. What is God the Holy Ghost like? He is like—what? What is that you can feel, but you cannot see. Tell me something you can feel and not see. You felt it to-day, but you did not see it. What is it? You felt it very strong to-day; as you came to church you felt it. The wind. You feel it, but you cannot see it. You can feel the Holy Ghost, but you cannot see Him. Therefore we will speak about that.

Do you remember any verse in the Bible where it speaks about 'the wind'? Do you remember Christ speaking to Nicodemus? What did He say to him we must all be? 'We must all be born again.' 'The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth; so is every one that is born of the Spirit.' The Holy Spirit is like the wind. Let us think about that.

Do you know, have you thought about it, nobody can go to heaven unless they are 'born again'. Now that is a very solemn thing. Nobody can go to heaven unless they are born again!

A man was once asked, 'Where were you born?' He said, 'I was born in London, and I was born in Salisbury.' 'What! born in two places?' he was asked. 'Yes; I was born in London,' he replied, 'and I was born in Salisbury.' 'What do you mean?' He answered, 'My body was born in London, and my soul was born in Salisbury.' 'We must be born again.'

I have read about a great palm-tree in the hot countries, which is called the Palm Azaleum, and when the palm-blossom comes out of the shield, the flower breaks the shield and makes such a noise, it is as loud as a cannon being fired off! Everybody can know when that flower comes out.

I have never seen any conversions anything like that; all I have ever seen have been so very quiet. And I think it is so with almost everybody. It is as quiet as when the little grain comes out of the grass, or when the flower comes out in the bud; you can hardly tell when it happens. Some few can tell when they are 'born again,' but most cannot. I do not know whether you are—I cannot tell whether you are 'born again'. But has a change taken place in you? Can you say, 'I now like things I did not like; and other things I used to like, I do not now like—I like the things of God, I like to say my prayers, I like to think of Jesus coming again'? If you have any feelings like that you are 'born again'; if you have not, you are not. We 'must be born again,' before we can go to heaven.

The Holy Ghost does as He pleases, when He pleases. One day there was a carter driving his cart along a road; he was a very wicked man, and when he was driving there was a very high wind, and suddenly the high wind blew a tract to his feet. Where that tract came from he never knew till he died; but the high wind blew it to his very feet. He took up the tract and read it, and a word there changed the man, made him a good man, a Christian. The Holy Ghost, like the wind, turned his heart; by the Holy Ghost he became a good man. So 'the wind,' the Holy Ghost, works. You cannot see when the wind comes, but so it is.

II. Now let us think of another thing the Holy Ghost is like. When He came down upon the Lord Jesus Christ, when He was baptised, how did He appear? As a dove. And people generally consider a dove to be very gentle. A dove is not always gentle; but a dove is considered an emblem or likeness of something very gentle. When the Holy Ghost comes, He comes very gently, and He makes us gentle.

I knew two little girls who were going out of a church, and one little girl pushed by the other little girl, and she made way for her to pass, and as she passed, she said, 'Blessed are the peacemakers'. That was gentle, like a dove.

There was a boy throwing stones at some poor little birds. It is very cruel to throw stones at birds. As he was going to throw a stone at a sweet little bird, the little bird sang so sweetly that the boy held his hand up but could not throw at the bird. Another boy passing, said, 'Why don't you throw? You will hit it.' 'I cannot,' he said; 'the little bird is singing so sweetly, I cannot hit it.' If you know anybody who is unkind to you, you sing like the little bird, and then see if anybody will hurt you.

III. The Holy Spirit is like dew. It says so twice in the prophecy of Hosea. 'Dew' is to be seen in the morning and evening. It is very pretty and makes everything so fresh where it comes. Now I have got a piece of advice to give you. If you wish to be good and please God, take care that every morning and every evening you get a little of 'the dew,' the dew of the Holy Spirit upon you. Pray for 'the dew'; it will make everything fresh and nice. If things are bad, pray for the Holy Spirit to come down as dew in the morning. You are now in the morning of life. Now is the time to have dew. May 'the dew of thy birth be of the womb of the morning!' Get the Holy Spirit to come and make you soft, and holy, and happy, and loving.

Then I hope the dew (the Holy Spirit) will always abide in and upon you, not like the natural dew, that soon passes away.

IV. There are two more things I should like to think of. The Holy Spirit is like fire. Let us see that. Supposing I were to give you a piece of iron, and say to you, 'I want you to make a pretty thing, an image out of that iron, what would you do with it? If you got a hammer and chisel and worked ever so hard at it, it would not make it into an image. What, then, would you do? Put it into the fire, then it would get soft; then you could make it into almost any shape you like. So it is with your hearts; they are like iron. You have tried to make them good; beat them into a pretty shape; but you cannot do so; but put them into 'the fire,' the Holy Spirit will make them soft. He will make them into right shapes. So St. Paul says in the twelfth of Romans, 'If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink: for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head'. Fire softens.

So you have got thoughts, and wisdom, and knowledge. But what good will they all do, if a little bit of fire does not come? There must be a spark of fire, the Holy Spirit.

One more thing I would say the Holy Ghost is like. He is like a seal. Do you remember anyone to whom it was said in the Bible? It was said to a young man Timothy. Speaking to him of those who had the seal, St. Paul said, 'The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal. The Lord knoweth them that are His. And, Let every one that nameth the name of Christ depart from iniquity.'

V. The Holy Spirit is a seal. Now look here: supposing a person had got some very precious jewels, and suppose he was going abroad, and he was not going to take his jewels with him, and he wanted to be quite sure that his jewels would be safe when he came back again—what would he do? He would lock them up, and to make them quite safe he would put a seal upon the lock that nobody might be able to break the lock. So long as the seal was not unbroken the jewels would be quite safe, and he would find them right when he came back. You are Christ's jewels, He has bought you at a great price—His own blood. He is your Proprietor, and He has gone abroad, He has gone away, He has gone into 'a far country'. By and by He will come back again. But while He is in that 'far country,' what does He do with you? He has 'sealed' you with the Holy Spirit. If you take care not to break that 'seal,' then you are quite safe; but if you trifle with that seal, that is to say, if you grieve the Holy Spirit, if you do what you know to be wrong, the 'seal' will be broken; then what will become of the jewels? You will be robbed of them; they will be taken away by the enemy. But keep the Holy Spirit in your heart, then you will be safe when Christ comes back.

In the time of the Emperor Tiberius, there was a law in Rome that anybody who carried a particular ring on his finger must never go into any dirty or wrong place. This was in the time of Tiberius, who reigned after Augustus. A great many people got rings with the image of Augustus upon them, and any one wearing one of those rings was never to go into any wrong place.

If that was the law of Rome about the image of Augustus, what must be the law about those who have the image of Christ, the seal upon them, the seal of the Holy Spirit.

You were 'sealed' thus at your baptism; you carry the seals. You must never go into wrong places, never do wrong things, because you have got the seal of the King of kings upon you. There is not the youngest child in this church who has not the seal of God upon him. What must you do? You have got the seal; keep it holy! People do not think enough about the Holy Ghost. I advise you to pray about the Holy Ghost. Think of Him as being like the wind, the water, the dew, the fire, the seal. Think more about Him at home. Try to get more of Him. That, when 'the wind' cometh as it listeth, you may be 'born again' by that Spirit, to go as He pleases: that your heart may be clean and white by that 'water'; that you may be gentle, like 'the dove'; that you may have 'the dew' upon your soul; that you may be soft and tender; that you may have that 'fire' in you that can mould you into the right shape; that you may have that 'seal' upon your heart which shall never break, but seal you safe for ever and ever!—JAMES VAUGHAN.

TONGUES OF FIRE

'And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place. And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost.'—ACTS II. 1-4.

ON this great festival the Apostles and Disciples were assembled together in an upper room in Jerusalem. They were praying. They were waiting for the promise of the Spirit. Suddenly the whole room was shaken as with a tempest, and bright flames, like tongues of fire, flickered for a moment over every head. These were, indeed, wonderful outward signs; but we must not think of this rush of tempest and this shower of flaming tongues, as the most wonderful thing that happened. They were but the outward signs of something more wonderful still. The Holy Ghost filled the hearts of all that were present—not only the Apostles, but the men and women who were with them (Acts II. 17, 18), and they burst out into loud shouts of praise and thanksgiving to God. I do not mean now to attempt to explain to you what the gift of tongues was. It is a difficult question, and you would scarcely be able to understand it at present; but I wish to show you what this wind and this fire signified. The wind and fire are visible things—that is, things which can be seen with our eyes or felt with our hands. The Holy Spirit is invisible—that is, we cannot see the Blessed Spirit of God; we cannot feel it, as we can feel a body of any sort. God then gives us the things which we can see to explain something to us of the things which we cannot see. The wind and the fire thus explain something to us of the nature and work of that Holy Spirit, of whose descent they were the outward signs.

I. Wind.—What a gentle thing wind is. What a powerful thing wind is.

Even so is the Spirit of God: speaking so tenderly to the heart of some little child; filling your young souls with every true, and beautiful, and loving thought that you have, and moving the strongest men to penitence and faith. The Spirit of God is gentle as the breeze, strong as the storm.

II. Fire.—There are two things which always belong to fire—heat and light. So the Spirit of God comes to us as light and as warmth. To enlighten us—that is, to teach us—to show us the meaning of God's Blessed Word, to explain to us what God is, and what our Blessed Saviour's life and death meant for us; and so to teach us many things which we cannot know without Him. So we say in our Collect to-day that God did teach the hearts of His faithful people, by the sending to them the Light of His Holy Spirit. And so we call the day Whitsun Day, because God gave 'wit,' or, as the word 'wit' used to mean, 'wisdom,' to His disciples.

But fire gives heat as well as light. The Holy Spirit not only teaches us about God and about Christ, but makes our hearts flame up in love to Him.

The Holy Spirit came to abide with us for ever. The smallest boy or girl here is a 'Temple of the Holy Ghost'. The Holy Spirit dwells in you. How very sacred a thing, then, you ought to be to yourself. Defile not the Temple of the Holy Spirit of God. Defile it not with any hasty or impure language, with any resentful or hateful thoughts, with any false or unkind deeds. The Temple of God is holy. Ask God to give you grace to keep it holy. Keep this day as indeed a feast of first-fruits—offer to God the first-fruits of your life. There is one little prayer you can never pray too often. It is easily remembered. Resolve to-day that you will say it. Pray it every morning and every evening: 'O Lord, take not Thy Holy Spirit from me.'—T. ΤΕΙΧΜΟΥΘΗ ΣΗΚΕ, Saint George for England, p. 177.

THEY KILLED THE PRINCE OF LIFE

ACTS III. 15.

BEFORE some of the young people here were born there was a great war, called the Crimean War, on the continent of Europe.

Now in a great war like that it is sometimes the case that if there should be a city or a fort near where the fighting is, the gates of it are shut and the walls made strong, and those who are inside fight to keep their enemies out, and those who are outside fight to get in.

In the Crimean War there was a city called Sebastopol, and one day the fighters inside of the city fired a great cannon-ball against the fighters outside. But this shot struck on the side of a hill and buried itself deep in the earth, and it so happened that at that very spot there was a spring of water, which had never been able to get out. But the opening caused by this cannon-ball made a way for it, and the spring gushed out, and the water was a great blessing to the poor soldiers who were stationed on that hill-side. So out of this evil thing came this that was good.

Now this is the very thing which the present passage shows.

The enemies of Christ put Him to death.

They really meant to do this and this only, to put Him to death. And they did put Him to death. 'By wicked hands they killed the Prince of Life.' But out of this evil deed God caused to flow forth the greatest blessing which ever came into the world.

From Jesus on the cross comes first our knowledge of God, comes next our knowledge of Himself, then comes the pardon of our sins.

I saw in a village I went to visit some time back an ancient stone cross, and at the foot of the cross there gushed out three springs of the purest, coolest water, which never dried up in summer and never froze up in winter.

That is just like the Cross of Christ. He was put to death; that was man's evil deed. But ever since then there have been flowing out into the world three springs of life, viz. faith, hope, and charity.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 80.

ACT LIKE CHRISTIANS

ACTS IV. 13.

THE grace of God is something that can be seen, felt, enjoyed, and passed on to others, in its influence and blessing. The Apostles were filled with the Holy Ghost and became earnest witnesses for Jesus, therefore they were marked men, and all Christians, whether young or old, should be reflectors of Jesus, echoes of Jesus, and brave soldiers for Jesus, so that the world will take knowledge of them that they have been with Jesus. Faith makes a Christian, Love proves a Christian, Trial tests a Christian, Life shows a Christian, and Death crowns a Christian. To act like a Christian is to be like the Apostles.

I. Benevolent and Kind.—Helpers of the helpless (ver. 9).

II. Bold and Earnest.—Preaching Jesus (ver. 12).

III. Brave and Fearless.—Dared to speak for Jesus (ver. 20).

IV. Bright and Happy.—Reflecting Jesus (ver. 13).

The Roman Censors took such an utter dislike to the wicked son of Africanus that they refused to let him wear a ring on which his father's likeness was engraved, alleging, 'that he who was so unlike the father's person was unworthy to wear the father's picture'. So the Lord will never grant any to enjoy the love of Christ in heaven who are destitute of His likeness on earth. To act like a Christian is to act like Christ in obedience, self-sacrifice, and service.—C. EDWARDS, Tin Tacks for Tiny Folks, p. 9.

A BLACK MAN RIDING IN A CHARIOT.

'Understandest thou what thou readeſt?'—ACTS VIII. 30.

A LONG time ago—about eighteen hundred and forty-five years ago—there was a black man riding in a carriage. He was driving through a country where there were but very few houses, and scarcely any people. But there was a man standing there. That man was a minister. And when the black man riding in the carriage came near to this man, something said to him, 'Go to that carriage!' 'He ran.' Whether it was because the carriage was going so quickly, or whether it was because he had such a loving heart, I do not know, but he 'ran' towards the carriage. And the minister saw that the black man was reading a book, and he said to him, 'Do you understand it?' 'Understandest thou what thou readeſt?' And the black man said, 'How can I, except some one should help me?' So he said to the minister, 'Get up into the carriage; sit with me; explain the book to me; help me'. So he got up into the carriage and sat with him; and they drove along. The black man was reading the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, and the minister explained it to him.

That is the way it all began. 'Do you understand what you are reading?' That is the way I want to begin now. I say to you, 'You read, but do you understand what you read?'

Oh! what a wonderful thing it is to read. I suppose almost everybody in this church can read. Can you read? Perhaps you can only read the little words. But I think everybody can read a little bit. It is a wonderful thing to be able to read. I hope you will all be able to read very nicely.

Did you ever think what it is you are doing when you read a book? Somebody wrote that book. In that book are that man's thoughts. That book is the thoughts of some man who probably lived before you were born; perhaps a very good man; a very wise man; a very great man. And those are his thoughts. And you are reading that man's thoughts. It is a wonderful thing to be able to do so—that you can now be reading the thoughts of some great, good man, who lived perhaps a hundred or a thousand years ago. Now he is telling you his thoughts. Is not it so? Now think. When you are reading, the man who wrote that book is telling you his thoughts, the thoughts he had when he wrote that book.

But when you read the Bible, what is it? That is a very wonderful book. God is telling you His thoughts! When you read the Bible, the great God from heaven is telling you His thoughts, His mind. He is telling you His mind. What an honour to be allowed to hear, to know, the thoughts of the mind of the great God! That is the Bible. So God talks with us. When you open your Bible, read your Bible, God is talking with you. Then, when you close the Bible, to kneel down and say your prayers, then you are talking to God. So that you are having 'conversation' with God. God speaks to you; then you speak back to God; and then again God will speak back to you; and you are really having conversation. God talking to you, and you talking to God. You are having conversation with the great God of heaven and earth. Oh! it is a grand thing to be able to read the Bible.

Now I want to say to you, Do you 'understand' it? Do you think you do? Do you understand your Bible?

I can fancy some of you saying to me, 'I am afraid I do not. I must say I feel very ignorant.' Do you feel that? Are you very ignorant? I am so very glad about that. Some one has said, 'To feel ignorant is the doorstep to the temple of truth'. I will say that again, because I think it is a very beautiful thing to say, 'To feel ignorant is the doorstep to the temple of truth'. So if you feel ignorant, you have got to the doorstep. That is something. Now I hope you will soon go into the temple of truth. You are on the doorstep. If you feel, on the other hand, that you know a great deal, you are not on the doorstep. If you feel, 'I am a very clever boy or girl, I don't want you to teach me', then you are not 'on the doorstep'. But if you feel you are very ignorant, you are 'on the doorstep of the temple of truth'.

There are very difficult things in the Bible. Somebody has said of the Bible, and I think it is very true, 'It is like water; and the water is so shallow that a little child can walk in it; until it is so deep that an elephant can swim in it'. That is the Bible. There are very difficult things in the Bible; deep mysteries. There are some things in the Bible which, when you cannot understand, I advise you to leave alone for a little while. If you go down to the sea to bathe, and find the water very, very deep, if you cannot swim you do not go in very far, but just stand on the shore.

But while there are some very deep things in the Bible, there is a great deal that we may know, and we shall be happy if we do know. I want to think about that. How are we to begin? What is the way to 'understand' the Bible?

I. What should you put first? Begin with a little prayer. David did. He loved his Bible so much and understood it so much, though he had not the same Bible as we have; he had only five or six books. He said he loved it so, when reading it sometimes, that he would 'open his mouth, and draw in his breath'! It was so beautiful. And he began with prayer 'Make me to understand it,' he said. That is a nice little prayer. 'Make me,' I cannot make myself, 'make me to understand.' Another time he said, 'Open mine eyes that I may see wondrous things'. That is the way to begin. Begin with a little prayer. 'Make me to understand.' 'Open mine eyes.'

Now having said your prayer we go to the Bible. The Bible is not like other books. You are not to learn it like other books. When you go up to your arithmetic, when you are doing a sum, it is not necessary to love the book; nor is it necessary to love the person who wrote the book. When you read Colenso's Arithmetic it is not necessary to love Colenso. You need not hate the man, but you need not love him. But you must love your Bible, for it is not with the head, but with the heart you are to know it.

It is hard work. It is always spoken of in the Bible as hard work. Solomon asked not for an understanding head, but an 'understanding heart'. It shows that 'understanding' has more to do with the heart than the head. And I am sure that those boys and girls who put their hearts into it, are those who will 'understand' it best. It is hard work. And we must love it.

I have read of a man who loved his Bible. I will tell you about him. He was a prisoner. He had not been in prison very long before they put him into a dark place, where there was no light. But three times a day he had his meals brought in: his breakfast, dinner, and supper; and while he ate those meals he was allowed to have a light, in order to see how to take them. But this good man who loved his Bible dearly thought to himself, 'Well, I can take my meals without a light; I can manage to eat without a light; but I cannot read my Bible without a light, so I would rather read my Bible when I get the light; then I can eat my meals in the dark.' So he did.

Every time when his light was brought in, say for an hour or so it was allowed him, he did not eat his breakfast, dinner, and supper, but he read his Bible. Then he took his meals afterwards in the dark.

Now I am sure that man had a right heart, and he had a true understanding. And God will take care to give 'the understanding heart' to us, if we love our Bible.

Well now we have settled that—love your Bible first, begin with that. 'Here is my Bible. God is speaking to me. I will love it.'

II. But you must study it. David said, 'All the day long have I studied it'. You cannot do that. You cannot study it 'all day long'. You must, however, be always thinking about it. There is nobody in the church now who could not study his or her Bible.

If you have ever been in the fields in summer, say a clover field, you have seen a little winged thing flying in and out of all the flowers, darting about, just alighting here and there, and then darting off again, never staying. Beautiful animal! beautifully coloured! But it is always on the surface of everything; it never goes deep. And you may see another little creature, not half so pretty; it is a little brown animal. But it always stays some time with the flower. It goes down deep, and it gets something at the bottom of the flower. It takes something away with it that will, perhaps, be useful to it in the winter. Do you know what those two little animals are? Don't you be a butterfly; be a bee. Go as the bee does. Not a touch and a go; but dig deep. You must study. You will not learn your Bible without hard study.

I have read of a little girl; her governess said to her, 'My dear, don't you understand your lessons?' The little girl said, 'Governess, you give me so many things to learn, I have no time to learn "understanding"'.

I think that is the case with you. In many schools they learn so many things that they have no time to learn understanding; they only learn the surface of things. I would advise every master and mistress to remember that! They must give their boys and girls time to 'learn understanding'.

Supposing I gave you a letter, and it was written in the Russian language, what would you do? You could not 'understand' a letter written in Russe, in the Russian language. But supposing you could find a man who knew Russian, then he could read the letter to you, and you would 'understand' it; or, supposing you had a letter but could not read it, and your correspondent came to your side, and read it to you, then you would 'understand' your letter, though you could not read it. That is exactly what we want in this study. We want to have an interpreter, one who knows the language, to explain it to us; and the person who wrote it to come and explain it. That is what we have got. We have the Holy Ghost to come; and God, who wrote it, and Jesus, the Great Teacher.

III. The next thing I advise you is to ask help. Now, if I am speaking to boys and girls who really wish to 'understand' their Bibles, why do not they sometimes come to me as their minister? Why don't you? I should be so glad to see you. Come to me and say, 'I am puzzled about this point, I cannot think how it can be'. Do you know it is my duty. I am a clergyman. I cannot do it as well as I ought. But I think I can help you a little. You come into my study, and say, 'I want this explained to me'. I shall be so glad for anybody in this church to come to me as your minister and say, 'I want to understand this chapter'. We will study it together. We will ask God's blessing upon it. I think I can help you. Will you do that? I cannot tell you how welcome you would be. You need not be afraid. Walk straight into my study. Open the front door, take the second door on the right, and walk straight in. There I shall be. I will help you to 'understand' the Bible. Perhaps you have somebody at home who can help you; if not, come to me; come to your clergyman.

IV. One more thing. If ever you read in the Bible something you ought to do, go and do it. Act it out. You remember this verse, 'If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine'. But he must 'do' it. You must be a good boy, a good girl, trying to lead a good life and please God, then you will get on fast; God will be your teacher. If you are not good, you won't get on.

Supposing you were reading something in a room, and I came in and closed the shutters—could you read it then? Supposing you were going to light a candle, and there was an extinguisher put upon it, could you light it then? If you are doing anything naughty, it is putting up the shutters, it is putting the extinguisher upon the candle. If the extinguisher is on the candle, you cannot light it; if the shutters are put up, you cannot see. Don't put up the shutters; don't put on the extinguisher. If you are doing anything to displease God, if you are unkind to anybody, if you are living in any sin, the shutter is up, the extinguisher is put on, you won't 'understand' perhaps a single word.

At Stirling, some time ago, there was a beggar; those who visited Scotland saw him always there, on the hill. He knew his Bible from Genesis to Revelation. He could repeat it straight through, chapter and verse, so long as he had a particular key, which he fumbled about in his hand. If anybody took away his key, his memory failed. If they gave him another key, it would not do. But he could repeat correctly so long as he had one particular key. He was a gin drinker, a drunkard; a very bad man. He knew his Bible, but he did not 'understand' it. He had plenty of knowledge, but he was a poor drunkard!

Now will you remember my advice to you. When you are reading your Bible, it is God talking to you; come to it with a feeling that you are very ignorant, that there are very deep mysteries in it; love the book, and love the Writer; study it carefully, and ask for help; act out whatever you find. Then I am sure you will be a good scholar.

I will just tell you one story. Did you ever hear of St. Augustine. He was a wonderful man, perhaps many would say (I do not know if I should say so) that he was the greatest Christian that ever lived. His books are most valuable. He lived in the fourth century. Up to the age of thirty-one he was a wild fellow, wicked, very wicked. One day when he was about thirty-one years old, Augustine, afterwards called St. Augustine, was lying under a fig-tree in a garden, close to a college in Italy. I often say to you what a blessed thing it is to have a good mother. He had an excellent mother. Oh, how he grieved her! There never was a man who had a better mother. But he grieved her deeply. He thought, 'What a wicked fellow I have been! How I have grieved my mother—and how I have grieved God!' As he was lying under the fig-tree he heard a voice,—where it came from he did not know, perhaps from the house near him, and he heard this voice say, in Latin, 'Get up and read!' He went to a friend of his and said, 'Have you got a Bible?' He took the Bible given him into his hand, and opened it on the thirteenth of Romans, and I will read you the two verses he read, they are the last two in the chapter. The words are these: 'Let us walk honestly, as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying. But put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof.' He read them, and was a changed man from that time. He became a very holy man, a very useful man. Never has there been a nobler Christian than he; or one more useful, in all ages. And that is the way it all began. Reading the Bible, and forsaking his sins. 'Get up and read!'—JAMES VAUGHAN.

CHOSEN VESSELS

'He is a chosen vessel unto Me, to bear My name before the Gentiles.'—ACTS IX. 15.

WITH these words the Lord calmed the fears of Ananias when he was told to visit Saul of Tarsus in the street called Straight in Damascus. The risen Saviour, still using images, had likened Saul to the struggling ox; and He now likens him to a rare vessel filled with sweet-smelling perfume. Very likely these never-to-be-forgotten words of Christ were still echoing in Paul's soul when, many years afterwards, he said, 'We have this treasure in earthen vessels' (2 Cor. iv. 7). The vessel here meant is a household cup or bowl, and the treasure in it is the name or Gospel of Jesus Christ.

1. Its Material.—All the vessels in your house—the strong bowls in the kitchen, the fine vases in the drawing-room and the china tea-cups—are made of clay and stone. The raw material of every one of them was found in the soil of the earth. The materials for earthenware are everywhere mixed up with the surface of the earth, though some soils suit the potter better than others. And so the whole world is the Great Potter's field, and Christ's 'chosen vessels' were all common clay at first. When He took them up their natures were as coarse, unshaped masses; of the earth, earthy. Could the finest china vessel speak, it might truly say, 'I was once but a piece of common clay, trodden under foot; but the skilful potter lifted me up, and by the miracles of his art fashioned me into what I now am. I am a piece of base clay ennobled by his art. I cannot boast, for I have nothing which I have not received.' 'Tis he who has made me to differ.' The Apostle never tires telling us that he was the chief of sinners, and that he owes all to the grace of God. What hope for us! What hope for all here! Splendid vessels are now made from mere rubbish, broken glass, and old bones. And the outcasts of earth have been shaped into vessels of honour by Him who lifts the beggar from the dung-hill and sets him among His princes. It used to be thought that the materials for porcelain or 'china' could be found only in China; but we now know that Cornwall contains miles and mountains of these materials; and a blacksmith was the first in Europe to discover them even in the mud of the highway. And the people in China, Japan, and Africa, as well as those in Christian lands, have in them 'the making' of Christ's chosen vessels. The potter's art can triumph over the rudeness of the most unpromising materials. A lady, who had won many to Christ, was one evening thanking them for a testimonial they had given her, consisting of silver and 'china' articles. I will give you some of her words as recorded in her biography: 'When I gaze upon your gifts, I seem to read a sermon in each one, and cannot forbear once again proclaiming the old, old story. The silver reminds me that it was not always thus beautiful: it had first to be dug out of the earth, then placed in the crucible that the dross might be consumed, then moulded, and lastly, the mark of its genuineness had to be impressed thereupon. And thus it is with the Christian. Again, when I see the exquisite tea-service, I cannot but be reminded that there was a time when to all appearance it was but useless clay, which the passer by would have left unheeded; but the potter has power over the clay, and the mean substance in his hand was prepared and moulded into these vessels to the praise of the maker's name. It is even thus that God deals with the sinner.'

II. Its Maker is God.—That beautiful cup is not a self-made thing. The potter took the clay, tempered, moulded, baked, painted, and fired it, and then put his mark upon it. And the Christian is made, not by self or man, but by God. 'For we are His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus.' I have known a boy, in a day of grace, saying to his minister, 'Please will you convert me too,' forgetting that conversion is the work of God. 'I am one of your converts,' a man smelling of whisky once said to Rowland Hill. 'I can believe it,' replied Mr. Hill, 'you look very like my bungling work. Had you been one of God's converts, you would not have come to me half-drunk.'

III. The Vessel's Use.—Christ's vessels are all for use, none for ornament only; they are 'vessels unto honour, sanctified, meet for the Master's use'. A great house has some chosen or choice vessels, preferred for their size, strength, or beauty. Such a vessel was the Apostle, great in mind and heart, most serviceable and beautiful from his glad devotion to Christ. 'He is a chosen vessel unto Me'—My creation and property—'to bear (or carry) My name before the Gentiles, and kings, and children of Israel.' Christ's name was the water of life for the perishing, the healing balsam for men's deadly wounds; and the Apostle was the vessel in which that heavenly treasure was carried round and offered to all. No other vessel in Christ's house has been more used and honoured. Yet the humblest vessel has its use. A poor broken cup may hold the water that saves the life of a dying man, and the humblest Christian may carry Christ's name to a perishing sinner.

IV. The Vessel's Beauty.—Our makers of vessels strive to unite the useful and the beautiful; their aim is to cast a thing of use in beauty's mould. Vessel is a name usually given to the finest ware, and a 'chosen vessel' suggests rare beauty. Our text may mean that Christ's name was to be carried on as well as in the vessel: 'to bear My name before (not merely to) the Gentiles and kings'; just as the costly vases in palaces bear the name and fame of the maker before kings.

Bernard Palissy, the French potter—a noble Christian and Protestant martyr—once saw a white enamelled or glazed cup, and resolved to discover the secret of so beautifying vessels. He spent all his money and sixteen years of his life in making the discovery. He was often at death's door, had burnt all his furniture for fuel, and his body was lean and dried up from hard work. At last he made some of the chosen vessels, and these have borne his name among nations and kings even to this day. Thus Paul bore his Creator's name far and wide, and multitudes 'glorified God in Him'. A life so ennobled by grace moved men to honour the grace that ennobled it. 'For this cause,' he says, 'I obtained mercy, that in me first (or to begin with) God might show forth all long-suffering for a pattern.' He was a specimen or sample of what God's grace could do with the most unlikely materials. The Maker's name was both on and in that chosen vessel.

If potters have done so much to clothe clay with beauty, shall they not condemn us if we do not earnestly seek to have the beauty of the Lord our God upon us? If a heathen philosopher reproached a rich man with having silver plate and earthenware principles, should we not reproach ourselves that we are so eager to possess every sort of beauty, except the beauty of the soul? When shall the 'beauty of holiness' find as passionate admirers as the beauty of art has in all our cities? Thousands almost worship what they fondly call 'the fine arts'. If those arts are by way of distinction 'the fine arts,' this I am discoursing on is surely the finest art under heaven.

Many there be who say, 'A thing of beauty is a joy for ever,' and 'the whole world without art would be a great wilderness'. Yes, a thing of beauty, like this chosen vessel, is a joy for ever to its possessor and to all beholders who know its worth. And without the art of creating Christ's chosen vessels this world were a wilderness, full of sin and misery, and overrun with the rank growths of hell.—JAMES WELLS, Bible Images, p. 227.

RHODA

ACTS XII. 13, 16.

RHODA and Miriam are the only two girls of the Bible whose names we know. Rhoda was evidently an earnest Christian, and occupies an important place in the records of the early Church. The mention of her name, the memorial of her life, and the fragrance of her service, are abiding marks of her precious testimony for Jesus. Rhoda means a rose, the emblem of beauty, sweetness, and fragrance, and these certainly were some of the features of Rhoda's character.

On a girl's tombstone in France there is a rose nicely carved upon it, with these words underneath: 'She was just like that'. And this is the picture the Holy Spirit has drawn of Rhoda in the New Testament. A bright, beautiful blessing, 'She being dead yet speaketh'.

I. Rhoda was a True Christian.—But you ask, How do you know? She was in fellowship with the Church. The Lord only added living souls (Acts iv. 47). She was interested in the prayer-meeting—prayer, the evidence of life (Acts ix. 11). She was glad when Peter was released; Christian love a family mark; grace, life, and fellowship, all true marks of a real Christian.

II. Rhoda was a Careful Christian.—She was placed on guard. No doubt she was set to watch and listen by the Church whilst they prayed. There were many enemies about (Acts xii. 1). She used her ears well. She hearkened carefully (Mark xiii. 33). She used her tongue wisely. She asked who was there (margin). She was very quick. She recognised Peter's voice. Grace makes us wise. Danger makes us careful, and love makes us quick.

III. Rhoda was a Warm-hearted Christian.—'She opened not the gate for gladness.' Rhoda got a little excited, still there was real joy. Her whole soul responded to the fact that prayer was answered, and Peter was released. There were three good reasons for Rhoda's gladness. Rewarded faith, answered prayer, and relieved anxiety. These blessings are always means of great joy and happiness (Acts v. 41).

IV. Rhoda was an Active Christian.—'She ran and told how Peter stood before the gate.' She had a quick ear, warm heart, nimble feet, and a ready tongue, all alive for Jesus. The outward evidences of a soul full of the love and joy of Jesus. Just the grace the two disciples had in Luke xxiv. 27, 41. If we are not like this, let us breathe that oft-repeated prayer in Psalm cxix. 25, 'Quicken thou me according to Thy word'.

V. Rhoda was a Useful Christian.—She was most useful to the Church then, and has been ever since. It was only very humble service, but it has been recognised and recorded by the Holy Spirit. It is a guide and pattern for every follower of Jesus. It was wise, hearty, helpful, happy service for the Lord. So every Christian, young or old, with head clear, heart warm, soul glad, faith strong, feet shod, and the tongue touched by the Holy Ghost, can do wonders for the Church and the world too. The Lord give us the Divine touch.—C. EDWARDS, Tin Tacks for Tiny Folk, p. 81.

A SUNSET ON THE HILLS OF CANAAN

'David, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep, and was laid unto his fathers.'—ACTS XIII. 36.

The verse from which I am now to speak to you tells us, among other things—

I. The Way to Die Happy.—Death has been spoken of, to those who are unprepared, as 'the King of terrors'. But of this King of Israel it is here said, 'He fell asleep'.

How was death to him thus so peaceful as to be compared to a little child closing its eyes and sinking into slumber on its mother's knees?

I think it was—I am sure it was—because he was enabled, in early years, when amid the flocks and sheep-folds of Bethlehem, to give his young heart to God. As I looked down when in Palestine on the valley of that name, I could not help recalling the youthful warbler who once was there with his simple pastoral reed-pipe, before he could procure the golden harp of after years. I thought of him by day amid the bleatings of his flock singing songs to Israel's God. And then, when the evening shadows fell, and the beautiful stars came out; when the sheep and lambs were all folded; when the birds had gone to their leafy cradles, and the great Temple of nature was silent; how that boy-minstrel loved to break the stillness with these loveliest night-Psalms ever penned: 'The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth forth His handiwork'. 'When I consider Thy heavens the work of Thy fingers, the moon and the stars which Thou hast ordained!' If he had not then learnt to love and praise and serve the great Creator, who had made him and redeemed him, he would not—he could not—have left the world so happy. It was because, when he was yet the age of many I now address, he had learnt to sing, 'The Lord is my Shepherd,' that he could plead when he was old and grey-headed, 'O God, forsake me not' (Ps. lxxi. 17), and that when he came to lie on a death-bed in his royal palace, he could take down the harp of Zion, and warble so sweet a farewell as we are told he did. Do you remember the words of that death-song?

You will find it in 2 Samuel xxiii. 5: 'He hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things and sure; for this is all my salvation, and all my desire'.

Or listen yet again to what the dying King, at the same solemn moment, says about men who 'rule in the fear of God' (2 Sam. xxiii. 4): 'He shall be as the light of the morning when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds!'

Seek in the morning of existence to love and serve God, if you wish, when you die, to 'fall asleep' in the 'everlasting arms' (Deut. xxxiii. 27). David, when he came, as he did, bitterly to mourn his great sins, would, I doubt not, have given his crown and sceptre and riches, and all that he had, to get back the bliss of a pure heart and a life unstained with crimson and scarlet guilt. Keep far out of the way of temptation. Try to do nothing that would cloud the beauty of your after years. Live holy if you would die happy.

II. The text tells, that All of you Have an Influence either for Good or for Evil.—David, though as I have just said at one time he fell unhappily into sad sin, yet mainly his life was an influence for good. He 'served his own generation' by 'doing the will of God'. As a Sun, he gladdened many with his beams. Many rejoiced in his light.

III. I shall add a third thought, though it is not told us in the text. It is this: That You all Have an Influence in the World after you Die. David, we are here specially told, influenced the generation among which he lived. But did he do no more? His influence remained after his death too.

This is surely a solemn reflection—that after death, when earth is left for ever, and when people gather round the grave of this one and that one and say of them 'They are gone,' it is not so. In a true sense of the word they still live.

Seek to live, that while you live, by loving ways and loving acts, the world may be the better for you; and that when you die, a good example—good thoughts and words and deeds—shall be left behind you; and thus, if I may repeat the illustration I have used before, like Mary's broken box of spikenard, the whole little home and circle of your influence may be filled with the odour of the ointment.

'The child Samuel,' we read (to return once more to David's old and kind friend), 'grew, and not a word fell to the ground.' That saying has a solemn meaning regarding us all—(1) Not a word of good falls to the ground. (2) Not a word of evil falls to the ground. Our characters, good or bad, survive, and live on for ever!

IV. There is one other thing of which the text reminds us. All Must Die.—David 'fell on sleep'. Great man as he was—king though he was: though he sung many sweet Psalms, though beloved by God and honoured by men—yet the summons came at last, 'Put up thy harp, and be gathered to thy fathers'; and 'He died'. David had stormed and taken many strongholds, but he could not storm or take the stronghold of Death! He was proud of the 'House of his armour' in the royal palace—the shields and spears, the bucklers and helmets of his mighty men, that hung in his cedar gallery, but they were all unavailing to resist or vanquish 'the Last Enemy'. The harp that charmed away the evil spirit from Saul was powerless at that solemn closing scene!

Live to God as long as you live; and then it matters not whether your years be few or many. Even a very brief existence, if it has been loving and gentle, and unselfish and good, will not have been in vain. Cut short in this world, it will be continued in that world to come where death cannot enter. I like to think of that verse in Psalm xci. The words may apply to a young, just as much as to an aged Christian, 'He asked life of Thee, and Thou gavest him a long life; even length of days for ever and ever!'—J. R. MACDUFF, Hosannas of the Children, p. 64.

SINGING IN A STRANGE PLACE

'And the prisoners heard them.'—ACTS XVI. 25.

SOME of the best men the world has ever seen have spent their time in prison. There was that friend of all children, the author of the Pilgrim's Progress, who lived for twelve years in a prison. Joseph, you remember, spent long and dreary years in the prison of Egypt. Jeremiah the prophet was not only put in prison, but let down into a miry pit in the centre of it, and nearly killed there. Daniel and the three Hebrew children were put in prison. Peter the Apostle was shut up in prison, till the angel came and opened the prison gates and let him out.

But none of the great heroes of the Bible was more familiar with the inside of prisons than the Apostle Paul; and to-day we have to consider one of the strangest scenes of his prison life.

I. The Singers.—Here, then, the two servants of God were immured. The heavy doors were shut upon them; the darkness surrounded them; the fetid odours of the dungeon rose and caught their breath; their backs leaned against the damp wall; their feet could not be moved; their wounds, in which the clotted blood was hardening, rent them with pain; and in their hearts there was the bitter sense of wrong, for they knew that they had been imprisoned for no crime, but for a deed of kindness. And outside their cell door, in the large outer room, the blackguards and vagabonds of Philippi, who had been imprisoned for all sorts of crimes, kept up a din, with oaths and coarse laughter and ribald songs.

But the hours wore by, and the night fell over the city and over the prison. The darkness in the cell of Paul and Silas could not be deepened; but in the room outside the red glow faded from the window, and the noise of the prisoners sank to silence, as they flung themselves on their pallets to sleep. The gaoler and his family were asleep; the prisoners in the large room were all asleep; midnight and silence and sleep enveloped the prison building.

But what sound is this which steals out in the silent midnight? It fills the large room where the prisoners are sleeping. One after another awakes;

he never heard such music before; he sits up on his couch and listens. Is it angels pouring their songs on the midnight, like those who sang on the plains of Bethlehem? Where can it be coming from? Is it possible that it is coming out of the inner prison? Are these two broken, bleeding men, whom they had seen thrust in there, singing?

Yes; it was even so! Paul and Silas could not sleep. Their smarting wounds would not allow them. But how did they spend the long and heavy hours? In complaining to each other of their misery? In cursing the injustice of those who had imprisoned them? In weeping and groaning over their pains?

No, no; they talked to each other cheerfully and pleasantly, until they forgot their misery and their wounds; they prayed together, until they felt as if they were in heaven rather than in a dungeon; and at last their hearts grew so full and so happy that they could no longer restrain themselves, but broke out together into the song which awakened their fellow-prisoners.

But what was it which made them able to be joyful and to sing for joy in such circumstances? It was not that they were brave men, though they were very brave. It was not that their friendship for each other was so strong that they were able to drive care away from each other's minds, though they were the best of friends. These things would not have been sufficient to make them triumph over pain and gloom and wrong as they did. What was it, then? I think I know. There was a third person in the cell. If the gaoler had opened the door and looked in, he would not have seen Him. But Paul and Silas saw Him. It was Jesus. He was with them; and His presence and His love made the midnight bright, and changed the clasp of the stocks into perfect freedom, and made them forget their pains and their wrongs, and changed the dungeon into a temple, and the groans of pain into psalms of praise. It was for His sake they had been beaten and imprisoned, and that was enough. He was with them, and all was well.

II. The Listeners.—Our text says, 'The prisoners heard them,' but it ought to say, 'The prisoners listened to them'. They sat up on their pallets, and tried to catch the strange sounds. They rose and crept to the door of the dungeon, and bent their heads towards it, eager to catch every word. There they stood, an awe-stricken group, listening breathlessly in the darkness.

The silence and the midnight hour heightened the effect. Have you ever heard a nightingale sing? If you have not, you cannot conceive what a flood of song it is, twittering and shaking, and piping and soaring, running over all the notes of the scale from the lowest to the highest. But much of the extraordinary effect of this bird's music is due to the circumstance I have just alluded to, that it sings at night, when all the other songsters of the grove are hushed, when the world is wrapped in silence, and the mind, undistracted by the sights and sounds of the daytime, can listen with all its faculties. So the Psalms of the Apostles gained much of their effect from the silence and the midnight hour.

What chiefly riveted the prison audience was wonder at the joy and cheerfulness of Paul and Silas. This was the miracle. How, after the treatment they had received, and in the circumstances in which they were, could sounds so calm, so cheerful, so joyful come from them? What was the secret these two men possessed? The prisoners knew they had nothing which could make them glad in such circumstances. They had sought happiness in revelry and abandonment, but they had discovered none like this.

Ah, this is what always rivets the attention of sinners, when they see that Christians have a joy that is far better than any other happiness in the world. I wish Christians would let the bird which sings in their breast be heard by others as well as themselves.

There is an exquisite sketch written by the hand which penned the immortal story of Rub and his Friends, and now, alas! lies still for ever in the grave, of a quaint old character of other days, well known to Dr. Brown, because he was his father's beadle. The sketch is written with the love and humour of which the author's heart was full; and among other traits of his humble friend he gives this touching one. He had been married in his youth, but after a year his wife and their one child died together; but always afterwards he kept up the practice of family worship, though quite alone, giving out the Psalm and the chapter, as if his dear wife had been there. He lived in a high story in the Canonigate, and his voice, in the notes of Martyrdom or Coleshill, sounded morning and evening through the thickly tenanted land; and many a careless foot was arrested and many a heart touched by that strange sound. I hope there are doors in our large blocks of houses where the passers-by are impressed by the same grave sweet melody.

I wish you to sing. Ah, but I wish most of all that you should have the joy which gives birth to song. It is the heart, and not the throat, in which song has its true habitation. It is in this cage the bird of song resides. When you sing of free grace and dying love, do you feel what you are singing? Do you feel these things so much that you cannot help singing? This is the right kind of song. If you can sing thus, then you will sow the seeds of joy wherever you go, and you will see them springing up in the new and happy lives of those who listen to you.—JAMES STALKER, The New Song, p. 168.

GOD, THE MODEL GIVER

'He giveth to all life, and breath, and all things.'—ACTS XVII. 25.

I. God is a Cheerful giver.—Jesus said to His disciples; 'Freely ye have received—freely give'. But when He said they 'received freely,' He meant to show the way in which God gives. All that we receive we receive from Him. 'He giveth to all life, and breath, and all things.' And all that He gives, He gives freely. He gives us life. But when the baby first begins to live, what does it have to pay for its life? Nothing. He gives us breath; and as we open our mouths to draw it in—what do we have to pay for it? Nothing. He gives us sunshine; and what do we have to pay for it? Nothing. He gives us pure, sparkling water from hundreds of springs and fountains, bubbling from the earth; and what do we have to pay for them? Nothing. He sent His blessed Son to die for us, and to 'open the kingdom of heaven to all believers'; and what do we have to pay for Christ's entrance into our world, to save it? Nothing at all. What God gives to us, He gives freely. And this is the reason why God expects us to give as St. Paul says: 'Not grudgingly, or of necessity; for God loveth a cheerful giver'. He loves to have us give cheerfully, because this is the way in which He gives to us. God gives freely, or cheerfully, because He loves to give. And this is the only reason you can name why God gives at all. He is not obliged to give. If He should stop giving, no one could help it; and no one would have right to complain. But He gives because He loves to give. And when we do anything from love, we always do it freely, or cheerfully. God is the model Giver, because He gives cheerfully. And we find beautiful examples of those who are trying to imitate the model of giving, which He sets before us, by giving cheerfully.

The baptised pocket-books.—Some time ago a rich merchant, who was going to join a Baptist Church, was about to be baptised, as they are accustomed to do it, by immersion, or plunging the whole body under water. One of his friends, who saw his pocket-book in his pocket, suggested that he had better take it out before going down into the water. But he shook his head and said, 'No, no; I want my pocket-book to be baptised too!'

He meant by this, to say, that he wished it to be understood that all his money, and everything he had, belonged to God. There are too many people who get baptised themselves, but their pocket-books are not baptised. They do not feel as if all that they have belongs to God. When people do feel in this way, and really have their pocket-books baptised, they will be cheerful givers.

II. God is a 'Valuable' Giver.—And on this account, too, we may well speak of Him as the model Giver.

'He giveth to all life, and breath, and all things.' What a valuable gift the gift of life is! This is so valuable that no one in all the universe has the power to bestow it in any case, but God Himself. Wherever life is found existing, from the mightiest archangel to the tiniest insect, it is there as the gift of God. All the wisest, and best, and greatest men that ever lived could not bestow the gift of life on any creature. All the angels of heaven could not give life to the smallest worm or insect. The life of an angel—the life of a human being—or of any meaner creature—is what none but God can give. 'But He giveth to all—life.'

Let us look at some examples of this sort of giving. The first illustration I have under this head is a very nice one. It may be called—

The consecrated diamonds.—This story is told of the Princess Eugenia of Sweden. She is an earnest Christian lady, and has for years been trying to do good among her people. She spends her summers at a beautiful home on the island of Gotthland. When there, she is accustomed to spend a good deal of her time in visiting among the poor. While doing this, she became very much interested in behalf of a number of poor women who were suffering from complaints which could not be cured. And she felt the more for these poor sisters in their sorrow, because she herself was suffering in the same way. After thinking over it a good while, the idea came into her mind, how nice it would be to have a hospital home for those poor women. Yes, indeed! but where was the money to come from! She was a princess, it is true, but she was already engaged in so many works, that all the money she could spare from her income was spent, and it would take a good deal to build this hospital. Still she kept on thinking about it, and wishing that it could be done. And you know the old proverb says, 'Where there's a will, there's a way'. And so it proved here.

One day while thinking about it, the question came into her mind, 'Why can't I sell my set of diamonds for this purpose?' She asked God to guide her. Then she consulted her brother—the King of Sweden—about it. He gave his consent.

The diamonds were sent to London, for the Swedish Ambassador to sell them. They were sold for many thousands of dollars. The money was sent back to the princess. The hospital home was built, and filled with poor sick women.

Several years passed away. The summer was drawing to a close. The time had come for the princess to leave her summer retreat, for her winter home in the city. She was going through the hospital to say 'Good-bye' to the patients. As she entered one of the rooms the matron pointed to a particular bed, saying, 'The old woman who occupies that bed used to be the hardest of all our patients to manage. Please speak a few kind words to her. You will find her wonderfully changed now.'

The princess went to this bed and spoke to the sufferer, who was now very near her end. 'These were the poor woman's words to her: 'I thank God that the blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth from all sin—and that He has cleansed mine.' As she said this the tears were running fast down her cheeks. They were the tears of gladness, which told of the gratitude she felt to Jesus for His love. The light of heaven was glistening in them. In speaking of them afterward, the princess said, 'In those tears I saw my diamonds again'. That is true. Yes! and when Jesus shall give her the crown of glory, which she will wear for ever in heaven, she will see those diamonds, in that crown, sparkling more beautifully than any ever seen in an earthly crown. It was a valuable gift which the Princess Eugenia gave, when she sold her diamonds in order to build that hospital.

The bag of farthings.—They were taking up their anniversary collection one day at a Sunday school in England, when a little boy, about seven years old, put a bag on the plate that felt quite heavy. The collector opened it, and found that it contained two hundred and eighty-five farthings! And where do you think the little fellow got all those farthings! He hadn't found them; he hadn't begged them. No; but he had earned them. And how! Why, his mother was a poor widow, and kept a little store. He used to run errands for his mother, and she let him keep all the farthings he received in change at the different stores to which he went. Instead of spending those farthings in buying candy, or fruit, or playthings, he kept them till their anniversary day came, and then he put them in the collection, which they always had on those occasions, for the missionary cause. That bag of farthings made up about six shillings of English money. They would make about a dollar and a half in our money. It was a valuable gift which that little boy offered in his bag of farthings.

III. God gives 'Self-denying' Gifts.—God is so great, and so rich; He has such an abundance of everything, that we do not think of what He gives as involving any self-denial on His part. And it is true that when He gives life, and breath, and such like things, they do not cost Him self-denial. But when He gives the blessings of His grace, and His salvation, then, He is giving us that which cost Him more than we can ever tell. Before the least of these blessings could be bestowed on us it was necessary for God to give up His only begotten Son to death; even the death of the cross. This is what the Apostle Paul teaches us when he says: 'He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?' When God gave His Son for our redemption He gave Him to be out of heaven, and away from His own bosom, for more than thirty years. He gave Him to pass through untold sufferings, and to die a dreadful death of shame and agony. And this was a gift that involved such self-denial as we can never know. And we may well speak of Him as 'the Model Giver,' because when He bestows upon us the blessings of His grace and Gospel, He is giving us that which cost Him wonderful self-denial.

God, the model Giver, denied Himself by giving His Son to die for us; and we should strive to imitate the model He sets for us by giving in the same way. —RICHARD NEWTON, Bible Models, p. 256.

THE CHURCH AND THE CHILDREN

'And they all brought us on our way, with wives and children, till we were out of the city: and we knelt down on the shore and prayed.'—ACTS XXI. 5.

WHEN we closely study Luke's words we find in them many warm touches of life. The scene had been photographed upon his gratified heart, and he writes as if his eye were resting on all its little details. His words, literally translated are, 'And we going out through the gate . . . knelt down on the pebbly or sandy shore'. As he writes he sees the city gate through which they passed, and the peculiarities of the shore on which they knelt. I found there, outside the city—'out of the city'—a long range of sandy shore, with many sandy hillocks, amid which you could find many a quiet sanctuary for a little prayer-meeting, shut out from the world, and open only heavenwards. Luke mentions the children, and this is the first notice of children in the Acts of the Apostles. That little company on their knees were as one man, with one heart's desire and prayer. We may be sure that their prayers were not read out of a book, but that they were the outpourings of their own hearts, shaped by their own needs. 'And when we had taken leave one of another, we took ship; and they returned home again.' Luke remembers well that leave-taking, and how on the deck he watched the retreating, lessening forms of his home-going friends. Perhaps they climbed the highest tower in Tyre and watched the flying ship. It soon became a speck, and then melted out of sight, and these friends never met again on earth. No doubt they felt the pathos of such a parting.

I wish to study with you—

I. Paul with the children.

II. The children with Paul.

I. Paul with the Children.—I. He respected them. Natural enough as this scene appears to us, it would seem very strange and ridiculous in heathen Tyre. The idea of two teachers having women and children among their disciples, would give the sages of Tyre much and genuine laughter. Think of Plato, or Socrates, or Cicero in such fine company! This scene was thoroughly original, and no scene like it could be found to-day in heathen or Mohammedan lands. In Cairo neither females nor children are allowed to pray in a mosque, or even to be present at a time of prayer. In North Africa lately a missionary told the chief that he wished to teach the women to read. The chief laughed loudly and said, 'My horse is more intelligent than any woman in my tribe; you had better teach my horse to read.'

The Bible everywhere shows a warm side to the children. It surrounds every young life with a sacred interest and dignity. It teaches us that every child is a young immortal, made in God's image, and of greater worth than all the material glories of earth and sky. It reverences the young, not only for what they are, but also for what they may yet become and do. It everywhere breathes a passion to win them early for Christ. In this spirit the great Apostle had the children at his farewell prayer-meeting on the Tyrian shore.

2. Paul sympathised with the children. I am sure that they were very poor children; probably their fathers were sailors, or dock labourers, or slaves; but I am also sure that their poverty would not impoverish the Apostle's sympathy with them. He sympathised with them intellectually. Profound theologian though he was, he had words and prayers for the young. He walked with them out of Tyre step for step, and probably hand in hand, and he knelt with them in prayer. All that is a parable. His mind as well as his body kept step with them. In both these respects he would consider the pace of the children as Jacob did when he said to Esau, 'I will lead on softly according as the cattle that goeth before me and the children be able to endure' (Gen. xxxiii. 13, 14). Paul would not overdrive the tender mind or body. Though he spoke many things hard to be understood, he also spoke many things that children could understand; and he would speak them with a beautiful simplicity. The great truths of the Bible come to us as simple facts belonging to the life of Jesus Christ. Paul knew well the priceless value of the religion of Christ for these boys and girls kneeling by his side. The early Church had the same spirit, for she had the dolphin among her symbols. The reason was that the dolphin was fabled to have a special tenderness for her young.

3. And no doubt Paul was hopeful about them, for his mind was filled with the Old Testament. He thought of God as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; as the family God and covenant God of His people, all whose promises were for the children as well as the parents. The fact that God's covenant of mercy had taken such remarkable notice of the children, and breathed such a spirit of generous hope regarding them, would work in him a kindred frame of mind. And then he had drunk in the spirit of Christ. He had also great faith in the upbringing and prayers of godly parents, and he would naturally expect the children of such parents as were kneeling with him to be Christians. Thus, I doubt not, the sight of these children made him thank God and take courage. They showed him that the cause of Christ had a great future, and he might delight in the idea of race handing on the name of Christ to race, and the rising generation carrying forward the work of their fathers. Such hopes as these were the very food of his soul, and would inspire the prayers he offered up amid the sand-dunes of Tyre.

II. The Children with Paul.—These children of Tyre made the same profession as Paul. Probably some of them were bigger boys and girls at the age when ridicule and laughter have the greatest power over us. As they walked through the city with Luke and Paul, I think it is very likely that their mischievous playfellows would point at them the finger of scorn, and fling at them many a stinging poisoned taunt; but they kept in the sacred company, and joined in the prayer-meeting. It is possible that the children prayed too. Perhaps the prayer went round, as is done on Sabbath evenings in some Christian families, where every voice, from the youngest to the oldest, rises into the ear of their Father in heaven. It is good for children to learn to pray aloud when they are young. Because they have not learnt this lesson in youth, many grown-up people are terribly afraid of their own voices in prayer. Thousands between the ages of twelve and twenty are laughed and jested out of their best convictions and desires. Some naughty, godless companion has more power over them than all the teachings and prayers of a Christian mother or father. Oh, how sad! Pray God to make you loyal and true and strong, so that you shall never hide your colours. Modestly but firmly keep your ground. Be ashamed of shame, and feel that the highest honour in the world is to be on the side of Paul and of Paul's Master. Let your lives show that you are true worshippers, as were these little worshippers on the Tyrian shore.

Once more, these children were interested in the work of the Apostle. Their sympathies moved along with his, as their feet had done through the gate of Tyre and along the pebbly beach. Religion was not to them a dull soulless thing that somehow—they did not know how—had come down to them from far-back ages. It was a grand thing that had kindled their enthusiasm. Paul and Luke might seem to them far grander men than the Roman generals, than Caesar himself. The parents, I dare say, wished their children to have the image of Paul enshrined in their hearts; but be sure that Paul would not allow them to hero-worship him. He would point them past himself to his Master. These children would so far at least understand the errand of these two men, for whom so many touching prayers were that day offered up. The children would know that these Apostles were fighting against all that was bad and for all that was good; that they meant to overthrow cruelty and darkness, and bring light and joy to all men by teaching them how to live a blessed life on earth, and how to reach heaven at last.

You feel, I hope, that it is a grand thing to be a Christian, and to belong to such a society as Christ's Church. Like these children of Tyre, be you linked in heart and soul, even in boyhood and girlhood, with Paul and Luke and the blessed company of the faithful.—JAMES WELLS, Bible Object Lessons, p. 231.

ROMANS

NOT ASHAMED OF THE GOSPEL

'I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ.'—ROMANS I. 16.

It is our great privilege to follow Christ. Let us not be ashamed of Him. There are two things which strike us in regard to a soldier's uniform: (a) the soldier knows he is wearing it; (b) it is seen. First, the soldier knows he is wearing it. In the same way we must know that we are wearing our Christian uniform, even Christ. It is surely one of the great facts of our faith that we have put on Christ; that, as St. Paul says in writing to the Corinthians, 'Ye are Christ's'; and again in writing to Timothy, 'I know Him whom I have believed'. It is a great reality to us to-day. It is a fact—we have put on Christ if we are true Christians. And now to the second thought.

I. It is Seen.—Just as the soldier's uniform is seen, and just as the wearing of it stamps him as a soldier; just as his red coat proclaims to the world at large that he is no longer a civilian, but that he has taken the Queen's shilling and been drafted into the Queen's service; so surely does our uniform have a like effect on those around us. They know Whose we are, and Whom we serve. They know that we are no longer ordinary people, but that we are set apart by the great Captain of salvation for His service. Will my hearers then realise these two things—will you apply them at this time to your lives? will you make them your own? And now we come to a further working out of our soldier life. The soldier who puts on for the first time his uniform has no idea of the life before him. He knows very little about his future. He simply finds it out by degrees. His uniform means to him barrack life and routine; it means drills, parades, reviews; it means perchance the being shipped off in a troopship for active service, and yet he doesn't realise all these things at once. They come by a gradual experience; so, when we put on our Christian uniform, we have little idea, if any, what it means to us; it is only by degrees that we understand what our Christianity signifies. But to go back to our illustration. Because the soldier doesn't know all that is before him, does he therefore sink into carelessness, self-indulgence and disobedience? By no means. He rather, by a faithful attention to duty, by a perfect obedience to the word of command, by a constant and unswerving attention to rules and regulations, strives to prepare himself for all the unknown future before him. Thus, then, the mere thought that we in putting on the Lord Jesus Christ know little of what is before us, should stimulate us to emulate the soldier's example, and do our best by the most perfect obedience we can render to fit ourselves for the duties, the trials, the dangers that lie before us, ever striving to know more and more of our Captain as the great motive power of our lives. 'I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ.' What, then, is this gospel of which we are not to be ashamed? It is Christ, and it is further explained to us in 1 Corinthians i. 24, 'Christ the power of God'. Let us realise this: that we have the power of God to rely upon, to trust in.

II. Any power to be of any use at all must be an Active Power. We see this exemplified in the natural world, when we look at some mighty tree sending forth its green shoots at the call of spring, through the power which is within that giant trunk; we see it in the spiritual, when we see some great man following the paths of purity and holiness, impelled along by a power not his own, but God's. 'It is God that worketh in us to will and to do of His good pleasure.' Yes, the power must be an active power, but even an active power may be of no effect. Take as an illustration some great factory. There is the powerful engine at one end of the long room, there are all the looms waiting to be worked; the engine is at work, but the looms are still. Why is it? It is because there is no connection between the engine and the looms; there is active power in that great engine, but it is useless so far as the looms are concerned. So surely there may be 'Christ, the power of God,' but unless each of us take this power as our own, unless there is the connection between our lives and Christ, the active power which is in Him is of no use to us. And so we have in our text a condition attached to the attainment of this power—'to every one that believeth'. We must believe in order to apprehend. But surely this ought not to be difficult.

Do we believe, then, Christ to be the power? If we believe our Bibles to be true, we must acknowledge this to be a fact, for as we have seen, Christ is called 'the power of God'. So the power is a fact, Christ is a fact. Besides the simple statement in God's Word, we have many practical demonstrations to illustrate how easy such belief is. Look at that express train whirling along the metals—What a tremendous power there is behind it! Yet you can't see the power, but you believe in it because you see the effect of it. So, as we turn and gaze for a moment at the lives of men like Livingstone, Havelock or Gordon, we are conscious of the effect of the power of God upon their lives, and so we believe in the power. There is still another side to this power of God: it is not only active, but it is continuing.

It is 'unto salvation'. We look back on the past. Surely there is no power that can avail to cleanse our past from sin? Yes, 'Christ, the power of God'. 'The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseeth from all sin.' We turn once more to the present and the future. Difficulties, temptations, doubts, dangers, seem to surround us. And yet Christ, the power of God, is with us to direct, control, guide, and strengthen us, and we realise that this power of God is with us all our life through.—NORMAN BENNETT, Be True: And Other Sermons for Boys, p. 75.

A STIRRING STORY

'Christ died for us.'—ROMANS V. 8.

THERE is a fine tale told of the old days before there was gunpowder, and when war was a simpler thing than it is now. The enemy came swooping down in the darkness and surrounded a lonely garrison, and hoped to shoot them down, or starve them into surrendering. Yet the soldiers in the garrison had friends, strong friends and many of them; only they couldn't tell them the danger they were in, or call for their help, without lighting the cresset fire which hung by its chain high up, where the enemy could see the man who tried to kindle it, and would shoot him down at the first spark he made. But if ever they were to be delivered that signal must be made; the cresset fire must be kindled.

One man at length stepped forth, and said he would fire the beacon. He knew what it meant; ah, yes! he knew; but he was ready, quite ready. He knelt and prayed, then sprang to his feet, grasped the torch, leapt on the ramparts, and climbed to the beacon, while a shower of arrows came whizzing upon him. But the beacon was fired; its flame shot up like a cry for help, and their friends understood it and marched to the rescue, and drove back the enemy, and delivered the garrison.

But the poor fellow who had kindled the beacon, where was he? Lying asleep in a soldier's grave. He had died to save his comrades.

Was there a soldier of them all who was saved that night who did not love and honour the man who had saved them? No, not one.

And 'Christ died for us'—died for you, died for me, died for everybody. Shouldn't we love Him? shouldn't we praise Him? shouldn't we live for Him? Ah, yes, we should!

If they could have brought the dead soldier to life again, wouldn't they have gladly made him their captain? They would, and so we should make Jesus the captain of our salvation, for He was brought to life again, and lives to bless us. Be brave, be true, be soldier-like, and stand up for the Lord, who 'died for us'.—J. REID HOWART, The Children's Preacher, p. 14.

GOOD AND EVIL

(Preached on Passion Sunday)

'For the good that I would I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I do.'—ROMANS VII. 19.

I. THESE words were uttered by one of the most noble Christians the world has ever seen, by one who was ready for the sake of Christ to go through weariness, painfulness, hunger, thirst, cold and nakedness, fire and sword. There was nothing that St. Paul was not ready to undergo in running the race that was set before him, and yet with all his zeal, his tremendous powers of mind, his absolute steadfastness of purpose which never wavered, he seems to enter to the full into the same difficulties, trials, and temptations that we have to face. His flesh, like ours, was very weak and sinful, and he has continually to remind himself of the power of the Spirit to overcome that weakness. 'O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from this body of death? I thank God through Jesus Christ our Lord.' St. Paul's testimony is very real and true. He hides nothing; he places himself before us in all his natural weakness, but only that he may the more abundantly bring out the wondrous saving and keeping power of Christ. St. Paul's aim was always to help those who, like himself, were striving after whatsoever things were true. If by any means he could show his sympathy with suffering, sinful humanity, it was his one desire to do so. And so as we hear those words fall from his lips, 'The good that I would I do not; the evil that I would not, that I do,' we are conscious at once of a responsive echo in our hearts. Just as when some trumpet is blown among the mountain-tops the sound is heard passing from peak to peak until it is lost in the distance, so do the clarion notes of the great Apostle of the Gentiles find an answer in each of our hearts this day. We are conscious of sin, of weakness, of failure; we try often to realise more what it means to be a Christian, but often and often does such striving end in disappointment, in failure. Some sin has taken hold of us in the past, it has bound us round with its chains; we feel helpless, we feel hopeless, and we know not what to do. Is it not so with every one of us at different times in our lives? Yes; over and over again we have to face the words of St. Paul, and find out the truth of them: 'The good that I would I do not; the evil that I would not, that I do'. I wonder as I look round on your faces this morning what this Lent will then mean to you. Shall I try and put before you what it may mean if you will only use it aright? It may mean a great deal to you. The first lesson that it must teach us, then, is that we are sinful.

II. Sinfulness, Proneness to Sin.—This is one of the greatest lessons that we have to learn; to some people it means nothing. They seem to think that anything is good enough for God, and that sinfulness has no place in their experience. What, then, is sin? We have it defined very clearly for us over and over again. But one reference will suffice, in St. James iv. 17, 'To him that knoweth to do good and doeth it not, to him it is sin'. Here we have the foundation of sinfulness, the knowledge of good and the defiant choice of evil. When our conscience, then, tells us that a certain thing is right, and we omit to do it or do the exact opposite, we oppose the will of God, we commit sin—we choose evil rather than good.

And then, again, some seem to think that it is the amount of sin that brings a man under the condemnation of God; and yet it is not so, for if we turn to the tenth verse of the second chapter of St. James, we read: 'Whosoever shall keep the whole law and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all. The man who breaks the law must take the consequences of his own act; so those who break the laws of God whether in much or in little are likewise convicted of sin. Therefore, sinfulness is upon each one of us this morning; thoughts, words and deeds have during the past been filled with evil. We have a record of not one, but many sins, and unless Christ is able to save us, we have no hope. So, like St. Paul, let us turn to Him and say, 'I thank God through Jesus Christ my Lord'. The past may have been clouded with many sins, but 'if we confess our sins He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness'. And then, again, we are confronted not only with our sinfulness, but with our weakness—the evil that I would not, that I do'.

III. How, then, will this time of Lent help us? Surely in this way: to look up to Him who is all strength, and ask Him to perfect His strength in our weakness. Just as Christ is willing to be our Saviour, so is He willing to be our strength. 'I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me'—such was St. Paul's testimony, such also should be ours. The mere fact that we are unable to cope with sin ourselves should make us throw our whole trust and confidence upon Him. If we look to ourselves we fall, we are defeated; but if we look away from ourselves to Christ, then we are 'more than conquerors through Him that loved us'. We see Christ Himself as at this time led up into the Mount of Quarantine, on the confines of the valley of the Jordan, to be tempted of the devil; we see Him resisting the specious temptations of Satan, and we see Satan baffled and conquered, and we realise, 'In that He suffered being tempted, He is able also to succour them that are tempted'. We are confronted with a power in Christ which is able to meet our every need. No temptation is too great. Everything which we feel Christ feels, and so in Him we have an all-sufficient Saviour; He makes perfect His strength in our weakness. There ought surely to be no such word as weakness in the true Christian's vocabulary, for 'when I am weak, then am I strong'. We realise that word of the Apostle Paul, 'Nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me'. Where, then, is the room for weakness? Was Christ weak? Certainly not; for we read of Him, 'All power is given unto Me'.—NORMAN BENNET, Be True: And Other Sermons for Boys, p. 94.

OF THINKING TOO HIGHLY OF OURSELVES

ROMANS XII. 3.

'FOR I say unto you, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you: Not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think.' It was the Apostle Paul who said this. He says it in his letter to the Roman Church. You cannot help feeling, in reading it, that he is very earnest in saying it. He had seen, as he went up and down among the Churches, that it was a thing which much needed to be said. Those were the first Churches, and the people who belonged to them had not been Christians long. There were many things they could not yet understand. And perhaps they did not yet understand that it could be a fault to do what all their lives before they had been doing, to think more highly of themselves than they ought. But, as I have said, Paul is very earnest in telling them that this thing ought not to be. And in another of his letters—his letter to the Philippian Church, he says what may be called the other half of what he said to those in Rome: 'Let each esteem other better than himself'. Paul saw that homes would be happier, and churches holier, and the whole world better, if only those two things could be done.

Now, as often as I read those words together, three thoughts come into my heart. First, I cannot help thinking how wonderful it is that things so simple as not thinking too highly of ourselves, and thinking more highly of others than of ourselves, should have such power as they have. Next, I think that they are things which everybody who is willing to try is able, by God's help, to do. And then I am filled with the thought of the exceeding goodness of God in putting such simple, such easy means of doing good into everybody's power.

I really believe, therefore, if the holy Paul were living now and had to speak to children, it would be such words as these he would speak: 'You need, just like the first Christians, to learn how simple and easy the rules of Christian life are; and how close to you, young though you be, lie powers of God by which you can be working for God and making those about you happy every day you live'. Therefore I take those words of Paul for my sermon for you to-day. I say unto you, through the grace given unto me, to every one who is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think. And I entreat you, with my whole heart, this very day to begin and let each esteem other better than himself.

It is misery to do anything else. The life that acts otherwise is the evil life of pride. It is pride that leads children to think no other children are as good as they. It is pride that makes it difficult to see the good that is in those around us. More than anything else in an evil heart is this evil of pride a sorrow to God. It blinds our eyes to the good that is in God Himself. It makes us haughty, and envious, and scornful. It leads to heartbreaks in families, and to quarrels in schools, and to hatred and wars with nations. It is such an evil that it can turn religion itself into a thing abominable to both God and man. It was pride that made the Pharisee who was praying beside the Publican in the Temple to say, 'God, I thank thee that I am not as other men, or even as this Publican'.

It was my good fortune not long ago to hear told by a friend some wonderful German stories.<sup>1</sup> And one of these brings out, so much better than I could do, the misery to which pride of this kind leads, that I shall try to re-tell it instead of preaching a sermon to you to-day.

In a certain German city, many, many years ago, lived a young man who was an organ-builder. Nobody could build such organs as his. And every new one he built was better than the one before. He was called the master-builder.

At last he built one that was better than all the rest. He called it the Wonderful Organ. It was so made that on certain occasions it could play of itself. The occasions when it could play of itself were when good, right-hearted, well-behaved young people came into the church to be married. As soon as two such young persons crossed the threshold of the church the organ began to play of its own accord. But if either the one or the other was bad, or had an evil pride in the heart, it did not play.

When the young master-builder finished this organ, and got it built into its place in the church, he said to himself, 'My fortune is made now, and I shall have a home of my own and a wife. And I will take my bride to the church in which my wonderful organ is. And as soon as we cross the threshold it will burst out into happy music, and all the people will say, "That is the wonderful organ, and this is the master who built it, and she who is beside him is his bride."'

So he went one day to seek a bride. He went to the fairest, kindest, most modest girl in all the city, and he said to her that he loved her and wished her to become his bride. And she gave him her love, and the day for the wedding was fixed.

It was a beautiful day, and the wedding guests were happy. But the bridegroom kept filling his heart with the thought, that so soon as he took his beautiful bride into the church his organ would begin to play, and all the people would say, 'Listen to the wonderful organ, and see! the builder of it is there'. His heart was filled with pride in his organ and himself, so that there was not room in it for any thought or feeling besides.

So the wedding company came to the church door, and the bridegroom and the bride passed in. But the organ did not play, and its silence went to the bridegroom's heart like a knife. 'Have I made a mistake in my choice?' he said to himself. 'Is this fair-looking maiden not fair, not good? Alas, for me this day!'

He did not once think that the evil which made his organ silent might be the evil of pride in himself. The smiles went out of his face; the joy went out of his heart; his warm hands got cold and clammy. He went through the wedding ceremony like a dead man. He did not touch the wedding breakfast; he did not say one kind word that whole day to his bride; he only kept brooding over the evil thought, that the fair young creature who had given him her love was not fair, nor good, at heart. And with this evil thought in his soul he stole out so soon as the guests were gone and it was dark enough, and left his beautiful bride alone.

He went from street to street till he got outside of the walls. Then he took the road to a foreign country and walked all that night, and the night following, sleeping where he could by day. At last he came to a city in which he was not known, and there he took up his abode. And in that strange city he lived for many years; he lived till grey hairs were beginning to show themselves on his head. And still he thought that he was in sorrow and in hiding because there had been evil in his bride.

One day, however, when all those years had passed, there came into his heart a great longing to see his native city, and if it might be his bride also once more. He tried to put away the longing; but it would not be put away. So at length he said to himself, 'I will go back once more and look upon the organ and upon her'. And with that he rose and left the place in which he had been living so many years. And he turned his steps to the city in which he had left his wonderful organ and his bride.

At last he saw the spires of his native city in the distance, and by and by he was at its gates. So eager to enter it was he now that he had begun to run. And the people he passed turned round and looked at the stranger who was running as if for his life.

As he ran he met a funeral procession. The people walking in it were weeping, and the street along which it was passing was filled with people also weeping. 'Whose funeral is this?' he asked. 'It is the funeral of a saint, of one who has been as an angel in the city, so kind was she to the sick and the poor.' Then the people named her. It was his own bride. And, oh! then, in the poor man's soul, fell down the cruel wall which his pride had built, and which, for so many years, had kept him from seeing the spotless purity, the holy charity of his bride. Then when too late to ask her pardon, he beheld the worth he had wronged. And in that same moment he learned that it was the pride of his own heart which had stilled the organ on the wedding-day. He trembled from head to foot. A horror of shame and humiliation fell upon his soul, tears streamed from his eyes, and sobs burst from his breast. But he went forth among the pall-bearers and begged to be allowed to help. The people thought he was some poor workman whom their dead angel had helped. But now a wonderful thing took place. As the pall-bearers with the body crossed the threshold and passed forward into the church, the great organ, of its own accord, burst forth into an anthem of praise. It was too much for the poor organ-builder. Sick at heart because of his sin, and faint with his long journey, he sank exhausted at the base of a pillar. He had spoiled his life and the life of the dead one of whom he had not been worthy. Never now could he tell his sorrow. Never now could he give or receive her love. There was just one comfort. He knew that God had forgiveness for sinners as bad as he. And he seemed to hear in the tones of the organ the very tones of the forgiving God.

As the people were about to lower his bride's coffin into the grave, he was seen to grow white and to fall forward on the floor. Some who hurried to his help found that he was already dead. And by some token about his dress or person they discovered that this was the husband of the saint they had come to lay in the grave. And the teaching of God fell upon their hearts. They kept back the body of the bride. They prepared the dead husband for burial. And they laid them together in the same grave. And as the two bodies were being lowered into the grave, the organ of its own accord began to play. It played such an anthem as had never before been heard, of the most heavenly music. But after that it was never known to play of its own accord.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Children's Portion, p. 55.

A CAREFUL START

'Principiis obsta.'

'Abhor that which is evil.'—ROMANS XII. 9.

SOME of you may remember the story that Virgil tells us about the priest of Troy and his two sons. You may even have seen the great group of statuary that represents the incident. The story goes that while they were standing by the seashore two great serpents came gliding over the surface of the deep, and laid hold, first, of one of the lads. The father went to his rescue, and it seemed an easy task to untwist the snake; but presently it wound itself more firmly about their limbs, and before long the three became knotted in a hopeless entanglement of the serpents' coils, and after a terrible struggle were slain together by their cruel tormentors.

I. That old-world story is just a picture of what may happen to every one of us if we allow sin to lay hold of our life. Tennyson has called us 'the fools of habit,' and, indeed, it is often surprising how foolish people can be about admitting bad habits into their life; they see the evil effects that these things have wrought on the lives of other people, but they never seem to imagine that the same sad consequences will take place in themselves. We cannot be too careful about the kind of guest we admit into the inner chambers of our heart. It would be easy enough were all these things ugly and hateful at first sight; but often the most dangerous are the most attractive. Perhaps you have seen in the hedgerows in summer a pretty wild plant with lovely clusters of berries, red like coral; it is called the Barberry, and at the back of its leaves you may sometimes find a number of pretty little round yellow cups. In these cups there is a kind of powder which the wind scatters over the fields, and should it come in contact with the growing wheat it will change the beautiful ears of grain into black, ugly, useless, hurtful ones. There are many subtle and in themselves seemingly beautiful dangers that surround the harvest-fields of our life. The wind of temptation and the soft blowing breezes of the world carry the poison with them, and if we are not very careful the evil may be wrought in our own lives before we are conscious of it.

II. On the other hand, things often look much more terrible before we tackle them than they are when we boldly face them. Oftentimes there is nothing so dangerous as to dally with an evil, and approach it in a half-shrinking manner. The old adage applies in many circumstances:—

If you gently touch a nettle
It will sting you for your pains.
Grasp it like a man of mettle,
And it soft as silk remains.

Tennyson tells a story in his tales of Arthur's court of how four brothers held a certain castle. Three of them stationed themselves in the passes that led to it, and challenged all comers. At last one of the knights overcame the three and reached the castle walls, where he had to face his last encounter. When his echoing challenge, thrice repeated, sank into silence there issued from a black pavilion, mounted on a night-black steed, a huge and gruesome figure of Death, who advanced in grim silence, not uttering a sound. Terror struck into every heart, and even the bravest felt an icy chill of strange dread. But in the onslaught Death was 'cast to ground,' and when the conqueror clove his helmet there 'issued the bright face of a blooming boy'. He had been compelled to play the strange rôle by his brethren, who were confident his life would never be risked, and that the supernatural horror would protect him. Many evils are like that grim figure. They seem very dreadful at first, but when one deals with them bravely and faces the foe with prompt courage, the reality is found to be much less awful than our imagination had pictured.

III. We must be careful also about the beginnings we make. Everything depends on them. 'A task well begun is half done,' the proverb says, and the reason is that a good method of starting secures our carrying on the work more easily. To learn the art of music under a good teacher from the commencement will save much trouble and loss of time. Bad methods would make it necessary to unlearn much, as well as compel us to begin afresh and cover much old ground again. The formation of all habits is of the same nature. Let us start with good ones, and we are halfway to the building up of fine characters. Let us grow a crop of bad ones, and the garden of our soul must first be weeded before we can hope for a show of fair flowers.—G. CURRIE MARTIN, Great Mottoes with Great Lessons, p. 26.

DEARLY BELOVED, AVENGE NOT YOURSELVES

ROMANS XII. 19.

I HAVE not required to search for a lesson to you this morning. One has come to me and to all in our neighbourhood from the playground. Two boys playing at marbles. A misunderstanding arose; then a quarrel, a blow; and then in answer to the blow a stone; then death.

The one struck by the stone was killed.

I am sorry for the boy who was killed, but I am very much more sorry for the boy who threw the stone. I am sure he did not mean to kill his companion. That never entered into his thoughts. Only he was angry at being struck; he was mad angry, and lifted the stone and threw it, and death stepped on to the playground.

It is all so pitiful.

Boys at play; angry words; blows; stones; then death; then the awful, awful thought of the survivor, 'I have killed my playmate'; then the inquest, then the police-court, and, above all, the agony in two homes.

Now what is the lesson? It is the one I have read to you:—

'Do not avenge yourselves.'

It is terribly hard to keep down the hand when you have been struck; when you are smarting from some hard blow, and put to shame, and some companions near are laughing, it is one of the hardest things you can do to keep from hitting back.

There are some people who will say: 'If you don't hit back, you are a coward, you are afraid'. And I have seen many a blow given because that was said.

Now I say: 'Don't hit back. Don't avenge yourself.'

Through and through it is the best way.

An old elder, a dear friend of mine, was wont to say: 'Better be sinned against than be the sinner. Better endure evil done to you than do evil yourself.'

Our Lord said: 'Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: but I say unto you, that ye resist not evil, but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also.'

I know there are some questions put, such as, 'If robbers should come?' But we are not talking of robbers in this lesson.

Or if the striker should be striking some child, some girl, or some weak old person? We are not considering that either.

There are different cases. You may strike down robbers when you can, and you sometimes might have to strike brutal people when they are striking others. Even then, it is often best to get the magistrate to strike. Better if Moses had not killed the Egyptian. But when you are struck yourself, don't hit back. Never mind what people standing by say about cowardice. It is not cowardice to refuse to do evil or folly. If this boy had not struck back, how much happier he would have been to-day! How much braver it would have been to bear! It is nobler to yield, even when you are in the right.

We all know a good deal about Mr. Wesley, but we do not all know that the virtue of patience was one of his greatest excellences.

It is well known that Joseph Bradford was for some years the travelling companion of Mr. Wesley, for whom he would have sacrificed health, and even life, but to whom his will would never bend except in meekness. 'Joseph,' said Mr. Wesley one day, 'take these letters to the post.' 'I will take them after preaching, sir,' said Joseph. 'Take them now, Joseph.' 'I wish to hear you preach, sir; and there will be sufficient time for the post after service.' Mr. Wesley said: 'I insist upon your going now, Joseph.' Joseph: 'I will not go at present, sir.' 'You won't?' 'No, sir.' 'Then you and I must part.' 'Very good, sir.' The good men slept over it. Both were early risers. At four o'clock the next morning the refractory helper was accosted with: 'Joseph, have you considered what I said, that we must part?' 'Yes, sir.' 'And we must part?' 'Please yourself, sir.' 'Will you ask my pardon, Joseph?' 'No, sir.' 'You won't?' 'No, sir.' 'Then I will ask yours, Joseph.' Poor Joseph was instantly melted; smitten as by the rod of Moses; and forth gushed the tears, like the water from the rock.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 70.

THE WARNING AGAINST SELFISHNESS

'We . . . ought . . . not to please ourselves.'—ROMANS XV. 1.

IF we ask ourselves the question what sort of a thing selfishness is? we shall find that there are three things about it, each of which furnishes a good reason why we should mind the Bible warning against it.

I. In the First Place, Selfishness is an Ugly Thing.—And this is a good reason why we should mind the warning against it.

One thing that helps to make our bodies look pleasing, or beautiful, is when the different parts, like the head, or the hands, or the feet, are all of a proper size, or shape. But suppose we should see a boy, or a girl, ten or twelve years old, with a head as big as a bushel measure; with feet as large as an elephant's; or with hands ten times as large as they ought to be; should we say that their bodies were beautiful? No, every one who saw them would say how ugly they were! A body of which the head, or the hands, or the feet are allowed to grow out of their proper size must always be ugly.

And it is just the same with our souls when we give way to wrong feelings. This makes one part of the soul become larger than it ought to be. Then its proper shape or proportion is lost, and this must make the soul ugly, just as it does the body. If we give way to pride, it will have this effect; and so will anger, and so will selfishness. There is nothing perhaps that makes a person look so ugly and disagreeable as giving way to selfishness.

'The unselfish school boy.'—His name was Arthur Campbell. He was about nine years old. One Saturday afternoon his mother said to him: 'Arthur, my dear boy, do you think you can practise a lesson in self-denial this afternoon, for the good of another person?'

'I don't know, mother, but at any rate I can try. What is it you mean?'

'Why, you know, little Susan Gray wants to go to Sunday-school to-morrow. But she can't go in her old ragged clothes; so I am making her a frock, a cape, and a bonnet in order that she may go. I shall have to work till late this evening to get them done. This is what I expected to do. But your father has just sent in a long account to be added up before tea-time. If I attend to this account I can't finish the clothes. Now the question is, shall poor Susan go without her clothes for another week, or will my dear boy give up his play this afternoon and cast up these accounts for me?'

Arthur hesitated a moment. Then he ran upstairs to his own little room. He shut the door, and then burst into tears. 'What shall I do?' he said to himself. 'I only come home from school on Saturdays, and go back on Mondays. If I give up flying my kite this afternoon, I shall have to wait a whole week before I can get another chance to fly it. And then it's my new kite, and a real beauty; and this is such a royal breezy day for it; and so many of the fellows will be out with their kites this afternoon; and I do so want to show them mine. And yet I know poor little Susan has looked forward to going to Sunday-school to-morrow, and she will be dreadfully disappointed not to go. What shall I do?' Then he knelt down, and asked God to guide him in this matter, and help him to do what was right. When he rose from his knees these words of our Saviour came into his mind: 'As ye would that men should do to you, even so do to them'. This settled the question. Dashing away the tears from his eyes, he put his new kite safely away in the closet for another week, and going downstairs to his mother, he said: 'Rather than little Susan shall be disappointed, I will give up my kite-flying, mother dear, and will stay home and settle those accounts'.

His mother stooped down to kiss him. As she did so he felt the warm tear-drops from her eyes fall upon his cheek. They were tears of gladness, to see her dear boy minding the Bible warning against selfishness. And Arthur was much happier that afternoon than if he had been flying his kite in the fields. But the next day, when he saw little Susan Gray in church, with her new clothes on, and looking as pleased and happy as possible, Arthur felt more real pleasure than all the kites in the country could have given him.

Now Arthur's noble conduct, resulting from his unselfishness, made him appear really beautiful. But if, instead of this, he had disobeyed his mother, and had spent that afternoon in flying his kite, how ugly his selfishness would have made him appear! And so the first reason why we ought to mind this Bible warning against selfishness is because selfishness is an ugly thing.

II. The Second Reason why we ought to Mind it is because Selfishness is a 'Disagreeable Thing'.—

When the things about us mind the laws which God has made to govern them, then they are all agreeable. The light of the sun is pleasant to see; the gentle sighing of the wind is pleasant to hear; and the fragrance of the rose, and other flowers, is pleasant for us to smell, just because the sun shines, and the wind blows, and the flowers give out their fragrance according to the laws which God has made for them. Doing this makes them all agreeable.

But if the sun should blaze forth with light ten times stronger than God has arranged for it to give, this would make our days very disagreeable. And so it would be with the wind, and the flowers, and the other things about us; they would all become disagreeable to us, because they were not minding the laws which God made to govern them. And it is just so with ourselves. God's law for us to mind, is that we are not to seek our own things, but the things of others. In the words of our present text it is that 'we ought not to please ourselves'. If we mind this law it will make us unselfish, and then we shall always be agreeable to those about us. But if we do not mind this law, then we shall become selfish, and this will make us disagreeable to all who are about us. We shall find out how true it is that selfishness is a disagreeable thing.

Let us look at some illustrations of this part of our subject. Our first story may be called, 'The effect of a little girl's selfishness'.

A Christian lady, who taught in Sunday school, was talking to her class on the evils of selfishness, when she illustrated it by this story from her own experience. 'I remember,' she said, 'when I was a little girl, I had not learned the Bible warning against selfishness. My Grandma, whom I loved very much, was dangerously ill, and near the end of her life. One day when I was playing with my doll in the corner of the room, she asked me to bring her a glass of water. I did not mind her at first, but went on playing with my doll. Then she called me again. After this second call, I went and got the water, and carried it to her. But I did it in a very unkind and disagreeable way. When she had drunk the water, she said, 'Thank you, my dear child, for bringing me the water; but it would have given me so much more pleasure if you had only brought it willingly'. Now it was nothing but my selfishness which led me to act in that way. My dear Grandma died soon after that. She never asked me to do anything for her again. I have never forgotten how disagreeable my selfishness made me appear to my dear dying Grandma. It is forty years ago to-day since this took place, and yet there is a sore spot in my heart which it left there, and which I must carry with me as long as I live.'

Our next story may be called, 'A great man's unselfishness'.

One of the greatest landscape painters that England ever had was the late Joseph W. Turner. The incident now to be told of him shows that he was not only great, but good. He was a member of the committee whose business it was to arrange about hanging up the pictures that were sent in for exhibition to the Royal Academy of London. On one occasion, when the committee were just finishing their work, and the walls of the Academy were already crowded, Mr. Turner's attention was called to a picture which had been painted by an unknown artist, from some distant part of the country, and who had no friend in the Academy to watch over his interest.

'That is an excellent picture,' said Mr. Turner, as soon as his eye rested on it. 'It must be hung up somewhere for exhibition.'

'That is impossible,' said the other members of the committee, with one voice. 'There is no room left. The arrangement already made cannot be disturbed. No space can be found for another picture.'

'That picture must have a place somewhere,' said the generous artist. Then he deliberately took down one of his own pictures and put the painting of this unknown artist in its place.

How noble that was! Turner had learned thoroughly the warning against selfishness. And in what an interesting and pleasing light his perfect unselfishness presents him to our view!

III. And the Third Reason why we ought to Mind this Warning is because Selfishness is a 'Sinful Thing'.—When we commit sin in most other ways we only break one of God's commandments at a time. For example, when we disobey our parents, what commandment do we break? The fifth commandment. If we commit murder, which commandment do we break? The sixth. If we steal, what commandment do we break? The eighth. If we bear false witness against our neighbour, what commandment do we break? The ninth. In committing these sins, we only break one commandment at a time. But when we give way to selfishness, we break six of God's commandments all at once.

A good many years ago there lived in Egypt an old man named Amin.

A time of great famine came upon the land, just as it once did in the days of Joseph. Amin had a great store of wheat in his granaries. When bread began to get scarce his neighbours came to him to buy grain. But he refused to sell it to them. He said he was going to keep his stock till all the rest of the grain in the land was gone, because then he would be able to get a higher price for it. Food became very scarce. People were suffering on every hand. Many died of starvation, and yet this selfish man still kept his stores locked up. At last the hungry people were willing to give him any price he might choose to ask for his grain. Then he smiled a cruel, selfish smile, when he thought how rich his locked up stores of wheat would make him.

He took the iron key of his great granary. He opened the door and went in. But in a moment all his hopes of great gain faded away like a dream. Worms had entered the heaps of his once beautiful grain and destroyed it all. Hungry as the people were they yet raised a great shout of gladness for what happened to that wretched man. They saw that it was God's judgment which had come down upon the miserable man for his selfishness, and that it served him right. But such was the effect of his disappointment upon the old man himself, that he fell down dead at the door of the granary. His selfishness killed him. It destroyed his body in this world, and his soul in the world to come.—RICHARD NEWTON, Bible Warnings: Addresses to Children, p. 356.

THE SAVIOUR'S SELF-DENIAL

'Even Christ pleased not Himself.'—ROMANS XV. 3.

ST. PAUL does not mean to be understood by what he tells us in the text, that our adorable Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, came into this world reluctantly, and because He was obliged to do it. It was of His own free will that He laboured for us, and suffered, and died.

He left His radiant throne on high,
Left the bright realms of bliss,
And came to earth to bleed and die!
Was ever love like this?

The Apostle merely wishes to make it plain to us, that while the Lord Jesus lived in this world His great desire and purpose was to accomplish His Heavenly Father's will. In order to do this, He was contented to undergo every trial and persecution, and suffering, and even the cruel and degrading death of the cross. He sought neither wealth nor honour, nor the favour of the great nor His own convenience and comfort. 'Even Christ pleased not Himself.'

He became poor, miserably poor, that His people might be rich. He was willing to be cast down and despised, that they might be exalted. He became wretched, that they might be happy.

When the people were actually carried away by their kinder feelings, and wished to take Him by force and make a king of Him whether He was willing or not, He withdrew Himself into retirement that He might escape their troublesome importunities.

He was much better pleased to have gentle Mary sit quietly and patiently listening to His teachings than when bustling, generous-hearted Martha took uncommon pains with her household cares, that the Master might be well served.

He paid the tax towards the support of the Temple worship, although, as the Son of the King of kings, He need not have done it. And so, in all things, in His life and death, He taught us the great lesson of self-denial. He did this to set us an example; and, as far as we are able, it is our duty to try and imitate Him.

Even children are expected to do this. Hence, you observe in the Epistle for Ash Wednesday, that they are expressly mentioned: 'Sanctify a Fast, call a solemn assembly; gather the people, sanctify the congregation, assemble the elders, gather the children.'

Several men and boys were one day working in a coal-pit in England, when the iron handle of the cart in which they were, suddenly broke, and a man and a boy who were hanging on the rope above, sprang up by a great effort and seized hold of a chain which always hangs at the side of the shaft as a guide.

It was soon known by those at the mouth of the pit that an accident had happened below, and a miner was sent down with a rope to render what help he could.

He came first in his descent to a boy named Daniel Harding (it is worth while to remember the names of such noble fellows), and when the man prepared to rescue him from his dangerous plight, the generous and unselfish lad exclaimed, 'Don't mind me! I can hold on a little longer. Farther down you will find Joseph Bawn, and he is nearly ready to faint. Make haste to him!'

How glad you will be to know that both Joseph and Daniel were saved. You need not, and you ought not to wait for great occasions when you may practise self-denial. We can manifest the spirit of unselfishness just as well in small matters as in great ones. Give the best apple or peach to your little friend; and the warmest place by the fire; and always offer the most comfortable seat to the sick or to persons older than yourself; and so will you be learning the great lesson of self-denial.

The Germans have a pretty story about a little girl named Jeannette, who once went out to see a grand review of troops. She found an excellent place from which she could enjoy the fine spectacle, when she observed an old woman behind her, trying very hard to get where she could see the soldiers. Jeannette pitied her, and said to herself: 'I should like to see the troops march, but it is not kind in me to stay in this nice seat and let the old woman stand there where she can't see anything. I ought to honour old age, and I will.'

So Jeannette called the old woman, and placing her in her own comfortable seat, quietly retired among the crowd. There she had to stand on tiptoe, and peep, and dodge about, to catch even a glimpse of the splendid scene which she might have seen so easily if she had kept her place. Some of the people laughed at her and called her a silly girl. It was hard to bear this, but still Jeannette was not sorry that she had done her duty.

A few minutes later a man in gay uniform elbowed his way through the crowd and said to her, 'Little girl, will you come to her ladyship?'

Jeannette could not imagine who her ladyship was or what she could possibly want with her, but she followed the man to a sort of balcony not far off. A lady with a pleasant smile said to her: 'My dear child, I saw you give up your seat to the old woman. You acted nobly. Now, sit down by me. You can see everything here.' And thus for a second time was Jeannette rewarded for honouring old age by practising self-denial herself.

We ought not to expect to be paid for doing our duty, but it will often happen that we shall be. Even when no rich person sees and rewards us here, there is One whose approval we shall be sure to win—the approval of the Saviour who 'pleased not Himself.'

There was once a most devoted clergyman in England, named Fletcher, who, for a long while had attracted the attention of good people by his faithful discharge of his duties. At length a friend went to him and said: 'I can get the parish of Durham in Cheshire for you, if you will take it. The work is light and the income good'. It was two thousand dollars a year.

Mr. Fletcher mused a little while, and meekly answered: 'I thank you very heartily for your kind intentions for me; but really that parish will not suit me. There is too much money and too little work.'

'A very singular objection!' said the other, 'and one which few men would make. It is a great pity to decline such an excellent parish. But how would you like Madeley?'

Mr. Fletcher's face brightened: 'That would be the very place for me'. And he took it with only half the salary offered him at the other parish; and there, in the practice of the self-denial which he had learned from his Heavenly Master, he passed his useful life.—JOHN N. NORTON, Milk and Honey, p. 61.

PLEASING OTHERS I

'Christ pleased not Himself.'—ROMANS XV. 3.

SHALL we all say it? Do you know it? Does every one know it? Say it with me, please. 'Christ pleased not Himself.'

I want to talk now about being selfish or unselfish. Which are you? Are you a selfish girl? Are you a selfish boy? I want to try and help you to be unselfish. Oh! there are a great many who are selfish. With some people it is 'I, I, I, I; me, me, me, me'. Shall I tell you that that is very unlike Jesus. Don't be very fond of saying 'I, I, I, I' and 'me, me, me, me'. I am sure Jesus is not. Think what it was for Jesus to be so unselfish, to leave that beautiful home, and the holy angels, and to come down to this poor earth. Was that selfish? Was it selfish to come and be laid in a manger, where the oxen were feeding? in a poor shed by the side of the house. They would not let Him come inside the house, because 'there was no room for Him'. Was it selfish to be brought up as a boy in a carpenter's shop, perhaps to work at the carpentering; to go of His own accord, without being told to go, and learn of the doctors in the Temple, rather than go home with His mother. Was that selfish? And when He grew up to be a man, and was thirty years old, He went about working. I do not know of anybody in the world working so hard; getting up so early in the morning; going about so late; going home so late; sometimes stopping up all night. He did not have time to get His dinner; He did not have time to get His meals. And what was so beautiful, He did not take the praise to Himself. He said, 'My Father doeth all things'. He gave all the honour to His Father. That was not selfish. He did the beautiful work, and then gave all the honour to His Father. And He was so poor! Do you know how poor He was? How much money do you think He had? Never a bit. Never a bit. He had no money. He had no bed to lie upon. 'The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests,' but He had not a bed to lay His head upon. I suppose His clothes were given Him by the friends who made those clothes for Him. Oh! He was so poor! I do not wonder at a little boy who was reading about all this saying, 'Oh! mother, oh! mother, if I had been alive when Jesus was here, wouldn't I have taken Him my pillow'. Would you have taken Jesus your pillow? He had no bed to lie upon. And look how He lived. He walked through the streets with those fishermen. How people laughed at Him walking with those fishermen! He did not mind being laughed at. They called Him all sorts of names. And then, you know, they spat upon Him, and did everything to try and irritate Him, and make Him angry, but He never was angry. Then they scourged Him. He could in a moment have called the angels from heaven and killed them all, but He did not. He was not selfish. He bore it all. And when He was before Pilate, Peter said, 'I do not know Him!' and was ashamed of Him. And John ran away, even John who lay on His bosom. John ran away from Him. They all ran away from Him. And Judas went and betrayed Him, who was so good and so kind a Friend. And then those cruel nails went through Him. And it became all dark. And then He says, 'My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?' Oh! I am sure that could not have been to 'please Himself'. It could not have been to 'please himself'. And why? He had no self in Him, no selfishness in Him. He lived for us; He died for us; He raised Himself to heaven for us. There is no self in Christ. You will see one great thing in Christ—He is unselfish in everything.

I want now to try to help you to copy Christ. What is the way? What is the first way? Copy Christ! Do you know how you can copy Him? Do you? Some boys and girls look on the line just above the one they are writing, and do not look at the top line. That is a very bad way to copy a copy. Take care when you are copying Christ that you do not copy the copy. Do not copy that boy or girl, and say, 'They are so good I will copy them'. That is the copy of the copy. What is the top line? 'Jesus.' Copy Jesus, and then you will be right. I know you cannot really be like Him, but you can try. You can try.

I remember two brothers made an agreement, and the agreement they made was this—that when they wrote about what Jesus said they would always put a large 'I', and when they wrote what they said or thought, they would put a little 'i'. The little 'i' was for themselves, and the great 'I' for Jesus. Let us all remember that we will all put a little 'i' for ourselves, and a great 'I' for Jesus.

Now, mind that you follow me, What shall we do to be unselfish? I will ask again, Do you think you are unselfish? Let us look at it. When you are called in the morning, and it is time to get up, do you get up in a moment, or do you 'please yourself', and say, 'The bed is so comfortable, I will stop a little longer'? You know it is your duty to get up now the time is come. Begin the day with a good start. The first thing is to conquer yourself, and then, when you have got a victory over self, you have not pleased yourself.

In the time of Charles the First there was a great general officer. He was a man of great power, and the king asked him to come and help him, and fight for him. The general said, 'I should like very much to come and help, but there is one thing stands in the way—I cannot get up early in the morning'. There was this general officer kept from his duties because he was so fond of his bed. He was a poor soldier. A soldier must 'endure hardship'. And if you are soldiers of Christ, you must endure hardship. Don't please yourself in regard to your bed.

Now you are going to dress. How shall you be like Christ? How shall you not please yourself in your dressing? How? Are you to please anybody? Yes. Are you to please yourself? Well, not quite. Well, who are you to please? Somebody, somebody. Please your father, please your mother, please your brother, please your sister. If you are a wife, please your husband; if you are a husband, please your wife. Please somebody, but don't please yourself. I think a great many girls, and some boys, only just think of pleasing themselves. That is just the opposite of Christ. You should be pleasing in your dress in order to please somebody. You must please God.

And now you are coming down. No, you are not coming down yet. You have not said your prayers. Now don't say your prayers to please self. If your prayers are all 'I, I, I, I', that is about self. Did Christ teach us to say, 'My Father which art in heaven?' No! What did He tell us to say? 'Our Father, our Father,' not 'my Father'. He is the Father of everybody else. Jesus went and prayed for other people, and not for Himself. Do not be selfish, then, but in your prayers think of other people. And when you pray, be careful; do it nicely, don't do it anyhow. Do it nicely, reverently, and religiously. Do it in the way to please God, and then it will be pleasing to God.

But now you are coming down. Don't push down before the rest. If each has to get down to breakfast, let the others go first. I knew a dear little girl who let her sister go forward on the stairs, and as she went by she said, 'Blessed are the peacemakers'. Remember that, and always let the others go first.

But now you have come down. Is it right to be shy? Supposing there is some company, some people in the room, is it right to be shy? No. What makes people shy? Thinking too much about themselves. 'But what will that lady think of me?' Don't think about that, do what is right. You are thinking about yourself too much. Shyness has a great deal to do with pride. If you were humble you would not have so much to do with pride. Don't be shy; be humble and modest.

Now you are sitting yourself to your meals. Don't be selfish. If there is a dish, and not very much in that dish, don't you say, 'I will have one of those nice bits'. No, let other people have them. And if there is one big piece and another little piece, don't you go and take the big piece. That is selfish eating and drinking. You know what I mean, don't you?

Well then, all day, try to make every one in the house happy. If you begin life by trying to make yourself happy, you won't make yourself happy; but if you begin life by making everybody else happy, you will live a very happy life.

I heard of a beautiful epitaph that was placed on the tombstone over the grave of a young woman. It was this, 'She always made home happy!' Now that was very beautiful. I wonder if that will be said of you when you die. 'She always made home happy.' I don't know anything that could be said more to the praise of any woman, or any man. 'They made home happy.' Do you? Do you make your home happy? Never cross, never letting people think, 'Oh! I wish she was gone'. Do you always make home happy? Is the school any happier because you are there? And home happier because you are there?

And then always, every day, have something to do that will show you are not selfish; something to do for somebody. Supposing you say, 'There shan't be a day I do not do something to make somebody happier'. Supposing you have lived ten years, and have made a person happy every day, why you will have made 3650 persons happy! A big town, a county almost. If you had made a person happy every day for ten years, you would have made happy 3650 persons. That is something to live for, isn't it? And when you are ten years older, you may say, 'I have made 3650 people happy'. I hope you will be able to say that!

I read in a book—I don't know whether it is true, I rather doubt it—I read of a little boy. One day he was seen in the garden doing something to the ground, and who should come by but the Duke of Wellington. As he passed by he saw this little boy busy about something, and he said, 'Why, boy, what are you doing?' 'Oh!' said the boy, 'here is a sick toad. I am trying to make this toad well and happy.' And the Duke of Wellington said, 'But ought not you to be at school?' 'Yes,' said the boy, 'but I am trying to make the toad well.' 'You go to school,' said the Duke, 'I will take care of the toad.' And the little boy went to school, and the Duke of Wellington attended to the poor toad, and in the course of the day the boy received a letter, in the Duke of Wellington's own handwriting, to say the toad was well. I do not know whether the story was true, but it teaches us a lesson. It was very good of the boy, and very grand of the Duke. He was not selfish; he was trying to make others happy.

Well, I will say a little more about how we are to be unselfish. The first thing is to put self low, and Christ high.

Frank and Ada were brother and sister, and one day their papa came home and brought them each a book, very beautifully bound. They were both the same size, but one of the books had a great many pictures in it, and the other book had no pictures. Of course each would like the book with the pictures. Frank said, 'Give it to Ada, because she is a girl'; but Ada said, 'Give it to Frank, because he is the eldest'. Each wished the other to have it. What should they do? Who was the father to give the book to? He gave it to Frank, because Frank was the eldest.

I can tell you of another little girl, her name was Ellen. One night—she was a little girl—she sat on her mamma's lap, and she said, 'Oh! mamma, I feel very different to what I generally do to-night'. And her mamma said, 'Why do you feel different?' 'Oh!' said the little girl, 'you send me to do things for grandmamma, and I did not like doing things for her. I knew it was wrong. I have done them in a sulky way, but to-day I knew how wicked it was, and before I rang grandmamma's bell, I went round under the lilac tree, and I prayed to God to make me a better girl, and to do all that grandmamma wanted. I saw at once grandmamma wanted something, and I ran and fetched it, and I feel so beautiful now. I am so happy to-night, mamma.' She did not please herself, so she felt so beautiful; and she was beautiful in God's eyes. She made her grandmamma happy, and then she went home happy.

I want each of you to feel like a little gentle stream. Have you in the country ever looked at a little stream? It seems to make everything happy about it. The flowers spring up, and the grass is so green just round this little stream. And why shouldn't you be a little stream, making the flowers come everywhere? Try to be like the little gentle stream.

Everybody is made up of four parts. This I read in a book. Rather funny to have four parts! Shall I tell you what they are? A warehouse, a workshop, a clock-tower, and a counting-house. Do you understand me? That is what you have got—a warehouse, a workshop, a clock-tower, and a counting-house.

What is your warehouse? Your memory. You lay up all sorts of knowledge in your memory. That is your warehouse.

What is your workshop? Your hands.

What is the clock-tower? Your face. The tongue is the bell, and that has to go very sweetly, and very beautifully, like the new bells at Hove. You are to make everybody happy.

What is the counting-house where the accounts are settled? Conscience is the counting-house, and there all the accounts are settled.

And you should use them all for other people. Remember them all—the warehouse, the workshop, the clock-tower, and the counting-house. Do all this, and you will not be selfish.—JAMES VAUGHAN.

THE FIRST EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS

THE HIGHEST SUMMIT

‘For I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and Him crucified.’—1 CORINTHIANS II. 2.

I. THE highest point of a chain of mountains is generally visible from every quarter of the horizon ; so it is with the cross of Jesus Christ, which is mentioned in almost every page in the Bible, from the Garden of Eden, when it was almost lost in the distant future. When God spoke unto the serpent, and said that the child of the woman would crush its head, and that he, the serpent, would bruise his heel, He meant that the day would come when the power of evil would cause the death of Jesus Christ, Who would, nevertheless, crush and destroy it. Do you not already discern the tragedy of Golgotha through this first prophecy ? And several centuries later, we again perceive the cross, but more distinctly this time, when in the wilderness of Arabia, which the Jews crossed before reaching the Land of Canaan, Moses caused a brazen serpent to be fastened on the top of a pole, enjoining the people to turn their eyes to it with faith, that they might be cured of the bite of the fiery serpents who had caused the death of thousands. Was not that brazen serpent an allegory of our Lord Jesus Christ nailed upon the cross, and to Whom we must turn for the remission of our sins ? Later still, we find the same allegory in the sacrifices offered by the Jews, and specially in the paschal lamb, that spotless lamb of which not a bone was broken, and which was slain on the fourteenth of the month of Nisan. Has not the Lamb of God given His life on the day of the Passover, on that same fourteenth of the month of Nisan, and had not the Scripture said that not a bone of Him should be broken ? The centuries glide on, and still the cross appears on the horizon.

II. From that culminating point which commands the whole Scripture, from the Book of Genesis to the Book of Revelation, from an earthly paradise to the celestial one, we discover two seas, two immensities, the one of evil, the other overflowing with Divine mercies.

You have often seen that small instrument called a thermometer which indicates the degree of cold or heat of the atmosphere. It consists of a narrow glass tube filled with a liquid either red or silvery, fastened to a small board, upon which are written the different degrees. When the weather is hot, the liquid rises, but with the slightest accession of cold it sinks again. I shall tell you of another sort of thermometer, which has nothing to do with the weather, but which marks the warmth of hearts : by warmth of hearts I mean kindness and lovingness. If I wish to know whether a little boy really loves his father, do not suppose I shall ask him to read the letters which he writes to him, if he happens to be away from home. Words or letters were never a true thermometer of hearts ; and however fervent they may be, still the heart that wrote or spoke them may have been cold. No, indeed ! I shall rather wait and see whether the boy really does what he can to please his father, either by his application to his studies, or by endeavouring to cure himself of some bad habit or of some fault ; and if I find him ready to give up to his father even the thing he cares the most for, I shall say, ‘ Here is a child who really loves his parent ’.

What I say about the feelings of a child towards his father, I might say about every other sort of love, let it be fraternal, friendly, patriotic, or divine. I might say it also about God’s love towards us. The greater the sacrifice, the deeper the love ; and He has so loved the world that He gave His only Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life. It is only when you have felt the love of parents for their children that you will fully understand the greatness of this sacrifice. That love of God is all the more admirable that we are so unworthy of it, and that He often meets with nothing but ungraciousness in return.

The lesson of what I have said might be easily learned by all, still three short stories will make it clearer.

1. ‘ One day,’ writes a missionary, ‘ I had been reading to a Greenland chief called Kajarnak the account of the sufferings and of the death of Jesus Christ.

“ What had He done ? ” inquired Kajarnak. “ Had He murdered any one ? ”

“ No ! ”

“ Had He then stolen anything ? ”

“ No ; He had done no harm, and the governor of the country had declared Him innocent.”

“ But why was He put to death ? ”

“ Why ? Listen and you will hear. No, Jesus had done no harm, He had neither killed nor stolen ; but Kajarnak was a great sinner, he had murdered his own child and his brother, so Jesus came upon earth, and suffered and died upon the cross, so that Kajarnak might be forgiven, and in spite of all his crimes obtain access to heaven.”

“ How so ? ” exclaimed the chief. “ Missionary, repeat that over again.”

And the account was read a second time, fresh explanations given, and the Greenland chief, till then hardened and bloodthirsty, became the humble and faithful disciple of the Lord Jesus.

2. Now for my second story. In the beginning of the last century there lived a man of great piety, whose whole life and fortune were devoted to the service of God. His name was Count Zinzendorf. When he was about nineteen years of age he was in Dresden with some friends, visiting the famous gallery, which was at the time one of the great attractions of the town. Of all these celebrated paintings one only attracted the notice of the young man. It was, as he himself relates, a Christ upon the cross, whose face wore a Divine expression, and under which were written the words, 'Hoc feci pro te, quid fecisti pro me?' (See what I have done for thee, what hast thou done for Me?) 'No answer came to my lips,' writes Count Zinzendorf, 'and I could only entreat my Saviour to compel me to suffer with Him, if I was not ready to do so of my own free will.'

If the Saviour were to ask that same question of you, what would be your answer; have you really done anything to prove your love and your gratitude? Perhaps you would answer that you have nothing to give. There you would be wrong, as you will see when you have heard my last story.

3. In a forest of West America, a man having heard a most impressive sermon upon the death of Christ, approached the preacher and asked:—

'Did Jesus die also for me, a poor Indian?'

'Yes, Jesus died for you.'

'Well, then, here are my gun and my blanket. I have nothing else, but I give them to Him.'

'But Jesus has no need of such things,' replied the missionary, 'it is your heart which He asks of you.'

The poor ignorant creature turned away sadly, but he returned the next day and said to the missionary:—

'Here is the poor Indian! Will Jesus have him?'

Do as the poor Indian did. Give your hearts and your love to Jesus, and when you have got to love Him, you will understand what you can do for Him. Remember that He who wins the heart, wins the key which opens every treasure.—A. DECOFFET, Sermons for Children, p. 64.

THINGS WHICH GOD HATH PREPARED

I CORINTHIANS II. 9.

ONE day a mother and her son were travelling in an Eastern land. It is different there from what it is in England. In this country we have dew and rain and wells and rivers, and our rivers never run dry. But in the East the sun is sometimes so hot that it dries up the dew and the rain and wells and rivers. And the grass is burned up, and the leaves fall from the trees, and there is no water to drink, and people die of thirst.

It was Hagar and Ishmael her son, who were travelling in that hot land. They had been sent away from Abraham's tent. The water they brought with them in their skin bottle was all spent. The hot sun beat upon their heads. And poor Ishmael grew sick for want of water, and was near to die. It was a wilderness into which they had come. There were neither roads, nor houses, nor inns in it. And they could find no wells with water in them, no cool rushing streams, no green pastures, no shady trees. There was only the hot earth, with the blistering rocks and the burned up grass beneath their feet, and above their heads the blazing sun.

When people are very sad they are often not sure about their way; tears blind the eyes. Hagar was very sad. She loved Abraham. He was the father of her boy. His tent had been her home for many years. It was the only home the boy ever knew. And now she was homeless. And her boy had no father to care for him. And he was about to die in the wilderness. What was she to do? She could not carry him, he was a big grown-up lad. And she could not bear to be beside him when she was not able to give him help. Poor Hagar! She did the best she could. There was a little clump of brush-wood near, and she laid him down there in the shadow. She herself drew back a little, and burst into tears; she could not bear to lose her boy, or to see him die.

But just then, when things were at the worst, she heard a voice. It was the voice of an angel. 'What aileth thee, Hagar?' the voice said; 'God hath heard the cry of thy child.' And suddenly, it was as if scales fell from the poor mother's eyes, and she saw there, in that very place, the thing she most wished to see, a well with water in it. In a moment her heart was filled with gladness. Her tears dried up. And she made haste and brought of the water to her boy, and he drank and did not die. Now God did not make that well that day; the well was there, although Hagar did not see it at first. The well had been there perhaps from the beginning of the world. It was prepared by God, and prepared for Hagar and her boy. Just there, where it was wanted by these two, God had prepared it, preserved it from being filled up, kept water in it, all ready, for years and years, till the day when Ishmael should need to drink of it and live.

Two young students were sitting one winter evening beside a fire. They had had a long talk together, and mostly about God. One of the two had lost sight of God and could not find Him again. He had been telling his friend this very fact, and saying that he could find no sign of Him in the world, or in his own heart.

It was no joy to this young soul that he had lost sight of God. He was not one of the evil class who sit in the chair of the scorner. He was filled with the same kind of sorrow that one has who has lost a friend. He had willingly listened to all that his companion had to say to him. And then the talk between the two ceased, and they were sitting silent, looking into the fire.

'Oh, my friend,' said the one who had lost sight of God, 'sitting as we are doing now, I sometimes see faces of people I have known, in the fire. From my heart I wish I could see the face of God there.'

The friend said: 'And does not something like God's face really shine out from this fire? Would there have been any fire for us two this night if some loving One had not been thinking of us before we were born? Who made the coals which are burning there? Who stored them up in the earth for the children of men? Who gave the eyes to find it, and the hands to dig it out?'

His companion did not answer, and he went on. 'I do not wonder that people used to believe that fire was stolen from heaven. It is just like a thing that came from heaven. It turns winter into summer and night into day; it cheers us, warms us, brightens our home for us. It renders us a thousand services which it must have been intended to render, and which seem to compel one to think that it was prepared by God for our use.'

I cannot tell what effect these words had on the young man who had lost sight of God. But the well which Hagar found prepared for her, and what this young student said to his sorrowful friend, have set me a-thinking of the things which God has prepared.

We are living in a world which is full of things prepared. A fire far bigger than the one those young men sat beside has been prepared and kept burning by God for a longer time than you or I could tell. The sun is a fire around which all living things are gathered. It is life, and heat, and health, and light, and joy, and movement to man and beast, to birds and trees. It sends its heat and power into all things, and makes all things fruitful, and active, and glad.

And not the sun only, but moon, and stars, and hills, and streams, and fruitful fields. An old English poet has said this in words which every child should have by heart:—

For us the winds do blow;
The earth doth rest, heaven move, and fountains flow.
Nothing we see but means our good,
As our delight, or as our treasure.
The whole is, either our cupboard of food
Or cabinet of pleasure.

The stars have us to bed;
Night draws the curtain, which the sun withdraws;
Music and light attend our head,
All things unto our flesh are kind.

And all things have been prepared for us by God. He has brought us into a heritage that is very fair, and He has filled it with things good for our use.

When the children of Israel came up out of the wilderness into the Land of Promise they found houses, and gardens, and walled cities, and vineyards, and olive yards, and ploughed fields, and rich pasture lands all prepared for them. It is God's way in dealing with His children. He prepares good things for them first, and then brings them in to love Him and serve Him in the enjoyment of these. 'See,' He said to the children of Israel afterwards, speaking by the mouth of Joshua: 'I have given you a land for which ye did not labour, and cities which ye built not, and ye dwell in them; of the vineyards and olive yards which ye planted not do ye eat. Now, therefore, fear the Lord and serve Him in sincerity and truth.'

And it is just this way God has dealt with you to whom I am this day speaking. You came from God as babies into this Christian land. When you opened your eyes and began to look about you you found yourselves in homes prepared for you, with loving mothers and fathers waiting to take care of you. You found yourselves in a land of churches, and days of worship, and Bibles, and schools, and teachers. Around the fire on winter evenings you have listened to stories of patriots who fought and of martyrs who died, for their country and for truth; these very stories are part of what God has prepared for you in this happy land. Beside you, perhaps in the same street or village in which you live, are men and women who have given themselves to God, and who every day of their lives, quietly and unseen, are going about doing good; these also, to be a help and example to you, have been prepared for you by God. But more wonderful and better than all, in this very land you can find God Himself. There is no spot in it from which the cry of a child's heart will not reach Him. And here, as in Judæa long ago, His Son is taking up children in His arms to bless them, and is healing the sick and opening the eyes of the blind, and saying to the poor and the heavy laden: 'Come unto Me and I will give you rest'. And all this is part of the things which God has prepared for those who love Him.

There is a hymn we sometimes sing, which begins with the words, 'I'm but a stranger here'. In that hymn it is said, 'Earth is a desert drear'. But the meaning is not that the beautiful earth itself which God has prepared for our dwelling-place is a desert. The meaning is that it looks like a desert to eyes that have lost sight of God. It is like a desert also to people like Hagar, who are in sorrow, whose eyes are blind with tears because those they love have died or are about to die.

But for people in these circumstances, and for all to whom for any cause the beautiful earth looks like a desert, God has prepared a well more wonderful than that which Hagar saw. Jesus was speaking of this well when He said to the woman of Samaria, 'whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give shall never thirst'. Jesus Himself—as the Word of God—is this well. He is the well in which the water of life springs up, the well which the saints in heaven drink of, of which God Himself drinks. And it has been prepared for us by God, prepared in Jesus, into whom for us the living water has been poured. And Jesus, thinking of Himself as this well of heaven, calls upon all to come unto Him and drink.

I read once of a young German student who found out this well. He was like one in a wilderness where he could not find God. Like Ishmael, he was dying for thirst, but it was the sight of God for which he was thirsting. Day and night his cry was, 'Oh that I knew where I might find Him!' He saw himself to be a poor sin-laden creature, who was shut out by his sins from the presence of God. Day and night he sought after God. He sought in the church and could not find Him there. He shut himself up in his room, and cried out in the darkness, and could not find Him there. He saw the faces of saints and holy prophets in the fire, but never the face of God. His soul was faint within him for want of God. But one day he went into the library of the college where he was studying, and there, on the shelves, all covered with dust, he found the very well for whose water his soul was thirsting; he found the Bible. There it was, all ready for him, waiting for him, prepared by God hundreds of years before, put there, in that very spot, for him by God. And the young man opened it and read and found the story of Christ in it, and the way by which a soul must go to find God, and how in Jesus a well has been opened for all sin, and that whosoever drank of that well should be cleansed of sin, made holy and live for ever. It was Martin Luther who found the Bible in this wonderful way, and also found, as we also shall do if we try, that it is a well in the desert, a well into which God has poured water of truth and life for the soul to drink of and to live.

One of the wonderful things which Luther read in the Bible was the story of an old prisoner in Rome. The old man was chained to a soldier, and thinking sad thoughts. It was the great Paul. For telling men that Jesus was a well of salvation he had been sent by wicked men to prison. And now his trial was coming on, and his judge was a very evil man, and Paul was thinking in his own heart that the judgment might go against him. It was something like this which was passing through his mind: 'My enemies are cruel, my judge is bad, and I may be condemned to die'. Then he thought of the work which remained to be done. Then he wondered who should do his work if he were put to death. Then he looked into the lonesome grave and across into the world beyond, and there he saw, all prepared for him, the very sight his sad soul wished to see; he saw Jesus on the throne of God. It was like seeing a well in a desert; it was like drinking of living water when the soul is faint with thirst. 'Jesus reigns,' he said to himself. 'The work will go on, though I should die; and if I die, I shall go to Him.'

When you and I come to the end of our lives may we see the vision which Paul saw, and be able to say with him, 'To live is Christ, to die is gain'. And may we know that we are going home to our Father's house, and to places there prepared for us by Christ.

We shall never know the beauty of these places till then. 'Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him.'—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Gentle Heart, p. 153.

THE GARDEN OF GOD

'Ye are God's husbandry.'—1 CORINTHIANS III. 9.

I. Preparing the Soil.—Nobody needs to be much of a gardener in order to know that it is useless to cast seed upon the soil unless the soil be first prepared for it. If you cast seed on the hard surface of a footpath leading through your garden, you need not expect it to grow. The soil of the garden must be turned up with the spade; the plough must be made to go through the field. The earth must be made loose and soft, and the stones taken out of it; and if there be any roots or weeds in it, they must be torn up and thrown away.

Besides, the right time must be selected for doing this. If you had begun to dig your plot two or three months ago, when the atmosphere was bitterly cold, and the frost had gone deep into the ground, you might have succeeded by main force in breaking up the earth and making it loose and soft; but, though you had sowed the best seeds in it, I do not think many of them would have grown. But at this time of the year a kind of force begins to move in the soil which was dormant during the winter; and the favourable moment must be taken advantage of to cast the seed in.

II. The Sowing of the Seed.—What is the seed which is sown in the soul? It is the Word of God. The texts of the Scriptures are like the little seedlets you have wondered at as you were going to bury them in the earth.

There does not seem to be the least resemblance between a text of the Bible and the beauty of a man's soul. Yet the one may grow into the other. The words of the Bible are the thoughts of God; and all thoughts are like seeds; they may grow into forms as different from themselves as the flower is different from the seed. Look at this church rising above us. It is something beautiful and substantial, is it not? But it is not long since it was only a thought in a man's mind. The architect saw it in his mind before there was one stone dug from the quarry to build it. But his thought was sown and took root, and this is the flower it has grown to.

It is very wonderful what a thought or a word may grow to. All the grand and beautiful works of man are the flowers which have grown from his thoughts; for they existed as thoughts in his mind before they grew to be realities which all the world can see.

Now, if man's thoughts are seeds which can grow to such wonderful shapes, it is not surprising that God's thoughts should be the seeds of very beautiful flowers.

III. The Growth of the Seed.—When the seed is put into its place in the earth it is covered over, and it seems as if it were dead and buried. But a mysterious process is going on. The little seedlet opens its mouth, and draws in the sap and the substance of the soil round about it; and the richer the soil is in which it is planted, the more food does it get, and the faster does it grow. It begins to expand and make room for itself. Then it sends a tiny shoot upwards, which struggles through the earth in which it is buried. But it pauses; it is waiting for something. By and by a little raindrop finds its way down through the earth to it, and is followed by another and another. It drinks them eagerly in, and begins to push upwards again, like a vigorous worker who has been refreshed by a deep draught of water. But soon it pauses again; it is waiting for something else. By and by a sunbeam cleaves its way down to it, and is followed by another and another. This was what it was waiting for, and it thrills with joy as it feels the heat going through and through it. Upwards still it pushes its way, till at last—look!—it comes forth into the open air and the full sunshine; the rain washes it clean, the breeze kisses it, and the dew moistens its lips every night. And so it rises slowly from stage to stage, till it is a perfect flower.

Now, the seed in the soul grows in the same way. It may long remain unseen, and yet it may be alive and slowly coming to the surface. It grows little by little and stage by stage. God does not expect you to be in your characters exactly like men and women. He does not wish you to be as wise or as bold or as active as you may be expected to be some years hence. There are graces of childhood, and graces of youth, and graces of manhood and womanhood, and graces of old age; and God likes best to see each time of life yielding its own fruit.

But at all stages the growth of the seed depends on getting the sunshine and the rain and the sap of the soil. What are these? Well, I should say the sap which enriches the soil of the soul is Christ. Just as the flower would starve and die if it were not being filled with the substance of the earth, so all the lovely flowers of the soul will die unless the soul be filled with Christ. Will you seek, therefore, that Christ may be in you, that He may come and fill your soul? You never can be truly good or beautiful within unless you be united to Him.

IV. The Flowers of God.—Some of you, I dare say, have very many different kinds of flowers in your garden in the course of the year. You have crocuses and pansies, and mignonette and roses, and I do not know what all. It would be a strange garden in which there were only flowers of one kind. And what a treat it is to get into a great and fine garden, and see flowers of a hundred kinds and a hundred colours blazing on every side!

We like variety in a garden, and God likes it too. Have you ever thought that God loves beauty and that He loves variety of beauty? Why else has He created all the different kinds of flowers, with their endless variety of colour? He might have made the earth all of one colour. He might have made the grass colourless instead of a bright green, and the sky black instead of blue, and the stars white instead of sparkling gold. The prairies and the mountain solitudes are God's gardens, where He walks alone in the midst of beauty.

But there are gardens He loves still better. They are the souls of children and of men and women in which the flowers of His grace are growing. What are these flowers? Here is one list of them: 'The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance'. And here is another: 'Add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience godliness; and to godliness brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness charity'. These are lovely flowers. What an exquisite flower is virtue, or Christian manliness, with the crimson flush of the rose on it! And how beautiful a flower is humility, drooping its head like a lily; and brotherly kindness, with the homely grace of the daisy; and love, with the clinging clusters and the fragrance of the honey-suckle!

Would you not like your soul to be a garden with these lovely flowers growing in it—a garden of God, in which He would delight? Yes; He comes down and walks in His garden, and inspects every plant in it.

V. God's Other Garden.—The flowers in your gardens are either plucked or they very soon die. When winter comes round and the keen frost holds the earth in its iron grasp, not one of them is visible. But God's flowers do not thus decay. What becomes of them? You have sometimes, I dare say, transplanted a flower from one part of your garden to another, because you thought it would grow better in the new spot. And you know that, as winter approaches, the gardener sometimes lifts plants out of the ground, and transfers them to the hothouse, where they will be shielded from the withering winds and saved from the biting frost.

That is something like what God does with His flowers. When the right time comes He transplants them from this world to the better land. There the soil is far richer, and the dews are far more refreshing, and the sunshine is bright and constant. There God's flowers will grow to a size and shine with a beauty they have never had in this poor cold world. God walks about among them and rejoices in them all; and the light of His countenance as He passes by makes them flourish with a more immortal bloom. Oh, may you and I be so filled with the beauty of God here below, that if death come and take us away, our loved ones whom we leave behind may be able to say, 'We will not weep. It is another flower transplanted to God's other garden.'—JAMES STALKER, The New Song, p. 38.

SLAVES

'Ye are not your own, for ye are bought with a price.'—
1 CORINTHIANS VI. 19, 20.

I HAVE lived long enough to see some very grand sights. I have seen our armies come home victorious from battle; I have seen our Queen sail down between the lines of her fleet, when the air was dense with the smoke of the cannon that thundered their salute, and even above that rose the hearty cheers of her sailors as they 'manned the yards'; but I never felt so proud of England as one day when I saw a man, once a negro slave—who had been once given in exchange for a horse, and another time sold for some tobacco—walk up the theatre at Oxford, no longer a slave and heathen, but a clergyman of the English Church, and receive the highest honour the greatest university in the world could confer upon him. Bishop Crowther, as a Doctor of Divinity, took his seat among the most learned and the greatest in the land. I often hear boys and girls saying they want something to read. I think a part of our children's time for reading might well be given to reading such stories as these; learning how, in days of old, good men and true, good women and true, have had to fight hard and to sacrifice much for these glorious blessings which we ourselves, and millions of our fellow-subjects in every clime, this day enjoy. The memory of their lives and of their struggles is like a fresh mountain breeze coming down to purify the close, selfish atmosphere in which so many of us live.

I. What was it that made slavery so terrible a state of life? The slave was completely in the power of his owner—entirely at the disposal of his master. Neither his body nor his soul was his; his children were not under his control, the master might sell them any day to some other master. In other words, a slave was not his own; he was 'bought with a price'. Now, curiously enough, that is just what St. Paul tells us we Christians are. When you think of what 'a slave' meant, is it not surprising that there was no title of which St. Paul seems to have been so proud as the title of 'slave'? Whenever the word 'servant' is used in our translation in the Epistles, the word is really 'slave,' or bond-servant; and the great Apostle boasts again and again that he is a 'bond-servant of Jesus Christ'. He often commences his letters thus. He wrote to the Philippians, 'Paul and Timothy, the bond-servants of Jesus Christ'. He opens his great Epistle to the Romans, 'Paul, a bond-servant of Jesus Christ'. St. Paul tells all Christians that they have the same great privilege for which he was so thankful and of which he was so proud—they are bond-servants, or slaves, of Jesus Christ. Why did St. Paul so rejoice in being a slave of his Master? Because, strange though it may seem, this slavery is the only real liberty on earth. There are some wonderful words in a prayer in our Morning Service which explain this. We say, 'O God, who art the author of peace and lover of concord . . . whose service is perfect freedom'. In the old Latin prayer from which these words come the last sentence is more striking, and might be translated, 'to be whose slaves is to be kings'.

II. You were all the slaves of sin, just as the poor negroes were the slaves of their masters. England paid twenty millions of pounds to deliver these slaves. That was an immense sum with which to buy the poor negroes out of bondage. It wasn't a drop in the Atlantic or the millionth part of a drop in the ocean, if you can imagine that, compared to the price with which we have been bought by Jesus Christ. The price He paid for us was Himself. Does not that thought of the greatness of His love to you stir up some love in your hearts for Him? Whenever you feel inclined to obey sin, to yield to that bad temper, to speak that angry word, to indulge in that forbidden ease, to utter that lie, to disobey your father or mother, to listen to that to which you feel you ought not to listen, or any of the hundred other things that are sinful, just think one moment Whose you are—what a price He paid; and let every feeling of gratitude and of love rise up in your hearts, and say to that sin, 'I am the slave of Jesus Christ—body and soul His; and, with His blessing, I will obey Him and not you'.—T. TRICHO-MOUTH SHORE, Saint George for England, p. 71.

BOUGHT WITH A PRICE

'Ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God in your bodies and your spirit, which are God's.'—1 CORINTHIANS VI. 20.

LIFE is a very strange thing, and to a great many people simply means 'selfishness' in one form or another. But I want to put before you this evening some facts out of God's own Word which tell us what life really is, why we are here, and while we are here what the religion of Jesus Christ means to each one of us.

I. First of all, then, what is life? Our few days on earth (and how few they are!) which we call our life are but the preparation for the great eternal life which is before us.

If we stand on the sea-shore and take in the palm of our hand one little grain of sand and then compare that one grain with all the sand of shores and deserts of the world, we get but little idea of time as compared with eternity. If we take a drop of water from the sea and then think of the vast oceans that beat upon the countless shores of the world, we fail to grasp the shortness of our life as in comparison with the great future beyond the grave—or as I heard it put by my old rector in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster: 'If you could imagine the greatest sand mountain in the world and then imagine a robin coming once every thousand years and removing a grain of sand in its beak, until the great sand hill was moved to another place'—even then it is impossible to gauge eternity.

These simple illustrations will give us some idea of our life here in comparison with that which is to come. Our life, then, is a preparation, and God places us here for a purpose, and so we come to our second question, Why are we here?

II. For the answer to this question we turn to 1 Corinthians VI. 20: 'Ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God in your body and in your spirit, which are God's'. Here is the purpose of our life—to 'glorify the God who has made us, the God who has redeemed us'. Our thoughts go to the great price paid for our redemption. We seem to see Jesus walking along that Via Dolorosa weighed down by the weight of the cross. We see Him insulted by the crowds which surge around, mocked, spat on, beaten, despised, rejected. We see Him as He draws near the hill Calvary, treading the path of suffering, of degradation, and of agony in all its most terrible meaning; and as we gaze upon His loving face we seem to hear Him say, 'Ye are bought with a price. Ye are not your own.' But the sacrifice is yet incomplete, and there rings out above the babel of the crowd the dull thud of the hammer as the nails are driven home through His hands and His feet, and the great cross, with that suffering body upon it, is raised in its place. Ah! how we seem to realise as we gaze, the truth—the eternal truth—of these words, 'Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price'.

III. 'Ye are bought with a price, therefore glorify God in your body and in your spirit, which are God's.' Here is the purpose. How far have you and I fulfilled it? Are we living for Him, or are we simply miserable victims and slaves of a life of selfishness? If we are living for self we can't be living for God in the way in which He has called us to live for Him.

There was once a young clergyman working in a mining village. The miners paid little attention to his message, but he laboured on, and week by week tried his best to win these rough miners for Christ. He used to have a short service every Wednesday evening in the church, and to this he generally got a few of the miners' wives and their children. Few of the miners ever came near the service, and as weeks and months passed away he began to despair of ever reaching them. One evening he had begun the service as usual and was just giving out his text: 'Greater love hath no man than this'—so far he had read when a dull roar of voices was heard outside; nearer came the unwonted sounds and the church door was burst open, while an excited crowd of men and women rushed up to the preacher with the terrible message, 'The pit's on fire! Come!' Hastily unrobing, the young clergyman made his way to the pit's mouth. The cage was just going down with an exploring party and he tried to jump in; but a burly miner stopped him, saying, 'Maister, it beant' for you—it beant' for you'. But, unheeding, the preacher forced his way into the cage, and soon was with the others near the scene of the disaster; man after man was recovered from the débris, and soon the cage was almost full. There is only room for one; the young clergyman half-dragged, half-carried a poor miner whom he had just recovered from the workings and placed him on the cage. There is no room for the rescuer; he must wait, he says, until the cage comes down again. Up the cage goes with its living burden, when suddenly there is heard the dull roar of falling earth and rocks, and the people realise with a sickening sense of horror that the pit has fallen in—it was too true. The young clergyman had died in trying to save his people. Very tenderly did they place his body by the pit's mouth, and as it lay there it preached a more real sermon than he could ever have preached in life. The old miner whose life he had saved came, and with a voice husky with emotion, said: 'He gave his life for me'. The text which had been begun in the pulpit a few hours before was finished now. 'Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.'

IV. So we see what our life is—a preparation for the future life. Why we are here—to glorify God in our bodies and our spirits, which are His. And now we come to our last thought. What does the Lord Jesus Christ do for each one of us who are His? In 1 Peter iii. 18 we read, 'Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the Just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God,' and so we are able, through the Lord Jesus, to enter into God's presence. We are able to pray to Him as our Father; we are able to look up to Him as the one who holds our right hand and says to us, amid many difficulties, trials, and temptations: 'Fear not, I will help thee'. —NORMAN BENNET, Be True: And Other Sermons for Boys, p. 48.

HEAVENLY CURES FOR YOUTHFUL CARES

'I would have you without carefulness.'—I CORINTHIANS VII. 32.

The old folk think that we young folk have no cares. It is a great mistake. Can we not weep as bitterly as they? Do we not play as passionately as our fathers and mothers ever loved or laboured? Are not our plans as terribly real to us as theirs to them? And do not other wills cross ours as gallingly as theirs were ever crossed? Yet because we are children these are trifles. And because they are grown folks, those are cares. They laugh at us because we worry. Over their own worries they break their hearts.

I fancy that in heaven the laugh, if laugh there be, is on the children's side. Around God's throne, 'above the smoke and stir of this dim spot,' as Milton has it in a poem you must all get by heart some day, the great things and the small things here are not so different as the grown folk think them. I am sure that many a game at marbles is far more real in God's sight than half the tricky business in the offices. To cherubim and seraphim there cannot be much difference 'twixt worrying about a doll and worrying about a thousand sovereigns. When the old folk reach heaven, perhaps they will find they have been the children. Then at long last they will have a fellow-feeling with us. And they will see the pride of it all, in having smiled at the young folk's cares, and all the time grown lean over their own.

What are the heavenly cures for youthful cares?

I. The first is Consider. 'Consider the lilies of the fields,' says Jesus, 'they toil not, neither do they spin. And yet I say unto you that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these.' Now you have botanised perhaps; or you have plucked the lilies and adorned your tables with them. But did you ever consider? That is the question. It wants but little time, few talents, and no money, yet we all cry and carp and quarrel, but consider—never! When did you ever steal away from the crowd and clamour of the school, and sit alone, and listen to the hum of myriad wings of indistinguishable creatures, and watch the flowers, and think how all the time that you were fretting, God's children of the fields were growing silently upwards into beauty, till even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these? When did you ever rise ten minutes earlier to hear the Psalms and hymns and spiritual songs of the congregation in the tree-tops? Lift up your eyes on high, and behold who hath created these things that bringeth out their host by number. For that He is strong in power, not one faileth.

II. The second cure is Cast.—Cast thy burden on the Lord, and He will sustain thee. Cast all your care upon Him, for He careth for you. Consider took you out into the fields. Cast takes you right to God. And so consider is a good word, but cast is a better.

Sometimes when the storm is driving through the Pentland, the stoutest ships are glad to run into the lee of Holborn Head and to cast anchor there. The pilot has considered everything, but considering alone will never save the ship. Considering must end in casting, or there will be wreckage after all. Now an anchor is not a pleasant thing to look at. It does not rise with grace like the mast, nor stream out proudly like the pennon. But there are times when mast and pennon would be but sorry furniture, but for the ugly anchor. And at these times men do not keep the anchor on board. They cast it out on to the anchorage, and so anchored, the ship rides in safety. I sometimes think God meant our cares, no less than our hopes, to be our anchors. Cares are not glad-some things like joys. They are far liker lead than gossamer. But there come seasons of peril and unsettlement and storm when the casting of that anchor on to the anchorage of God will hold and steady us as nothing else can do. Come, sea-captains (for every lad at heart is that), out with your anchors! God's ways are in the sea. Cast all on God, and He will carry you through.

III. These then are two of the Gospel cures. But there is still another—Come. 'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest.' Considering and casting, these are good. But coming is the best of all. It takes the others in its arms. All other Bible means and methods for the quieting of hearts and ordering of lives are enfolded here.

What is it to come? It is to trust in Jesus. It is to look to Jesus. It is to kiss His feet, and hold His garment's hem, and cling to Him. It is to lie before the cross and hate ourselves, and tell the Lord that we deserve death and hell, and know it, but that we trust Him. It is all this done daily, truly, yet, alas! how ignorantly, till we die. It is to lean on Jesus, and to lean the hardest in the hardest hours. It is to venture wholly on Him. That is coming. And it is all so strange, so mystical, so desperate, so contrary to every passion and pleasure of the heart I never wondered that the Lord said, 'No man can come to Me, except the Father draw him'. The marvel would be the other way. Come! for you can come. That faintest stirring Christwards in your heart is the first binding of the drawing and everlasting cord. God never drags. God always waits and longs and loves to draw. Trust God. Yield yourselves up to God. 'All that the Father giveth Me shall come to Me, and him that cometh to Me, I will in no wise cast out.'—G. H. MORRISON, The Oldest Trade in the World, p. 25.

THE INCREASING VISION

'For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known.'—1 CORINTHIANS XIII. 12.

THE Bible is of no use to those who have no vision to begin with, any more than a telescope is of any use to a blind man. It must be used, also, by those who have some appreciation of its value as a book of guidance and wisdom.

The first telescope was, undoubtedly, produced in Holland, and, though there is much dispute about it, the credit for its invention is given to Galileo. His first telescope was much like a pair of opera glasses, and could magnify to about thirty times. With such a primitive glass, he succeeded in discovering the satellites of Jupiter, the mountains of the moon and other celestial objects. Kepler improved the telescope by the addition of the second, convex lens. The great telescopes with which we are familiar are the product of very recent times, until now the manufacture of the largest and finest telescopic lenses has become one of the highest arts, with Alvan Clark of Cambridge, Mass., the most successful maker.

In the use of the Bible as a spiritual telescope, we are enabled to bring the far-distant facts of our eternal destiny very near. Yet the truths of the world-to-come are not all equally made clear to us. Some things regarding that future life are made very plain, while others are in the shadow of their own remoteness. However, what we know is exact knowledge, and may be fully relied upon. Let us trust the Word and it will support us in every time of uncertainty and danger.

One time there was a man compelled to cross a river. It was in the winter season, and he found the river frozen over. People who lived near the river told him that it would be perfectly safe to cross upon the ice, but he was so doubtful of what they said that he crawled over upon his hands and knees. When near the middle, he was greatly startled by a sound in the distance, and he waited to see its cause. Presently around a bend of the river, came a negro driving a team of mules drawing a load of pig-iron! What a foolish man he was to be so afraid. It is not necessary to state that after he saw that load of pig-iron he at once arose and walked with perfect confidence. Life has its perils, but the Divine Word gives us the needed assurances, and we should trust our experiences as coming by the direction of an All-wise Providence.

The world of spirits is unseen, but present, now and here. It is the hidden kingdom of God which, in due season, will be revealed. Now in this spring-time, the world of nature shows its hidden powers in the outburst of the life which God hides in it. So in the coming of that eternal spring, for which Christians are waiting. Blessed are they who shall behold what mortal eye hath not seen, when they find themselves gifted with fresh powers, vigorous with the life that is in them.

So then continue to gaze through your telescope of the Word of your God. Look for the new heavens and the new earth. You will see ever new beauties from day to day.—GEORGE V. REICHEL, Bible Truth through Eye and Ear, p. 355.

THE MAGIC CRYSTAL

'Now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face.'—1 CORINTHIANS XIII. 12.

WHAT a lot of things we want to know! We begin by wanting to know 'how the wheels go round,' and then, as we get older, we want to know how the world goes round, why it does it, and what it is all for. We want to know all about this world, and we also want to know all about the next. How are we to learn about these things? That is just what the Apostle is trying to show us.

He says we can see something about them all now, but it is darkly, as if we were looking in a kind of mirror. You children understand what he means. You read fairy tales, and poetry, and other things that are good, so you know all about Merlin and other great and wise magicians. Do you remember how they came to see things that were far away, and tell what was going to happen, and what things had been done? It was by their wonderful crystal globe.

There was the round glass ball as clear as a fountain, without a speck or a flaw, but as the magician gazed upon it, it grew dim, as if the mists were going up within it; and then, as he gazed and gazed, the mists would clear away, and there, on the crystal mirror, he would see all that he wanted to know, whether it was about things far off or near, things past or things to come. 'Twas very wonderful. That crystal globe must have been long since broken or lost, for nobody has it now. It has vanished like the magicians themselves.

But we have a mirror that is like it, though something different. It is the Bible. As we look into it reverently, lovingly, prayerfully, we see more and more, better and clearer, all we want to know about God and ourselves; about the world, and what it is for; about life and death, and everything we need to learn. Make much of your Bible. It is the grandest possession you ever can have. Oh, the happy, happy times I have had with it in some quiet corner! What beautiful visions I have seen in it! What great things I have learnt from it! The real magician—the one who is really wise—is the boy or girl, the man or woman, who loves to look much and often into this mirror, for these come to learn there what never can be seen or learnt anywhere else—the love and the wisdom of God working through everything.

But there is another meaning this text may have. When it says we see 'darkly' or dimly in this mirror, it means that it all looks like 'a riddle'. That is the word you find in the margin—'a riddle'. And things do look like that very often. So many strange things happen we can't account for, such wonderful things are done which we can't explain, that when we look up to the stars, and then think of where we were born, and wonder where we shall die; when we see how much sorrow there is in the world, yet how much beauty and goodness too, and how things often go wrong when you meant them to go right, and how they sometimes turn out good though you never intended it, then it all looks like a riddle! Will you give it up? Some do. They grow weary, poor things, of trying to puzzle it all out. But they grow weary because they don't take the right way; that's all. How simple the most difficult riddle becomes when you have found it out! Would you like to find out this riddle?—the riddle about everything? I can tell you how. It is by loving and trusting Jesus Christ, and trying to live like Him. For it is said, and the word is true, 'The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him'. They have the key to the riddle; everything is made simple to the one who lives loving and trusting Jesus.

Would you wish to be wise? 'The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.' Give Jesus your heart: learn from Him; trust Him, and He will teach you the secret of life—open up to you the good meaning of God in every dark riddle or difficulty you shall ever have to meet. So, whenever there is anything too hard for you to understand, go to Jesus, and tell Him all about it in prayer, and then, when prayer has cleansed your eyes and prepared your heart, turn to the crystal mirror of His Word: there you will get the light, the vision, the guidance you need, and so be made wise, and wiser still for His full salvation in the end, when you shall see Him, as He sees you now—'face to face'.—J. REID HOWATT, The Children's Preacher, p. 80.

THE ALCHEMIST'S SECRET

'The greatest of these is charity.'—1 CORINTHIANS XIII. 13.

THREE hundred years ago might have seen some venerable-looking old man—people called him an alchemist—followed him home, would have found room full of bottles and glass vessels, with furnaces and other strange things. What could he use them for? Trying to find something which would turn other things to gold. If he had found it? Very rich—but what use? Very old and must soon die. So used to try and find something else as well which would make him live when he got rich. He was seeking for something which would give him riches and life.

Would you like to discover this great secret? You may—it will give you better riches and a better life than any he aimed at. 'Treasure in heaven,' and 'eternal life' to enjoy the treasure. What is the secret? Love.

I. Love Turns Everything Into Treasure.—What is treasure? Not merely riches, but riches which we can keep. [King's treasure, not the money he spends, but the jewels and valuables which he does not spend.]

1. Things we like.

Suppose you have money—don't mean to keep it—spend it—what you buy only lasts for a little—wears out—goes somehow, more or less quickly.

Suppose instead, see some poor person—very hungry—'I am a little Christian—Jesus would have helped—wants me to help. There, take this.' 'Gone?' No. Gone up. Treasure in heaven. Only remember may give from wrong motives—to get praise, or because giving is pleasant, in such case you have bought praise or pleasure with your money. Only love can turn it into treasure: 'I do want to love Jesus, and He wants me to do this'. One of these days find the treasure waiting for you. [Picture out—Jesus come again—we all before Him. Matt. xxv. 40.]

2. Things we don't like.

Troubles.—Our Lord turned His troubles into treasure (Isa. liii. 10, 11; Heb. xii. 2).

So did St. Paul (2 Cor. xii. 8-10, cf. Rom. v. 3-5.)

Enemies.—Love turns them into friends. [Alexander the Great was asked, how so young he could do so much. 'I use my enemies so well that I compel them to be friends, and I treat my friends so well that I never lose their friendship.']

Difficulties.—Boy at school—can't learn lessons Younger brother comes—elder brother helps him—obliged to learn himself—finds his own work easier. Love has made it grow easy.

One of these days when we get to heaven and come to look over our treasury—what a heap of strange things! All treasures then—but love has made them treasures.

II. Love Gives Life (1 John iii. 13, 14).—Death can't get in where there is love.

[Fire on prairies—all grass burnt up—one green spot left. Why? Little spring there; fire could not destroy because spring never failed. So 1 Corinthians xiii. 8. Charity, i.e. love never faileth.]

III. How may We get Love?—Some say, 'I can't love. Some things I never shall like. So selfish; never can be like Jesus Christ; always going about doing good—always thinking how I can help others.'

Yes, you can.

1. Do little kind acts, then love will grow.

2. Ask God. He will give you this gift (Jas. i. 17). The 'most excellent gift'. 'The love of God'—the love like God's love—is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us' (Rom. v. 5).—C. A. GOODHART, Hints and Outlines for Children's Services, p. 45.

THE SECOND EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS

CHRIST'S LETTERS

'Ye are . . . the Epistle of Christ.'—2 CORINTHIANS III. 3.

I. Is there anything in the world more wonderful than a letter? When the English missionaries first went to Africa, nothing surprised the black people more than the letters they wrote. 'Does the person you write to hear you speak?' said a chief to one of the missionaries. 'No.' 'Does he see your lips move?' 'No.' Then he ranged a long line of his people in a field, asked the missionary to stand at one end, and stood with a second at the other end. 'Now write what I bid you.' The missionary beside him put down the chief's words, and the bit of paper was passed on by a messenger to the other end. At that end the missionary standing there read the words to the messenger. The messenger repeated them to the chief, and the chief cried out, 'It is just magic!'

And a letter is really a kind of magic. It is only a sheet of paper with some signs on it. But it tells what is going on ten, twenty, a hundred or a thousand miles away. Through these signs, we, sitting at our breakfast tables, can see homes over wide seas, and the people living in them, and baptisms, and marriages, and sick-beds and funerals. By these signs commands come from far countries, and merchants in this land rise and go to the market, or the exchange, or the bookstore, or the house of a neighbour, and do the biddings of those who wrote them down. And by these signs the secrets of one heart are carried into another; and two hearts know the secrets instead of one.

II. The Lord has always been a letter writer. He has written His letters on the blue sky and on the green earth. Summer and winter, springtime and harvest are sentences from one of His letters. He wrote ten words once, thousands of years ago, on sheets of stone at Mount Sinai, and those words are read still in every part of the earth. He has written two long letters to men in the Bible: the one is called the Old Testament, the other the New Testament, and those letters have been copied thousands of times, and are being sent to and fro among all the nations of mankind.

But from the beginning He said: 'It is not enough for Me that I write on the sky and the field, or on leaves of stone or paper. I want something better still to write My letters on. I will only be satisfied when men allow Me to write My letters on their hearts; and when I can lay My heart with all its secrets on the hearts of men and women and boys and girls, and leave the imprint of these secrets there.'

It was this His prophets said so often in the old times. They said that a day would come, a happy day, when God would write His laws no more on tables of stone, as the Ten Commandments were, but on the heart. That day came when Jesus came. He made His words go into the hearts of those who listened to Him. It was all the same as if He had written on their hearts, and these hearts had become letters from Christ.

So Paul gives that name to the boys and girls and the men and women who have let Christ write the secrets of His heart on theirs. He calls them epistles of Christ—letters written on the fleshly leaves of the heart. And there is nothing better in the world for a boy or girl than to be a letter of this kind for Christ.

III. Some years ago the people living in Paris were surrounded by the German army, and could neither get out themselves, nor have anybody coming in. They were besieged by that army, and all the while the siege lasted neither bread, nor milk, nor coals, nor wood, nor horse, nor cow could get in. It was a hard time, and the people suffered for want of food. But there was another thing they greatly suffered for want of—and that was news of dear ones in other parts of the world. At last those dear ones wrote letters on the first page of the Times newspaper in London. Then a photographer made a copy of that first page so small that it was only the size of a penny stamp. Then those tiny pages were tied under the wings of doves and carried by them over the heads of the German army into Paris. There the photographers made the tiny papers large again. And in this way the people in Paris got letters from the dear ones far away.

The Lord Jesus does something like this in writing His letters on young hearts. He has a great deal to say: but the hearts of children are too small to receive all His words. So the Lord makes His letter small, so small that it can all be printed on a child's heart. And then as years go on and the body grows tall, the heart grows larger and larger, and the letters grow with the growth of the heart, and when boys and girls come to be young men and women they find that the loving Jesus has written nearly all the Bible on their hearts.

IV. But sometimes it is only a single sentence He writes. During a very cold winter, between twenty and thirty years ago, there were two stories in the newspapers which went to every heart. A poor actor left Inverness for the town of Cromarty, where he was engaged to play. He had his little girl with him, a child of seven or eight. Snow had already begun to fall when he set out. But by and by a storm arose, and the snow fell so thickly that all the sky became dark with it, and the poor travellers lost their way. In a day or two, half-way to Cromarty, at a lonely turn of the road, where there was some shelter, the two were found buried in the snow, and dead. But it was noticed that the child was wrapped round with the father's overcoat, which he had taken from himself to keep her warm.

The cold was so great that year that many poor people died of it in their very houses, where they had neither fire nor food. Among those who died was a lonely mother in one of our cities. She was found cold dead on the floor of her home, and nearly naked, but beside her was her living child, living and warm, well wrapped up in the clothes which the mother had taken from her own body.

What were those two : the poor actor who stripped himself of his coat to keep warm his child : the poor mother who went nearly naked to keep her baby alive ? They were letters written by Christ and sent out to be read of all, letters written with one of the deepest secrets of His heart. What He wrote on those two hearts was sacrifice, pity, love, like God's. Just as those two acted, Christ would have acted if He had been in their places. It was even so He did act, when on the cross He died for man. He took His own life and wrapped us round with it, that we might not die but live. And he would have every one of us to act to others as He acted towards us. And on our hearts, as on the hearts of those two of whom I have told, He desires to write pity and self-sacrifice, and kindness and love.

V. I shall never forget the winter in which those two died. I had gone to reside in a little country town among the hills, and a great snowstorm came on the very first week I was there. Day and night the snow continued to fall. The roads were blocked up, the stage coaches could not leave. At last the little town was cut off from the rest of the world. It so happened that I had promised to be at a meeting in a neighbouring town about eight miles off. And I wanted to fulfil my promise. So I got a friend to help me to find the way, and with a second friend who was staying with me we set forth. The whole country, far as the eye could see, was one unbroken sheet of snow. The roads were buried. The very hedgerows were not to be seen. Not a foot mark nor track of a wheel was to be seen. We were the first since the snow began to attempt the journey.

When we had worked our way about three miles, we saw one other traveller coming towards us. It was the letter-carrier with the mail-bag for the town we had left. We could not help thinking him a wonderful sight. There was no other being on that white waste of snow. But what he represented was more wonderful than himself. He represented the government of the country. Humble though he was, he was a public servant. Thousands of other servants, on other hills, on other roads, would be doing the same service which he was trying to do. Then we thought of the letters in his bag. Then of the letters in other bags. Then of all those letters as filled with things interesting one way or other to those who should receive them. And we thought of the government as the power which was sending them all on to the persons to whom they were addressed.

And then this thought came into our minds : There is a greater government than ours—the government of God—and that too is sending forth over all the land—throughout all the world—letters written not on paper with ink, but on the hearts of men and women, and boys and girls, and written by Christ Himself. Then we remembered the words in second Corinthians : 'The epistle of Christ, ministered by us, written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God'.

VI. It was Paul who wrote those words. It is very helpful always when Paul says a word like this to know why he says it. He was sending a letter to Christian people in Corinth to whom he had often preached. But he knew that there were some among them who did not care for his preaching, and also had spoken evil about himself. He did not like to have evil spoken about him : no good man does. But Paul did not like it because evil words spoken about him were all the same as if they were spoken against the Gospel he preached. And as he is writing this comes into his mind, and he stops for a moment and asks himself : Shall I reply to the evil words ? But he does not reply to them. He only began his writing again, and says : 'Do I really need to defend myself before you ? Do you know me so little that I should have to bring a letter of commendation to you ? Must I get other people to tell you that I am not a bad man ? Surely that cannot be needful when I am writing to my Corinthian friends. You are written on my heart ; I am written on yours. You are my best letter of commendation. If anybody speaks ill of me I appeal to you and to your Christian life. It was through me Christ made you Christian. He wrote the secrets of His heart on your lives ; and I, unworthy although some think me, was His penman when He did so. You are epistles of Christ, living epistles, and it was my preaching which Christ used to make you that.'

No evil speaker could answer back to that. A Christian life is like a letter filled with the words of Christ. If the people to whom Paul had preached were now like Christ, it was a proof that Christ Himself had written that likeness on their hearts.

VII. A dear friend of mine when she was a little girl went to live at Cape Breton. At that time letters arrived but once a month from this country. There was no post office to leave the bags at ; there was only a great open road through the forest, and little foot-roads from the village leading up to it. The letter-carrier as he passed each of these foot-roads got out the letters from his bag which were to go that way, and dropped them into a box that was fixed on a tree. Then somebody came up from the village with a key and opened the box and took the letters away. It was my friend who had this duty to do. She had a long walk of many miles before she came to the end of the narrow foot-road, then she opened the box, and often, she used to tell, the tears would come into her eyes when there were no letters, or letters with black borders; and when she got letters and took them back, and sometimes found that one now and again was unpleasant or silly, everybody was vexed.

I sometimes think that a school is like that letter-box in the forest. There are children at school who are like silly letters, or empty letters, and sometimes like bad letters. And I think it is so sad—it is just like my friend at Cape Breton coming miles through the lonely forest for letters and finding none, or finding only letters that were bad—when a young boy or girl is sent to a school, and finds no one there on whose heart Jesus has written His tenderness or truth or love. But it is a blessing which words cannot tell, when coming to a school, the young comer finds hearts and lives on which Christ has written His love.

You remember the story in Tom Brown's School Days about the gentle boy who knelt down the first night he came to say his prayers, and the rude fellows who made a mock of him? But he found one there on whose heart Christ had written, who stood up for him. And a great blessing came into the school through this one gentle boy, and that other brave lad who defended him, being epistles written by Christ. What was written on their hearts came to be written by and by on the hearts of those who had mocked.

I will give you therefore a prayer to offer up at school. Say to God: 'O my Father, blot out folly if Thou seest it written on my heart; blot out everything there that is a grief to Thee, and write Thy name and law instead; and make me a clear, well-filled epistle, to tell of the goodness I have found in Thee'.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Gentle Heart, p. 73.

ALL FOR JESUS

2 CORINTHIANS V. 8.

In the fifth verse of the eighth chapter of second Corinthians these words occur:—

They 'gave their own selves to the Lord'.

From this text I wish to speak a little about self-consecration.

It is the privilege and duty of all of us to consecrate ourselves to God. We may all be priests to God in Christ. And giving ourselves to serve God we must keep nothing back. We must be all for Jesus. This is the truth I wish to enforce.

I ask then:—

I. Your Eye for Jesus.—What a beautiful and what a curiously-formed organ the eye is! One could write a long lecture or a volume in description of it. You will find in books such descriptions of its form, and seat, and different parts, and varied defences, as would delight and surprise you. But what I wish you to think of here is the wonderful use it serves. It enables us to see. To see! Oh, what a world of marvel and beauty is covered by that little word! Have you ever thought what a strange thing sight is? Some one calls it a diffused and subtle touch. So it is. I close my eyes, and can only touch what my hand reaches. I open them, and, looking out at the window where I am writing, I touch trees, fields, distant houses, more distant hills, still more distant skies. I have a kind of hand to reach the very stars. Wonderful, beautiful vision! But there is something in the mind like to this, more subtle, and swift, and wondrous still. It is thought—the vision of the soul. Try how swift it is. I name five or six places, and as fast as you read them your thoughts are in the places named—London, Calcutta, the moon, the sun, the stars, the throne of God in heaven. In a few seconds you have travelled miles not to be measured. You have seen all these far distant objects with the eye of the soul. Now I want this eye, this thinking power, for Jesus. You are always busy thinking. But how much is the Saviour in your thoughts?

I ask—

II. Your Ear for Jesus.—The ear, too, is a most curious organ. Outside, as you see it, how interesting to notice the winding passages and tunnelled porchway leading in to the chamber of audience! Is it not very wonderful to think how, when a minister or other public speaker addresses a multitude, he should be able, by the moving of his lips, to send his words on invisible wings in through the gate of the ear to the minds and souls of hundreds? Now Jesus made this wonderful ear, with all its fittings, to receive sound. If, then, He speaks Himself, should we not hear Him? But, you say, Christ does not speak to our ears. He did once speak on earth, to the very ears of men. He might still do so. He once spoke to Paul out of heaven, after He had gone up. And still, through the Bible and through providence, in the church, in the school, in the sick-room, He speaks to us in effect. It is all the same as if we heard Him. And so Paul says about Him, 'See that ye refuse not Him that speaketh from heaven'. And when I ask 'ear for Jesus,' I ask attention to what He says, and obedience to what He commands. See what I wish, in the posture of good and happy Mary, when 'she sat at Jesus' feet, hearing His word'. Humbly hearken to Jesus; take pleasure in reading and hearing about Him; do His will, as if you heard Him call you from the skies. One day your ear, cold in the grave, will open to His voice; and after you have risen, He will speak words to you. He will say Come, or Depart. Which would you wish it to be? Oh, hearken to Him now, when He says, Come! and He will not change the word at the last day. But, again, I would have—

III. Your Hand for Jesus.—Were you ever present at a marriage in Scotland, and did you notice how, at the minister's request, the bridegroom and bride joined hands, while they promised to be faithful to each other? I have always thought that simple ceremony of joining hands a touching one. It is a pledge on the part of the married—a seal to their promises to be true and kind to one another all their lives through. Or did you ever see men strike a bargain? Then, perhaps, you heard one of them say, to conclude it, 'Here's my hand on it,' and so they shook hands together. I wish your hand for Jesus in a sense which these customs suggest. I want to have you pledged to be Christ's—'joined to the Lord in a perpetual covenant, never to be forgotten'. You write with your hand, you subscribe your name with it. There is a prophecy in Isaiah that I would like to see fulfilled in you. Here it is: 'One shall say, I am the Lord's; and another shall call himself by the name of Jacob; and another shall subscribe with his hand to the Lord, and surname himself by the name of Israel'. If a letter were written to Jesus, promising to follow and obey Him, do you think you could put your name to it?

IV. The Foot for Jesus.—The foot walks, or runs; and in the Bible the walk or way of any person is his whole course of conduct—his manner of life, in short. There are evil ways and good ways. Hear what Solomon says about the first: 'Enter not into the path of the wicked, and go not in the way of evil men. Avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it, and pass away.' Solomon's father sings much about the good way, as in the first Psalm. God marked out the good way; good men have trodden it from the beginning; Jesus Himself walked in it; follow you Him. Do not let your feet carry you on any sinful errand—to steal, to deceive, to break the Sabbath, to disobey parents, to go with evil companions, to enjoy sinful pleasures. Keep away from places where Jesus would be vexed and displeased to see you. But be ready, on the other hand, to run Christ's errands, to do some kind office, to prevent some evil, to perform some good, to learn some holy lesson, or practise it. Did you ever see the hill-tops at sunrise getting bright with the golden beams fast falling on them, as if some angel were walking there to tell the world below the day was coming back. Perhaps the Bible points to this when it says, How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that publisheth good tidings. Oh, what a happy child around whose steps sun-hine falls wherever he goes, because he is 'running the way of God's commandments'! The heathens spoke of one of their deities at whose tread flowers sprung up from the sod, and good children's paths are like that fabled walk, full of blossoms of hope, and joy, and love. Will you not walk there? I said—

V. Give your Lip for Jesus.—There is a text in Hosea which speaks about rendering to God 'the calves of our lips'. Paul tells us what is meant by changing the phrase into 'the fruit of our lips,' and explaining that to mean the sacrifices of praise, thanksgiving to God's name. When your lip is asked for Jesus, your speech and your voice in song are asked for Him. If you give Him your lips, you will shun all bad words, lying, profane, foul, bitter words. You will try to speak good words, true, kind, holy.

VI. Your Heart for Jesus.—You cannot really give hand or eye to Him without this. As all the fingers grow out of the palm, and are but the hand divided, so all the five foregoing particulars depend on this. You give Christ nothing if you keep back the heart—you give Him all when your heart is His. He asks this, 'My son give Me thine heart'. 'Is not that a poor return,' I heard it once asked of a boy, 'to give Christ our weak hearts for all His love?' 'Yes,' was the answer, 'but it is all He asks from us.' Then yield your heart, that is your love, to Christ. You cannot love Him too soon; you cannot love Him too long; you cannot love Him too much. All your heart is not more than He deserves; and when He gets it all you are happiest. Heart, then, for Jesus, that eye, ear, hand, foot, lip, may all be His also.—J. EDMOND, The Children's Church at Home, p. 52.

POOR, YET MAKING MANY RICH

2 CORINTHIANS VI. 10.

AMONG the wonderful things mentioned in the New Testament none is more wonderful than this, that it was by poor people the good news concerning Christ was first made known. Never were poorer people than these. Poor fishermen, poor tentmakers, poor labouring men and women, poor slaves—such were the people by whom the good news was carried throughout the world. They had neither money nor fine clothing, nor lands nor fine houses. They had nothing but what they earned by the labour of their hands. They came from fishing villages, from despised little homes among the hills, from back streets in great cities. Nobody knew them. Nobody ever heard of them before. They were mocked. They were beaten with rods. They were cast into prison. Yet they were helped by God to go from place to place telling their wonderful story. And poor and despised and ill-treated though they were, they made the world rich by the story they told.

'Poor, yet making many rich': that was how Paul described them. They arrived in the great cities, Ephesus, Corinth, Rome, or Philippi, and began in the first company they entered to tell their news. They had seen the Son of God on the earth. They had seen Him opening the eyes of the blind, healing the sick, raising the dead. More wonderful still, they had seen wicked men putting Him to death, and they had seen Him alive again, risen from among the dead. They were like people who had been in heaven. In a sense they had really been in heaven. They had been with the King of heaven. They had heard Him speak. They had received His blessing. They had His life in their hearts. I fancy myself sometimes telling in those meetings, where these poor people were telling their story. I see their eyes streaming with tears as they tell of the cruel sufferings the dear Saviour had to endure. And I see the tears dried up and a glow over all their faces as they tell of His resurrection and His going up to heaven.

At those meetings people who had never heard of the kindness of God learned from the lips of these messengers that He so loved the world as to send His only Son to die for it. People who did not know the mighty power of God learned that it was so great as to break the door of the grave and bring the dead Saviour back to life. After hearing news so glad some many burst out into joyful cries. 'The great God loves us,' they said; 'and He will not leave our souls to perish, nor our bodies to lie in the dust for ever!' Great new thoughts came into their hearts, such as never had been there before. Strange new desires stirred within them and made them eager to be near to God that they might love Him and serve Him better than they had ever done. It seemed to themselves as if they had been carried up to the very door of heaven and had seen its happy life, and the Saviour who had died for them sitting on its throne, and a light of love on His face as He turned His look to where they stood.

In this way, in the days when Paul lived, the poor made many rich. But it is not back in those days only that this wonder has been seen. There never has been a time in which God did not give grace to poor people to do this very thing. It is a wonder that never ceases. We have only to open our eyes, and we shall see it in the days in which we ourselves are living. Nobody is too poor to be used in the service of the loving God. The greatest Servant He ever had upon the earth was so poor that He had not where to lay His head.

Sometimes when I stand up to speak to you, and see your faces glowing with health, and think of the bright homes in which you live, where everything comes to you like magic, where want is unknown, and remember homes of a different kind, where food is scant, where faces are pale, the thought comes into my mind that although in some things you are well off, in others, by your very well-offness, you suffer loss. You do not know the gladness over little mercies which those who dwell in such homes know. You do not know the tenderness which God shows to the people who live in these homes, nor the help which He brings into their humble lives, nor the great uses to which, through their very poverty, they are sometimes put.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Children's Portion, p. 19.

ON GIVING

2 CORINTHIANS VIII. 1-12.

I. THERE are some words which to children are a little hard to be understood in these verses.

But what they say is well worth trying to understand.

They say, first, that God gave them a great blessing—a grace.

They say, next, that this blessing was the giving of money to help Christ's Churches which were poorer than their own Church.

They say, third, that before they gave their money to Christ for His poor Churches they had given themselves.

And, lastly, they say that in so acting they were just following Christ's own way of doing; for He gave Himself to us, that He might save us, and being rich in heaven, He came down to earth and became poor for our sakes.

Now it is this I want you to think of. It is the grace of giving one's self to Jesus as Jesus gave Himself for us.

Children as young as you have no money, or not much money, of their own to give to Christ for His poor people or for His work.

But they can give what is better than money: they can give a part of themselves.

What is it in a child that is richer and better than money? It is love.

The smallest child who understands can give that.

God says: 'Give Me thy heart'. The heart is just love.

Children are not too young to give their hearts to Jesus—to love Jesus.

Jesus likes to have the love of children coming to Him.

That is the gold and silver of heaven.

And because children cannot see the Lord Jesus Himself, He will have this love given to brothers, to sisters, to father, and mother, and schoolfellows, to friends and neighbours.

He says: 'Inasmuch as it is given to them, it is given to Christ'.

Now say: 'I will give more of myself to my mother, to my sister, my brother, than ever.

'I will not be greedy in expecting things to myself. 'I will be a giver, and what I give will be a bit of myself—my love.'

'The blessing will be, that giving to those in the house with you will be accounted giving to Christ.

In the northern city where I once spent my holidays, there were many things to see and to hear about. There were fine old churches, the old castle, old monuments on graves, and old traditions. Then there were the golf links, the beautiful sea-shore and the sea. But one of the things which I best like to call back and think about is the story of an old woman who lived there long ago, but who is still remembered for her kindness to the poor.

I am sorry I cannot tell you her name, nor the year she was born, nor when she died, but only this: the story of her good deeds. When she was living, she looked round about in this ancient town of St. Andrews, and saw that winter was a very hard time for poor old women. She saw that many of them were widows, whose husbands had been drowned at sea, and when they got to be old, and weary, and poor, they were no longer able to work as they used to do, and they felt the winter to be a sadly trying time.

So this excellent woman—she was not what people call a lady; I mean she did not belong to grand people—did not live in a fine house, did not have servants; she was just a homely, ordinary woman, belonging to the common people. Well, this good soul, seeing the old women in her neighbourhood cold and ill-clad in winter, and without much fire, said to herself: 'I will save up whatever I can save, I will spend nothing on myself that I can do without,' and in this way she gathered together, by saving and sacrifice, what people about her might call a good bit of money; not thousands, oh no, nor hundreds even; perhaps as much as a hundred and fifty pounds. And she put this money aside, and she gave it first to God, and then in trust to certain magistrates and others in St. Andrews, to be invested as she desired, and the yearly proceeds to be paid out in coal to poor old women in that town; and winter by winter, as the winter comes round, there is the sum of five pounds, the savings of this old lady (you now see she was a very real lady), spent in buying coal—ten carts of coal. That means ten poor old women who will be warm instead of cold, because this old lady had pity for all such in her heart, and denied herself many luxuries, and even comforts, in order to lay up this money for the poor women.

Now think, as long as Scotland lasts there will be these ten carts of coal for so many poor old women in St. Andrews.

There are names in the almanac of saintly ladies who lived long ago. This lady's name is not in any almanac, but I am sure when the poor widow who gave the two mites is spoken of in the Great Day this old St. Andrews' saint will be counted worthy to stand beside her.

It is said: 'He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord'. See how great a lending this is to the Lord; it goes on year by year, even after the giver is dead.

II. (Heb. xiii. 16).—This is the counsel to-day—'To do good and to communicate'.

I will tell you a little story and then give my lesson.

A good many years ago I heard of a young lady who was blind. Her parents were wealthy, and had their blind daughter taught to do everything that was possible for blind people to do. She was trained to be a good musician, and she had a good voice. It did people good to hear her singing a hymn and accompanying it on the piano; and although hers was a lonely life, yet she resolved to be active and useful. So she searched out all the blind children and blind people in her neighbourhood, and in one way and another tried to do them good.

Now among the blind people in the town where she lived there was a very rough-speaking man, a pauper, who had a fine family of children, all except one little girl, and she was blind like himself.

Now, it is strange to say, the blind man could not endure his own blind child, and often beat her cruelly if she stumbled, or was the occasion of an accident.

My blind young lady heard of this poor lonely ill-treated child, and she set out one day, crossed the town, went up the narrow street in which the child's family lived, and found the father standing at the door.

'Well,' he said, 'who are you?'

'I am blind Miss Hill.'

'And what do ye want?'

'I want to see your blind daughter.'

'And what do ye want with her?'

'I would like to teach her to read and sew.'

'What will ye gie me if I let you teach my lassie?'

'Well,' she said, 'I do not think I should give you anything.'

'Then ye'll no get her, and ye'll no see her.'

The young lady, however, did not mean to be put off in that way. So she came day by day, and got the same reception, until one day she found the father absent, and went in.

The mother received her gladly. The little child knew nothing about learning, but she thought the lady could protect her, and whispered, 'Will ye keep my father from beating me?' But the father heard of the visit, and stood out, and said unless he was paid for it he would not allow the child to be taught.

At last Miss Hill agreed to give him sixpence a week, and she has been giving the churlish boor that for more than a year.

It is a sight to see the poor blind child setting out from the poor home, hurrying, groping her way, right shoulder forward, every day, to be in time at the home of her lady teacher, learning to read, to sew, to knit, and resolving, like her teacher, to do good.

III. Contentment (1 Tim. vi. 6; Heb. xiii. 5).—Thinking over the lesson I gave you in the last chapter, that God has other ways of making people rich than by giving them money, I find that He bestows graces on His people, old and young, which shine forth, and make glad the circle in which they are seen.

Of these graces one kept coming back to my mind as very good, and as one of the most enriching gifts which a boy or girl could receive.

This good thing is contentment.

If boy or girl, man or woman, had all the gold and silver in the world and yet had not contentment, they would not be happy.

But if one who had neither gold nor silver had contentment, he would be happy.

'Godliness with contentment is great gain.'

'Be content with such things as ye have,' and this story will show you what contentment means.

In a German village one day the village school was coming out. The children rushed out; they began to jump and run. Many made off to the fields; others went into the playground and began to play at ball and other games. At the end of all and last came a little lad who, through an accident when he was very young, was lame, and had to walk with crutches. He saw his school-fellows leaping and running, and he seemed to be as happy, looking at their happiness, as if he were leaping and running himself.

There happened to be passing that day a stranger from a distant town, a writer of books. His heart was touched by the sight of the poor boy, looking on but unable to join in the play of his schoolmates; and he went near to him.

'Are you sorry that you cannot play like the others?' said the stranger.

'No, sir; I am quite happy too. I have a starling at home that can speak, and I have a linnet that sings. Mother is very kind to me; and I have books.'

'But when you are grown up and a man, what will you do to earn your bread?'

'Well, I shall be a cobbler. I shall be able to sit and work. I shall have a room to work in, and I shall keep birds in the room to sing to me and keep me company. And with the money I get for the shoes I make I shall buy food for my mother and myself.'

The stranger walked with the lad down the road. At a cottage door he saw the boy's mother looking out for him, with a face filled with love. The linnet and the starling saw the boy coming, and began to speak and sing to him. And the boy's face glowed with joy.

'Ah!' said the stranger to himself, 'that boy is happier than I am.'

It was contentment that enabled the boy to be so happy.

He took his lameness as God's gift: his mother, his starling, his linnet, his own happy heart, were God's gifts too.

He was content with such things as he had. His 'contentment was great gain'.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 106.

HOW TO THANK GOD FOR JESUS

'Thanks be unto God for His unspeakable gift.'—2 CORINTHIANS IX. 15.

I AM going to take that one word Gift, and break it up letter by letter, and make each letter stand for an initial. And we will pray 'that God will teach us so, how better to give thanks for Jesus.

I. G then will stand for Grow like Him. When we begin to grow like Jesus, then we thank God for Him.

Have you been planted? That is the question. For if we have been planted together in the likeness of His death, we shall be also in the likeness of His resurrection. There is the first secret of all growth. No prayers, no tears, no toil will ever make us Christlike without that. First, we must lie in Jesus' bosom, as earthly things lie in the bosom of the earth, and then the constraining love of Christ will work such wonders with us, that old things pass away, and all things become new. Have you been planted?

Or put it in another way. One of the great treats in store for you when you grow older, will be to read the writings of a scholarly and saintly doctor, Sir Thomas Browne. And there is one piece of his I want you all to read. It is his Letter to a Friend. In that Letter he tells the story of a young man's deathbed, and there was one strange thing Sir Thomas noticed in that dying man. As death drew near his features changed. He lost his own look, and through his features there seemed to shine the features of a relative. Death cancelled self for him, and made him grow in strange likeness to another whose blood ran in his veins. Living, these lineaments were concealed. Dying, they stood out evidently. 'He looked like his uncle, the lines of whose face lay deep and invisible in his healthful visage before.'

That was what Sir Thomas Browne saw in his dying friend. I sometimes wonder if it did not seem to him a shadowing of deeper things. For there is a higher life than the life of the body. There is another death than the ceasing of the heart to beat. It is the death to sin and self. It is the crucifixion with Christ Jesus. And of this be sure. This you and I must learn. Only as we approach that death, and daily draw nearer to that death in fuller surrender and heartier consecration, will the lineaments of Jesus, sealed on us by the Holy Spirit in the hour of conversion, begin to show through ours. Until at last, when we are truly dead, and our life is hid with Christ in God, then shall we truly live, and yet not we, for Christ shall live in us. If any man would grow like Me, says Jesus, first, he must be born again. And then, if any man would grow like Me, let him deny himself, take up his cross, and follow Me.

Though born again, and hungering and thirsting daily, for all that, growth into His likeness must be slow. I believe it is now accepted by all learned men that this great world has been built up out of atoms. All that we see has been made out of these particles so small that the most powerful glass is powerless to see them. The stars that shine by night, the mountains that lift their heads up to the clouds, the noble forest trees, the various beauties of ten thousand herbs, all these, under the fingers of a creating and a devising God, have been fashioned from molecules infinitely small. Not from original masses was creation formed. But all its grandeur, majesty, and beauty have been slowly wrought from particles invisibly minute. So with the massive forms of life: the majesties of character: the Christlike heart. They too under the Spirit's hand are slowly fashioned from the tiniest births.

II. The second letter I will stand for Imitate Him. Would you thank God for Jesus? Then begin now to imitate the Master. There is a proverb which says, Imitation is the sincerest flattery. God wants no flattery, but He does want thanksgiving, and imitation of the right kind is one of thanksgiving's choicest forms.

III. And now we come to F, and F shall stand for Follow Him. I wonder if you ever tried to count how often the Bible uses that word follow. I could tell that the Word of God meant you and me to be followers, not leaders. The one word is so much more frequent than the other. Jesus said, Follow Me! Lo! we have left all and followed Thee, said Peter. I follow after, said Paul. We think of Peter and James and Paul as leaders. They never thought of themselves as leaders—always as followers. This was their joy and crown and glory, that they followed Jesus.

Christ calls for volunteers to-day. Who will take Him for Captain, and donning shield and breastplate, make life a battle for the right? That will give stir and movement to the dreariest day. That will bring back to you the spirit of the knights who jostled in the tourney. No life is commonplace if Christ be in it. Who enlists now?

Jesus, still lead on Till our rest be won!

IV. Lastly comes T, and that must stand for Trust Him. But I have spoken too long to you, and must close. I want you all to trust Him. I wish you all to follow Him. I would fain see every one of you imitating Jesus, and growing more like Him every day. What joy there would be in heaven over that! God waits to accept it as the richest sacrifice of thanksgiving for His unspeakable gift.—G. H. MORRISON, The Oldest Trade in the World, p. 66.

THE EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS

OLD SELF AND NEW SELF

'I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me: and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave Himself for me.'—GALATIANS II. 20.

I DARE SAY you have often been disposed to think that these chapters of the Galatians are very hard to be understood; and perhaps they may seem to you rather uninteresting, and a repetition of the same thing over and over again. Well, they are not easy in themselves; but we make them much harder, because we read them in such short chapters. If I were telling a story, however interesting it might be in itself, if you came in when I had been going on for half an hour, stayed five minutes, and then went out again, you would be likely, to use the common expression, to make neither head nor tail of what I was saying, and to think it very dull. Now St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians is one continued argument; and if we take a little bit out of the middle, and read that by itself, though we may pick up three or four verses here and there, we shall hardly be likely to understand the whole drift of what the Apostle is saying; nay, perhaps, we may understand the very opposite of what he meant us to understand. And this difficulty is as old as the time of St. Peter, who says that in St. Paul's Epistles 'are some things hard to be understood; which they that are unlearned and unstable, wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, to their own destruction'.

Now I am not going to enter into this Epistle, so as to explain to you St. Paul's reason for writing it, or to show you what his argument is; I will only tell you that, in reading it, and the former part of the Epistle to the Romans, you must always remember two things. The one, that wherever the Apostle speaks of the Law, he does not mean the Law of God—that Law, according to which we have to walk here, that Law, according to which we have to be judged hereafter; no, he always means the Jewish Law. And the other, that when he speaks of faith, he does not mean that which we generally now call faith, the believing in God's Word because it is His Word. No; he means only the Christian Law—or if you like it better, the Gospel. Almost always when he uses the word faith, you would understand more clearly what he means if it were now translated the Gospel. So in the beginning of the fifth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, which many people have written so much that is untrue about, it only means: 'Therefore, being justified,' that is, made righteous by the Gospel, that is, by the way the Gospel points out, namely, our dear Lord's passion, 'we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ'. And so in a great many other places.

I. Now let us see the meaning of the text I read you just now. It begins: 'I am crucified with Christ'. How is that? Why, you must remember how fond St. Paul is of telling us what we all know so sadly in ourselves, that we have, so to speak, two selves, two I's: the old bad self which we get from Adam, and which he calls the old man; the new better self which is given us at baptism, which he calls the new man: the old bad I, which says, when we are offended, 'I will be angry, I will revenge myself; I think it is a glorious thing to have my own way; I will hate such an one, because he or she has spited me'; and the better self which says, 'I will forgive, because Christ forgave; I will not revenge myself because He, when He was reviled, reviled not again; when He suffered, He threatened not'. There is the old bad self, which says, 'I will not learn this lesson; I will not do this task, because it is so much trouble; I will take my ease and enjoy myself instead'; and there is the better I, the I in which the Holy Ghost speaks, which says, 'But I will take pains about it, because my dear Lord laboured when He was on earth; because this is what He meant by taking up the cross and following Him; because He has promised that, if I suffer here, I shall reign hereafter'. Have you not sometimes felt those two selves sometimes as plainly striving within you, as if they were two different persons? I know you have; I have often; no one who is now in the kingdom of heaven but has often; ay, and those unhappy ones who departed out of this world out of the grace of God, they know what the struggle was, but sadly, sadly they fought in it, and allowed the worst self to be conqueror over the better. That is the great happiness of those that die in the Lord: that henceforth there is no more this constant struggle between the two selves.

II. There is a story which I should like you to read, which represents three children setting out on a pilgrimage to the Heavenly City. But with them, wherever they go, goes a troublesome, wicked, mischievous companion, called Inbred Sin—'the old man' of St. Paul: and yet sometimes he is so pleasant and so droll, that though they know he is trying to do all he can to hinder their ever getting to the Heavenly City, they cannot help liking him. Many a trick he plays them; many and many a time he leads them out of the way. But at last, when they come to the Black River that has no bridge, and that flows between them and the Heavenly Land, then how Inbred Sin shrinks back from it! how he shrieks and groans, and cries out!—and behold, when they have got through, and come forth on the other side, he has been drowned in the river, and they have done with him for ever.

Well; and that is what St. Paul means here: I am crucified with Christ. As our Lord was nailed to the cross, which is a very slow, lingering, painful death, but a very certain death, so our old nature, our troublesome self, our Inbred Sin, was nailed to the cross at our baptism; and all we have to do is to keep him there. That is when he received his death wound; and because he is a part of ourselves, we feel all the pain, the lingering pain of his destruction: but destroyed he will be, at the very moment when we give up our last breath. In the meantime he sometimes struggles very hard, often contrives to do some mischief; but only by our own faults can he really hurt us. I have seen a picture of the Crucifixion, in which the wicked thief, struggling and wrestling to get free, has torn one of his hands from the cross; and something like this our evil nature will sometimes do. Well: that is what St. Paul means when he says, I, that is the worse I, the sinful I, am crucified with Christ.

III. And he immediately goes on: 'nevertheless I live'. Do you know how young cuckoos are born? The cuckoo never builds a nest of her own: she drops her egg into some other bird's nest, generally a sparrow's; and when it is hatched, the young cuckoo, being so much larger and stronger, contrives to get to itself the worms that the mother-bird brings, and so starves her young ones. Sometimes, too, he turns the true young ones, one after another, out of the nest, and so gets all the food to himself. But sometimes these young ones, seeing that if they do not get rid of the cuckoo he will get rid of them, make a great effort, and heave him over the nest—and then he falls down, and dies on the ground beneath the tree. This is just like our two natures—one must kill the other. Well, then, I—that is the worse, the sinful I—am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I—that is the better I, the I that came of baptism—live.

Well, just as we think we understand this very plainly, we hear something to make it more difficult nevertheless: 'I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me'. Ah! and how is that? why, take the same example again; and we may take it the more boldly, because you know our dear Lord Himself says, 'How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!' When those young sparrows have pushed the cuckoo out of their nest, they live; yet they do not live of themselves; they could not live unless the mother-bird brought them worms or crumbs, or what else she can find for them, every quarter of an hour. So unless our Lord helped our better selves to keep alive, to do His will, to do what of our old nature we hate, to leave undone what of our old nature we love, we never could get on for a moment.

God says to you, what Jehu said to the people in the palace of Jezreel, Who is on my side, who?—I hope you will all try to give the same answer. Try to make this, then, the chief end and aim of you all, that you may each and all serve God ten times better than ever before!—J. M. NEALE, Sermons for Children, p. 174.

GENTLENESS A FRUIT OF GOD'S HOLY SPIRIT

(Whitsunday)

'The fruit of the Spirit is gentleness.'—GALATIANS V. 22.

THE greatest results are accomplished by gentle, quiet influences.

I have chosen this subject now, because this is Whitsunday, the day on which this Blessed Spirit came down from heaven, and rested upon the Apostles, at Jerusalem, more than eighteen hundred years ago. Before He left the world our Saviour promised that He would send the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, to be with His people always; and on this day, ages ago, this pledge was kept.

What greater gift, what greater love,
Could God on man bestow?
Angels for this rejoice above,
Let man rejoice below.

The word gentleness (which is one of the virtues which the Holy Spirit helps us to cultivate) means, in the text, goodness and kindness. It is the opposite of a harsh, crooked, and crabbed temper. It is a disposition easy to be pleased, and in our idea of this Christian gentleness we must include mildness and politeness.

Religion sweetens the temper, teaching us to be kind and patient and thoughtful of the feelings and the comfort of others.

St. Paul, who wrote the text, was a polished gentleman in its highest and truest sense.

It is a pity that the word gentleman is so often improperly used. What is a gentleman? Is it always one who is rich? Is it the man dressed in the most fashionable clothes, and who takes off his hat with a graceful flourish when he salutes his friends? No; the veriest blackguard might have plenty of money; and wear a coat in the height of the fashion; and move about with the air of a dancing-master. A gentleman is one who does gentle things, and who has kind and unselfish feelings. And it is worth remembering that the Holy Spirit of God is ready to teach us to be gentle. 'The fruit of the Spirit is gentleness.'

The power of gentleness is really irresistible. The blustering wind could not make the traveller take off his cloak—but the only effect was that he wrapped himself up the more tightly in it. When, however, the gentle sunbeams shined softly and steadily on him, he was glad to remove it.

Gentleness must not be confounded with cowardice and with a mean truckling spirit.

No one would doubt General Washington's courage; and yet he could practise gentleness. After the Revolution was well over, and the country had become settled and quiet, he was making a long journey in his carriage, attended by several gentlemen who travelled in a conveyance of their own. One afternoon, as night was fast approaching, and they were all anxious to reach the neighbouring town before dark, they found the road almost blocked up by a large wagon drawn by four horses, proceeding at a snail's pace.

Wishing to go faster than this wagon, a gentleman in the foremost carriage called out to the teamster with a lordly air, to turn out and let them pass. As might be supposed, the man merely looked angry and refused to budge. Seeing how matters were, General Washington spoke politely to the driver, and explaining why they wished to hasten forward, asked him to allow the carriages to go by. The power of gentleness prevailed in a moment; and the weary travellers were soon enjoying a good supper at the village inn.

A Quaker physician in Philadelphia, who was very kind to the poor, was hastening in his old gig to visit a patient, when he found his way stopped by a cart in a narrow street already half blocked up with piles of brick and lumber.

Having waited patiently for several minutes, the doctor requested the drayman to let him pass.

The man had heard of the kind physician, but not having seen him before, he did not suspect this plain-talking Quaker to be the person, and began to swear at old 'straight coat,' flatly refusing to open the way.

'Well, friend,' said the doctor, 'all I have to observe is this; if thee should get sick, or if thy family should ever be in distress, send for Dr. P——, and he will do thee all the good he can.'

The heart of the drayman was softened at once; and stammering out the best apology he could, he made haste to clear the path for the physician. If he had returned harsh words for the driver's curses, he might have sat in his gig until midnight.

In the case of quarrels among schoolboys, the gentle one is always sure to come off victorious in the end. The fact is, a kind word hurts much more than a blow.

Two little boys were once rolling a hoop over the frozen ground, and in running carelessly after it Gerald, the younger being behind, came in contact with his brother Thomas, and both fell down with violence, the younger on top of the elder. Thomas was severely bruised and rose up in a terrible passion. He scolded Gerald in the most offensive words he could think of, and then began to beat him. Instead of crying out or striking back, the little fellow put his hand into his pocket hurriedly, fumbled about among his treasures, and drawing out a stick of candy thrust it into Thomas's mouth, even while he was scolding and beating him.

Thomas instantly stopped, and looked confused and ashamed. And thus his wrath was turned aside by the spirit of gentleness which his younger brother manifested.

I ought to say for your comfort and encouragement that such a spirit is not natural to us, nor easy to acquire; and yet the Holy Spirit will help us to gain it whenever we show a real desire to do so. The Holy Spirit, gentle and loving Himself, is the best teacher we can have.

The dove, as you know, is often taken as the emblem of gentleness, and so in the pretty hymn—

Come, Holy Spirit, Heavenly Dove,
With all Thy quickening powers;
Come, shed abroad a Saviour's love,
And that shall kindle ours.

Let us all try to be gentle, and pray to God's Holy Spirit to help us to become so.

If ministers of the Gospel could always be gentle, if parents and teachers could be so, and if boys and girls would put themselves under the guidance and instruction of the Blessed Spirit, then, indeed, would heaven be begun, even upon this earth.—JOHN N. NORRIS, Milk and Honey, p. 98.

SOWING AND REAPING

'Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.'—

GALATIANS VI. 7.

A MAN who lived a long time ago wrote this, 'If you take away little children out of the city, it is like taking the springtime out of the year'. A pretty thought! Then this is your springtime; and if it is your springtime, it is your 'sowing' time, because we always 'sow' in spring. And you are all 'sowing', you cannot help it. You are all 'sowing seeds'. Everybody every moment, at this moment, is 'sowing seeds'.

I. Some people 'sow the wind'. Will you look at Hosea viii. 7—'They have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind'. Now I think there are some people who, though they do not 'sow wickedness,' sow folly—'the wind'.

I know what I should call it, if boys and girls were very idle when they ought to be doing their duty and learning their lessons; or playing away their time, when they ought to be getting wisdom, they are 'sowing the wind'. Or suppose a person is very fond of reading silly novels and love stories, I say, 'It will come to nothing. You are sowing the wind.' Supposing a boy to be very ambitious; thinking about nothing but what a wonderful boy he wants to be; you are 'sowing the wind'. Supposing a girl in the school thinks only about popularity; you are 'sowing the wind'. Or a little girl thinks about dress—looks much at herself in the glass; you are 'sowing the wind'. And what will you 'reap'? Remember what God says, 'the whirlwind'.

I will tell you about a young man. When he was a boy he had a great many good feelings; and often said he was very religious. When he went to college, he became what is called a very ambitious young man. He did not care very much about the Bible, but wanted to be great in this world, and particularly wanted to be great in politics.

His father and mother wished him to be a clergyman; he said, 'No; I will be a lawyer'. He thought that would be the best way of getting into Parliament, and then he might become one of the queen's ministers. His God was power, and his heaven was fame. He thought about little else. I have known many such. So he went on. God strove with him at one time particularly; but he put it away—he resisted it, and thought only about politics.

When he left college he married a wife, and had a little child; and he went into a government house where he thought he could rise. Thus he went on 'sowing,' and 'sowing the wind'.

By and by he applied for a very high situation—one of the highest he could get. His application went to the Prime Minister; and he thought he was going to 'reap' the highest honours.

Just after he had done this, his wife and little child died of the typhus fever, and he took it, and was laid upon his bed—poor, sick young man! without any comfort. No Jesus Christ to look to; no peace in his conscience. He became very sick, and very miserable.

One day while he was lying on his sick-bed there came from the Prime Minister the long-expected paper, appointing him to the office he had been seeking. His parents thought it might do him good if it were shown to him. When he saw the paper he rose up in his bed, his consciousness seemed to return to him—he took it in his hands; but he shuddered all over. Within three or four hours afterwards he died! He 'sowed the wind, and he reaped the whirlwind'.

II. Some 'sow mixed seed'. In Leviticus and Deuteronomy it is said the Jews were never to 'sow mixed seed'. Perhaps it might mean that they must not be as some people are, half Jews and half for the world—trying to get the best of this world, and the best of the next also. I am afraid a great many persons are 'sowing mixed seeds'. God will not have it.

I will tell you who 'sowed' it. Lot did. He was a righteous man; but he went to wicked Sodom because it was a fertile country; and look at the trouble he came into. Reuben also 'sowed mixed seed'; and he never 'excelled'. Do not 'sow mixed seed'.

I shall mention three good 'seeds'. Will you look at Hosea x. 12. Let us all read it together. 'Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy.' What does it mean? I wonder whether a very little girl could tell me what it means. I do not think she could. Some could tell me the true meaning of this verse. Jesus Christ is our 'righteousness'—for we are all bad before God! nobody is 'righteous' before God. If we are so, it must be because we love Jesus Christ. Then God will see us in Him. So that He is our 'righteousness,' we cannot be 'righteous' in any other way. No one, let him try ever as hard, or live ever as long, can be 'righteous,' except as clothed in the 'righteousness' of Jesus Christ.

Now you must 'sow in Christ'. And what will you 'reap'? 'Mercy!' Though you are a poor sinner, yet if you 'sow faith' in Jesus, you will reap mercy; and then, when you have 'sown in Jesus,' and attained 'mercy,' and your sins are forgiven, then you 'sow righteousness'; that is, speak the truth, and do everything that is honest. You will 'sow' prayers, and prayers will come up again; you will 'sow' the reading of God's Word, and that will come up again. But you must 'sow in Christ'.

I should like to tell you something about that great man, John Wesley—he was a very great man—some of you have heard of him. When he was eighty-six years old (such an old man as that!) he was as handsome almost as ever he was, and he was very strong. He wrote in his journal, on his eighty-sixth birthday, something like this—'I am eighty-six to-day. I can write, I believe, as well as ever I could; and preach as well as ever I could. Thank God for this mercy! I feel a little pain in my eyes sometimes, but not much. I can do almost anything that ever I could. . . . How is it that I have such peace in my mind?'

Then he wrote down the reasons. 'One is, because for sixty years I rose at four o'clock; and, in most of those years, preached at five.' Wesley used to preach every day to the colliers in Gloucestershire. 'Another reason is, because I have been so much in the open air, and taken so much horse exercise; perhaps this has had something to do with it. Another thing is, I am so quiet in my mind. I have had the peace of God in my heart nearly the whole of my lifetime, and have always endeavoured to forgive everybody. And this has helped me to be such a happy old man.

'But then,' says he, 'one thing more; so many of God's children have prayed for me. But the greatest of all is, because God is so kind to me; and because He loved me when I was a boy; and, as He loved me when I was a boy, He does not now forsake me because I am an old man.'

Wesley lived till 1791, and died at the age of eighty-nine. When dying, he said to his people around him, 'The best of all is, God is with us for ever and ever'. After he had said that, he began a hymn he was very fond of,

I'll praise my Maker, while I've breath.

He said, 'I will praise, praise, praise'—he could not say more than that. He had 'sowed righteousness' when a boy, and he 'reaped in mercy'.

I will tell you a very simple story about this, which is very suitable for little children. Little Susan was one day sent by her mamma with a message. Outside the door of the house where she lived was a pile of wood; she managed to get over it, and trotted to the place and back. On arriving at home again, the woodcutter kindly lifted her over, and put her into her mother's house. Little Susan was very grateful, and said to her mamma, 'The woodcutter has been so kind to me. What can I give him?' Her mamma said, 'Well, really, I cannot tell you'. She said, 'I should like to give him my red apple'. So she did. The woodcutter said, 'May I do what I like with it?' She said, 'Oh, yes'. 'Then,' said he, 'I will take it to little Johnny—he is my little boy; he once sat on a stool, and fell off into the fire and burned himself, and he will like to have this nice apple.'

The little girl went back to her mamma, and said, 'Oh, mamma, may I not also give him my little horse with the soldier upon it?' Her mamma gave consent; so she gave that to the woodcutter also. He went off with them; and when he reached home, his little Johnny was very much pleased. He kissed the apple, and the soldier, and the little horse.

After a little while, he said, 'Father, may I do what I like with the red apple?' 'Oh, yes,' said he. 'May I give it to Jim?' 'What!' said his father, 'to that naughty boy that puts his thumb out and makes faces at you? Do you love him?' Little Johnny said, 'Not so much as I could wish, father; but I should like to give him this apple'. So when Jim went by Johnny called him, and said, 'Here is a fine apple for you'. Jim said, 'I am sure you do not mean it for me. I cannot take it,' and he turned away very much ashamed. But Johnny would not let him go away, and Jim was obliged to take the red apple.

And what do you think he did. He went home to give it away to his brothers and sisters. They were astonished at him—it was a thing he had never done before; and from that time Jim became a kind boy. He went to work and earned twopence, and when he did so, he bought some plums and apples and gave them to Johnny; and he began to be kind to everybody. How many kind things were done through the woodcutter's kindness—by the little girl; by him; by Johnny; by Jimmy; and by him to everybody. 'Cast thy bread upon the waters, and it shall be found after many days.'—JAMES VAUGHAN.

WHAT YOU SOW YOU REAP

'Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.'—
GALATIANS VI. 7.

THESE words are true regarding three worlds. I shall say a few words about each of them. The world of matter, the world of mind, and the world of spirit.

I. The text is true regarding the world of Matter—the outer creation. If you plant flowers in your garden, flowers will grow. If you plant weeds, and nettles, and thorns, these will grow. If the farmer puts wheat-seed into his field, wheat will grow—or barley, barley will grow—or tares, tares will grow. I am told that many years since, when people first began to go from this country to Australia to till the land there, a Scotchman missed two things that were very familiar in his own glens and valleys at home. The one was the bee, and the other was the Scotch thistle. He managed to get both sent out to him. In a very short time he had swarms of busy bees murmuring around him, and honey on his table. This was all well; but I believe he came to regret having ever brought the other, the thistle, from its distant home; for the thistle-down—the seed of the plant—was soon wafted all around, and sprang up in large quantities. His wheat crop was none the better for this; neither were his neighbours' fields. That downy stranger, he had in an evil hour invited, preached to him and to many far and wide a silent sermon on my text—'Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap'.

II. The text is true regarding the world of Mind.

If you are diligent at school, and learn your lessons well, you will be sure to get on. Sowing well, you will reap in due time golden sheaves in life's after harvest. If you are idle and inattentive, and fonder of play than of your books, then you will grow up ignorant, and not be able to act your part in the world. The unsown field will produce nothing. When your neighbour's parks are green and beautiful, yours will be brown and bare.

Who, I ask, are those who have been successful in life—who have climbed up to the top of the ladder, and who by their knowledge and discoveries have made the world wiser, and their fellows better and happier? They are not the lazy, and slothful, and indolent, but rather those who resolved to do their best. They shut themselves up among their books. They continued, it may be, late at night, conning their task. They held sacred the precious hours of youth; and difficult though it was to ascend that ladder of which I have just spoken, yet up they climbed, higher and higher, until they gained the highest step. Others who started at the same time as they did, have been left far behind—with their talents wasted and their chances gone. They were sleeping and idling when the others were working. They sowed to idleness, they reaped ignorance—it may be even poverty and want.

III. The text is true regarding the world of Spirit. It is true of the world of Matter and the world of Mind, but it has a far more solemn truth regarding the Soul and Eternity.

The present is the sowing-time for Immortality. The soul is the field. Whatsoever we sow in this world we shall reap in the next.

Those who serve God and love Jesus, who try to be good and amiable and gentle, who are kind to their brothers and sisters and to all around them, will reap a harvest of bliss.

Those, on the other hand, who have no love for God or for His Word; who are naughty and selfish, who tell lies and say bad words, and disobey their parents, and are passionate to their brothers and sisters, are preparing for themselves a harvest of sorrow. The same thing which must make them unhappy in this world, will render them unhappy in the world to come.

Take that beautiful Bible verse for your encouragement—'Be not weary in well-doing; for in due season ye shall reap if ye faint not' (Gal. vi. 9). The Day of Judgment is the world's great Harvest-home. Jesus will then be heard saying, 'Thrust in the sickle for the harvest is ripe'. The reapers, we read, are to be the angels. May you all be gathered as golden sheaves into the Heavenly Garner by these angel-reapers: 'found unto praise, and honour, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ'. May it be said of you now, may it be said of you then, may it be said of you through all eternity—'They joy before Thee, according to the joy in harvest' (Isa. ix. 3).
—J. R. MACDUFF, Hosannas of the Children, p. 301.

A GREEN ROSE

'Let us not be weary in well-doing.'—GALATIANS VI. 9.

IN our gardens it is not uncommon to find a rose-bush, which, instead of being covered with beautiful crimson roses, is covered over with little tufts of green leaves at the end of the sprigs. These green roses, as they are called, have no fragrance, no grace of shape or beauty of colour; and they produce no seed, no germ of hope for the future. There is an end of them then and there. The little leaves of which they are made up are inferior to the ordinary leaves in every respect. It is a case of floral backsliding, where the rose, instead of going forward to produce its crimson blossom, according to its natural law, goes back, owing to some defect in its nature, or to excess of nourishment, into a mere tuft of green leaves, which has not the beauty or use of the blossom, nor the beauty or use of the foliage.

In the carnation there is also a very curious variety like that of the green rose, produced by the same cause. It is called the 'wheat-ear carnation' because the blossom changes into a long green spike destitute of the usual pink colour and delicate fragrance, and looking like an unripe ear of beardless wheat. It was first found in Holland, where the carnation was at one time extensively cultivated as a favourite flower; and it is still occasionally seen as a curious monstrosity in our own gardens.

It was of a similar case of going back in the spiritual world that the Apostle Paul was thinking, when he said to the Galatian converts, 'Let us not be weary in well-doing'. It is difficult to explain in English the exquisite balancing of the words in the original Greek. The Greek word for 'weary' is a compound of kakon, which means badness; while the Greek word for 'well-doing' is a compound of kalon, which means beauty or goodness. And the meaning of the advice of the Apostle, therefore, is—Let not your goodness become badness—your beauty, deformity.

This was a tendency to which the Galatian converts were peculiarly prone. Their weariness came from a capricious, unstable nature. They began things with great enthusiasm, and soon got tired of them. They had the Celtic temperament, with all its faults and excellences. They lacked endurance. They had no power of perseverance. They liked to race along the straight white road before them, rather than to pace it slowly, step by step. They resembled the seed in the parable, growing up rapidly in the stony ground, and producing a luxuriant braid, long before the rest of the field had sent up a single blade, but speedily withering away for lack of root.

I. In nature there are things that begin in beauty and end in corruption. The day that opens with bright sunshine often ends in gloomy clouds. The plant that sends forth a fair shoot, and gives promise of a lovely flower and abundant fruit, becomes blighted, and withers untimely. And, alas! how many experiences of the same kind are there in human life! Bright careers ending in woeful failure, glowing hopes quenched in despair. But the saddest of all such experiences is declension in religion; for the corruption of the best is the worst. The purest lily smells rankest in decay; and gold sinks deeper in the mire than rotten wood.

II. We have characters in the Bible that represent the temperament of the Galatian converts. Balaam was a man of noble gifts and grand promise. He saw the vision of God's dealings with Israel, and sympathised with it. But he descended from this lofty Pisgah of the soul to the vanities of the world, and sank to the level of his baser self, and so made shipwreck of his life. We have examples of similar declension in the case of the Church of Ephesus, which left its first love; and in the case of the Church of Pergamos, which held at last the doctrine of Balaam, and went after his covetous ways, and sank down sadly from the grand days when Antipas, Christ's faithful martyr, belonged to it. And among ourselves are there not too many examples of the Galatian temperament; young people whose spiritual life, instead of producing crimson blossoms, produces green roses that are but mere leaves of profession, and yield no fruit of righteousness, who, instead of growing better by their religion, are growing worse?

III. The danger of spiritual declension is very great. There is the same tendency in spiritual things, to lose the fresh interest and enthusiasm which gave them such a charm at the beginning, that there is in all human things. Your Christian life, left to itself, without any of its usual elements of growth, may for a time seem to put forth beautiful blossoms under the impetus it has received; but in order to grow vigorously and bring forth the peaceable fruits of righteousness, it must be planted anew in the soil of faith and love in Christ Jesus from which it sprang.—HUGH MACMILLAN, The Spring of the Day, p. 289.

THE EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS

STEALING

'Let him that stole, steal no more.'—EPHESIANS IV. 28.

PROBABLY the most singular funeral sermon ever heard, was that which the eccentric Rowland Hill once delivered in London over the remains of his favourite servant, Roger.

'Many persons present,' remarked the preacher, looking around on the anxious faces turned towards him, as he stood perched up in his high pulpit, 'were acquainted with the deceased, and have had it in their power to observe his character and conduct. They can bear witness that for a considerable number of years he proved himself a perfectly honest, sober, industrious and religious man, faithfully performing, so far as lay in his power, the duties of his station in life, and serving God with constancy and zeal. Yet this very man was once a robber on the highway.'

You may readily imagine what astonishment these words produced, and amidst what profound silence the preacher thus went on: 'More than thirty years ago he stopped me on the public road, and demanded my money. Not at all intimidated, I argued with him; I asked him what could induce him to pursue so iniquitous and dangerous a course of life.

'His answer was, "I have been a coachman; I am out of place, and I cannot get a character; I am unable to find any employment, and am therefore obliged to do this or to starve".

'I told him where I lived, and asked him to call and see me. He promised he would, and he kept his word, I talked further with him, and offered to take him into my own service. He consented, and ever since that period he has served me faithfully, and not me only, but he has faithfully served his God. Instead of finishing his life in a public and ignominious manner, with a depraved and hardened heart, as he probably would have done, he died in peace, and, we trust, prepared for the society of just men made perfect. Till this day the extraordinary circumstance I have now related has been confined to his heart and mine. I have never mentioned it to my dearest friend.'

The practice of stealing prevails in all pagan communities. You will find many curious instances of dexterity in theft in such books as Cook's Voyage, and others of more recent date. Ephesus was a great city, and its inhabitants were intelligent; and yet even to the Christians there St. Paul thought it necessary to put into his letter, which was to be read aloud in church, 'Let him that stole steal no more'. We could not afford to blot out this verse from our Bibles; the world needs it now as much as it ever did.

Almost every newspaper contains an account of house-breaking, or a bank robbery, theft in a post office, or some new and cunning device for cheating the Government. And why this prevalence of theft? Because so many never have been taught the eighth commandment, and the duty of 'keeping their hands from picking and stealing,' according to the wholesome instructions of the Catechism. Whatever is got by unfair and dishonest ways is stealing. Mean and contemptible as theft is, it is by no means confined to the poor and the degraded.

The Empress Josephine once had a beautiful red shawl sent to her from Egypt, and this made all the fashionable people in high life anxious to have red shawls also. One night at a party a countess took off hers for a few minutes, when it was stolen by a young girl in 'good society,' who was figuring among the gay butterflies at the same assembly. She denied the theft, but when the enraged countess dragged it from her shoulders, and pointed out her own initials embroidered in one corner and concealed by the fringe, the discomfiture of the guilty party was complete.

A cashier in a large city bank once told a friend that his experience there for many years had almost destroyed his confidence in human nature, declaring that hardly a day passed that somebody did not bring in a counterfeit note and try to pass it. When about to make a mark on all such bills on their own bank, as it was his duty to do, many would loudly and positively object to it. In embarrassment he would ask, 'Why, you would not pass this worthless money on anyone else?' and they would answer, without hesitation, 'Oh, I came by it honestly, and the loss ought not to fall upon me'.

The rash and reckless way in which so many engage in wild speculations, has led thousands to be dishonest who might otherwise have passed through life free from reproach. A very common mode of 'making money' is for a man to declare that he has failed in business, and to agree to pay a small sum on the dollar, on condition that those to whom he is largely in debt will let him off. The arrangement is made, because the creditors despair of getting more out of the 'bankrupt,' and yet, in the course of a year or two the man will be better off than ever, although it seldom occurs to him that he ought to show his honesty by paying his old debt.

We ought to learn to call things by their right names. If a poor, half-starved fellow in his shirt-sleeves, shivering on a cold day, slyly takes a fustian coat worth five dollars, which is hanging out in front of a clothing store, it is spoken of by every one as stealing, and the culprit enjoys a few years of retirement in prison to remind him of his dreadful breach of the law. On the other hand, let a so-called gentleman in broadcloth run away with fifty thousand dollars from some institution in which he had an office, and how does the world regard him? As a thief? By no means. He is only a defaulter! And yet can you see any difference between the two cases, except it be this, that the thief in broadcloth is the worst?

Samuel Kilpin, who for a long while preached in the city of Exeter, England, related this touching story of himself:—

‘When seven years old, I was left one day in charge of my father’s shop. Pretty soon a man passed along the street with a board on his head loaded with toys, and crying aloud, “Little lambs, all white and clean, at one penny each!”

‘In my eagerness to get one, I lost all self-command, and taking a penny from the drawer I soon made the purchase. My keen-eyed mother asked how I came by the money, and I evaded the question with something like a lie.

‘The little white lamb was placed on the mantel-piece and was admired by all who saw it. To me, however, it was a source of inexpressible anguish; for day and night I heard sounding in my ears the terrible words, “Thou shalt not steal! Thou shalt not lie!”

‘Overwhelmed with a sense of guilt, I went to a hay-loft where I could be alone, and prayed to God, even with tears, to pardon me for Jesus’ sake. I left the hay-loft with a load lifted from my heart, and going directly to my mother, told her the whole truth. I actually burned up the lamb in the kitchen fire, while my dear mother wept tears of joy over the penitence of her son.’

If any now listening to me are treasuring up the secret of dishonest deeds in their own bosom, let them learn from this beautiful story the duty and the happiness of a full and frank confession.

Many acts of theft are committed out of pure thoughtlessness.

What do you say of the common practice of borrowing books, and umbrellas, and overcoats, and money, and never remembering to return these things to the owner? Is not this stealing?

‘Horrible! horrible!’ you say; ‘but people do not mean to be dishonest.’

That may be so; but do they have such poor memories when the thing to be thought of is the hour for dinner, or for some pleasant entertainment? Are they apt to be equally forgetful when other people borrow of them?

I cannot think of a better way of applying this important subject, than to relate a little circumstance which once happened in the Sandwich Islands. A good missionary had preached a sermon on the sin of dishonesty, hoping it might not be lost upon his hearers. The very next morning, on opening the door of his bamboo hut, he was surprised to see a great many of the islanders seated on the ground, waiting for him. The missionary kindly asked why they had called upon him so early, when one of them replied:—

‘We have not been able to sleep all night, after hearing what you said yesterday. When we were pagans, we thought it right to steal if we could do it without being found out. Yesterday you told us that God commanded people not to steal, and as we wish to mind Him we have now brought back all the things we ever took.’

One man then lifted up an axe, a hatchet, or chisel, and exclaimed, ‘I stole this from the carpenter of such a ship,’ naming the vessel; others handed back a saw or knife, and a great variety of other things, making the same candid confession.

They then insisted that the missionary should take these stolen goods, and keep them until he might have an opportunity of returning them to the owner.

May all of us try to be as honest as these poor islanders, and when the eighth commandment is read in church, let us pray most earnestly, ‘Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law’.—JOHN N. NORTON, Milk and Honey, p. 133.

THE WARNING AGAINST GRIEVING THE SPIRIT

‘Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God.’—EPHESIANS IV. 30.

The Spirit of God is given to us to be our teacher and helper in trying to love and serve God. We please this blessed Spirit when we listen to His gentle whispers, and try to carry them out. We grieve this Holy Spirit when we do not mind His teachings, and try to do the things which He wants us to do.

I. We ought to mind this Warning, Because Grieving the Spirit will ‘Injure our Knowledge’.

—Of ourselves, we have no knowledge of the way to heaven, and never could tell how to get there. It is the Holy Spirit alone who can give us this knowledge. But if we grieve the Spirit, we shall never get this knowledge.

Suppose that you and I were travelling through a strange country like Switzerland. We should have no knowledge of the right way to travel in, so as to get safely through the country. And this would make it necessary for us to have a guide to show us the way. I remember when the Rev. Dr. Cooper and myself were travelling through Switzerland, some years ago, an incident occurred which may come in as a good illustration of this part of our subject. We were stopping at an inn in the beautiful valley of Interlaken, and had made arrangements, one evening, to go on foot the next day over a high mountain called ‘the Wengern Alp,’ to the valley of Lauterbrunnen on the other side. We had engaged a guide to show us the way, and were to make an early start the next morning. There was an English traveller staying at the same inn with us. He was travelling alone, and wanted to make the same journey. He spoke to one of the guides about going with him. But he thought the man asked too much money. They could not agree about the price; so he refused to take the guide, and said he was sure he could find the way himself. He started all by himself the next morning, a good while before us. When we had got nearly half-way over the mountain our guide stopped. He pointed to a dark-looking little object, far off from the path in which we were walking, and said:—

‘There’s the gentleman who would not have a guide. He has lost his way. He never can get out of the mountains in that direction. If he doesn’t come back he’ll lose his life.’ Then the guide climbed up on a high piece of ground, and putting his hands to his mouth, he called out as loudly as he could, ‘Come back! come back!’ We could not tell whether the lost man heard him or not, or what became of him. But in refusing to take a guide to show him the way that man was injuring his knowledge, just as we do when we grieve the Holy Spirit.

II. The Second Reason why we ought to mind this Warning, is Because Grieving the Spirit will ‘Injure our Happiness’.—When David was speaking of the happy effect which follows from our acquaintance with the truth of God, he said—‘Blessed are the people which know the joyful sound’. This blessedness refers to the happiness which God’s people find from knowing Him. And here we see how the knowledge of God, and the happiness which springs from it, both go together. This knowledge is like a fountain; and this happiness is like the stream which flows from the fountain. But we cannot have the stream unless we have the fountain too. And so we see that if grieving the Spirit interferes with our knowledge of God, it must, in just the same way, interfere with the happiness which springs from that knowledge.

This story is told by an English clergyman, who lived in St. Petersburg a number of years, having the charge of an English chapel there.

‘We had several Russian servants,’ he says, ‘among whom was a bright, intelligent young woman, whose name was Erena. She came to us in the fall of the year, and everything went on well till the beginning of Lent in the spring of the following year. Erena was a member of the Greek Church. The persons belonging to this Church are very particular in keeping the fast of Lent, and attend the services of this season as diligently as though their salvation depended on it. Erena told her mistress that she wished to attend Church twice every day all through Lent. Her mistress told her that she ought not to think of going so often.

“Do you wish me to lose my soul, ma’am?” asked the girl. “No,” was the answer, “far from it; I wish your soul to be saved. But fasting, and saying prayers, and going to church will not save your soul.

There must be something more than all this. The Lord Jesus Christ is the only Saviour of sinners, and it is by faith in Him alone that any can be saved.”

“Ah,” said Erena, “that is your religion; but I have been taught differently, and I must follow my own religion.”

Erena’s mistress had taught her to read, and had given her a Russian Testament.

‘One Sunday, when we were going to chapel,’ says this good minister, ‘my wife left Erena in charge of the children. Before leaving, she asked Erena to please read the tenth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles while we were away. This excited her curiosity. She wondered what there could be in that chapter which made her mistress so anxious for her to read it. She began to read it at once, and got very much interested in the account given there of Cornelius the centurion. When she read about his fasting, and praying, and giving alms, she was very much interested, and said: “Ah! this is delightful! This man was of my religion. He believed in fasting, praying, and giving alms.” But when she found that an angel was sent to him, to show him how he could get to “hear words whereby he might be saved,” she could not understand what this meant. As soon as we returned from church, she came to my wife with great earnestness, and said, “Please, ma’am, will you explain this to me? I can’t understand it. Here is a good man, who kept the fast, and prayed to God, and gave alms; but that was not enough. Now, why was it not enough? I never was taught to do anything more.”

“Well, Erena,” said her mistress, “just read the chapter carefully through, and you will find out why the angel was sent to Cornelius.”

‘Then she went to her room, and read carefully on till she came to that beautiful verse, where Peter says of Christ, “To Him give all the prophets witness, that through His name, whosoever believeth in Him shall receive remission of sins”. This was enough. For the first time in her life, she clearly saw how we are to be saved through Jesus. She had found out the way to heaven. Running to her mistress, she clasped her hands, and exclaimed:—

“Oh, ma’am! I see it now—I see it now—I see it now! It was not by fasting that Cornelius the centurion was to be saved; it was not by saying prayers—it was not by giving alms—but it was by believing on Jesus the Son of God. I never saw it before, but I see it now.”

That Russian servant had found out the way to heaven. She began to walk in it at once, and it made her happy. But if she had refused to read the Testament that her mistress gave her, she would have been grieving the Spirit. That would have injured both her knowledge and her happiness.

III. The Third Reason why we should mind this Warning, is Because Grieving the Spirit will ‘Injure our Usefulness’.—If you are an errand boy in a store, and your duty is to carry parcels or messages wherever you are sent, then if anything should make you lame, so that you could not walk, this would interfere with your usefulness. Suppose you have a position on one of the stations of the Pennsylvania Railway. Your duty there is to watch the signals which tell when a train is coming; and then to give notice of it by ringing a bell. And suppose that something should happen to your eyes, so that you could not see; this would at once injure your usefulness, and unfit you for the duties of your position.

Or suppose that your mother is a very skillful seamstress, and is supporting her family by the diligent use of her needle. She has an attack of rheumatism which settles on her right hand, making her fingers so stiff that she cannot use her needle. That would injure her usefulness.

If we listen to the voice of the Spirit when He speaks to us, and mind what He says, then He will show us what our duty is, and help us to do it. And that will make us useful. But if we grieve the Spirit by not listening to His voice, then we shall never know what our duty is, and we should have no power to do it, even if we did know.

IV. The Fourth Reason why we should mind this Warning, is Because Grieving the Spirit will 'Cause the Loss of our Souls.'—Just see what it says in the other part of the verse in which our text is found, 'Grieve not the holy Spirit of God—whereby ye are sealed, unto the day of redemption.' To seal the soul unto the day of redemption is to make its salvation sure. This is what the Spirit will do for those who listen to His voice. But if we grieve the Spirit, by refusing to listen to His voice, He will stop speaking to us and leave us to ourselves, and then our souls will certainly be lost.

See, there is Noah's ark just finished. God told Noah and all his family to come into the ark. They listened to His voice. They all went into the ark; and when the flood came, they were saved. But suppose now they had not minded what God said to them and had refused to go into the ark, that would have been like grieving the Spirit; and the result would have been that when the flood came, they would all have been destroyed. And so if we go on grieving the Spirit, it must certainly result in the loss of our souls.

This story is told by a faithful minister of the Gospel, as connected with his own experience while in college.

'We had,' said he, 'a remarkable revival of religion, one winter, during my college course. A large number of the students in my class became Christians and joined the church while that revival was going on. There was one young man in our class, who was an unusually bright student. His manners were very pleasing, and he was a great favourite with all the students. He attended the revival meetings for several weeks, and was under great exercise of mind. I was very anxious for his conversion, as I felt sure that he would make an uncommonly useful Christian. I prayed for him continually, and had many earnest conversations with him on the subject. But there seemed to be some difficulty in his way, and I felt very anxious about him. One evening he came to my room, and in the course of our conversation he said to me—"I am very much obliged to you, my friend, for the warm interest you have taken in my case during this revival. I have come to tell you that the question is settled at last, but in a different way from what you have expected. I have made up my mind not to become a Christian now. You see I have always intended, when I get through college, to enter into political life. But I feel sure that I never should succeed as a politician if I were an earnest Christian. So I have concluded to make politics my choice, and let religion go."

'I was greatly distressed,' said the good minister, 'when I heard this. With the tears streaming down my face, I pleaded most earnestly with him not to take this course. But all that I could say had no effect on him. He had made his choice, and was resolved to stand by it.

'When his college course was finished, he entered into political life. He was successful in his efforts. He won great honour as a politician. But what was the end of it? He finally became intemperate and went down at last to a drunkard's grave. And we know that God has said, "Drunkards shall not inherit the kingdom of God."

Now that young man was grieving the Holy Spirit of God, when he made up his mind not to be a Christian, at the time of that revival in his college life. He did not mind the warning of our text, and the end of it was—the loss of his soul.—RICHARD NEWTON, Bible Warnings; Addresses to Children, p. 186.

GRIEVING THE HOLY SPIRIT!

'Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption.'—EPHESIANS IV. 30.

I WANT my hearer to think with me upon a very important subject, about The Holy Spirit! And I want you to do so, because I do not think most persons think much about the Holy Spirit. We think more about God the Father, and Jesus Christ, than we think about the Holy Ghost—don't we? That ought not to be. We ought to think about the Holy Ghost as much as we think about God the Father, or about Jesus Christ. But I do not think we do. I will tell you why we ought to do so.

Do you know who the Holy Ghost is? He is God. Now I will tell you a wonderful thing—He is God in you. The Bible says so, He is God in you, 'unless you are reprobate'. And I think, and I feel pretty sure, that the Holy Ghost is now in all of us. When you have a nice religious thought, He is in you. He gave you that nice thought. When you do something wrong, and are sorry for it, it is the Holy Ghost who gives you that feeling. And when you feel very happy, and believe that God loves you, and you think you are going to heaven, it is the Holy Ghost who gives you that thought. When you have been in sorrow, and are comforted, it is the Holy Ghost who comforts you. Everything that is really good in us is because the Holy Ghost is in us.

I. That is a very wonderful thought—that the Holy Spirit is God, and is in us. And therefore I have thought that we ought to think a great deal about it. You won't understand my sermon without the Holy Ghost; but if you have the Holy Ghost you will. You won't know the real meaning of the Bible without the Holy Ghost; but if you pray to the Holy Ghost, and read the Bible, you will then see some wonderful things in it; things you have not seen before, the Holy Ghost will show you. Therefore let us speak about the Holy Ghost.

Do you know that I find in the verse that I have read to you a proof that the Holy Ghost loves you? Do you see that? Look at the verse. What is there, in the words, to prove that the Holy Ghost loves you? It says, 'Grieve not the Holy Spirit'. Now if He is grieved about anything in us, it is because He loves us. I should not be 'grieved' about any of you that did wrong unless I loved you. It is a proof that the Holy Ghost loves you because He can be 'grieved' when you do wrong. A father or mother is 'grieved' when a child does anything wrong; but a stranger is not 'grieved'. He is shocked; he is angry; but he is not 'grieved'. But the Holy Ghost can be grieved. That shows to us how He loves us. Now do not grieve One who loves you so much! Somebody has said this: 'Christ is the head of the Church, but the Holy Ghost is the heart of the Church,' because he is so full of love. He is like the heart. 'Christ is the head, the Holy Ghost is the heart of the Church.'

Now I will tell you what sort of things are those that 'grieve' Him.

II. The Holy Ghost is in you. The Holy Ghost is in your conscience. Your conscience; that little voice inside which tells you when you do wrong, and when you do right. That is conscience, and the Holy Ghost speaks to us by the conscience. Whenever, therefore, you do anything that is against your conscience, you 'grieve' the Holy Ghost, this kind, good God that is in you. If you say anything that is not quite true—and you know that it is not quite true—you 'grieve' the Holy Ghost, God the Holy Ghost! If you are unkind to anybody, if you are unkind to any animal, if you are unkind to anything, you 'grieve' the Holy Ghost! If you are disobedient, you 'grieve' the Holy Ghost! If you are idle, you 'grieve' the Holy Ghost! If you do not say your prayers—if you say your prayers without thinking what you are doing—you 'grieve' the Holy Ghost! If you do anything that is wrong, you 'grieve' the Holy Ghost! If you do behind anybody's back what you would not do before their face, you 'grieve' the Holy Ghost! If you neglect your duty, you 'grieve' the Holy Ghost.

That is 'grieving the Holy Ghost'. Perhaps we do not think enough when we do anything wrong how that affects God. Do you know that when you do a wrong thing, when you do a sin, that sin is the nail that fastened Jesus Christ to His cross! A lie—a dishonest action—anything wicked—pride, is a nail that fastened Jesus Christ on His cross. That is a fearful thing to think about. Do you think you have nailed Jesus Christ to the cross? Yes, yes, you have! When you do anything that you know is wrong, or leave undone anything you ought to have done, you are grieving God; you are trampling upon God.

There was a great Roman general. He commanded the Roman army when his country was invaded. The Roman army was conquered, and the Roman soldiers were flying away. As they did so they had to pass through a narrow passage, where only one man could go through at a time. What do you think the general officer did? He laid himself down in that narrow passage, so that as each man came flying back he would have to trample on his general! They could not fly from the enemy without trampling on their officer. So when they wanted to fly away, and came to the narrow passage, they could not bear to trample on their general; therefore they turned back again to fight with the enemy. That was the way the general prevented the soldiers from flying away.

When you do what is wrong you trample upon your conscience, upon your Saviour, upon the Holy Ghost, upon God! That is very awful, but it is true. You trample upon God!

Let me tell you of one or two persons, to show you about 'grieving the Holy Spirit'.

In the fourth century there was a very good and great man, who was called 'St. John Chrysostom'. Chrysostom was not his real name. It is a Greek word which means, 'The golden-mouthed'. He was called 'Chrysostom' because he used to speak nice, beautiful words. He was a very holy man; but the emperor was very much offended with him because of something he had said. He had spoken the truth. The emperor was very much offended, and he considered what he should do to punish him. So he consulted his counsellors. And he said to some of his great men, near his throne, 'What shall we do to punish Chrysostom?' And one man said, 'Banish him out of the kingdom. Send him to the other end of the earth.' Another man said, 'Take away all his money. Everything he has got.' Another man said, 'Put him in prison. Chain him up.' Another man said, 'Kill him outright. You are the emperor, and can do what you like.' Then another man spoke, he was a heathen man, and he said, 'All those men have given wrong advice. If you banish Chrysostom to any part of the world, it won't make any difference to him. He will preach about God anywhere. He won't bind himself not to do so. If you take away his money, you are only robbing the poor, for all his money goes to the poor. Therefore you are not robbing him. And if you chain him up in prison, he will kiss the chains, he will love the chains. And if you kill him, why, you will just open his door to heaven, be just doing what he would wish, opening the door for him to go straight into heaven. I will tell you what to do, there is only this one thing you can do —make him sin, that will distress him. He will be miserable if you can make him do some sin.'

Oh, what a noble man Chrysostom must have been, that the only thing that could trouble him was sin, and the only way to punish him was to make him sin! They could only punish him by trying to make him sin.

That is about a great man; now I will tell you about a little boy. His father was a clergyman. This little boy had done something wrong; he had grieved his father; I could not tell you what it was, but his father was very much displeased with him. And the little boy went to his room to learn his lessons, to do his Latin and Greek. Just before the time came to take up his lessons to his father (he was being educated by him), the little boy came up to his father's room, and said, 'Papa, I cannot learn my lessons to-day, because I feel you are displeased with me; I can do nothing; I have been trying all this morning, and I cannot learn anything, because I know you are displeased with me'. His father said, 'Well, my boy, all I want you to do is to confess you have done wrong, and feel it. Now that you have confessed, and feel it, I am no longer displeased.' The boy said, 'Will you give me a token that you will forgive me? will you kiss me?' 'Yes,' said his father; and he kissed him. The little boy kissed his father, and all was made up. Then he said, 'Now I can read Latin and Greek with anybody, I am so happy'. As he was leaving the room, his father said, 'Stop, my boy. Is not there somebody else you have grieved?' Ought not you to have asked God to forgive you?' The little boy said, 'Papa, I did that first, before I came into the room to you. I knew I had grieved God, and before I asked you to forgive me I had asked God to forgive me; and I feel sure that He has, and now I am quite happy.' And the father writes (in the book in which he describes this circumstance), 'I don't think I ever had cause to reprove that boy again'. I wish you could all act as did this little boy.

III. But do not think it enough not to grieve Him, try to do something to please Him; to please this God in you, this Holy Ghost in you. How can you please Him? If you try, I am sure God will show you, Conquer some bad habit; be kind to somebody who has been unkind to you; do some duty to please Him; and what will be the consequence? There will be a little bird that will sing very sweetly in your bosom! You see if there is not. A sweet little bird in your bosom; and he will sing sweetly; you will hear such sweet notes! The Holy Ghost will always show when He is pleased. You will have happy thoughts; you will be able to pray in a different way; when you open your Bible, you will read it quite like a different book, you will feel it so much. You will feel so happy. You will get the 'seal' in everything. You will be so much happier. Everything will be beautiful—because the Holy Ghost is pleased. You will get over your lessons; you will have nice friends; you will be useful; because the Holy Ghost is pleased. Try to do something for His sake, and see if the Holy Ghost does not show you that He is pleased.

IV. And one thing more I will tell you, if you please the Holy Ghost, the 'seals' will not be broken. 'Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption.' Let me try to explain that, being 'sealed' by the Holy Ghost.

I am going to suppose something. I will suppose you have got a great many very valuable jewels; you have got diamonds, and rubies, and pearls, and all kinds of beautiful jewels; and you are going abroad. You are going to leave England, and going into a foreign country. You do not like to take your jewels with you. What can you do to keep them quite safe? You had better lock them up. But that won't make them quite safe; you had better put a 'seal' upon the lock; then you can go abroad and leave your jewels safely 'sealed'. When you come back, if you find that the 'seal' has been broken, you will be pretty sure that the jewels are gone; but if the 'seal' is all right, the jewels are safe.

Now you are Christ's jewels. He bought you at an immense price. You are Christ's jewels; and He has gone abroad, gone to another country for a while; but He will come back again. He has gone many miles away. But that you may be quite safe in His absence, He has put you under a 'seal'; that 'seal' is the Holy Ghost. You were 'sealed' by the Holy Ghost at your baptism; you were 'sealed' to keep you safe. And if you do not break that 'seal,' you will be quite safe. You break it when you commit a sin; when you grieve the Holy Ghost. Christ has put you under the Holy Ghost to 'seal' you. And if you honour the Holy Ghost, obey Him, please Him, then that 'seal' is not broken. Then, when the Proprietor returns, the Saviour Jesus Christ, as He will, He will find His jewels safe, because the 'seal' is not broken. If the 'seal' is broken, you will be lost! So take care! Remember you are Christ's jewels, which He loves, which He bought with His blood. Then, having the 'seal' put upon you, at your baptism, if you do not break that 'seal,' if you see that no man robs you of that 'seal,' you will be safe. Keep the seal! Then when Christ comes, shall I tell you what He will give you? 'The white stone with the new name written thereon.' And those who have 'the white stone with the new name written thereon,' are they who have kept the 'seal'—who are 'sealed'; and that 'white stone with the new name' is the ticket to heaven. This ticket everybody will have to present at the gate of heaven as they go in. The 'white stone' is pardon. It is taken from an old Greek custom, where the 'white stone' was the token of pardon. 'The white stone' means that you are forgiven; and the 'new name' means the Lord Jesus Christ. And if you can show at the last that you have been pardoned, and that you are belonging to the Lord Jesus Christ—that you have got 'the white stone,' pardon, and 'the new name,' Jesus, put upon your heart, you are safe for heaven. It is a ticket for heaven. The angels will admit you; and you will go straight to heaven. The angels will admit you; for the seal is the white stone of pardon—eternal life! Take care, do not grieve the Holy Ghost. Think how much depends upon it. He loves you! Do not 'grieve' Him! do not 'grieve' Him!—JAMES VAUGHAN.

OUR TRUEST RICHES

'Use Time Wisely'

'Redeeming the time.'—EPHESIANS V. 16.

THE words of this motto stand high up in a tower above one of the busiest streets of a great northern city. Underneath them is the dial of an uncommon clock. There are two circles alongside one another. In the first of these, in clear figures, is displayed the hour. In the other are the figures that denote each minute. And as one watches it, the one, two, three, four, etc., succeed each other in regular succession. The first time I saw it, the thought occurred to my mind very forcibly how long a minute is. I was surprised to find how far I could walk along the street between the appearance of one of these figures and the next. It was a very noteworthy manner of impressing on one's mind how frequently we waste our time. Perhaps you have all been impressed with it on certain occasions. You may have stood with a watch in your hand trying to time a race, or to see how long elapsed between a flash of lightning and the subsequent peal of thunder. It may have seemed to you then as if even seconds were long, and when we read in certain sciences about seconds being divided up into millionth parts, our brain becomes dizzy at the thought of the enormous length of time. But the more common idea is of time's shortness. I suppose this becomes more and more noticeable the older we get. When we are quite little the hours seem long, and a summer day is like a week. But even children, when they are happy, think that time flies too quickly. There is one phrase people use sometimes which always appears to me one of the worst, and, if they really meant it, most sinful phrases one could use. They speak about 'killing time' as if time were some enemy, some evil beast that had to be slain, and these are generally the people who have least to do, and who make the worst possible use of the time at their disposal. As a matter of fact, time is one of God's most precious gifts, and like His other gifts of highest value it is common to every one. Time is the same everywhere, and we have all the same length of day, hour, and minute; wherever there may be inequality, there is perfect fairness and adequate opportunity here, and it altogether depends upon the way in which we use our time as to how we are going to manage our life. Time is far too sacred a gift to abuse it.

I know one great castle in the south of England, and on its entrance tower there are two sundials, and the one that faces the approach has upon it the one Latin word, 'Prætreunt,' meaning, 'They have passed by,' and refers to the hours that the dial has measured. Then, as one comes up to the flight of stairs that lead to the hall, the other dial upon the right hand bears the word 'Imputantur,' 'They are reckoned up,' thus reminding every one who enters that the hours one has lived have their chronicle with God. It is a solemn lesson to be taught so forcibly, and impresses at any rate the casual visitor. One wonders whether it becomes so familiar to those who live within the roof of the castle that they do not even notice the words as they go out and in at the door. It is possible to become so familiar with danger that men forget it altogether, and we may become so familiar with truths like this that they do not impress us. I dare say we have all done our best to save our money, in order to get something we desired very much. How many times we have counted it, how often we tried to discover by the very process of counting that we had a shilling more than the sum we knew very well was the correct one. Yet time is of infinitely more value than all the money we can ever get. Some men are so rich that we read about their being worth so many pounds a minute; but in reality every one's minutes are worth far more than can be reckoned in the terms of earthly currency. In reality our time is not ours at all, but God's. He gives it to us, and it is a trust we hold for Him.—G. CURRIE MARTIN, Great Mottoes with Great Lessons, p. 49.

THE EPISTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS

THE APOSTLE PAUL, THE MODEL OF EARNESTNESS

'I press toward the mark.'—PHILIPPIANS III. 14.

PAUL, the Apostle, spoke the above words. He was a very remarkable man. Of all the persons spoken of in the Bible, next to our blessed Lord Himself, there is not one who has done so much good in the world as St. Paul. And I suppose that the chief thing that helped to make him so useful was the earnestness which marked his character. And, in putting him among our Bible Models, we cannot do better than to consider him as the model of earnestness.

This feature of character belonged to him by nature. Before he became a Christian, he was earnest in getting an education. He left his home at Tarsus, in Asia Minor, for this purpose, and was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, the greatest teacher of that age. None but an earnest young man would have done this.

And then we see how earnest he was in persecuting the followers of Jesus, when he thought that was the right thing for him to do. He got letters from the chief priests, and then travelled all the way from Jerusalem to Damascus—a very long journey in those days—that he might make prisoners of the Christians there, and bring them bound to Jerusalem. But it is chiefly in St. Paul's character, after he became a Christian, that we find his earnestness exhibited. And there are three things about the Christian life of St. Paul, in which his earnestness appears. These are—the beginning; the continuance; and the results of that life.

I. St. Paul showed his Earnestness in the way in which he 'Began' his Christian Life.—We see what that beginning was in the prayer which he offered, when Jesus appeared to him on his way to Damascus. He found that he was utterly wrong in the course of life he was pursuing. He saw that it would be necessary for him to make an entire change. He knew not what to do. So he offered the prayer: 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do?' This showed that he was ready to begin his Christian life by doing whatever God wanted him to do.

II. But Secondly, we see what a Model of Earnestness St. Paul was in the Way in which he 'Continued' his Christian Life after it was begun.—We see this illustrated in the words of our text, in which he says: 'I press toward the mark'. In the use of this language, St. Paul has reference to the public games which were practised in his days.

One of these was the game of racing. A long racecourse was prepared in one of the public squares of the great cities. At the end of this racecourse, the laurel crown to be given to the victor was hung on the top of a high pole, so that all the racers could keep it in sight. The men who were going to join in the race would put off their unnecessary clothing, and with their loins girded would stand all ready to start as soon as the signal was given. The moment they heard the signal—they would be off. Each one would keep that crown in view, while, forgetting everything else, he would strain every nerve as he 'pressed toward the mark,' in the earnest endeavour to win the prize.

And when St. Paul said, 'I press toward the mark,' he meant to say that he compared his Christian life to a race. The mark, or prize, at the end of this race, which he kept in view and towards which he was pressing all the time, was the crown of life and glory which Jesus has promised to give to all His faithful followers. This was what he meant when he said—'I press toward the mark'. And in doing this he showed the earnestness with which he was continuing the Christian life which he had begun.

We see the earnestness of St. Paul in the way in which he preached; and in the way in which he worked.

In a little town in Germany lived a poor widow. Her husband had died leaving her nothing but the care of her three young sons. She found it very hard to support herself and them, yet she managed to do so sparingly, but honestly. The two elder sons at last were old enough to leave home, and do something for their support; but the youngest remained with his mother still, and went daily to school.

Then the war broke out, and there was a time of great trouble and distress. Collections were made all over the country for thousands of the poor wounded soldiers, and the cry for help reached even to the little town where this poor widow lived. The list of contributors to this work of mercy was carried from house to house. One day the collectors called at this poor widow's house. She had given her little mite to them, and they were going away, when her little boy took up a pen and quietly wrote down his name on the list for three dollars; and then counted out the money into the hand of the astonished collector. This was more than many of the people in the town who were quite well off had contributed. And where did this money come from? For several years this little fellow had been longing to own a watch; and every time that his mother or one of his elder brothers would give him a small piece of money, he would put it carefully away. When he got enough pennies he would change them into a silver piece, and great was his joy when his money had increased so much that he had his first whole dollar. But now at last, it had increased to three dollars; and very soon he was expecting to have the great pleasure to which he had been looking forward so long—the pleasure of feeling that he had his own watch in his pocket. But he gave up this long-expected pleasure and readily parted with all his money, in the earnestness of his desire to help the poor wounded soldiers.

This was real noble in that boy. It showed that he had just the same spirit which St. Paul had, when he was such an example of earnestness in his Christian life. It was this earnestness of spirit which led the great Apostle of the Gentiles to continue his Christian life, in the same way in which he had begun it.

III. But in the Third Place, we see what a Model of Earnestness St. Paul was, when we Look at the Results which 'Followed' from his Christian Life.—We see one of the results of St. Paul's earnest life, in his labours for the cause of Christ. His missionary journeys took him to the utmost ends of the world, as it was then known—east, and west, and north, and south. Probably no man ever preached the Gospel to such multitudes of people as St. Paul did. If we only knew how many thousands and hundreds of thousands of persons there were, who had heard the Gospel from him, how surprising it would be! And if we could have an account of the multitudes of people who were converted by his preaching; and then of the multitudes who were converted by them, and so on, all the way down, from that day to this, we should no doubt find numbers of Christians labouring in the Church to-day, as the direct result of his labours, before he went to heaven eighteen hundred years ago. While he was still alive St. Paul said that the Gospel 'had been preached to every creature under heaven,' and this was mainly the result of his labours. And when we think of all this, we may well say that he was indeed a model of earnestness, in view of the results which followed from his labours.

But we see the result of St. Paul's earnestness in his writings, as well as in his labours.

There are twenty-one Epistles in the New Testament. Of these St. Paul wrote fourteen, or two-thirds of the whole. These Epistles are filled with the precious truths of the Gospel. Ever since St. Paul wrote them ministers of the Gospel have been taking texts from these Epistles, and preaching sermons from them. And through these sermons multitudes of souls have been converted; those in ignorance have been instructed; those in trouble have been comforted; those who were doubting have been encouraged, and an amount of good has been done which will never be known till that great day of judgment shall come, when all that is now secret shall be made known.

And so, when we think of the results of St. Paul's Christian life, both in his labours and in his writings, we may well speak of him as a model of earnestness.

A missionary's earnestness and what it led to.—One hot day in July, 1839, Dr. Hamlin of the American Mission at Constantinople, and so long at the head of Robert's College in that city, while passing by the Custom House, saw a crowd of people gathered there. Forcing his way through it, he found a poor sailor lying by the side of the wall apparently dying of cholera. 'Do you speak English?' asked Dr. Hamlin. 'Yes,' said the man, following the word with an oath.

'Are you an Englishman, or an American?'

'American,' he replied with another oath.

Still more terrible curses showed that profanity had become his mother-tongue.

Dr. Hamlin secured assistance, and had him removed to the home of one of the missionaries.

For several weeks he was kindly nursed, and taken care of by the missionaries. Then he recovered. One morning he called on Dr. Hamlin to say good-bye, as he was about to sail for Boston. Lingering for a moment at the door, he said, with great feeling:—

'I never shall forget your kindness to me, Dr. Hamlin. I have been a very wicked man, and have done all the evil in the world I could. But now, by the help of God, I am going to turn round and try to do all the good I can. God bless you! Good-bye.'

Three years afterwards Dr. Hamlin received a letter from him, which read thus:—

'DEAR DR. HAMLIN,—Thank God I still live. I am here workin', and blowin' the Gospel-trumpet on the Eri Kanal.'

When the Rev. Dr. Goodell, the missionary, saw this letter, he asked that he might begin the answer to it, and taking a sheet of paper, he wrote as follows:—

'DEAR MR. BROWN,—Blow away, brother! blow! Yours in blowing the same Gospel-trumpet—WILLIAM GOODELL.'

Twenty-five years after this Dr. Hamlin was dining one day at a hotel in the city of Paris, when an American gentleman came up to him, and said, 'Sir, I am just from Honolulu, in the Sandwich Islands. I knew a man there by the name of Brown, who is acting as missionary or Bible reader, and who has done a wonderful amount of good among the sailors. He can go anywhere, and everywhere, among them. He told me that he was once a wretched blaspheming sinner, dying in the streets of Constantinople, when you kindly took him to your home, and was the means of saving both his body and his soul. This seemed to me too strange to be true. Was it so?' asked the gentleman, 'or is it only a sailor's yarn?'

'It is a sailor's yarn, indeed,' said Dr. Hamlin, 'but it is a good yarn, and every word of it is true. And I am glad to know that in showing kindness to that poor blaspheming sinner, I was enlisting a trumpeter who not only sounded the Gospel-trumpet on what he called the "Eri Kanal," but is now doing the same from the Atlantic coast to the Golden Gate of California, and among the islands of the Pacific.'

This faithful missionary was imitating Paul's model of earnestness; and we see what great good resulted from his labours.—RICHARD NEWTON, Bible Models, p. 288.

OUR TREASURY

The peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through [rather 'in'] Christ Jesus'—PHILIPPIANS IV. 7.

DEFOR has a story, 'Captain Jack'. Little boy, beggar, gets hold of lot of money. Quite happy before, then wretched, not know where to put it. Can't sleep because of it. At last finds hole in hollow tree—surely safe there; puts it in, and it drops down inside! Had a treasure, and wanted safe place for it. So now people with money put in bank. But even banks not always safe; sometimes man in charge not trustworthy. Steals money, or lets it get stolen. So besides safe place want also sure keeper. Text tells of a treasure we have, and a safe place to put it in, and a sure keeper to look after it. Think—

I. Our Treasure.—Hearts and minds—that which loves, and that which thinks. Very valuable (Prov. iv. 23, etc.). How often love wrong things and think about wrong things. [Balaam, Demas (2 Tim. iv. 10), and for 'the mind' (Ezek. xxxviii. 10, 11).] When we do, then put our treasure in bad places (cf. Matt. vi. 21).

II. The Treasury.—Safe place where we put treasure—text says 'in Christ Jesus'. How put hearts there? Get them to love Him, then can't love bad things. [Illustrate from Luke vii. 36-50. Poor woman had been putting treasure of her heart in bad places. Finds Jesus, puts it there. Does what she can to show her love for Him. See what He said (ver. 47).] So too with minds; think of Him, and can't well be thinking of bad things at same time (cf. Col. iii. 2; Phil. iv. 8).

But must put them there, just as put money in bank. [No use keeping money yourself and saying, 'What a safe place the bank is!'] How put them? [How put money in bank? Take it there and ask managers to take care of it.] So take hearts and minds to Jesus; ask Him to keep them. He never refuses to accept deposits, as banks sometimes do (John vi. 37).

III. The Treasurer.—Sure keeper wanted as well as safe place. So here, 'The peace of God'.

[Great deal of treasure in Bank of England. Every evening soldiers come tramping up Cheapside to look after it.]

The treasurer here not a band of soldiers, but Peace. [Cf. John xiv. 26, 27. Christ's legacy to His disciples 'Peace,' His 'Peace'; but this was one with the coming of 'The Comforter'. When Peace is said to 'keep the heart,' it is because the Holy Spirit is the Guardian.]

For us the treasury the most important matter. We have 'hearts and minds,' our treasure. Where are we putting them? They can't have a safe keeper unless put in right place. Pray, 'O Lord Jesus, see to the keeping of my heart and mind'.—C. A. GOODHART, Hints and Outlines for Children's Services, p. 161.

A BRACELET AND RINGS OF GOLD

PHILIPPIANS IV. 8.

If you turn to the fourth chapter of St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians, eighth verse, you will find six clauses, all beginning with whatsoever, and then a short clause at the very end of the verse, which is connected in sense with all the six. Any one of these would make a good text; but I think if there be any one of them sweeter than the rest, it is the fifth. I select it, therefore, as the text at present. It reads thus, with the words which complete the sense appended: 'Whatsoever things are lovely, think of these things'.

You know the meaning of lovely well, when the word is applied to things that are seen. If, for example, you were conducted into a garden, and some one were to cull you a pretty flower, and show you its neatly-shaped leaves, and its beautiful colours, and say, Is not that a lovely flower? you would quite understand the question. You feel as if you could love the sweet little flower. Or if you saw a little child in its mother's arms, healthy and happy, with a bright eye and a gay smile playing on its face as you spoke to it and fondled it, you would very naturally say, What a lovely babe! Your heart would be warming towards it. In reading the text, however, you see at once that it is another sort of loveliness than that which is seen with the eye, that is intended here. The lovely things to be minded, according to this exhortation, are things in the soul, things seen only in the actions they lead to—qualities of that invisible part of your nature which thinks and feels, is pleased or angry, happy or unhappy. There are lovely things in the mind. If I were to describe a boy who obeyed his parents, always spoke truth, never got into a passion, was obliging, polite, and kind to all, you would think him a lovely boy, whether I told you anything about his looks or not. Read the description given of the youthful Jesus, in Luke ii. 51, 52, and say if the picture presented is not lovely—worthy of your copying into your own lives, fitted to draw forth your love.

Let me now tell you of some lovely things in the mind and soul which you ought to seek after. I will give you five, and for memory's sake you may call them rings of gold, one for each finger of your hand. I shall then add a sixth, more valuable than all the rest, and to express its greater worth, you may call it a bracelet of jewels.

I. The first gold ring I would have you wear is Sweet Temper.—Swords have tempers according to which they are harder or softer, better or worse. And it is curious that the better the temper is, the sharper and more during the weapon is. But good tempers in souls are not sharp to cut. They are the very opposite. Every child knows what is meant by being cross, or short. If you cut a piece of wood across the direction in which its fibres grow, and make a bit of plank, you would soon find how easily it would break. Now some tempers are like such a board—the least pressure makes them snap. There are some children with such tempers—they are so cross-grained, you can hardly please them; the least thing puts them out of humour, and they pout and get angry, and put on looks of gloom. Or perhaps they fret, and storm, and speak hot words of folly. You speak to them, and they answer as if you had struck them; and possibly, if engaged on some piece of work, they spoil it through spite. I have seen children in bad temper do very foolish things. I have seen them quarrel with their very food. How very unlovely these things are!

But if you knew a child gentle and meek, not easily made angry, always ready to be pleased, and anxious to please, speaking kindly to every one, and wearing a sweet smile for all, you would acknowledge the loveliness of such a disposition. And I am sure that it is a happier disposition, as well as a lovelier.

II. The second gold ring I wish you to put on is marked Biddableness.—You will easily understand the word, though I believe you will not find it in the dictionary. I wished a term stronger than obedience, meaning readiness to obey, and ventured to make this one.

Have you ever seen children who would not do what their father and mother bade them? I have. I have seen children that needed to be told a great many times to do a thing, when once should have been enough. I have seen them, even after that, go away very slowly, and do what was ordered in such a way as plainly said they did not like doing it. Others may be found that require to be reasoned with, or coaxed, or bribed by some promise, to obey a parent's command. Now there is something to be said to fathers and mothers about allowing this; but at present I am speaking to children, and I would say to them that such conduct is very unlovely indeed.

How lovely, on the other hand, is the sight of an obedient child. He not only does what father or mother bids, but he does it at once, and with a smile. He does it so as to show that the work is a pleasure to him. As he goes his merry step beats time to a music that is in his heart. With what delight the parents' look follows the willing little messenger! My heart warms to such a child when I see him. Put the gold ring on his finger. God Himself loves such a child, and approves his conduct. For this is His own 'commandment with promise,' 'Honour thy father and mother, that it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth'. Again He says, 'Children, obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right'. Yet, of course, if parents should bid what God forbids, we owe it to our Heavenly Father rather to obey Him. And the child that can please his parents in all lawful things, but refuses, even to please them, to do what is wrong in God's sight, has already the spirit of a martyr.

III. But now I produce a third gold ring, worthy to adorn the middle finger of the hand. Engraved on it is Unselfishness.—There are children in whose eye the word Me is always prominent, and from whose lips it is always sounding. They wish and strive to get the best of everything to themselves, the best seat, the nicest portion of what is given to eat, the first opportunity to choose, the rarest toy, the prettiest gift. They are always looking after their own gratification. Now this is very unlovely, and manifests a disposition which, if left unchecked, will grow up to something very ugly indeed.

Put in contrast with such conduct the behaviour of an unselfish child. He has his happiness in seeing others happy. When there are gifts presented to be distributed among brothers and sisters, or playmates, he would have others choose first. He likes to see his companions get what pleases them. He would rather go without a thing himself than see others want. He yields a good place to another, happy to oblige. He looks to the comfort of others more than his own. In this spirit a little girl once, with a nice piece of cake just given from her mother's hand, seeing a poor child crawl to the door, ran with her dainty to cheer the little mendicant. How likely are such children to grow up useful and beloved!

I once read a story that touched me. Two boys, brothers, had gone to school on a winter's day. When the hour of dismissal came, snow had begun to fall. Amid the drifting storm the little fellows lost their way, and, instead of reaching home, had to seek shelter at last in a sort of cave or hollow, where they were protected from the blast. The elder was a brave, unselfish boy, and did his best to keep his younger brother cheerful. How he succeeded by and by appeared. For when his little companion complained of cold, he put off his own coat and wrapped him round with it. Friends were not long in making search for the wanderers; and when they found them the younger was fast asleep, and his brother was sitting watching him, cold without, but with a heart warm with love within; and the thanks of happy parents for his care of his little brother, was only less sweet than his own unselfish joy to have made his brother comfortable.

IV. A fourth ring of gold is marked Tenderheartedness.—You know what it is to be cruel. You recollect the fable of the frogs in the pool that were pelted with stones by mischievous boys. Those boys were doing a cruel thing in sport. Once as I came home along the streets at night, I found some boys torturing a rat, and when the poor creature seemed dead, one called out, 'Let it alone, let it come to itself a little, that we may get more fun'. I cannot bear to see unnecessary pain inflicted, even on a reptile. What are we that we should needlessly, or in sport, add one pang to the misery that is in the world? To take pleasure in witnessing battles between any of the lower animals is very hateful. Keep away from all sights of the kind. But men are very cruel often to one another. Joseph's brethren showed themselves hard-hearted when, spite of his cries and tears, they sold him away to strangers and a foreign land. Slavery is a very cruel thing. The habitations of the heathen are full of cruelty. They have been doing awfully cruel things in Sicily of late years, which it was maddening to see the proofs of. Cruelty makes people very like devils, and the worst displays of it grew out of small beginnings. A bloody, brutal Roman emperor is said, when a boy, to have amused himself with tormenting slaves.

Children, cultivate a tender heart. Feel for the pains of others. Never inflict pain without reason. All that is called tender-heartedness is not good. A surgeon would not have a tender, but a weak heart, that would shrink from cutting off a limb to save life. A parent is cruel, not tender-hearted, that will rather indulge a child than deny it what is wrong, or refuse to chasten it, at the expense of leaving faults unattended. But it is beautiful to see in children a feeling, kindly heart, sympathising with sufferers, and never giving pain that can be helped. Their disposition is very lovely. The gold of their ring is very bright.

V. I shall just name one other. It is Industry.—The opposite of this is idleness, a very unlovely and a very unhappy thing. It is so even in children. I don't object to play. Active, healthful play is not idleness. And in its own place, and within due bounds, it is a right thing for children. Young children should have a great deal of play. God means them to have it, as He means that lambs should frisk, and run, and gambol. I like to see children playing, kindly, justly, lovingly. It is a lovely sight. Only, it must not be all play with them. And always more and more as they grow older, they should wish and strive to be of some use. They should be industrious at their lessons; they should be happy to run messages; they should accept happily duties at home to help their parents. Even where children must go to work sooner than is desirable, because their parents are poor, I would like them to think it is not all hardship. It is miserable to see little children put to tasks beyond their strength—the thing is cruel and wicked; but the mere necessity to work has some elements of comfort. It is safer to toil than beg. It is a very useful part of education. Work is always better than sloth. What I wish, however, to show by putting the ring, industry, on the finger, is the beauty of being useful, of doing something, of helping on the tasks of the world. The man that does not work in some way is a nuisance on the earth; and a child should learn when young to hate being a mere idler.

VI. But now I have in reserve a jewelled bracelet, worth all the rings many times over, and when worn along with them making them all look brighter. Bind it round your arm. Its name is Grace.—Grace is what God gives to make the heart good, or the effects of that gift. Here I use the word as meaning the effects on the character. These are very lovely, like sparkling diamonds.

A child that has grace fears God, loves Jesus, is afraid to sin, tries to do all things so as to please his Heavenly Father. There may be those other things I have mentioned as lovely without this; but this makes them all still lovelier. For then they all shine in a light from above. They are practised from regard to God's will. See that kind, sweet-tempered, generous boy, always obliging, always active, polite, obedient, amiable; what does he lack? Ah! he does not care for God, he does not think of God, he does not love the Saviour who loves him. How lovely he will become when the good Spirit touches his heart. He will be kinder, franker, truer, braver than ever for the sake of Jesus. He will have new motives then. He will study a new pattern. He will be like the Son of Mary, 'that lowly, lovely child'.—J. EDMOND, The Children's Church at Home, p. 38.

BE TRUE!

'Whatever things are true.'—PHILIPPIANS IV. 8.

Be true! be true! As I look back on the past, I hear these words ringing in my ears. Often and often through the years since I left Uppingham have they pulled me up when I was entering upon some line of action that was not strictly true. Often and often have these words saved me from some sin against God. Often have they enabled me to withstand some great temptation. 'Be true,' then, is to be my text for to-day. I go back to the circumstances under which the words were uttered. I see myself at the end of my last term, just about to leave the old school; I see myself looking back as I did at that time on misspent hours, on opportunities missed, on evil temptations unconquered, unresisted. Yes; I remembered all this as I went on my way to that last interview with my old headmaster, Edward Thring. And I must confess, too, to a feeling of awe and fear as I came to the schoolhouse at the appointed time. There was the old schoolhouse with its ivied walls, its grey-stoned windows, its well-known quad. There was the entrance where the fags used to ring the school bell for prayers. There was the housemaster's entrance, and through that door I must go ere many minutes should pass. And so as I rang at the bell, and heard its clang echoing through the house, I felt somewhat like one whose doom was sealed. The door opens and I am ushered into the presence of the headmaster. 'Sit down.' And then began a short talk on life, ending up with those never-to-be-forgotten words, 'Be true!' Never shall I forget those words. When afterwards in my office at home, as a law student, they would often bring before me my duty in respect of the books which I was studying. When I was perhaps discouraged by many difficulties in my law-life, they would come to me as a message from God. They carried me through my examinations. They spurred me to further effort. They made me look to the highest standard as the one by which my life must be formed. And so I put these words before my hearers to-day; I put them before you in all their simplicity of meaning, in all their depth of meaning. And I pray God to bless them to your souls this day as they have been blessed to mine. 'Whatsoever things are true.' How, then, are we to realise the text, 'Whatsoever things are true'?

I. First, then, it centralises our attention on truth: whatsoever is true in our endeavours to do right, in our struggles against temptation, in our anxiety to make good resolutions and keep them. We often in the first instance look to ourselves and strive in our own strength to battle against sin in its various forms. This is the experience of many, and it is an experience which leads to failure. It is centred on self, and is therefore no help to us, and so at the very outset we want to realise that if we are to attain to 'whatsoever things are true,' it can only be by the entire subjection of self, and the placing on the throne of our lives one guiding principle, Truth. How, then, shall we appropriate this truth? What is truth, the possession of which is of such vital importance to us? Let me refer you to St. John xiv. 6: 'Jesus saith, I am the Truth'; and here let us notice Jesus does not say, 'I am a part of the Truth,' but, 'I am the Truth,' the whole Truth; and so we begin to realise that if we wish to follow 'whatsoever things are true,' it can only be by having in our hearts the Truth, even Jesus Christ, who by His Spirit shall lead us into all truth.

II. While we think of 'whatsoever things are true,' and wish to follow them, there may arise instinctively in the minds of some of my hearers the thought of past sin. The past is a nightmare to some fellows. It is something to be avoided. It may even be that this past has, as it were, joined hands with the present, and that as you sit here listening to me you are conscious that you are not living truly and faithfully in God's sight. Are there any, I wonder, in this position here now? I feel there must be. What, then, has Christ, who is the Truth, to say to you?

The man who follows 'whatsoever things are true' is like the runner in a race. He doesn't want to be handicapped by the weight of former sins. He wants to be free. How is this to be attained? He sees the past with sins of thought, of word and deed. He realises that the fetters of sinful habits are still binding him, and he cannot run the race as he wishes. With what joy does he hail the message, 'If we confess our sins He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness'. There is no one here who cannot enter into the reality of this message. 'God willeth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he turn from his wickedness and live.' God willeth not that fellows at school should sin in thought, word, and deed against Him. No, rather does He proclaim forgiveness for the past, and strength for the future. We see, then, that the mere fact of former sin must not discourage us, but rather should it encourage us to cast our whole life upon God's greatness and love and mercy, and realise in doing so that we are forgiven, and that we are able in the truest sense to be His faithful followers. But there are still some more thoughts for us in regard to the text, 'Whatsoever things are true'. What has it meant to those of us who make an outward profession of Christianity, who call ourselves Christians? How far have we followed the Truth in our daily experience? Christianity is not meant for the Sunday alone, and yet there seem to be many who think so. You see men going to church on the Sunday, and then on the Monday giving way to all sorts of sinful habits. This is not Christianity; Christianity is nothing if it does not enter into every detail of our lives. Christianity is nothing if it does not leave our whole life by its presence.—NORMAN BENNET, Be True: And Other Sermons for Boys, p. 1.

KEEPING THINGS IN ORDER

'Joying and beholding your order.'—COLOSSIANS II. 5.

THE church at Colosse kept things in order, and Paul, seeing it, was glad, just as I am glad when you keep things in order in your homes, in school, in church, and at your work. But how did Paul find out that the church to which he wrote these words, in the year of our Lord 62, kept things in order? for he was in prison at Rome for Christ's sake at the time. He heard of it through one of the members of that church who came to Rome to see him, named Epaphras, and who told him of their order and love. Hence Paul could write: 'For though I am absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit, joying and beholding your order, and the steadfastness of your faith in Christ'. So I am with you in the spirit, joying and beholding your order.

Let me say a few things about keeping things in order.

I. You like to scatter things about. When you play with your blocks or toys, or cut out paper dolls and dresses, you cover the floor or table with them. You take great delight in them. But after awhile you become tired of them, and leave them scattered about, and such a looking table or floor! Dolls, dresses, bits of paper, blocks, everything you were playing with scattered all about! You had a good time at your play, putting things out of order, and now comes a sore trial to most of you; for—

II. It is hard keeping things in order. You do not like to pick up your play-things, putting each in its place, as your mother wants you. How many of you keep things in order? How many of you leave it to your mothers to pick up after you? If I were to ask your mothers, what do you think they would say? There is no play in keeping things in order, you say; well, there is something better than play. So I am going to tell you how to do it.

III. Always have a place for everything. Have a place for your play-things, for your hat or cap, your coat or shawl, your books, your clothes, which you call your own. And put your clothes in order at night when you go to bed, your shoes side by side. That is the way the cadets or scholars at the military school at West Point have to do. That is the way you ought to do. You ought to have a place for everything, not a half dozen places for each. If you have not such a place, ask your mother to give you one: one for your play-things, one for your books, one for your clothes, one for your hats and caps. Then—

IV. Always put a thing in its place. When you are done playing put everything away in its place, and pick up every bit of paper or litter and put it where it belongs. When you come in, hang your cap or hat in its place every time. Do not throw it down anywhere, but put it in its place; for that is the way to keep things in order. If you use any tool, as a hammer or hoe, do not leave it where you used it, but put it in its proper place. And so of everything you have or use. Do you ask me: 'Why take such pains to keep everything in its place?' I will tell you.

V. Because then you will know where to find it. If you leave things where you played with or used them, you will be all the time losing them. You will be ever asking, 'Mother, where is my hat?' 'Mother, where is my knife?' and so of everything. You forget where you left it, and you ask mother. But if you hang your hat where you should, and put everything in its place, you know where to find them. This is one reason why you should have a place for everything, and keep everything in its place.

Another reason is that if you do so, you, like the church in our text, will have such order that all will rejoice in it. If I were to look into your homes, after you have had a good play there, do you think I should rejoice in seeing your good order? Should I find that you had put everything away? Or should I find the floor all covered over with litter, waiting for your mother to clean up after you? Which should I find? The keeping of things in order is another reason why you should have a place for everything and should keep everything in its place.

But there is another reason that I will mention. As you do in childhood, so you will do when you become men and women. If you keep things in order as children, you will always keep things in order; but if you let everything lie scattered about where you happen to use them, you will never keep things in order all your days. You will have trouble all your life because you did not learn to be orderly in childhood. Hence your plays are of use in teaching order.—A. HASTINGS ROSS, Sermons for Children, p. 73.

AIMING AT HIGH THINGS

'Set your mind on the things that are above, not on the things that are upon the earth.'—COLOSSIANS III. 2.

If you should shoot an arrow at the ground, you would hit the ground, but no one would praise you for it. If, however, you should aim at a very small mark and should hit it, all would praise you for your skill. To shoot downwards and hit the great earth, anybody can do that; but to shoot upwards and hit a small mark, very few can do it, for it takes a long time to learn to do it, and few have patience enough to get the skill to do it. It is said that Indians put their boys' dinners on limbs of trees, and the boys must shoot them down before they can have them. Thus they learn to shoot straight.

Paul told the church at Colossæ—and the children that were in it—to set their mind on the things that are above, where Christ is, and not on the things which are upon the earth, which is under our feet. He tells us to do the same. But to do it, we must aim at the high things, not at the low; we must set our mind on the best things, not on the mean; we must shoot at the stars, and not at the ground.

Our text tells you, boys and girls, to aim at high things, and to keep aiming at them until you hit them. You are to set your mind on them, to study how you may make the high things your own. Let us see how you may do this.

1. In the home there are high and low things, and you should set your mind on the best things there and strive for them until you win them. You should aim to be the very best boy or girl in the home, in good manners, in kind treatment of one another, in ready obedience to your parents, in tender love, in everything. If you fail now and then, try again, and still again until you succeed. Hit this high mark in the home: for if you are a good child at home, you will be a good man or woman, husband or wife.

2. There are high and low things in play, and you should mind the high and shun the low. You should be fair in play and never unfair, truthful and never untruthful, kind and never unkind, ready and never dull, skilful and never unskilful. Set your mind on being ready, skilful, kind, truthful, and honest in play, for these are the high things you should aim at.

3. There are high and low things in school. You can play in school, have poor lessons, and be a bad scholar; or you can study, get good lessons, be a good scholar, and behave as you ought. Now on which will you set your mind? Let me tell you. Get every lesson perfectly. Make no failures. Behave the best you can. Make your conduct and scholarship perfect. Aim at the high things.

4. There are high and low things in learning a trade. Aim at the high. Do not slight any part of the trade. You may think it to be a trifle. Perfection comes from minding trifles. You want the highest skill in your trade, to be in it a skilled workman. Then put your mind into it. Slight nothing. Do everything in the quickest and best way. Aim at the highest.

5. There are high and low things in the store, in the office, on the farm, in every kind of honourable work. Do you think the work hard? Never mind that; but mind to do your best in it. Keep your mind on the work in hand. Master every little and every great thing in it. You cannot do anything well without care and attention.

6. Aim high in everything. Always try to do the best you can, in whatever circumstances God places you. The high and the low are in every calling, in everything we do. Set your mind on the best, and weary not until you win it.

7. But Paul looked above the things of earth, and said: 'Seek the things that are above, where Christ is, seated on the right hand of God. Set your mind on the things that are above, not on the things that are upon the earth.' God is in heaven. Christ is in heaven. We want to go to heaven when we die. Let us, therefore, mind the things of God, of Christ, of heaven. To do this we must study God's Word, the Bible; we must attend church; we must love, serve, and obey God; we must love one another; we must always do what is right and shun what is wrong; we must keep His commandments. You are not too young to do this. The youngest can love and obey Christ. God is love, and gave His only-begotten Son Jesus Christ to die on the cross for your sins. He sends His Holy Spirit to lead you to Christ, that you may tell Him your sins and ask Him to forgive you.—A. HASTINGS ROSS, Sermons for Children, p. 21.

KNOCK AT MERCY'S DOOR

I THESSALONIANS V. 17.

'PRAY without ceasing' is a Divine precept, and constant need requires constant help. Asking, Seeking, and Knocking are three special features of real prayer. Asking is the simplicity of prayer, seeking is the earnestness of prayer, and knocking is the importunity of prayer. Prayer should be the key of the day, and the lock of the night. 'Knock and it shall be opened unto you,' is the promise of the Lord Jesus Himself. There are three Knocks all our tiny folks should avoid:—

The timid knock. Want of faith (James i. 6).

The runaway knock. Want of patience (Ps. xl. 1).

The late knock. Want of time (Luke xiii. 25).

There are five proper ways of knocking:—

I. Knock Early.—Whilst you are young (Ps. v. 3).

II. Knock Earnestly.—With all your heart (James v. 17, 18).

III. Knock Distinctly.—With simple words (Matt. vii. 7).

IV. Knock Repeatedly.—With importunity (I Thess. v. 17).

V. Knock Expectantly.—With patient waiting (Ps. xxvii. 14).

A little girl about four years of age being asked, 'Why do you pray to God?' replied, 'Because I know He hears me, and I love to pray to Him'. 'But how do you know He hears you?' was the further inquiry. Putting her little hand to her heart, she said, 'I know He does, because there is something here that tells me so'.—CHARLES EDWARDS, Tin Tacks for Tiny Folks, p. 57.

UNCEASING PRAYER

'Pray without ceasing.'—I THESSALONIANS V. 17.

WHAT! always praying? How can I? Dressing, eating, walking, etc., all this besides prayer? Yes; but they can all help us to pray. Little girl once found this out—dressing, she prayed for a better dress (Rev. vii. 9); eating, reminded her of other food (John vi. 32-34) [cf. the grace, 'We thank Thee, Lord, for this our food,' etc.]; walking, spoke of another walk (Ps. cxix. 1). So, then, one way of doing what St. Paul tells us is—

I. Let Everything we do Remind us of Something to be Prayed about.—But other ways of praying besides words. [Man in a good service—wants his son to be taken on—knows that his master knows his wish—thinks, 'If I work well he will grant it'; so takes pains always to look neat—so please master

(praying with his dress). Works very hard and carefully (praying with his work), etc.] So with us—all our prayers may be put into one prayer, 'Thy will be done'. If really want that, can always be praying it: In dress, neat, careful, clean, because God's will (1 Cor. x. 31, 32). In eating and drinking, not greedy, but grateful. In lessons, doing best to learn. At play, 'rejoice evermore,' etc.; what St. Paul says to slaves (Col. iii. 23), true for us—may do everything 'heartily,' with our heart as well as hands, as to the Lord, because God wills. So another way of obeying the text is—

II. Let Everything we do Say, 'Thy Will be Done.'—One other thing. Come and look at a little prayer-meeting—up in a mountain (picture out from Ex. xvii. 8-16); prayer ceasing, success ceases—then others lift up his hands—so prays without ceasing.

So sometimes boy or girl wants something (help to conquer bad temper, or do some work); prays—no better (temper breaks out again, etc.). 'Oh, no use praying, just as bad as ever!' Ah! you must pray without ceasing—keep on—keep on. [Elijah (1 Kings xviii. 42-46) wanted rain—prays—boy goes to look—'nothing!' Again, and again, and again, and again—seven times—then at last (ver. 44). He prayed without ceasing. May cf. also Luke xviii. 6, 7.] How many prayers like runaway ring or knock! So then—

III. Persevere—Keep on. Go on Praying till the Prayer is Answered.—Three ways of obeying command in text. (Recapitulate 1, 2, 3.) Make it our text this week, and try to see whether we can't do what it tells us. Not so hard as it seems at first, and if we ask God, He will give His Holy Spirit to show us how to do it.—C. A. GOODHART, Hints and Outlines for Children's Services, p. 121.

ABOVE SUSPICION

'Abstain from all appearance of evil.'—I THESSALONIANS V. 22.

PROBABLY you have read these words many times; possibly you have filled the whole page of a copybook, line after line, for twenty lines or more, with this same sentence. Yet we will not discard it. To start with—anything that speaks of 'appearance' is at least speaking about something that is well understood to-day. There never was a time when appearance was so considered—not only in people, but in things. The very furniture in our houses—the mahogany furniture and the oak furniture—are only mahogany or oak in appearance. They are covered with a thin shaving of mahogany or oak, as the case may be, and underneath there is a commoner wood ; so they are not what they appear to be. It is so with many people, unfortunately : they appear to be gentlemen, or learned, or good, or Christlike, but it is all an outward covering. There is no depth of character or learning or goodness in them. They only study appearances.

We have to learn from our text that just as there may be goodness in appearance, so there may be evil in appearance. Sometimes people are deceived by the appearance of goodness in a man, and for a time take him to be a good man ; they make him their friend, and they trust him, perhaps to their sorrow. On the other hand, we have to notice this important fact, that there may be the appearance of evil in a man, and others may take that man to be an evil man ; which is a very serious thing for him, and for the family to which he belongs, and for Jesus Christ if he professes to be a Christian. He is not actually evil, but something he did, because he was not careful or thoughtful, had the appearance of evil, and sometimes the mere appearance of evil will work out the same unfortunate results as the evil itself.

We have to remember that it is not enough to have a conscience free from the sense of evil in God's sight, but we must also have a life free from the appearance of evil in man's sight.

The Chinese have a curious proverb ; it is, ' Don't tie up your shoe in a cucumber field '. It is another way of saying, ' Abstain from all appearance of evil '. If you were passing through a cucumber field, of course all the cucumber vines would be running along the ground, and on the vines there would be the cucumbers, and though you stooped down only to tie up your shoe, others might think that you had stooped down to steal.—JOHN EAMES, Sermons to Boys and Girls, p. 118.

THE VOICE WITHIN

'A good conscience.'—1 TIMOTHY I. 19 (with HEB. X. 22).

In an evil world like this we need all the help we can get to enable us first to find out the right way and then to walk in it. Some of us have had wise and loving fathers and mothers and other friends, who have done much for us in pointing out the way, guiding and encouraging us to walk in it, protecting us from dangers and keeping us from mistakes into which, but for them, we should certainly have fallen. And if we had them always at our side, we think we might manage in some way to get along. But we cannot have them always with us, and even if we had, there are things which they cannot see and in which they could not help us. We must judge for ourselves and act for ourselves. We soon enough get to be the men and women which so many young people wish and weary to be, and we must then do the best we can for ourselves. We have, indeed, the Word of God, the blessed Bible, to shed light upon our path. We can carry our difficulties to it, and put questions to it, such as no other can answer. And yet we cannot have the Bible always in our hands, and even though we had it all committed to memory, it would not altogether serve the purpose. We want something nearer to us than any book, or any friend—which we can carry about with us wherever we go—which there is no danger of our forgetting or leaving behind us. We want a light within. And we have such a light. Each of us has it. It is always there, whether we attend to it or not; and if we deal with it as we ought, it will generally guide us aright. You will find mention made of what I refer to in 1 Timothy i. 19, 'A good conscience'. You may also look at Hebrews x. 22, 'A evil conscience'.

I wish to say a few words to you now about Conscience. Some of you may not understand very well about the word, but you all know the thing. There are two great words with which we have to do every hour of our lives, and with which all our happiness and welfare are wrapped up—Right and Wrong. Conscience has to do with these, telling us about them, and telling us about ourselves in connection with them. There are three remarks under which I may arrange what I have to say about Conscience: What it is—what it may be—what it leads to.

What it is.—There are three characters in which we shall look at it.

1. Conscience as a guide—a guide as to what is right and what is wrong. When you are going to do a thing, it is as if a voice within said to you,

'That is right,' or 'That is wrong'; in the one case, adding, 'You may do it,' or 'You should do it,' and in the other, 'You must not do it'. It is just something like what you find in connection with certain things of a different kind. If you were going to step into deep water, if you were going to walk out at an open window, two or three stories from the ground—if you were going to put your hand into the fire or into a pail of boiling water—if you were going to drink a mixture from a phial that had 'poison' marked on it, it would be as if something within you said 'Don't!'—as if something laid hold of you to keep you back. If anyone were to ask you, 'How did you not do it?' you would very likely say, 'Well, I can hardly tell you. It was just a kind of instinct. I felt I should not do it.' Now, in a somewhat similar way, we have got that within us which tells us we should not do certain things, not merely because they would hurt us, but because, however pleasant they might be at the moment, or however they might be thought to benefit us in some ways—they are wrong. You are tempted to do some forbidden thing, and though there is no human eye to see you and nobody may ever know of it, the voice within says, 'Don't; it is wrong!' You are tempted to take something which does not belong to you, but which you have very much desired to have—money, a pencil, or knife, or something of that kind, and the voice says, 'Don't; it is wrong!' You are tempted to say what is not true, in order to escape punishment for a fault, or to get some reward to which you have no right—to copy at school, to take advantage of a class-fellow, to do what is unfair at your play, to speak some word which you would be ashamed that your mother, or any friend whom you respect, should hear—to do some underhand or dishonourable thing which you have promised not to do, such as writing letters of an improper kind or reading books of a doubtful character; and the voice says, 'Don't; it is wrong!' You all know about this. It has happened to you a hundred times.

Now, what is it that thus speaks? It is Conscience. It is a kind of instinct or sense which God has implanted in your nature for your guidance, telling what would hurt your soul, just as the other things I spoke of would hurt your body. It has sometimes been spoken of as 'the voice of God in the soul'. That is only true so far. It is not always right in what it says. There is such a thing as an ignorant conscience—an unenlightened conscience. Thus Paul's conscience led him to persecute the followers of Jesus—to hale them to prison and put them to death. He says, 'I verily thought within myself that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth'. And other people have often done very wrong things, at the bidding of their conscience. And so conscience needs to be instructed, taught, enlightened. And if you ask me who is to teach conscience, I answer—God. The great instructor of conscience is the Word of God. It is with conscience as with a ship's compasses, by which the helmsman steers the vessel's course. In a general way these may be depended on; the needle points to the north with more or less of steadiness. But now and then there are slight deviations, and whenever the ship comes into port, her compasses have to be adjusted. So with conscience. We need to be constantly bringing it to the Word, to have it put right and kept right. Whenever it differs from the Word, conscience is wrong. Hence the need of making the Word our constant study, and seeking the teaching of the Holy Spirit that we may understand it and apply it aright. The more this is done the more trustworthy will our conscience be. The more we have to do with God, and the more we study the character and life of Jesus, and keep up fellowship with Him, and have a desire to be like Him, the more likely will our conscience be to be a right and safe guide. It will then tell us truly about sin and duty, and be, as one has described it, a reflection of God's will.

Now, supposing you were in an unknown and dangerous region, where you were sure to miss your road, unless you had good guidance, where there were snares and pitfalls into which you might fall, where there were those who wished to lead you astray, and if possible to destroy you, how would you do with your guide? Would you not be asking him at every turn, 'Which is the right way? Where should I go? Will it be safe to take this road? Where does it lead to?' Would you not get him to go before you, and follow as close to him as possible, at very dangerous places, planting your feet in the very marks which he pointed out to you? Would you not say, 'I have the guide for the very purpose: otherwise, I might as well not have had him?' Would you ever think of trying to put out his eyes, or to blindfold him, to drug him, and get him to fall asleep, so as to unfit him for his work, or compel him to be silent? Would you be angry with him because he told you which was the right road, and showed you the danger of taking any other? Would you treat him with neglect and pay no attention to what he said, whenever his way differed from the way you wished to take? If you wished to get some beautiful flowers, or to catch a bright-coloured butterfly, or to rob a bird's nest on some dangerous cliff, would you disregard him, and evil entreat him, if he tried to save you from what might be death to you?

And yet is not that just what some of you do to your consciences? You pay no attention to them. They speak to you in vain. You will not follow their leading. You seek to silence them, to drown their voice, so that you might as well have no conscience at all. None ever needed a guide more than you; none ever needed to listen more carefully to the guide's voice. And yet you put your fingers in your ears and will not hear. A friend told me of a young man who had been well brought up, but who became a Sabbath-breaker, and regardless of all that was good. He used to set out on the Sabbath mornings to walk in the fields and to bathe in a neighbouring river. Sometimes when he was at the river side, the church bell, which used to call him to the house of God, began to ring. He could not bear to hear it, and used to undress as fast as he could, plunge into the river, and keep his head under water as long as he was able to bear it, that he might not hear the sound that told him of his duty and of his sin. It was conscience that was speaking to him, but, foolish lad that he was, he would not hear. He would not follow the leading of his guide.

I have heard of a boy who was sent to a shop to buy a parcel of sugar. As he was on his way home, he was seen to come to a stand in the village street, look at the parcel that was under his arm, put his finger into his mouth and wet it, as if he were going to rub a little hole in the paper and just taste what was inside. And then, all of a sudden, as if some one had spoken to him, he withdrew his finger, put the parcel firmly under his arm, took to his heels, and never drew breath till he was home and had given the parcel into his mother's hands. What had happened? Who had spoken to him? It was conscience, acting as his guide, telling him he was about to do what was wrong. And he followed his guide and escaped the danger.

And so your safety lies in listening to conscience, whether it whisper gently or thunder terribly. Whatever it may cost you, let your resolution be, 'I must hear what my guide says. I must follow my guide.' Nothing could be more foolish or dangerous than to disregard it. It is as foolish and dangerous as for the engine-driver on an express train to disregard the danger-signals which tell that the road is impassable, or for the helmsman on board ship to pay no attention to the man on the look-out, when he tells that another ship lies across the vessel's course, or that the vessel is close upon the rocks.

2. Conscience as a judge.—It is more than a guide, however important that may be. It not only tells what is right and what is wrong, but it acts the part of a judge, and the instant a thing is done, it tries the doer of it, and approves or condemns him. There are some trials, in courts of justice, which are very long and tedious, and in which it is very difficult to get at the truth. The evidence is often contradictory. One witness says one thing, and another says another, so that the judge does not know what to do. Sometimes he acquits the guilty. Sometimes, when there is a want of proof, the verdict is 'not proven,' and the criminal escapes. Does it ever occur to you that a process of this kind is going on every day, in the case of each of you? Each of you may be said to carry about a court of justice in his own breast.

There is no need of witnesses. There is no need of a jury to sift the evidence. All that is wanted is a judge, to pronounce at once on each action, as soon as it is done, giving it its character, as good or bad, and passing sentence on him who did it.

How do you generally feel when you have done anything which you know to be wrong? Why do you look so sad? Why are you so unhappy? Why do you seem so absent, in some company in which you should have been full of spirit and glee? Why is there such a burden on your heart? Some one asks if you are ill; another asks if anyone has been annoying you. What is the matter? Conscience has been judging you—condemning you. Nobody saw the evil deed done. Nobody knew of it. No one accused you. No one said you had done wrong. You stood as a criminal at the bar of your own conscience—there was no denying the wrong done, and the judge condemned you. And how long did it take? It was all the work of a moment. And you left the bar condemned—self-condemned. That is what is the matter with you.

And where you have done right, conscience approves—it says, 'Well done!' and, next to God's approval, nothing in all the world is so much worth having as this—the approval of your own conscience. Others may condemn you and think or speak ill of you, but that matters little if your own conscience approves. But when it cries 'Shame!' it matters not though all the world should approve. No one can pass such a sentence upon you as that which you pass upon yourselves.

It is not difficult to account for the unhappiness of some people—their uneasiness, their unsettledness, the shifts to which they have recourse to drown thought. It is conscience acting as judge. God has appointed conscience in each of us for this very purpose—to do this very work—to act as His representative. We speak about 'the judgment' as future—as all to come. The truth is, the judgment is going on now—every day, all day long. We are judging ourselves. And when the great judgment-day shall come, the result will only need to be declared. Oh, take care how you treat this judge! how you deal with his sentences, how you behave after he has condemned you. I shall speak, by and by, of the way in which pardon and peace, in such a case, are to be found.

3. Conscience as a recorder and remembrancer.—In courts of law, when sentences are passed, they are recorded, and stand against the guilty person. It is the work of the clerk of court to see to this. Now, conscience does this also. It remembers—it records—it brings to mind, the evil we have done. It does not need to be written down on paper with pen and ink. It is written down the moment it is done, on the tablets of the heart, and laid past to be ready for after use. Who shall tell what a memory conscience has, how long and accurately and minutely it remembers, and how faithfully and fully it will bring all up again, perhaps thirty or forty or fifty years after, as if the thing had happened yesterday? The fact that you have forgotten it meanwhile, does not matter in the least. It is all written down, ready to be recalled, whenever occasion arises. It is like documents written with a certain kind of ink. As soon as the ink is dry, the writing becomes invisible. When you look at it, you see nothing but a sheet of clean paper. But hold it before the fire, and in a moment it starts out, as if by magic, every letter of it distinct.

You recollect how it was with King Herod. He had beheaded John the Baptist, because he reproved him for his sin. And when Jesus appeared, a mighty prophet and worker of miracles, and every one wondered who this remarkable man could be, and some said one thing and some another, Herod, when he heard of Him, said, 'It is John the Baptist, whom I beheaded.' In a moment the picture of the murdered man started up before him. 'But how can it be he? Is he not dead and buried?' 'He is risen from the dead!' said the king. Others might have forgotten all about the evil deed, but Herod's conscience had kept the record.

You remember the story of the boy and the grapes—how he selfishly and greedily stole the grapes brought by a friend to a little invalid sister, as they lay on the table at her bedside. And there the matter seemed to begin and end. If there had been no conscience, it might have been so. But conscience had recorded it too faithfully to admit of that. The boy became a man. He was crossing the ocean, his vessel was wrecked, and he went down into the trough of the sea and gave himself up for lost. Wonderfully he came to the surface again and was saved. And what were his thoughts when he was so near the eternal world? The past all seemed to come anew before him, and that mean action of his boyhood—conscience held it up before him, and the voice within asked, 'Who stole sister's grapes?' He needed no remembrancer, no accuser but himself.

We are told of a jeweller travelling with his servant, carrying a large amount of property, in jewels and money, with him. At a lonely part of the road the servant drew a pistol from his master's saddle and shot him dead, threw his body, with a heavy stone fastened to it, into a neighbouring canal, and made off with his booty to a distant part of the country. There he began business in a small way, doing everything in such a manner as to furnish no trace of the terrible deed. He grew in wealth and in public esteem, entering into family life, and at length becoming chief magistrate of the place. No one knew of his guilt. Dead men tell no tales, and it seemed as if he should carry the secret to his grave. But a case comes up in which a servant is accused of having murdered his master. Witnesses are brought forward, the crime is proved, and it only remains that sentence of death should be pronounced. The man of whom I am speaking is president of the court. It falls to him to pass sentence upon the murderer, when to the amazement of the onlookers, he rises from his chair, comes down from the bench, takes his place beside the criminal at the bar, tells out the story of his own crime, and demands that justice shall take its course. It just needed such an event to bring all to mind, to loosen the tongue of conscience, and leave the man no choice but to publish the secret to the world.<sup>1</sup>

Sometimes you hear of conscience-money. The country is defrauded by some one who has not paid his fair share of the taxes levied by the Government. He has made a false return of his income, or he has smuggled some forbidden goods, or he has not paid the tax for his dog, or otherwise he has withheld what he knew to be due. Perhaps he thinks he has done a clever thing. But again and again it comes up. He thinks of it when he is alone. He dreams about it when he is asleep. It is an unjust and dishonourable thing, and it so haunts him that he can find no relief till he returns the ill-saved money. When you see acknowledgments of 'conscience-money' in the newspapers, that is what is meant.

Not long ago you might have seen, what I suppose is to be seen to-day, an unused postage-stamp in the crown of a gentleman's hat. A friend of mine who noticed it day after day, in a house in which he was staying, had his curiosity aroused, and at length asked what was the meaning of it, and was told that many years ago—twenty-five or thirty, I think he said—when the gentleman was in business, he gave one of his customers, who was paying an account, five shillings too much in the way of change. All these years passed away, and not long ago he received a letter mentioning the fact, and telling that on the occasion of Mr. Moody's visit to the city where he lived, the dishonest customer had been awakened and brought to Christ, conscience had brought up the remembrance of the wrong, and demanded of the new convert that restitution should be made. The sum due was enclosed in postage-stamps. All the stamps but one were used in the ordinary way, and that one was stuck in the crown of the hat, as a reminder of the power of conscience in a day of awakening. I might tell you of many such things within my own knowledge, where conscience has brought back the recollection of things long forgotten.

It may be easy enough just now to make light of the faults and sins of youth, turning them into an occasion of amusement, perhaps boasting of them, and then dismissing them from the mind, and feeling no further concern. And yet the record of each of them remains to come up some other day, with no possibility of denying them, and with nothing to say in excuse; the only choice in such a case being to take the accusing conscience to Jesus that, by the sprinkling of His blood, He may satisfy and silence it, or to bear the penalty throughout a lost eternity.

Sometimes, I dare say, you wonder what hell is. The word spoken to one who was there has come to us: 'Son, remember' (Luke xvi. 25). The workings of a guilty conscience, an unsprinkled conscience, its remembrance of past sins and its terrible upbraidings, even as felt now and here, give us some idea of the state of those who have refused the only Saviour and trampled on His cleansing blood, and are now among the lost.

I do not know anything, except the love of Christ, that is more fitted to keep us from thinking lightly of sin and indulging in it, than the thought of the record that is kept of it by our own consciences, and the certainty that it will all be brought up another day, unless washed away in the atoning blood of Jesus.

Beware of running in the face of conscience, of tampering with conscience. There is nothing you have such cause to fear. There is no sacrifice, no self-denial, no reproach, no loss or suffering, which you had not better meet, than do anything which conscience tells you is wrong. What is any present pleasure, or gratification, or gain, in view of what must inevitably follow?

An eminent lawyer,<sup>1</sup> who afterwards became Lord Chancellor of England, made a statement on this subject, which has often been quoted, and which I especially commend to the notice of older boys: 'It was the first command and counsel of my youth always to do what my conscience told me to be my duty, and leave the consequences to God. I have hitherto followed it, and have no reason to complain that my obedience to it has been even a temporal sacrifice. I have found it, on the contrary, the road to prosperity and wealth, and I shall point it out as such to my children.'—J. H. WILSON, The King's Message, p. 93.

PILOT WANTED!

'Made shipwreck.'—1 TIMOTHY I. 19. Dec 28 '30

THERE'S nothing sadder! To see the gallant ship clear out of the harbour with all sail set and pennons flying—like a bright, strong youth going out to face the world—and then to see the same ship, when the storm is past and the sun has come forth again, lying broken among the rocks, a poor, crushed, bruised, battered thing—this is as sad a sight as we can ever see. I have seen it, seen it many times; seen it with ships and seen it with men and women, and it always makes the heart ache.

Let me tell you about a couple of shipwrecks that have something to teach us. There was the Nepaul, one of the finest vessels we had in our merchant fleet. A few years ago she set out from China, homeward bound, and passed in safety through all the dangers of the great broad seas she had to cover, till she had almost reached Devonport, her destination. But there was a thick fog hanging over the waters, and the captain's signals for a pilot could not be seen. He should have anchored then and waited. Ah! it's a great thing to learn, when you have done all that you can do, to stand, simply stand, and wait for God to work. But the captain would not wait; he thought he knew the coast well enough to pilot his vessel himself into Devonport, and so he went on and on making for the harbour, till suddenly there was a crash and a lurch, and the beautiful ship was a total wreck—a wreck almost within reach of the haven!

What was the captain's fault? Presumption. He would not wait for a pilot; he thought he knew as much of the coast as the men did who spent their lives in learning. And presumption is our great sin when we think we can get to heaven without the great Pilot, Jesus Christ. We can't do it; we may get very near; God may be very good and very patient with us, and protect us in many dangers, but no one can enter the Good Haven unless the flag of the cross shows that Jesus has the command. Run up the flag now, let Jesus have the command of your life. When the pilot comes on board the captain steps down; he becomes then but the chief officer, who takes his instructions from the pilot. That's how it must be with us, if we would enter the Harbour at last, with full sail and happiness, to receive an 'abundant' entrance. Don't trust to your own knowledge or your own cleverness; trust Jesus, 'Jesus only,' if you would avoid the shipwreck of your life. Do it at once; you can't tell the rocks you may have to steer through to-morrow.

The other wreck was just as sad.

The steamship Central America, on a voyage from New York to San Francisco, sprang a leak in mid-ocean. A vessel, noticing her signal of distress, bore down toward her. Seeing the danger to be very great, the captain of the rescue-ship spoke to the Central America: 'What is amiss?'

'We are in bad repair, and going down; lie by till morning,' was the answer.

'Let me take your passengers on board now.'

But it was night, and the commander of the Central America did not like to send his passengers, for that would cost the price of their passage, and thinking the ship could be kept afloat a while longer, replied, 'Lie by till morning.'

Once more the captain of the rescue-ship cried, 'You had better let me take them now.'

'Lie by till morning,' was sounded back through the trumpet.

About an hour and a half afterwards her lights were missed, and though no sound had been heard, the Central America had gone down, and all on board perished, just because it had been thought they could be saved better at another time.

That is how most people are wrecked. It is by delay—by putting off and putting off to a more convenient season. We have never any right to study our own convenience only: we need to study the convenience of others as well, or we shall soon be all wrong, and put others wrong too. Now whatever time we may think convenient for us, there is only one time that is convenient for God. That time is Now! 'Now is the accepted time: Now is the day of salvation.' 'Put off, put off!'—that is what Satan whispers. 'Now, now, Now!' that is what God is calling. Which voice will you obey?—J. REID HOWART, The Children's Preacher, p. 158.

THE VOICE WITHIN

'A good conscience.'—1 TIMOTHY I. 19 (with HEB. x. 22).

In a former address I tried to show you what conscience is—how much we stand in need of it, and what a help to us it is fitted and intended to be. The two texts to which I called attention were 1 Timothy I. 19, 'A good conscience,' and Hebrews x. 22, 'An evil conscience.'

Under the first head, What conscience is, I said there are three characters in which we should look at it—as a Guide, as a Judge, and as a Recorder and Remembrancer.

We go on now to consider—

What it may be.—The Bible often speaks about conscience, and describes it in various ways. It speaks of a 'conscience void of offence,' 'a good conscience,' 'a pure conscience,' 'a seared conscience,' 'a defiled conscience,' 'an evil conscience,' 'a purged conscience'. Now all these may be summed up under the two words—a good conscience, and an evil conscience. And when I speak of what conscience may be, I mean that it may be a good or an evil conscience.

1. A good conscience.—This expression may be used in more ways than one. It may be said of a clean or pure conscience, of a cleansed and pacified conscience, and of a tender conscience.

(1) A clean or pure conscience is a 'good conscience'. In this sense the word is used in our text. When you are tempted to do something wrong, and you resist the temptation and refuse to do the wrong thing, you may be said to have kept a good conscience—to have a clean or pure conscience.

About the time of the summer holidays, some of you may be tempted to cross the wall into a neighbouring garden, where the fruit is getting ripe—strawberries, or gooseberries, or a little farther on, apples or pears or plums. The sight of them 'makes your mouth water,' you say, they look so tempting. Other boys are about to become young thieves, and are planning to steal the fruit as quietly as possible. They urge you to be one of them. For a little while there is a struggle, partly because you would like the fruit, and partly because you feel it difficult to act differently from the other boys, and to bear their upbraiding. But conscience warns you that it would be wrong, and you do what it bids you. If you had done the wrong thing, it would have defiled your conscience; you would have had 'an evil conscience'. Whereas you have kept your conscience pure. You have come away from the scene of temptation with 'a good conscience'.

Or you are tempted to say what is not true. It seems as if it would benefit you to tell the lie. It might save you from punishment or disgrace. It might gain you a place in your class, or success in your game, or the approval of others. But because God and conscience forbid it, you say to yourself, 'No! Nothing shall induce me. I should scorn to be a liar.' And though you lose the place or the game or the advantage otherwise, you keep your 'good conscience'.

You are tempted to be disobedient, to be indolent, to neglect your work, to do some forbidden thing. It falls in with your wishes. You would like to do it, but you know it to be wrong. Conscience says—No. Keep your conscience pure. Do not sully it. Every wrong thing you say or do leaves a stain on your conscience—just like a black mark on a white piece of cloth or a sheet of paper, and your great concern should be not to have your conscience thus made black and foul. This applies alike to those who are Christians and to those who are not. The best conscience has stains enough, and, as we shall see, needs to be cleansed. But in so far as your decision as to any action or course of conduct is concerned, it is of the last importance to keep your conscience clean. I need not say that this is not easy. It requires a constant effort—aye, a constant fight. Paul knew what this was. Good man as he was, he required to be ever on the watch to keep his conscience pure. He says, ‘Herein do I exercise myself’—I am at pains—I take trouble—it is an object of constant thought and effort to me—‘to have a conscience void of offence both toward God and toward man’. And it is well worth all the trouble you can take to have it so. Do not, for the world, defile or outrage conscience by doing what it forbids. Whether other people see it or know it, or what they may think of it, is of little consequence. The keeping of ‘a good conscience’ is important above all else. Peter urged it on those to whom he wrote: ‘Having a good conscience’. And again—‘The answer of a good conscience toward God’. And Paul says: ‘For this is our rejoicing—the testimony of our conscience’—‘For we trust we have a good conscience’.

(2) A cleansed and pacified conscience is a ‘good conscience’. Perhaps some of you say, ‘Alas, what you have said about the pure conscience, is of little concern to me. At least, it can only be a thing of the future to me. What about the past? My conscience troubles me. It is defiled. It is burdened and guilty. I have done over and over many things which it told me not to do. And it accuses me; it condemns me. Sometimes I do not know what to do. How can I have a good conscience? Is it possible for me? Must I not carry my bad conscience with me to the end of my days, and even to the judgment-seat? I know well what conscience is as a judge—a condemning judge; can there be hope for me?’

Now it is here that the Gospel comes in with the good news of cleansing for the conscience. It not only tells of provision of grace and strength in the Lord Jesus, to enable us to keep the conscience clean and do what it bids. It does more. It tells of pardon for sin, through the Blood of Christ, who, by taking the guilt of sin upon Himself, and dying in the sinner’s stead, removes the guilt, washes out the stains, and so brings back peace to the conscience. There is no conscience that does not need this cleansing—that does not need it again and again, whether the conscience is troubled about the sin or not. There is great danger of thinking that our conscience is so pure that it does not need cleansing. And there is great danger, when conscience is burdened and troubled because of sin, of seeking to get quit of its burden and to find peace in a wrong way. There is but one right and safe and effectual way of cleansing and pacifying the conscience. There is but one remedy for an evil conscience, and that is—the Blood of Christ. There are two passages in the Epistle to the Hebrews which refer to this, ‘How much more shall the Blood of Christ purge (or cleanse) your conscience’ (ix. 14)—and ‘Having our hearts sprinkled (i.e. with the Blood of Christ) from an evil conscience’ (x. 22).

Thank God, the worst conscience that ever was has thus got cleansing and peace. Some of the greatest sinners that ever lived—thieves, drunkards, murderers, whose consciences were all defiled, whose sins cried to heaven for vengeance, who could get no rest day or night, and almost felt as if hell had begun on earth—have come to Jesus, have taken Him as their Saviour, and got cleansing and peace through His Blood, so that even they had a ‘good conscience’. There is no one who may not get this cleansed and pacified conscience—no sinner who may not get it for the first time, no believer who may not get it again.

There is one remark, however, which I think it important to make here. Even where the conscience is sprinkled with the cleansing and peace-speaking blood, there must also be the putting away of the evil thing—the restoration of what has been taken from another—confession made to the injured person of wrong done, and restitution made as far as that is possible. For example, you may have taken something belonging to another—money, or some article, such as a knife or book or the like, and your conscience is troubled about it. You know you have done wrong. You feel unhappy about it. You ask what you shall do. It is not enough to confess the sin to God, and seek forgiveness and cleansing through the Blood of Christ. The thing taken must be restored. That is essential. Not a moment should be lost in giving back the stolen article. You have no more right to keep it than you had before.

If you have falsely accused some one, have laid the blame on him of what you knew he was innocent of, so that he has suffered through your false accusation, then the truth must be told, and he must be thoroughly cleared. Justice and fair play demand that.

This was just what Zaccheus did, when he received Christ as his Saviour. He was a rich publican or gatherer of the public taxes, and we may believe him to have done what so many other publicans did—to have oppressed and defrauded the poor, who had no power to resist. As soon as he came to Christ for the cleansing, he set about putting right what had been wrong, and the first thing he said was: ‘Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor, and if I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold'. That was his way of getting conscience put right.

I can fancy some boy having a favourite knife, which he took or got wrongly from another boy. He would not like to part with it. It has almost become a part of himself. He would not think of taking a country stroll, or going to fish, or even going to school without it. Could he not get conscience cleansed, and yet keep the knife? I say emphatically, No. It must go back at once to its rightful owner, or there cannot be 'a good conscience'.

I have heard of an Indian having a dollar which did not belong to him. Pointing to his breast, he said, 'I got a good man and a bad man here, and the good man say, the dollar is not mine: I must return it to the owner'; and so he did. He could not have got the 'good conscience' otherwise. You remember the story of the postage-stamp in the crown of the hat, of which I told you. The five shillings had to be returned, after twenty-five years, or there could have been no 'good conscience'.

(3) A tender conscience is a 'good conscience'. This comes pretty near my first remark. Still I am anxious to call special attention to it, and I have put it third instead of second, because it seems to come in most suitably after speaking of the cleansed and pacified conscience. If I can get peace for my conscience by going to the blood of Christ, does it matter very much my sinning again? Ah, yes.

Once fell and got my right arm broken. But the doctor set it, and to-day it is as well and strong as ever. Do you think I should wish to have it broken again, because I could get it put right a second time, and have it strong and well once more? Would I not rather be more careful than before, and avoid the place where I met with my accident?

I heard the other day of a man having a 'strong conscience'. That is to say, he could go a great length and do very questionable things, without his conscience being troubled. Perhaps in order to create a laugh, or to be thought clever and make himself 'good company,' as it is called, he might exaggerate or go beyond the exact and literal truth, without it disturbing his conscience much. Now that is not a tender conscience. 'Old Humphrey,' speaking of such a one, says that he 'puts too much red in the brush!' All such things should be avoided.

It is very important to cultivate tenderness of conscience. Even if a thing is not altogether wrong or bad—if it has a doubtful look about it, it should not be done. There are some pieces of machinery which the smallest pin would damage or stop. Take a watch and let a grain of sand get into it, and all would go wrong. Let a grain of sand get into your eye, and you know what comes of it. Now your conscience should, in this respect, just be like the watch—should just be like your eye—the least thing of wrong should be feared, and felt, and avoided—and if it does get in, there should be no rest till it is out!

2. An evil conscience.—I might have spoken here of a conscience that is satisfied with itself when God is not satisfied with it—a conscience that thinks itself clean or pure, when it is far otherwise—a conscience that clings to its own 'dead works,' and that needs to be 'purged' or cleansed, in order that there may be a right serving of the living God. I wish, however, to confine myself to two remarks.

(1) A burdened or guilty conscience may be said to be an 'evil conscience'. It is, indeed, a good and not an evil thing when conscience is awakened out of its sleep, and begins to do its proper work of telling the sinner of his sin, and alarming him about it. That is better than to have a sleeping conscience—a dumb conscience—a dead conscience. We have cause to be thankful when conscience is fairly aroused and speaks out for God—all the more where it gives one no rest, until he has gone to the Lord Jesus to get pardon and peace from Him. In that case it is no more evil than it is evil when a man who has been sleeping or unconcerned amid the flames is awakened to a sense of his true condition, and has become alarmed about it, and earnestly seeks to escape. It does not make his case worse than before. It only makes him more alive to the real state of things.

But what I have more especially in view in this remark is the opposite of the clean conscience—is the defiled conscience—the conscience that has guilt lying on it when wrong is done. When temptation comes and you yield to it, knowing that it is wrong, conscience, as guide and judge, protests against it, and pronounces sentence on you as guilty; and from that moment you have a guilty or evil conscience. Which of us does not know what that is?—a conscience that has been disregarded, and that is aggrieved, at not having been listened to, amid all its warnings and protestings?

The conscience of which I am now speaking is unlike either the pure conscience or the cleansed conscience. It is no longer pure, and it is not yet cleansed. The sinner is like the criminal whom the policeman has seized in the very act of committing the crime, and whom he still holds by the throat, without his being able to get away, there being no one as yet to pay the fine or other penalty, and to set him free. I have no doubt I am speaking to some now, who have this 'evil conscience'. You cannot go back on your past life—you cannot go back on the past week, without things being called up that fill you with shame and discomfort and sorrow. What would you not now give that these things had never been done? They lie like lead on your heart. They burn like fire.

Some of you may have read of one who had been thinking of death and eternity, and whose conscience had been touched, as he heard the ticking of the old clock that stood in the corner of the room where he was working. It called up the sins of his past life, especially that of forgetting and rejecting God, and with audible voice it seemed to say, 'For ever—where? FOR EVER—WHERE? FOR EVER—WHERE? After a while he could bear it no longer. He rose, put his finger on the pendulum, and stopped the clock, as if that could silence the voice within. But it could not. And it was not until he had cast himself as a helpless sinner into the arms of Jesus that he found rest. To anyone similarly troubled with an evil conscience, from whatever cause, I would say, 'Go thou and do likewise'.<sup>1</sup>

(2) A seared conscience is an evil conscience. This is where there is no feeling—where one is past feeling—where conscience has been so often disregarded and outraged that it ceases to warn any longer, and one can sin without compunction—without fear—without shame. This does not come about all at once. It is the result of repeating sin again and again and again, till what was difficult at first becomes easy—till what made one miserable and cost many an anxious and bitter thought, and needed much resolution to do it, is scarcely thought of. The Scripture expression is, 'having their conscience seared with a hot iron'. Take a hot iron and touch your hand or any part of your body with it—how it burns—how it blisters—how it smarts all day long—how you look at it a hundred times! But repeat it again and again, and each time you feel it less, till at length you do not feel it at all. The tender skin has become hard and thick and unfeeling—almost like a piece of wood or leather.

So it is with conscience. At first it is tender, the slightest thing disturbs it. Like a sentinel at his post it warns of danger. It says, 'No passage this way. This cannot be allowed.' But by and by it is like the sentinel who has become sleepy or drunk or dead; anyone might come, anything might be done, and there would be no protest or hindrance. And this is what persistence in any sin—in any evil way, is ever bringing nearer. There are boys who blushed at their first oath, their first lie, their first little act of dishonesty, who are now utterly shameless, and could lie or swear or steal without misgiving. This may be easier and pleasanter than to have a troubled conscience, but it is not safer. Here is a young man who had been suffering terribly from disease in his limb—so much so that he could scarcely bear it. One morning, when the doctor came in, he said, 'Doctor, the pain is gone'. 'Surely,' you say, 'that is a good sign.' Alas! no. The doctor shook his head, and as he went out, said, 'the worse for him!' Mortification had set in. Death had begun. An awakened conscience may be terrible enough, but a seared conscience is worst and most hopeless of all.

Many people drown conscience by plunging deeper into sin. Many seek relief by rushing into drink. And yet what is this like? It is like the ostrich when pursued, thrusting its head into the sand, and because it no longer sees its pursuers, fancying that all is safe. It is like sailors in a storm, flying to the spirit casks and drugging themselves with drink, so as not to see their danger—so as to drown their fears, thus taking away all hope of escape. When one's conscience is seared, and he can do wrong without a pang, we might shake our head like the doctor, and say, 'the worse for him!'

What it Leads to.—What is the effect of having a good or evil conscience?

1. A good conscience leads to happiness and peace—an evil conscience to misery and despair. Have you not found it so? When you have done what is right, when you have resisted temptation, when you have refused to do the wrong—however difficult and even painful it might be at the time—have you not felt a glow of joy and happiness afterwards that was a full recompense? And so, when you have got the guilty conscience cleansed—when you have taken your sin to Jesus and laid it upon Him, and looked in faith to His precious blood—what relief and rest and blessing there has been! And, on the other hand, what misery comes of the 'evil conscience'! There is not one of all whom I address who does not know it. However pleasant the thing may be, in prospect or at the moment, it is no sooner done than it brings its punishment with it, in the shape of unhappiness, depression, discomfort. Oh! who shall describe the wretchedness, the sinking of heart, the despair of an evil conscience? There is no illness, no bodily suffering ever to be compared to it. John Bunyan gives us a picture of it in the Pilgrim's Progress, in 'the man in the iron cage'—imprisoned, without hope, and feeling that he has brought it all upon himself. A 'good conscience' is a better blessing than any the world can give. An 'evil conscience' is the most terrible of all curses.

2. A good conscience inspires with courage, independence and fearlessness—an evil conscience fills with cowardice and shame. 'The wicked flee when no man pursueth: but the righteous are bold as a lion.' You all know this. When you have done wrong, how ashamed you feel—how you start—how you fear being discovered—how you blush—how your heart beats! When any reference seems made to the matter—how you fancy everybody knows it—how you cringe to those who are in the secret and so have you in their power—how you lose your independence, and are afraid to do anything that would displease them—how you do not care to be left in the dark, or to be alone! It is an evil conscience that makes people cowards. Adam 'hid himself from the Lord God among the trees of the garden'. Why? He had an evil conscience. Felix, the Roman governor, 'trembled' before Paul his prisoner. Why? He had an evil conscience. Herod was in terror when he heard of Jesus, and could not be persuaded that He was not John the Baptist, whom he had beheaded. Why? He had an evil conscience.

On the other hand, when a man has the testimony of a good conscience nothing can daunt him. He needs to fear nobody. He is not afraid of anything being found out. He is independent. Like the 'Village Blacksmith'—

He looks the whole world in the face,
For he owes not any man.

Any boy who wishes to be brave and fearless—let him study to have a 'good conscience'. I give that as the best of all prescriptions for a brave spirit. Though the whole world were against you, it does not matter. You may be unjustly blamed—you may suffer wrongly, but the 'good conscience' will bear you up, or rather God will, and sooner or later all will come right.

I think it is Mrs. Gatty who, in one of her interesting and instructive volumes, tells of a young servant who was charged with stealing a valuable jet necklace. It had been left in the room where she was. Nobody had been there but herself, and it had disappeared. She could only deny the theft. She could give no explanation. She was dismissed from her situation in disgrace, and her father, who was gardener in the place, also got his leave. But she carried with her a good conscience. And in course of time, when the roof of the house was being repaired and the plumbers came to clean the gutter, there was the missing necklace, where no hand could have put it. It was found that a tame jackdaw had carried it out at the open window, and so the young servant was cleared.

I have heard of a young grocer's boy, Frank —, being asked by a fellow-apprentice to accompany him on his Sabbath excursions, and when he refused, being persecuted in every possible way. One thing after another disappeared from the shop, and when at last a sovereign went amissing, a policeman was brought in, Frank was examined, the gold piece was found sewed into the lining of his jacket, and he was taken off to prison. And what supported the poor lad? His 'good conscience'. In two days the truth came out, the real culprit was discovered, and Frank returned home in triumph.

A conscientious person has always the best of it. He is trusted and respected. It is about the best thing that can be said of anyone, that he is 'thoroughly conscientious'. I can hardly wish you anything better than that you should be conscientious Christians. In closing this address, I would earnestly express the hope that all my youthful readers may bear this honourable character. It is better than to be rich, or clever, or learned. It is worthy of your highest ambition and unceasing effort. And let me add that, as you should be jealous of tampering with your own consciences, so you should beware of tampering with the consciences of others. Let the rule for yourselves, and for others as far as you can influence them, be—

Keep conscience as the noontide clear.

THE 'LION SERMON'

I TIMOTHY IV. 16; I PETER V. 5-11.

QUITE lately there was a curious service held in an old church in London.

It was on the 16th of October there was preached in the church of St. Katherine Cree, Leadenhall Street, what was called the 'Lion Sermon'.

It is preached every year on 16th October. It has been preached every year in that same church for the last two hundred and fifty years.

If you wanted to be present and would go a little earlier than the hour, you would hear the most lovely chime of bells—a chime beginning in the ordinary way, only more softly pealing, and then breaking into hymn tunes—'Sun of my soul,' 'Abide with me,' 'The happy land,' and the like. Then there is the service, made very short; then the event of the evening—the sermon, the 'Lion sermon'.

And this is what the people present that Tuesday evening heard.

There was once in the city a very pious man, called Sir John Gayer (or Gair). At one time he was Lord Mayor of London. Sir John happened to be in Asia at one period of his life. And when he, with his caravan, was travelling through a desert place, he found himself face to face and alone with a lion. Everybody of his company who could have helped him had gone forward. Sir John knew that only God could deliver him. He thought of Daniel in the den of lions. He perhaps thought of Paul, who at one time was expecting to meet an emperor who was as cruel as a lion. And he fell on his knees there before the beast and shut his eyes and cried to God to shut the mouth of the lion. And when he had finished his prayer and opened his eyes, the lion was nowhere to be seen. So when he came back to London he set aside a sum of money to be given away in gifts to poor people every 16th of October, and to secure that a sermon should be preached to tell the generations to come how God heard his prayer and delivered him from the mouth of the lion.

Lions? 'This was an actual lion.

Lions? There are stone monuments of them! In abbeys and cathedrals you may see knights with their feet resting on the lion.

The lion the knights sought to trample was the evil spirit which goeth about like a roaring lion.

Perhaps you may never have to face an actual lion. But this other lion you will have to face. Who is it to help you to subdue that? Only God.

There is the lion of sloth.

There is the lion of passionate anger.

There is the lion of untruthfulness.

There is the lion that rends the soul (Ps. vii.).

There is the lion that waits secretly for his prey. —ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 103.

GREAT GAIN

(A New Year's Sermon)

'Godliness with contentment is great gain.'—I TIMOTHY VI. 6.

A HAPPY New Year to you, the best and brightest that you have ever had!

'What is the good of wishing us that?' says surly Bill. 'It does not bring us anything. I've wished for things hundreds of times, and nothing ever came.'

Well, it is a very pleasant thing to feel that people love us enough to wish us any good; and it means that they would give us what they wish for if they could. So I will wish you a Happy New Year; and as I can't give it to you I will do what is perhaps better—I will try and show you how to get it for yourselves. Now there is one thing I wish for you all. I wonder if you could guess what it is. Sometimes I go into the great city of London, and see all the people hurrying along—crowds of men and women, and even boys and girls: they are all hurrying after what I wish for you. And away in the country the ploughman ploughs for it, and the miller grinds for it, and the woodman fells for it, and the miner goes down the deep dark pit for it, and the fisherman puts out to sea to look for it. All the busy world is eager to get it. It is gain—great gain. And that is what I wish for you—great gain. Once there was a king who had immense wealth. He had a throne of ivory overlaid with gold, and six ivory steps, with carved lions on each step, leading up to it, and a foot-stool of gold. Almost all the things in his house were of gold. As to horses and chariots, he had so many that there were four thousand stalls to keep them in. And every three years his ships came in, bringing gold and silver, and ivory, and apes, and peacocks. If ever a man knew what gold could do, this great king did. He was as wise as he was rich, and he said that there was a gain which was more than pure gold.

Years afterwards there lived a man who gave up all he had and went about preaching. He was very poor. Often he was in want. He went through all kinds of dangers, now in wrecks, and now amongst robbers, and now amongst cruel men. And he who was so poor says just the same thing as the king who was so rich. He says, 'Godliness with contentment is great gain'.

And this is what I wish you all—this godliness with contentment that is great gain. Godliness is a long word that you may not understand. But we can make it into two short words that you can easily see the meaning of. It is God-likeness, to be like God; that is, to be true, and good, and loving. And that is more than all the wealth and splendour of the king.

This is great gain, because it is something in us—in our hearts.

The great gain is a good heart. God-likeness is great gain. But God-likeness is not all. Godliness with contentment is great gain. It is a dreadful thing for anybody to be discontented, but it is very much worse for a religious man, because it ought not to be so. It is wrong, and he could set it right if he would. If men have good and true and loving hearts, they ought to have contentment. It reminds me of a rich man who had nothing to do, and he got a fancy into his head that he was very ill. He lay in bed all day long, and took all kinds of medicines, and sighed and groaned about his symptoms, and really thought that he had enough to feel very ill about, and that he was going to die. One day a clever doctor that I knew came to see him, and found that he was quite well; but how could he make the man know it? At last he said, 'I think, Sir, you should go to the south of France'.

'Oh, I could never get there!' groaned the poor man.

'Well, I will go with you and take you.'

The rich man was glad enough to pay the doctor for going, and the doctor wanted a holiday—so they started. But as soon as they got to France the doctor made him get up at six o'clock in the morning, hustled about with him in cabs and trains, and made him walk two or three miles at a stretch. And he had to do it, or the doctor would have left him behind in strange, out-of-the-way places. So gradually the rich man began to find that he could do it all—could get up and walk about, and eat and work like other people. And so these good people ought to be contented; and they could be if they set themselves to be so. They ought to have godliness with contentment.

This is what I wish for you all—Godliness, with contentment, which is great gain. Now, you can think of one or two ways in which it is greater gain than gold. We can always have this gain with us. You remember the story of the king who went to fight in the East, and, as he came home, he was taken prisoner, and shut up until somebody should send money for a ransom. There, a poor lonely prisoner, how he would think about his kingdom and his throne, about his crown and jewels and all his gold—how he wished that he had them with him. But they were a long way off, and could not help him now. All that gain of his was of no use to the poor prisoner. But when we have this gain of godliness with contentment we carry it with us wherever we go. St. Paul, who said this, took it with him into prison, and he sang there, quite happy, and in all kinds of strange places he was always rejoicing. Long ago, people used to talk about a philosopher's stone which turned whatever it touched to gold. This 'great gain' is the true philosopher's stone. Contentment in the heart makes everything golden.

And then, again, it is great gain because we can take it with us when we must leave all other gain behind. Have you ever read about William the Conqueror, the great king who had such wealth, and lived in such splendour? When he was dying in France, all his friends left him to secure their own property, and as soon as he was dead even the servants took what they could and hurried away. The dead body of the great conqueror was left almost naked on the floor. He who had his thousands of followers could hardly find a kindly friend to bury him. He who had so great a realm could hardly find a grave. He was dead, and he left all his great gain behind. But when St. Paul was an old man he had this godliness with contentment in his heart, and he felt that he could take his great gain with him. He said, 'To die is gain'. And this was the gain: 'Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day'.—MARK GUY PEARSE, Sermons for Children, p. 110.

THE LITTLE THORN TREE<sup>1</sup>

I TIMOTHY VI. 6-9.

CONTENTMENT is great gain.

Be pleased to be what you are, and be pleased with the things you have.

Some children, when they grow a little and begin to look about them, and see there are houses grander than their own home, and people richer than their parents, begin to be discontented. Then they begin to put discontent into words and say :—

The old house, it is too old.

The clothes, they are not fine enough.

The holidays, they are too short.

The people we know, they are not grand enough.

If we could only be richer, grander, finer-looking, and more surrounded by great friends !

Nothing they have pleases them ; only something they have not would please them.

The German people are the great story-telling people of Europe. A famous story of theirs is about a tree. It is this :—

In a deep forest in the German land lived a little tree which had this kind of discontent. It was a thorn tree and might have lived a happy life, for it was strong, and nobody troubled it. But it was not satisfied. 'Why do I have hard, bare, prickly thorns ?' it said. 'Other trees have leaves : I only ugly thorns. If I had my wish, I should have leaves of gold.'

And although it is a strange thing to tell, the little thorn tree had its wish. When the next day dawned, it saw that it had leaves of gold. And the light of the sun shone on the golden leaves, and the tree made a splendid show.

The little tree laughed for joy.

But in the midst of its joy a robber came. 'Gold !' he cried, 'leaves of gold ! That is splendid for me.' So he plucked off every leaf, put them in his pockets, and went on. At night the poor tree was quite bare.

It was very much cast down. But once more it was allowed to wish. And this time it wished leaves of glass. So leaves of glass grew on the branches. And the morning sun came out and shone on the leaves, and it was a great sight. The little tree clapped its hands for joy.

But when night came, there arose a storm. It came crashing through the wood, breaking the branches, overturning the trees : at last it came to the little glass-leaved tree. And with one mighty blast it shattered the leaves into fragments.

And the little tree had sorrow once more.

But once again it was allowed to wish. This time it wished for green soft leaves like other trees. These came, and then, when it was glad for their beauty, the little goats came and began to lift up their mouths and bite and nibble, until before night every leaf was eaten, and the tree was bare.

Then the discontented tree saw its folly. 'I was not pleased with my thorns,' it said. 'But thorns are best for me.' So it wished back the thorns, and the thorns came back.

Robbers did not touch them ; storms did not break them ; goats did not eat them. At last with the things given by its Maker it was contented.—

THE GENTLE HEART

'Be gentle unto all men.'—2 TIMOTHY II. 24.

THE other day a friend brought me a song which was sung in Italy six hundred years ago. He called it 'The Song of the Gentle Heart'. It is a song in praise of gentleness in the life, and of gentle deeds and words and thoughts. And what the song says is that all gentleness has its home in the heart; and that unless there be gentleness in the heart there can be none in the life.

At the time this song was sung, there were many who thought that gentleness could only be found in palaces and castles, and among the people who dress in splendid clothes. But the song says that it may also be found in the most humble cottages, and among people whose hands are rough with daily toil. It is the gentle heart which makes people gentle. Whether a home be rich or poor, if those who live in it have gentle hearts, that home is the dwelling-place of gentlefolks.

After hearing this song I could think of nothing else. The words of the old singer kept sounding like music in my soul. And I also, as if I had got back his eyes, began to see his visions.

And all the bypast week these visions have been coming to me. When I went out into the country, they met me in lonely roads. When I went into the town, I saw them in the crowded streets. Night and day, and every day, they came. And every day they seemed brighter than the day before. At last I said, I will bring them into my words to the children, and they shall be visions for them as well as for me. I will call them Visions of the Gentle Heart.

I. One of the first visions of the Gentle Heart I saw came to me hid under the rough form of an old Roman soldier. If I had seen him only when he was dressed for battle, I should not have thought of him as gentle. I should have seen him carrying a sword to kill men with, and a shield to defend himself from being killed by others. And as he had other soldiers under him, I might have heard him speaking to them in a loud, commanding way, and telling them to do hard and cruel things.

But when I saw him his sword and shield were hanging on the wall, and he was sitting beside a little bed in his room in the soldiers' barracks. After one of his dreadful battles he had got for his share of the spoil a little boy who had been taken captive—a poor little boy, torn away from father and mother, and forced to be a slave. He was the slave of this soldier; he cooked his food, he tidied his room, he polished his armour, he went his errands. Just a little slave—nothing higher. This rough-looking soldier might have beaten him every day if he liked; nobody would have found fault. He was his own property—just as his horse was—just as his dog was—and he might have sold him like any other property.

But under the outside roughness of this soldier was a gentle heart. He did not beat his slave; he loved him; he looked upon him as his own son; he let the little man have a home in his heart. It was a joy to him to see the child happy; it was a grief to him to see him sad. And it was a great grief to him when one day the little slave fell sick. Then the rough soldier was as tender as a mother could be. He sat by his bed; he watched over him day and night. Many a time, I am sure, as the thought came into his heart, 'My little boy will die,' the hot tears came rolling down his cheeks. And he thought the boy was really about to die; the little fellow's breathing became more feeble, his face grew very pale, his eyes were closed.

One day as the big soldier was sitting by the little bed somebody came in and said, 'A great prophet has come to the town. Jesus of Nazareth has come.'

'Jesus of Nazareth?' the soldier said; 'the healer of sickness? Oh, that He would heal my boy!'

But then this thought came into his mind, 'I am a soldier of the nation that is ill-treating the Jews. I am not worthy that a Jew so good as He should do anything for me.' Then other thoughts came, and in his great love for the boy, and knowing that Jesus could heal him, he at last ventured to send this humble message: 'O my Lord, my servant is near to die, and Thou art able to save from dying. I am not worthy that Thou shouldst visit my house. But only speak the word, and he shall live. Thou art Lord of health and sickness, as I am a lord of soldiers. Say to this sickness, "Depart," and it will depart. Say to health, "Go to this soldier's servant," and health will come to him, and he shall live.'

Now when Jesus received that message, a great joy came into His heart; and He said to health, 'Go to that soldier's little servant, and make him well, for I have not found a heart so gentle as his master's—no, not in all Israel'.

And He had no sooner spoken out on the street than the thing He commanded was done. Health came back to the sick boy in the soldier's house. The eye in which there had been no light opened; a little smile passed over the worn face as he saw his dear master still nursing him. And the gentle heart of the master swelled up in thankful joy, as he stooped down and kissed the child whom Jesus had made well again.

II. My next vision also took me back to old times, but not so far back as my first. It was to times that were very evil I was taken. There was a wide open place in an ancient city, and a great crowd of people standing far off in a ring. Inside the ring were priests and soldiers in black cloaks and red. In the centre was a stake of wood, with faggots of wood piled round about it. And there, chained to the stake in the midst of the faggots, was an holy man of God, whom evil priests were about to burn, not because he was bad, but because he had preached the Gospel of Christ to men.

Then I saw the evil men putting a light to the faggots; and I saw that the faggots were wet, and slow to catch fire, and the slow burning of the fire was a great agony to the man at the stake. And then came to me this strange but real gleam of the Gentle Heart. Out from the crowd stepped an old woman with a bundle of dried faggots and some straw. She set them on the pile on the side the wind was, and they blazed up at once. And I saw a look of thankfulness come over the face of the poor sufferer as he said, half speaking to God, and half to her, 'Oh, holy simplicity!'

It was the holy simplicity of the Gentle Heart. She could not bear to see his slow pain. Since he was to die for Christ, for Christ's sake she shortened his suffering.

III. That vision faded, and instead of the evil fire I saw a beautiful garden in Geneva. I saw a young couple with happy faces come out of the house, come down the garden walk, and seat themselves beside a beehive. It is Hüber the student and Aimée, his beautiful wife. What we read now in books about the queen bee and the other bees, and the honey and the wax, was found out for the most part by this man. He spent his life in the study of bees. But look! he is blind. He has been blind for years. He will live till he is an old man, and be blind to the end. And yet to the end he will watch the ways and find out the secrets of the bees. And he will be able to do this because the gentle Aimée is by his side. Her friends said to her, 'Do not marry Francis Hüber, he has become blind'. But she said, 'He therefore needs me more than ever now'. And she married him, and was his happy wife and fellow-student forty years. She was eyes to the blind. She looked into the hives, and he wrote down what she saw. And she never tired of this work, and she did it with her whole soul. And the story of the bees, as it was seen and written in that garden by these two, will be read in schools and colleges when Hüber and his beautiful Aimée are themselves forgotten.

It is a hundred years ago since they began to study the bees together, and they are both long since dead. But still shines out for me in the long, helpful, patient and loving service of Aimée, the Gentle Heart. And it was of that very heart, I am certain, her husband was thinking in his old age, when he said, 'Aimée will never be old to me. To me she is still the fair young girl I saw when I had eyes to see, and who afterwards, in her gentleness, gave the blind student her life and her love.'

IV. After that I saw an island on the coast of Africa. And in the island I saw a house for lepers, with a great high wall round about it. And I beheld, when a leper or anyone else entered that house, that the gates of the great walls were shut upon them, and they never more were allowed to come out. The house was filled with lepers—lepers living, lepers dying—and no one to care for their sufferings or speak to them of God. Then I beheld two Moravian missionaries bidding farewell to their friends on the shore, crossing over to the island, coming up to the gates, and passing in amongst the sick and the dying, to nurse them, to preach to them, to live with them, and never more go out from among them, till they should be carried out dead.

V. Among my Christmas cards this year was one from a dear old friend in the north. And among my visions of the Gentle Heart was one in which he was the centre. It is a long while now since he retired from business and turned for work to his garden and his flowers. But it is nearly as long since, as he went along the crowded streets of the town in which he lives, and saw homeless boys and girls on the pavement, the thought came into his heart to gather the orphans among them into a home. So he gave only a part of his time to his garden and his flowers, and the rest to provide this home. And the home was built, and the homeless ones gathered into it—a large family now. And in that home, and for that home, my friend spends many a happy hour. He is justly looked upon as the father of the home. Yet he is so modest that his name never appears in the reports of the home, except among the names of the directors, and those who give money for its support. Once, indeed, he was taken by surprise: the other directors asked as a great favour to have his portrait for the home. And if you were going there, and asking the children whose portrait it was, they would answer, 'It is the portrait of our papa'.

One year some failure in bank or railway made him much poorer, and he could not give the twenty pounds which he had given to the home each year. He might have said quite honestly, 'I am sorry, but I can't afford to give my twenty pounds this year'. But the gentle heart had something more in it than honesty. That very year a new flower had been brought to London from Japan, and each plant of it cost a pound. The orphans' papa sent to London for a plant, took it into his greenhouse, cut it into twenty bits, and struck a new plant out of each. Then he sold his twenty plants at one pound each. And so that year too there was joy in this Gentle Heart that he was still able to pay his twenty pounds to help to bless little orphan children.

VI. Then I saw a vision of a rich man's son. In the city of Glasgow once lived a worthy merchant, whose children I knew. As God had blessed him in his buying and selling, he became a rich man. And having a great love for country life, he took his riches and bought some fields on which he had played and gathered flowers when a child, and also the mansion in which the old laird of the place was wont to live. There was just one thing he forgot to do; he forgot to make his will, and say to whom the mansion and fields should go when he died. So by and by, when he died, no will could be found. Now he left behind him his wife, four daughters, and an only son. But as no will had been made, the mansion, and the fields, and a great part of all his riches, came to this only son. He was in London when the news came that his father had died, and that he was now a rich man. Just at that moment money would have been very useful to him, for he was a young merchant beginning life, and no one would have blamed him if he had said, 'The money is welcome, and with it I shall push my new business on'. But God had given him a Gentle Heart. He left London as soon after he got the news as he could get a train. And although it was late in the day when he arrived at his native city, the first thing he did was to go to the house of a friend who writes out wills. And that friend, at his request, wrote out a will by which the mansion and the fields were made over to his mother all her days—and all the rest, both land and money, which his father had left, was divided, share-and-share alike, between her, his sisters, and himself. And when that was all fixed, he went to his home and buried his father. Somebody said to him afterwards, 'But why did you go that very night and have the will made out?' He said, 'I thought I might see that it was my duty to do it. If I had left it till next day, my duty might not have seemed so clear.'

That is the way of the Gentle Heart.

VII. One vision of a Gentle Heart came to me out of the years when I was at school. Among my class-fellows was a Jewish boy. His real name was John, but some of the bigger boys had given him the name of Isaac, and by that name he was known. He was a shy, timid-looking boy, tall and slender, with a little stoop. He was very clever at making musical toys. He used to bring pan-pipes and singing reeds and wood whistles to the school. Sometimes he brought a little flute, and in play-hours, when the bigger scholars were at their games, he would stand leaning against the wall, with a crowd of little fellows around him, whom he taught to play on his simple reeds and whistles, or to whom he played on his little flute.

I sat beside him at school, and got to know him well; and I never knew him to tell a lie, or do a base, or mean, or cruel thing. And I do not think as much could be said of any other boy amongst us all at that school during the years when he was there. He helped the backward boys with their lessons. I have seen him oftener than once sharing his lunch with a schoolfellow that had none; and although he had no quarrels of his own, he took up the quarrels of the little boys when the bullies were ill-treating them. One day he saw a big lad of fifteen beating a little fellow of eleven. 'Now, Tom,' he called out, 'let that little fellow alone.' 'You mind your Jews' harps and whistles,' said the bully. Isaac made no reply, but went right up to the hulking fellow, seized the wrist of the hand which had hold of the little boy, gave it a sudden twist and pinch, which loosened the hand-grip in a moment, and let the little boy free. It was done so quickly and neatly that all the boys standing around burst into laughter at the bully. From that time the bully was Isaac's enemy, and every evil trick that could be done against the Jew lad he did, and every spiteful word that could be spoken he spoke.

But it happened one afternoon, when school was over, that Isaac was standing at his father's door, and he saw a great crowd turning into the street. Boys and men were storming up, and there, in front of them, running as if for life, and white with terror and fatigue, was the bully. He had been in some boy's prank or other, and was being chased by those who wished to punish him. Isaac saw at a glance how matters stood, and, standing back within the door and holding it open, he said, 'Come in here, Tom; I'll let you out another way'. And he let him out into another street. Isaac saved his bitterest enemy, and Tom escaped. It was Tom who told us all this. Isaac never referred to it. But we all noticed that Tom said as much good of the Jew boy afterwards as he had said evil before.

VIII. But while I was thinking of these visions, as they came one by one, I found that they began to come two and three together, and at last in a crowd. And it is only little bits of what I saw after that I can now tell.

I saw a brave man plunging into a river one dark night and saving a woman who had stumbled in; and when the friends sought him in the crowd to thank him, he was not to be found. The brave man wanted no thanks. His reward was that he had saved a human life.

I saw a gracious man going into a bank one day, and entering a large sum of money to the credit of a widow, who had lost husband and means the day before.

I saw a wounded soldier on the field of battle refusing the water he was thirsting for, that it might be given to one beside him who was worse wounded and needed it more.

I saw a tender lady passing from bed to bed in a hospital, and speaking cheering words to the sick people, as she did some gentle service to each. And I saw the thankful smile that came up over their wan faces as she passed.

I saw daughters refusing homes of their own that they might wait beside their sick mothers. I saw them lovingly tending the dear sufferers as if they were queens, and counting it joy to be able in this way to show their love.

I saw a man stand up before an angry mob, and say to them, 'It is falsehood you are speaking against my friend'. And when they cried against him in their anger, he defended his friend the more.

I saw a brave captain on the great sea, bringing his ship close to a burning vessel crowded with human beings, and waiting beside it—risking his own ship in the flames—till the day closed, and far on through the night, till at length every soul was saved.

And in each of these visions, and in many more that I cannot tell, what I saw was a gleam of the Gentle Heart.

At last, however, all these visions melted away, but I saw that it was into the light of a far greater vision.

I thought it was night, and I was with a crowd of people upon a great mountain. There were mountains all round, mountains below, mountains above, a great stretch of mountains, and the tops, reaching far up into the sky, were covered with snow.

We turned our faces to the mountain-tops, and we saw coming out on the peaks of the highest just the faintest little flush of light. Then it grew stronger, then red, then one by one the great snow-peaks kindled up, away up into the sky, as if some fire were shining on the snow; and indeed a fire was shining on the snow. For as we turned our faces the other way to come down the hill, we beheld the morning sun rising into the sky. It was the flame of the rising sun which we had seen shining on the lighted peaks.

Now that is just what my visions of the Gentle Heart have been—fires kindled by a greater fire; far-off gleams of the Gentle Heart of Jesus. The gentleness I have been telling you about is just light from Him. He is the sun. They were the hill-tops, great and small, aflame with love like His love. And it was into the light of that largest love my visions faded.

Yes, His is the heart from which all hearts take their gentleness. It is from His heart all the gentleness of mothers and sisters, all the gentleness you have ever known in father, or brother, or companion, or nurse has come. His is the gentlest heart the world has ever known, or ever can know. It is this heart which in the Bible the loving God offers to each of us. This is that new heart which will new-make you, and bless you, and bring you at last to glory. Just the heart of Jesus, the gentle, loving, merciful heart of Him who once died for us, and who still lives to help and bless us all.—A. MACLEOD, The Gentle Heart, p. 3.

THE BIBLE

2 TIMOTHY III. 15.

WHEN I was in London lately, I spent one evening with a very learned friend, a Jewish doctor. He showed me a splendid new Hebrew Bible with a new translation and hundreds of Doré's illustrations, which he had just purchased. This led us to talk about the Bible and its influence, and in the course of our talk my friend recalled to memory a toast that was drunk to in Scotland when he was a lad at college. The toast was this: 'A clean sword and a dirty Bible'. Now a toast is a sort of prayer. It is the expression of a wish, and in that sense we may understand it to-day.

'A clean sword': that is the wish that wars are to end, and peace prevail all over the world. That is a right wish to have, that there should be no more bloodshed, no more fighting between nations. I fear we are still far away from such a state. But yet it is our duty to wish and pray for that good time.

Now, although it was an old-fashioned way of speaking to say 'a dirty Bible', yet you must not suppose it was the least disrespectful. Not at all; it simply meant a well-thumbed Bible, a Bible often handled, often read, frequently referred to, the commonly used book of a Bible-loving people.

It is a fine thing to see a handsome new Bible, with pictures, and gilt edges, and clasped boards, but it is better to have a Bible constantly used, often opened and read, even though the edges are frayed and the pages dimmed.

Some time ago we had an Indian officer addressing a religious meeting in our hall. He told us he had been careless and foolish in his youth, and when he was leaving home to join his regiment his father gave him a Bible, but he never read it; he forgot that he had it for years, till he was wounded and sick and set aside. Then in his loneliness he began to read his Bible, and a new light dawned upon him, and he was converted to God. He said: 'Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now I keep Thy Word'.

Suffering may fall on any one of you; you may be laid on a sick-bed. You may even be called, young though you are, to die.

What would help you to suffer nobly? Only this, to have begun early to walk humbly with God.

At a meeting of the Bible Society, which I attended some years back, the following incident was mentioned:—

The body of a youth, seventeen years of age, was washed ashore. He had gone out on the rocks to read, in preparation for Oxford, and, immersed in study, must have been unconscious of the rising of the tide till it was too late to escape. On the fly-leaf of his pocket Bible, found upon him, he had written, in a bold firm hand, the following words: 'In danger, I now declare that I do trust in Jesus as my own Saviour, and I have trusted Him for about five years. I know that my sins of heart and of action are many and grievous, but I do pray to God to forgive me for the sake of the perfect righteousness of Christ and to receive me in safety and holiness with Himself. I pray God that He will bless my father and mother, and give them His Holy Spirit, and keep my brother and sisters in His faith and fear.' How forcibly this touching incident proves the fidelity of God to His Word. 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee, because he trusteth in Thee.'—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 9.

PUNCTUALITY

'Be instant in season,'—2 TIMOTHY IV. 2.

PAUL had been a very active man, always on hand when there was anything to be done. But when he wrote our text he was an old man, and was in prison for preaching Jesus Christ. He was soon to be beheaded as a martyr, dying for Christ's sake. A little while before he was put to death he wrote a letter to a minister of the Gospel named Timothy, a young man. Paul told Timothy to 'be instant in season, out of season,' in his preaching. But as he who is not prompt about other things is not likely to be in preaching, we may apply the text to all things that we do.

To be instant in season is to be attentive, ready. It is a prompt attention that may at any moment pass into action. It is much more than to be punctual, and yet it includes punctuality, and we will apply it to being punctual.

To be punctual is to be on hand at the fixed or set time, not tardy or behindhand; to be prompt. Let me illustrate it: Church worship begins at a fixed time; and to be punctual at the church is to be there and in your seats before the services commence. If you come late, you are not punctual. So the school begins at a fixed time; and to be punctual at school is to be there and in your seats before the school begins. If you agree to meet one at a certain hour of the day, to be punctual is to be on hand at that hour and minute. If you come after the time, you are not instant in season, but you are tardy.

You ought to try to be punctual at all times and places, and these are the reasons why:—

1. You will do more if you are punctual. The punctual boy or girl, man or woman, keeps ahead of his work or study, and does not lag behind it. Take your lessons. If you are instant in season you will get them before the time comes to recite them. You will keep up and ahead of your recitations. But if you are not punctual, then you will lag behind. The time will come to recite and you are not ready. A part of the lesson will not be well learned. So if you make an agreement to meet one, to be on hand and have it done with saves time for other things. So if you have work or chores to do, do them punctually at the proper time, and you will do them best and quickest. If you are prompt, punctual, instant in season, you will save time and do more work and study.

2. You will have more time for play if you are punctual. If you have a task to do of any sort, and you are promptly at it in time, it is soonest done, and being done you can then play with a free heart. I am glad that our common schools teach punctuality so thoroughly that the children hurry in when the last bell begins to ring. Do your tasks promptly and you will get more time for rest or play or reading good books and papers.

3. It is your duty to be punctual. If you have ever seen soldiers march, you know what it is to be in line. If one is fast and another slow, if one is prompt to obey and another tardy, the line is all out of joint. It is crooked and no one can admire it. Hence soldiers are trained to keep step, to move together, to march in line. It is the duty of every soldier to be instant in season, that he may not put others out of order. So if you have heard a band of music play, you noticed what perfect time was kept. One did not begin and then another, and then the third, each as he pleased; for they are all trained to begin together, to keep together, and to close together. The tardy ones put the others out and have to leave the band if they cannot learn to be on time. They have to be instant in season.

Now it is your duty while young to form habits of promptness, readiness. You need to learn to be punctual, on hand in time, instant in season. You see how quick they are who play ball. They are all alert to catch the ball, but to catch it they must be where it is, and so they are intent, they watch for it, they are instant in season. You want to learn to do the same in all the affairs of play, study, work, and life. You want to be punctual, prompt, so as to make no failure in life.

It is even said of God that He is not slack concerning His promises. He is not slow in fulfilling them. He is always on time. So we should always be on time. And when He says: 'Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth'; 'Those that seek Me early shall find Me,' we should obey promptly. Like a good soldier we should obey orders. We should be prompt to hear and act. We ought not to wait for a better time. Act promptly, be instant in season, in obeying your parents, your teachers, your Saviour. When Christ said to Matthew: 'Follow Me,' Matthew obeyed instantly and followed Him. God commands you to do the same. Never be behindhand in any duty. Then God, even our God, shall bless you.—A. HASTINGS ROSS, Sermons to Children, p. 267.

THE EPISTLE TO TITUS

IMPOSSIBLE FOR GOD

'In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began.'—TITUS 1. 2.

God cannot die. He cannot lie. Lie! no, let us say it with reverence and with gladness, His oath says that He may as soon die.

But now I go on to say that we have two grand lessons to learn from this impossibility for God. Here is—

- I. An argument for trust, and
- II. An argument for truth.

I. For Trust.—We often ask of a fellow-creature, 'Can he be trusted?' The question has in it such thoughts as these. Is he heedful enough? Is he wise enough? Is he kind enough? Is he true enough, not to deceive or disappoint us, if we rely on him? Now God in all views of His character may be safely trusted—for He is wise, mighty, good, and faithful—He cannot lie. Every word of His is purest gold. There is no drawback about it. Do you remember how gladly Joshua and Israel acknowledged that? 'Ye know,' said that great leader to the assembled people, 'in all your hearts, and in all your souls, that not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the Lord your God spake concerning you; all are come to pass unto you, and not one thing hath failed thereof.'

Will you think reverently of this, that God can have no motive for lying. Even bad false men, generally speaking, do not lie without some purpose to be served, as they think, by the falsehood. When Joseph's brethren brought to Jacob their father his torn and bloody coat, and said they had found it, they wanted to conceal their cruel conduct in selling their brother into Egypt, and to prevent his being sought after and brought back. When Ananias lied, he wanted to get credit for being as liberal as other Christians who had sold their estates and given the money to the Church, and yet have some of the price he got for his land for his own use. Nay, even Satan, when he told the first grand lie to Eve, had a purpose he was trying to accomplish by it. It was a very wicked end he thought of; to spite God; to ruin man; but yet this prompted his false words, 'Ye shall not surely die.' But God, supreme in power, and in bliss, can have nothing to gain by falsehood. All things He wishes He can easily reach and have. But besides, falsehood is all against His nature. Falsehood is a dark thing. It conceals. It has folds. It would not be seen through. 'God is light, and in Him there is no darkness at all.'

Not to trust God when He speaks is, as John says, to call him a liar. Now that is a fearful word. I remember when at school boys would sometimes very recklessly call each other by that odious name. Grown people, alas! sometimes do the like. But, bad as men are, they feel that liar is a word of terrible and unbearable reproach. Will you fling it, then, at God? Ah! take care; for none of us can escape being a proof that God never lies. He will show that He keeps His word with them that will not trust Him, as well as with them that do. He threatens, and He fulfils. Oh, it must be a fearful thing to meet God making good that word—'The soul that sinneth shall die'. Why should any of us so meet Him? He does not wish us to die. He wants us to live. He likes to be trusted to give us life.

None perish that Him trust.

A Highland drover once heard a minister, eminent in his day for holy worth, read from the Scottish version of the thirty-fourth Psalm the concluding verses ending with that line. It touched his heart. After service he waited on the minister, and said, 'Oh, sir, can that be true?' And the man of God, beginning from that Scripture, preached unto him Jesus. It pleased God to bless the word to him, and he became a happy believer in the only Saviour. Frequently, in the prosecution of his calling, he had occasion to pass through the town where God first awoke him, and brought him to himself. It was his custom, in so doing, always to call for the minister by whom the word of God was spoken to him, and ever as the two met, the first word uttered on either side was this—

None perish that Him trust.

But,

II. Here is an Argument for Truth.—If God cannot lie, because His nature is all against lying, then He must very much dislike lying in others. So the Bible says He does, 'Lying lips,' it tells us, 'are an abomination to the Lord'. 'He destroys all them that speak leasing.' 'All liars shall have their portion in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone.' Is not that fearful to think of? Then, if it be a blessed and glorious thing in God to be incapable of lying, surely to be like Him in this must be noble and good. Happily there are men and children too, of whom it may be said in a lower, but still in a grand sense, they cannot lie. They have been trained to such habits of truth, and they have such holy fear of God, that nothing will induce them to speak what is false. In the town of Devizes you may see, in the marketplace, the following inscription, 'The mayor and corporation of Devizes avail themselves of the stability of this building to transmit to future times the record of an awful event which occurred in this market-place in the year 1753; hoping that such a record may serve as a salutary warning against the danger of impiously invoking the Divine vengeance, or of calling on the holy name of God to conceal the devices of falsehood and fraud. On Thursday the 25th of January, 1753, Ruth Pierce, of Pottera, in this county, agreed with three other women to buy a sack of wheat in the market, each paying her due proportion towards the same. One of these women, in collecting the several quotas of money, discovered a deficiency, and demanded of Ruth Pierce the sum which was wanting to make good the amount. Ruth Pierce protested that she had paid her share, and said she wished she might drop down dead if she had not. She rashly repeated this awful wish, when, to the consternation of the surrounding multitude, she instantly fell down and expired, having the money concealed in her hand.'

The lessons from the text may thus be shortly taught. God cannot lie. Believe Him, therefore; and be like Him.—J. EDMOND, The Children's Church at Home, p. 734.

THE EPISTLE TO PHILEMON

THE STORY OF A RUNAWAY SLAVE

'Not now as a servant, but above a servant, a brother beloved, specially to me, but how much more unto thee, both in the flesh and in the Lord?'—PHILEMON 16.

THIS letter which tells us the story of the runaway slave was written by St. Paul in quite a private way and for a private purpose, just as you in these days might write such a letter to a gentleman in whom you were interested. All the other Epistles written by St. Paul, such as the Romans, or the Corinthians, or the Ephesians, are about great and important Christian truths or doctrines, and we have to follow him very attentively to be able to understand all his reasoning about these important spiritual matters. But when we turn to this Epistle or Letter to Philemon, it is about nothing more than a runaway slave; and because it does not contain anything about those great spiritual principles of which all the other Epistles are full, the people who lived some three or four hundred years after St. Paul said that it could not possibly have been written by the Great Apostle himself, because, said they, St. Paul was much too great a man to concern himself about so trivial a matter as a runaway slave. It seems that we might just as well say that the incident of Jesus taking the children in His arms cannot be true, because Jesus was far too great to concern Himself about the children. We, in these days, however, see the greatness of the character of Jesus in the fact that He did concern Himself about the children, and so in St. Paul's letter about this runaway slave we see proofs of the Apostle's greatness, and of the fact that he had caught much of the spirit of Jesus.

I. Let me tell you now something about the slaves in those days. The conditions under which we live are so different that we can hardly form any idea of the state in which those slaves existed. So many slaves were there, that in one province, it is said, there were three slaves to one free man. Some masters owned ten or even twenty thousand slaves; and there is in existence now the will of one of the masters of those times in which between four and five thousand slaves are willed away. These slaves had no rights; they were simply, as it was termed in those times, live implements. If a slave stole from his master, or ran away, he could be scourged or crucified as the master pleased. About the time when St. Paul was writing of this runaway slave, a Roman senator had been slain by one of his slaves in a fit of anger, and the law demanded that all the slaves under the same roof at the time should be put to death, the innocent with the guilty. There were as many as four hundred. You say, surely these were not all put to death for the offence of one man? They were, and when some of the more humane people rose against such cruelty, the Roman Senate sent an army of soldiers to put them down, because, as one of the senators said, 'The slaves must be held down by fear'; and another said, 'As though heaven cared for slaves'.

II. Philemon had a slave whose name was Onesimus. Now this Onesimus, who was Philemon's slave, one day stole something from his master and ran away. That he was very determined about what he did we can tell by the great distance he travelled. He resolved not to stay in hiding in that neighbourhood, but to make his way to the world's great centre, the wonderful city of Rome, which was the London of those ancient times. There he could mix with the crowds of men and not be known; there he could gain a living for himself, and be free from the fear of discovery.

Now comes a very remarkable thing. Paul the Apostle is in Rome, preaching the Gospel. Onesimus hears that the Apostle is here, or, it may be, comes across him with a crowd about him, even though at that time the Apostle was a prisoner, for he was still permitted to reside in his own hired house. Perhaps, if St. Paul did visit Colosse when he was at Ephesus, Onesimus saw and heard him, and it may be with a desire to get a glimpse of him again, and to hear once more something of the new strange Gospel he was preaching, he stands and listens in the crowd. But whatever it was that brought him under the influence of the Apostle, the fact remains that just as the truth of the Gospel made its way to the heart of his master Philemon, so that truth makes its way to the heart of the slave Onesimus; it may be that he was pricked in conscience at the remembrance of his theft, or, perhaps, he had had so hard a time in getting to Rome that he was worn out with his journey, and, wretched in heart and mind, longed after the peace, the joy, and the salvation through Jesus Christ.

How tenderly St. Paul received him, and how interestedly he entered into his life, this beautiful letter to Philemon tells us.

Bearing this letter, Onesimus makes his way back over those hundreds of miles from Rome to Colossæ. How his heart would beat the nearer he got to the city! how he would wonder whether the letter would have the desired effect upon his master! And then as he came through streets well known to him, and saw again faces so familiar, the news would hasten on before him, the slave Onesimus has returned! and all would wonder what this quiet but strange return of his own will could mean. At last, like the Prodigal, with broken words upon his lips, he would give the letter of Paul the aged to his master. And the wonder of it all, almost beyond belief, and the joy of it all, to so good a Christian as we can believe Philemon was, would prompt a welcome so ready and forgiving, that, had the Apostle himself been present, he would have been more than satisfied. The runaway slave returned a brother in the Lord.—JOHN EAMES, Sermons to Boys and Girls, p. 9.

PHILEMON 16.

ROWLAND HILL preached a funeral sermon upon his own coachman. He said in his sermon what a good man the coachman had been to him for thirty years. He had been an honest, upright man, a good, religious man, and an excellent servant to him. But he was once a highway robber! I will tell you how Rowland Hill became acquainted with him. He attacked him when he was going along the road. 'I was not frightened,' said Rowland Hill, 'I talked kindly to him. I said, "Why are you a robber? Why do you follow this dishonourable pursuit?" "Well, sir," said he, "I am out of place. I am miserable. I have no money. I am driven to despair."' Rowland Hill said, 'Call upon me to-morrow morning'. He did. And there and then Rowland Hill took him as his coachman. For thirty years this man served him faithfully as coachman, though he once attacked him as a highway robber. So you see, though we may have stolen, we may again become useful members of society—only we must do right things.—JAMES VAUGHAN.

THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS

WHAT WILL MY CAPTAIN SAY?

'The Captain of their salvation.'—HEBREWS II. 10.

FOUR years ago last April (1908) an American liner, the St. Paul, had left the docks at Southampton and was making her way in a blizzard down the Solent. She was on her outward voyage to New York. Coming up the Solent at the same time was a cruiser belonging to the British Navy named the Gladiator. She had left Portland that morning with two hundred and fifty men on board, who were all happy in the anticipation of their return to Portsmouth. Both vessels were enveloped in a blinding snowstorm. It is said that the eyes of the men on the look-out could barely distinguish objects a yard or two ahead, and though both vessels were blowing their sirens their sound was lost in the howling and shrieking of the wind. Neither vessel knew of the other's approach. Suddenly the grey hull of the warship loomed up, broadside on, just in front of the bows of the liner. The engines were immediately stopped, but it was too late, and the St. Paul drove straight on to the doomed cruiser and buried her stem deep in the armoured vessel. The crash was terrific. For a few moments the two ships remained locked together and the liner seemed to be carrying the warship forward impaled on her bows. The passengers on the decks of the St. Paul, which were higher than those of the Gladiator, could see the white set faces of the blue-jackets on the doomed vessel. Yet in these thrilling and critical moments the coolness, the courage, and the heroism of British seamen were magnificently displayed. But no courage or heroism could prevent the awful results which followed directly the vessels parted. The waters poured through the huge hole torn in the side of the warship and in a few moments she sank in the stormy waters. Happily many got to the land which was not far distant, but some thirty found a watery grave there that day.

In connection with this sad disaster there is recorded an incident of great interest. As the bow of the St. Paul was momentarily locked in the wreckage of the cruiser's hull, some of the blue-jackets climbed up over on to the deck of the liner. One of them, as soon as he had planted his feet on the bow of the St. Paul, saluted the captain of that vessel, and for a moment seemed dazed by the experience. Rapidly recovering himself, he saluted again. Then looking round he seemed to realise his position and what he had done and gasped out, 'Oh, my God, what have I done? What will my captain say?' Then he leaped over the side of the vessel again, down on to the decks of the sinking cruiser, and was seen no more.

Often I have wondered whether he was one of those who were saved, or whether he went down with the vessel. It is an incident one can never forget. Again and again those words ring in my ears and come to my lips: 'Oh, my God, what have I done? What will my captain say?'

You see, the sailor suddenly realised that he had deserted the post of duty. He saw in a moment that he had been selfish in thinking of his own safety alone. He had not troubled to see if he could help to save the ship or assist in saving others. In this moment of great need he had done nothing but save himself, and he was ashamed. For the moment he had forgotten his training, his duty, his fellow-seamen and his captain. He had not upheld the honour of the British seamen, and as it all suddenly came to mind he was ashamed of himself and felt that his captain would be ashamed of him too. Who cannot imagine the feeling with which he uttered those words, 'What have I done? What will my captain say?'

'The Captain of our Salvation,' says the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews in speaking of our Lord Jesus Christ. Yes, He is our great Captain, and we stand much in the same relationship to Him as that in which the sailor on the Gladiator stood to the captain of his vessel. There are many other ways in which to think of our Lord, but it is of that way I wish to think now. He is our Captain; we are His Christian soldiers. It is for Him to command; it is for us to obey. There can be no proper relationship between us and our Lord except there is the true spirit of loyalty and obedience in us. There is no greater crime or disgrace in the British Army and Navy than to refuse to obey the command of an officer. All have to be obedient from the lowest to the highest or the army and navy might as well be disbanded at once. Without this same spirit of obedience in Christ's soldiers His warfare against evil cannot be successfully carried on in the world.

You are a soldier of the Great Captain Jesus Christ. Try everything which relates to your life by this same question, 'What will my Captain say?' When you forget your duty in thought only for yourself ask, 'What will my Captain say?' When you have played the coward's part and were not brave for Christ's sake—when you have been ashamed of your Christian principles and were silent when you ought to have spoken—when you have been wilful and unkind—when, like the disciples, you have deserted your Lord and Master and left Him alone, then ask yourself, 'What will my Captain say?' And perhaps the thought of His disappointment and sorrow will help you to retrieve your character and face your duty even as a similar thought did the sailor upon the ship.—JOHN EAMES, The Shattered Temple, p. 162.

WHAT FAITH SEES

'Now faith is the evidence of things not seen.'—HEBREWS XI. 1.

I. Faith Sees through her Glass an Unseen God.—No man hath seen God at any time. Other kings have been seen, but not 'the King immortal, eternal, invisible'. Him 'no eye hath seen or can see'. Yet faith has no doubt that God is.

You will not find that anywhere God proves by an argument that He exists. His way of proving His being is by showing Himself, though not to the eye. He does so in various ways, and where there is capacity to perceive His presence, there is faith of it. A father, to his children that can look at him, does not need to prove by an argument that he is their father, if their eye is sound. But I well remember a little child, whose brain in disease was touched and reeling, that did not know her own father—thought him a stranger, and shrank from him when he stood near. Neither would his voice assure her; he said, I am papa, but she would not believe him, and was afraid of one to whose bosom she was accustomed to cling as her refuge and joy. He reasoned with her in his distress not to be known by his child, but it was useless arguing. The disease had to be cured first, and when it fled no argument was needed. The father's face was enough. I knew a little boy that on the day he died, restored for a short hour from dark stupor, was fondly asked, Who is this? and who is this? The soft answer, in failing breath, that came with a sweet smile, 'Papa, mamma,' can never be forgotten. To see was to know. And I have thought when that boy's soul went to heaven, as I believe it did, supposing his angel-guide to ask him of the Saviour, Who is He? he would know Him at once—to see with the eye of a pure spirit would be enough—and the answer would come in the radiant joy of immortality—'It is Jesus, my Lord and my God!'

II. Faith Sees with her Glass an Unseen Saviour.—Christ Jesus has not always been unseen. He was once on earth, and people saw His face, and heard His voice, as we hear each other. He was once a little child, like yourselves. He grew up, as you grow. He went to church. He walked, He sailed, He rode, He sat at table, He ate, He slept. He took children in His arms. He healed sicknesses with a word and a touch. He was crowned with thorns. He was nailed to a tree. He was buried. He rose, and was seen again. He went up to glory, and His disciples saw Him as He went up through the air. But since that, with two or three exceptions, nobody on earth has seen Him. But hundreds and thousands believe as firmly as if they had been with Him in the days of His flesh that He was once here. Do you so believe?

Christ Jesus is still seen in heaven. After His ascension, you recollect that Stephen said he saw Him through the open skies. You remember also that He met Saul of Tarsus on the road to Damascus, and looked on him, and spoke to him, and changed his heart. You have read the description John gives of Him when he saw Him in vision in the Isle of Patmos. At these times Jesus came out through the blue veil behind which He passed away. But in the world beyond the veil they always see Him. The angels do. Departed saints do. Your pious friends that have gone to heaven do. I do not know how this is. I cannot tell how spirits see. But there is some way in which souls in heaven are in Christ's presence, different from the way they enjoyed it on earth. For Paul, as you know, says of himself, that he was in a strait betwixt two; not knowing whether to prefer living or dying; he knew that his living was needful for the Church, but had 'a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better'.

III. Faith Sees through its Glass an Unseen Judgment.—This is unseen, because future. It will be seen. And such a sight it will be as was never seen before. Let me just try and tell you what will be seen on that great day, when Christ comes 'the second time' to visit our world. I shall say nothing but what the Bible tells us.

Jesus will 'come in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory'. At his face the heavens and the earth will flee away. The sun and moon will grow dark, as if turned into sackcloth and blood. Then a trumpet, exceeding loud, like a thousand thunders, shall be blown, and the sound will go down into the deeps of graves, and the depths of sea. And the dead shall rise from every place where the dust of men is sleeping; some from lonely tombs in moors, and deserts, and mountain-sides, and some from crowded churchyards, and some from the bottom of the ocean. And all the living on earth will be changed, as quickly as your eyelids twinkle. Then angels will be seen flying to and fro in every direction, gathering Christ's people together, and separating them from the wicked. Two companies will be made, one very happy and shining; one very miserable and dark. They will be brought before a great white throne, high up in the sky. On the throne the Saviour will be seated, angels round about Him, and all His person burning with indescribable glory. Then the air will take fire, and the earth, and the sea, and will all burn together, crackling and crashing in one tremendous flame. And when the Judge has spoken to the righteous, and to the wicked, an awful tempest of wrath will drive away the enemies of Christ into the punishment they deserve, and Jesus will go up with His saints into the presence of His Father, to dwell with them there for ever and ever.

IV. Faith Sees with its Glass an Unseen Hell.—I wish I did not need to put this head into my sermon. I wish faith's glass could find nothing in the direction of the outer darkness. But hell is revealed in the Bible as surely as heaven is. And very awful words are spoken about it. It is said to be a lake that burneth with fire and brimstone. What a dreadful representation! If you had stood where Abraham stood on the morning after Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed with fiery storms, it would have been terrible to see the whole plain smouldering and smoking like a furnace. Outside the city of Jerusalem there was a valley which, after the days of Isaiah, became a place for collecting all kinds of refuse and off-scourings, and consuming them with fire. Consequently the whole place was filthy and disgusting, with fires always burning in different spots, sending up smoke by day, and flaring in the gloom of night. It was called Tophet and Gehenna; and this last is the New Testament name for hell. Now, do not mistake me. I do not say that hell is such a place. But these things are what the Bible uses to be a figure of the terrors of hell. For it is fire that 'is not quenched'. And it is a 'worm that never dies'. It is 'everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and the glory of His power'. It is said to be in 'the outer darkness'—darkness outside the line which the rays of the most distant sun reach—

Beyond the bounds of light, and life, and love.

There are in it 'weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth'. Oh, children! flee, flee from the wrath to come!

Blessed be God, there is another world which faith looks to as her own. So I remark:—

V. Faith Sees with its Glass an Unseen Heaven.—There are seen heavens—the airy, cloudy firmament, the starry skies. But beyond them is another—the heaven of heavens, the home of God.

I will tell you some things about that heaven taught us in the Bible. It is a beautiful place. Sometimes it is called paradise, a pleasure-ground around the King's palace; and you may be sure that it is richer and more beautiful than the garden of Eden itself. Sometimes it is called a city; and then it has jewelled foundations, and golden streets, and jasper walls, and a light that leaves no need of sun, or moon, or lamp to shine in it. Sometimes it is called a house; and then it is God's house, with a multitude of mansions furnished and prepared for his sons to dwell in. It is a holy place. There are no bad men in it, and no bad thoughts and feelings in anyone's heart. Holy angels stay there. The holy Jesus is there. It is full of God. It is also a happy place. You might search as long as you pleased, you would not find a tear in it, for God 'shall wipe away tears from all faces'. You would never hear a sigh of sorrow there, for 'sorrow and sighing shall flee away'. You would never meet a sick person, for 'the inhabitant of the land shall no more say, I am sick: for the people that dwell therein are forgiven their iniquities'. You could never find a grave in it, for there 'shall be no more death'. Heaven is a large place, moreover. There are many mansions in Christ's Father's house, and many sons of glory already there, and many more on the way. There is room in it for you. Heaven is a busy place. There is none idle in it. They serve God day and night in His Temple—thinking of Him, praising Him, doing His work. And it is a sure place. That heaven shall never pass away. The throne of God is in it, and it endures for ever. The new Jerusalem is an abiding city. All the cities of earth decay. Nineveh, Babylon, Tyre have all perished; and Rome, Paris, London must, at least, be destroyed with the earth; even God's own city of old, his beloved Salem, cannot remain; but the heavenly city of peace is founded for immortality.—J. EDMOND, The Children's Church at Home, p. 199.

ON GIVING PLEASURE TO GOD

'He pleased God.'—HEBREWS XI. 5.

At the beginning of a new year it is good to ask, whether there is any thought we can receive into our hearts which will help us to lead better lives than we lived before.

There is one thought which very few have opened their hearts to, which yet is one of the best thoughts we can think. It is the thought that we have been made, and are kept in life, that we should give pleasure to God.

It will make a great difference in our lives when, instead of doing things to please ourselves, or our companions, we do everything to please God.

I once read a poem, by Mary Howitt, in which this good thought is put into the lips of a very little child. He was called Willie. One day Willie's mamma saw him sitting very silent in the sunlight, with all the men and women and the beasts and birds of his Noah's ark set out in a row. 'What are you thinking about, Willie?' said his mamma. Willie answering, said:—

You know that God loves little children,
And likes them to love Him the same;
So I've set out my Noah's Ark creatures,
The great savage beasts and the tame,—
I've set them all out in the sunshine,
Where I think they are plainest to see,
Because I would give Him some pleasure
Who gives so much pleasure to me.

It is true that it is only a very little child who would think of giving God pleasure in that way. But although the way of doing the good thing is a little child's way, the thing itself is good to do.

It is good for everybody to try to give God pleasure.

There was a great prophet in the world once, in the days before the ark, who tried to do this, and who did it all the days of his life. It was the prophet Enoch. At the end of his life, the story of his life told by God Himself was this: 'He pleased God'. Not himself, not his friends, but God. I have tried to see what it was in his life that gave pleasure to God, and I find it was this, that 'He walked with God'. Now you know why it is you walk with some young people and not with others. It is because you know them and love them, and know that they love you. Enoch knew all that about God. He knew that God loved him and he loved to be in God's company, and to have God near to him in everything he did. 'He walked with God': in the very way God walked—the way of truth and right. 'He walked with God': he had God for his friend, and told him by prayer all that was in his heart. 'He walked with God': he went about with God doing good, helping the helpless and trying to bring people to God. Every day he would say to himself, 'How can I please God to-day?' And day by day he kept doing the will of God, and walking out and in with God for his friend.

But there was a greater than Enoch who pleased God. You remember this is the very thing which the voice from heaven said of Jesus: 'This is My beloved Son in Whom I am well pleased'. And God was well pleased with Jesus. He began to be pleased with Him even when He was a child. It is said that Jesus, when He was a little boy at Nazareth, 'grew in favour both with God and man'. Could anything better ever be said of a child's life? To be in favour with God! To have God well pleased with you! That is to be like Jesus Himself. And you may really be like Jesus in this very thing if you do as He did. He set Himself so to give pleasure to God that it became His meat and His drink to do God's will.

A little girl came one day to the late Charles Kingsley, and said: 'Dear Mr. Kingsley, give me a song'. And Mr. Kingsley, who had a great love for children, wrote this song for her:—

Be good, sweet maid, and let who will be clever;
Do noble things, not dream them, all day long;
And so make life, death, and that vast for ever,
One grand, and sweet song.

It is a great pleasure to God when His children do noble things. But I wonder if the little girl for whom this song was written knew—I wonder if you know—what the noblest thing ever done on this earth was! It was dying on a cross. It was Jesus laying down His life to save the world. Nothing else gave such pleasure to God as this. Jesus died to let God's love be known. He died that this love might shine in upon sad hearts and sorrow-filled homes; and that the poor, and the heavy laden, and those who are out of the right way, like the prodigal in the parable, might be drawn by it to God.

To help children to be like Jesus in this, some things are mentioned in the Bible which give pleasure to God. It is a great pleasure to Him to see His children sharing the good things He has given them—food, or clothes, or knowledge, or happiness—with those who have none. That was the kind of sacrifice which Jesus made. He gave up the life which His Father had given Him that all the world might share it. With such sacrifices God is well pleased. It is a great pleasure to God, also, when children honour and obey their parents. Jesus did that. One of His last thoughts on the cross was to make provision for the honour and welfare of His mother Mary when He was gone. But the greatest thing of all in giving pleasure to God is love. It is impossible to please Him unless there be some knowledge of His love in our hearts, and some love to Him in return.

The heart of Jesus was filled with both that knowledge and this love. And all who wish to please God as Jesus did, and know these ways of doing it, will earnestly try to follow them.

But this leads me to tell you what is the first way of coming into this life of giving pleasure to God. It is a way so simple that a very little child can understand it. It is just letting God please you. Yes, that was the secret of the life which the Lord Jesus lived. He began by letting His Father in heaven please Him. The desire of God is to give pleasure to His children. There is a Psalm which speaks of God's ways with His children, where it is said: 'Thou shalt make them drink out of the river of Thy pleasures'. And God sets Himself to give us this very pleasure. He gives us the very things to be pleased with which please Himself—the river of His own pleasures. This is the river of which it is said in another Psalm 'it maketh glad the city of God'. And this river which maketh glad the city of God, and is the river of God's own pleasures, is nothing other than the love which is in Jesus Christ, which brought him to die for us, and with which God is ever well pleased. This is the way in which God works when He is working in us to bring us to will and to do his good pleasure. He begins by getting us to be pleased with the Son in whom He Himself is pleased. It is the same as if He said, 'See, this is He on whom My love is ever resting, in whom I have endless joy. Take pleasure in Him.' And whoever is brought by God's great kindness to be pleased with Jesus and with the things in Him with which God is pleased—and these things are love and mercy and truth—begins in that very pleasure to give pleasure to God.

To be pleased with Jesus is a child's first step in the life of giving pleasure to God.

Now I give you this good thought. I ask you to admit it into your hearts. I advise you to take it for the rule of your lives. Say in your own heart to God, 'O my Father! from this time forth I will try to give pleasure to Thee'.

In the fairy stories the young prince or princess who is setting out in the world always meets a kind fairy who gives a cap, or a ring, or a flower, or a ball, which must never be let go or lost, and it will be help by the way. But this which I am offering you is a better gift than any fairy could give. This will be better than wishing-cap or ring, better than gold or silver. The child who shall say, 'I will from this day live to please God,' will live a happy, good life. And at the end God will tell the same thing about the life of that child as He told about Enoch's and Christ's. He will say, 'I have been well pleased with this child'.

NICOLAS HERMAN

'He endured, as seeing Him Who is invisible.'—

HEBREWS XI, 27.

I. ABOUT two hundred years ago there was living in the city of Paris an old man who was so holy, and in his holiness so happy, that people came to him from far and near to learn the secret of his life.

He lived in a great house with a company of religious men. Among those men his place was a very lowly one. He was their cook, and it was down in the kitchen of their great house that he had to spend his days.

For more than forty years this man lived in that house doing this lowly service. And through all those years, the one desire and joy of his heart was to be always with God, and to do nothing, say nothing, and think nothing which might be displeasing to Him.

His name in his youth was Nicolas Herman, but in his old age, Brother Lawrence. He was born in Lorraine near the beginning of the seventeenth century. His parents were too poor to give him much schooling, and although, in some way or other, he learned to read, and in his old age could write a sensible letter, he remained through life without the learning which you to whom I am speaking receive at school.

As a boy he was very uncouth and very stupid. He was always doing awkward things. Nobody who saw him then could have foretold that he would one day cease to be awkward and become careful and wise and helpful. It is only God who can tell from the outside of a boy what sort of man he will become.

But although Nicolas was poor and unlearned, and in all his movements ungainly and awkward, he had, even as a boy, a gentle heart. And one day this gentleness showed itself in a very wonderful way. It was a day in winter. Everything was cold and bleak and bare. On this particular day Nicolas, walking about, happened to come upon a tree that was leafless. Something drew him to look at the tree, and as he stood before it, looking, the thought came into his mind that that very tree, bare and dead though it seemed at the time, would soon be all covered with leaves, with bloom, and by and by with fruit. And there came to him, in the very heart of this thought, the thought of God. He seemed to see at a glance that before all these changes could take place, God must be present to work them. Only God, working on the very spot, could bring back life to the dead tree. His soul at that moment caught sight of the great truth that God is everywhere present. He said to himself, 'He is here, on this very spot'. He learned that day that God was not a God far off, but near. He was so near that He would be present to cover that tree once more with leaves. Standing before that tree, he saw that he was standing in the very presence of God. This nearness and presence of God became one of the thoughts of his soul.

In a dim way at first, no doubt, but more and more clearly as years went on, he saw God everywhere. From that day onward he lived as one who had been admitted, for one happy moment at least, into the presence of God. And I like to think that as he turned his steps homeward that day, the poor, untaught, and awkward boy, whom everybody was already trying to scold into less stupid ways, may have carried this new thought like a new joy in his heart, and said to himself, 'Poor and stupid though I be, God is near me; and lowly though my father's cot is, God is there'.

This was the beginning of religion in his life, but not yet of happiness. Nicolas had a long way to go and many things to learn and suffer before the happy years of his life began. A blessed thought had been dropped by the Holy Spirit into his soul. But it was as yet like a tiny seed which has neither root nor stem. The happiness which is in a holy life does not spring up in a day. Sometimes it takes years to grow, and often it has to be watered by our tears. At any rate that was the case with Nicolas Herman. He was like the man spoken of in one of the Psalms, who went forth weeping bearing precious seed. But it was to be a long time before he came back rejoicing with the fruit.

He was only eighteen years of age when he saw the vision of God's presence in the tree. After that he had to become a soldier; and when he was set free from being a soldier, he became a footman in a private family. He was still unhandy in his ways. His master said of him that he was a great clumsy fellow, who broke everything he was set to carry.

II. But this was only the outside of his life. All this awkwardness and stupidity, this want of handiness in doing things, was a sincere grief to Nicolas. He did earnestly wish to have his faults corrected. He was willing to submit to any suffering by which his awkwardness should be put away. And now, being a man, and being very earnest about leading a right life, he began to look about for the best means of having his faults corrected, and he resolved at last that he should apply for admission to the house of the Barefooted Carmelites. There, he thought, I shall be taken to task, and if I fail to do well I shall be punished. And I am content to be punished until my faults are removed. The brethren consented to receive him into their kitchen and give him work as cook.

Now it was a custom with those brethren, before receiving any new member into their company, to put him upon trial for a time; and during that time the person wishing to become a brother was put under instruction for his soul. This was a very precious time for Nicolas. He got time to think. But this at first brought him into new trouble. When he came to think about himself he found that much more needed to be put right in him besides his awkward ways. The thought that he was in God's presence led him to ask himself what sort of object he must appear in the eyes of the holy God. And then his heart sank within him. He saw that he was a poor sin-laden man, not worthy of a single glance from God. He recalled evil words he had spoken and evil deeds he had done, and thought that God, as the just Judge, could have no choice but to banish him for ever from His presence.

III. But by and by—his history does not tell either in what manner or at what precise time—the Spirit of God directed him to look to the Cross and the blood of Jesus. He then saw that the holy God is a Saviour as much as a Judge, and that He is full of love; that He gave His son to die for sinners, and that there is cleansing for all sin in the blood which Jesus shed. Nicolas was slow to believe that there could be cleansing for him. For four long years he feared that he should be shut out from God's presence at last. And for six years longer doubts of his salvation came back upon him from time to time. But all the while there was this fine resolution in his heart: whether he was to be saved, or shut out from salvation, he resolved to do the thing that was right. 'Whatever becomes of me,' he said, 'whether I be lost or saved, I will continue to act purely for the love of God. I shall have this good at least, that till death I shall have done all that is in me to love Him.'

But God did not leave him in this uncertainty. He came to his help, as He always does to those who are in earnest about their salvation. He brought him out of all his fears and into perfect happiness and peace, and He worked so great a change upon him also that all his awkwardness came to an end.

Although Nicolas never ceased to think meanly of himself, or to look upon himself otherwise than as a sinner, his whole view of God was changed. Instead of seeing Him as a judge about to punish a criminal at His feet, he saw Him as a gracious King who had come down from His throne to serve him. 'This King,' he said, 'full of mercy and goodness, very far from chastising me, embraces me with love, makes me eat at His table, serves me with His own hands, and gives me the key of His treasures.'

IV. After that the principal thing in Herman which helped him to live a happy life was the lesson he learned in his boyhood, when he stood before the leafless tree. A thought entered his soul that day which never left him. It was the thought that God is everywhere present. It was, as I said before, a very tiny thought for him at the first, a mere little seed of thought. But when the Holy Spirit took him in after years and set him before the tree on which the Lord Jesus died, the thought grew and spread and filled his whole soul. He saw then that if God must be present to cover a dead tree with leaves and fruit, He must much more be present when a dead soul, like his own, was to be changed into a living one. A strong feeling took possession of him that he was always in the presence of God, and a feeling not less strong that it was his duty continually to remember that fact. And to this duty he set himself. Day by day, and every hour of the day, he said to his soul: 'Soul, thou art in the presence of God thy King'. At the beginning of his religious life, he spent the hours appointed for private prayer in forming the habit of remembering this presence. He strengthened the habit by thinking often of God's goodness and mercy and nearness. If business took his soul away from the thought for a little, he sought a fresh remembrance of it from God. At length it came to be natural to him to feel that he was every moment in the Divine presence. He was so much under this feeling that his prayers were like conversations with one who was in the same room with him; and sometimes like a joyful sense of that presence, as if his soul were telling its wants by simply looking into the face of God. At such times he was insensible to everything but the love of God. His highest joy was to feel himself in the presence of that love. It was a joy so sweet that he likened it to the joy of an infant at its mother's breast. Indeed, he seemed to himself sometimes to be just an infant drinking happiness out of the bosom of God, so inexpressible was the sweetness he tasted in the presence of his Lord.

V. Another thing in Nicolas which made his life a happy one was his putting God's will always before his own.

He had set his heart on being like the Friend in whose presence he so much loved to be. And he had learned that the nearest and best way to this likeness was to let this Divine Friend rule him in everything. So he placed himself altogether under the will of God. He gave up everything to God that God might be everything in his life. He gave himself. He gave body and soul. He gave will and wish. He kept nothing back.

It was not easy to do this at first. But he prayed for help. And all difficulty came to an end. And it became both easy and pleasant, until at last, next to the joy of being in the presence of his Divine Friend, was the joy of giving up everything for that Friend's sake.

His life, after that, was a life of obedience to God. At every step in life, and in all things—in things small as well as great—in things painful as well as pleasant, he said to God, 'Thy will, and not mine, be done'. He liked to remember how much God had given up for him. He liked to fill his soul with the thought that Jesus gave His life to redeem him. And he looked upon himself, in consequence, as one that belonged to God. 'I am not my own, but God's,' he said; 'and I will think no thought, I will speak no word, I will do no act except as God allows me.'

And this was his life. His soul's ear was bent to listen for the commands of God. His greatest joy was in fulfilling these commands. He would do no action and suffer no thought which he knew to be contrary to them. His whole endeavour was to let God work His will in him. He felt himself so entirely in the hands of God, to do, or to suffer, as it might please Him, that he sometimes likened himself to a block of stone which a sculptor was carving into a statue. God who loved him was this sculptor. And Nicolas would present himself as such a stone before God, and say, 'O my best Friend, my Maker, my Lord, shape me into Thine own image: make me entirely like Thyself'.

VI. A great secret in the happiness of Nicolas was the close connection he kept up between his religion and his daily tasks.

He took his religion with him into the kitchen. He could not bear the error of some that religion was only for the church, and for religious meetings. Religion and business with Nicolas were not two things, but one. He did all the work of a cook as the servant of God and out of love to God. And in the very humblest part of his duties he tried to give pleasure to God. Like the Apostle who said, 'Whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God,' Nicolas felt that whether he was cooking in the kitchen, or worshipping in a church, he had all the same to glorify God.

To this old man the kitchen was as holy a place as a church. He was with God there! Daily he had sweet talk with Him as he went about his humble duties. And the fireside, with its pots and pans, and with its heats and smells, became like a gate of heaven unto his soul.

And this was the more beautiful in him because naturally he did not like the work of the kitchen. But he put his dislike of the work aside and did it joyfully out of love to God. He began every part of his duties with silent prayer. As the work went forward he would lift up his heart again in prayer. And when it was finished he would give thanks to God for helping him. Or, if he had failed, he would ask God to pardon him. In this way his distasteful work became a joy to him, and easy. And it was so mixed up with prayer that his soul was more united to God amid the tasks of the kitchen than when he was in his private room.

Nicolas believed that a holy life did not depend upon finding some high and heavenly kind of work to do; but in doing common work, the work of every day, for the love of God. It is a holy life, he held, to do for God's sake the things we commonly do for our own. He put great stress on the doing of little things to God. He used often to say that Christians ought never to weary in doing little services for His sake. 'It is not the greatness of the work which God regards,' he would say, 'it is the love with which it is performed.'

A friend who saw him at his work in the kitchen has borne witness how truly it was work for God. 'His very countenance was edifying. There was such a sweet and calm devotion appearing in it as could not fail to affect the beholders. In the greatest hurry he still preserved his heavenly-mindedness. He was never hasty nor loitering, but did each thing in its season, with an even uninterrupted composure and tranquillity of spirit.'

Nicolas himself said, 'The time of business does not with me differ from the time of prayer; and in the noise and clatter of my kitchen, while several persons are at the same time calling for different things, I possess God in as great tranquillity as if I were upon my knees at the blessed sacrament.'

VII. There were many other things in this life which helped to make it a happy one, which I should be glad to tell about, but I must content myself with one more.

Nicolas had such perfect faith in God that when he brought any difficulty before Him in prayer, when he came with some burden, or sorrow, or care, he really left it with God. After laying it on God, he did not suffer it to trouble him more. And it was the same with his sins. When he had once asked God to forgive him for some particular sin, he left the sin with God, and believed that he was forgiven, and went on to do the next duty on his path. In this way he had an almost unbroken peace and joy of mind.

To people who came to ask him about the way of happiness, he was accustomed to say: 'Keep the thought of the Presence of God ever in your hearts; and give yourselves entirely to the study of His love, and you will come to perfect happiness. The more you know of His love, the more you will wish to know; and the greater your knowledge is, so much deeper will be your love, and so much greater your desire to be continually in His company. Cast everything out of your hearts that God may have the whole room to Himself. And when God has taken up His abode there, trust Him in everything to the end of your lives.'

Writing some advices of this sort when he was about eighty years of age, he added, 'I hope from God's mercy the favour to see Him in a few days'. And within a few days he went home to be with God for ever.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD.

WARNING AGAINST DISCONTENT

'Be content with such things as ye have.'—HEBREWS XIII. 5.

THE subject we have now to consider is—the Bible warning against discontent. And I wish to speak of three good reasons why we should learn to mind this warning,

I. We ought to Mind it, in the First Place, 'for our own Comfort'.—Now suppose that you have a long walk to take every day, but you have a thorn run into your foot, or a sharp stone in your shoe—could you have any comfort in taking that daily walk? Certainly not. If you wished to walk with any comfort, the first thing for you to do would be to take off your shoe, and throw away the sharp stone that was in it; and then to have that thorn taken out of your foot. You never could have the least comfort in walking till this was done. But a feeling of discontent in our minds is just like that thorn in the foot, or that stone in the shoe. It will take away from us all the comfort we might have, as we go on in the walk of our daily duties.

And if we wish to have any comfort ourselves, in what we have to do, we must get rid of this feeling of discontent from our own minds. A discontented person can have no comfort in anything.

Our first illustration may be called, 'The fable of the discontented bittern'.

The bittern is a large bird with a long neck and long legs that lives in swamps. The fable says that a bittern was discontented with his condition. He had got tired of living in swamps, and eating frogs and worms and all sorts of reptiles. He wanted to live in the orchard like a robin, and be a favourite with everybody. 'I guess bitterns can sing as well as robins,' he said to himself one day, 'and I have no notion of being confined to a marsh, and catching fever and ague all my days.' So he started for the orchard, partly flying and running as fast as he could go. When he got there he began at once to build him a nest, like the robin, on the branch of an apple tree. The next day, as he was busy with this work, a farmer from a cottage near by saw him. He got his gun and shot him. The shot did not kill him, but it broke his wing. Then he was glad to hobble back to his old home in the swamp, and to eating frogs and worms again. His discontent had taken away all his comfort. But the lesson he learned that day took away his discontent, and made him satisfied that the position which God had chosen for him was better than any that he could choose for himself.

Here is a short story about a good bishop who had learned to mind this warning about discontent, and the comfort which it gave him.

This good man had passed through many great trials; but he was never heard to complain in passing through them. He was always contented and cheerful. An intimate friend of his, who had often admired his calm, happy temper, and who felt as if he would like very much to imitate his example, asked him one day if he would tell him the secret of the quiet, contented spirit which he always had.

'Yes,' said the bishop, 'I will gladly tell you my secret. It consists in nothing more than making a right use of my eyes.'

'Please tell me what you mean by this.'

'Certainly,' said the bishop, 'I mean just this. When I meet with any trial I first of all look up to heaven, and remember that my chief business in life is to get there. Then I look down upon the earth, and think how small a space I shall need in it when I die and come to be buried; and then I look round in the world, and think how many people there are who have more cause to be unhappy than I have. And in this way I learn the Bible lesson—"Be content with such things as ye have".'

II. The Second Reason why we Ought to Mind this is 'for the Comfort of Others'.—The Apostle Paul teaches us that our duty as Christians is—'not to please ourselves, but to please our neighbours, for their good to edification' (Rom. xv. 1, 2). This means that we are to try and please those about us, not by doing anything that is wrong, but by setting them a good example, and helping them on in the way to heaven. But there is no better way in which we can do this than by first learning the lesson of contentment ourselves, and then by our example helping others to learn it too.

Suppose that you sit down some afternoon to study your school lesson for the next morning. Outside of the house, under the window of the room in which you are studying, a cross, ill-natured dog is sitting. He is yelling and howling and barking all the time.

Would that be any help, or comfort, to you in studying your lesson? Not at all. On the contrary it would be such a trouble and discomfort to you that you would be ready to shut up your book and say, 'Well, I must drive away that noisy dog, or I never can learn my lesson'.

And then suppose that there was a tree near the window of the room in which you were studying, and suppose that a little bird should perch himself on one of the branches of the tree, and should warble forth his sweet songs; what a comfort that would be to you! You would feel that the little fellow was a real help to you in learning your lessons. Now, if we give way to an ugly discontented spirit, then, like the barking dog under the window, we shall only be a plague and a trial to those about us. But if we learn the lesson of contentment, and have a quiet, gentle spirit, then like the singing bird we shall be real comforts to our friends, and they will be always glad to have us near them.

John Wesley, the founder of the Methodist Church, used to say, 'I dare no more fret, than curse or swear'. A friend of his, who was intimately connected with him for a large portion of his life, in speaking of him after his death, said, 'I never saw him fretful or discontented under any of his trials. And to be in the company of persons of this spirit always occasioned him great discomfort and trouble. He said one day, "To have persons around me, murmuring and fretting at everything that happens, is like tearing the flesh from my bones. I know that God sits upon His throne ruling all things. With this thought in my mind, and the grace of God in my heart, I may well learn "To be content with such things as I have".' Good Mr. Wesley was minding the Bible warning against discontent when he used these words, and was setting a good example for us all to follow. What a blessed thing it would be if all Christians would try to follow his example.

III. The Third Reason why we Should Mind this Warning is 'to Please God'.—No trials can ever come upon us in this world without God's knowledge and consent. He is so wise that He never makes a mistake about our trials, and He is so good that He never lets any trouble come upon us, but what He knows will be for the best.

And when we try to be patient and contented under our trials, because we know that God orders or permits them, this will be pleasing to Him.

We will close our sermon with one other illustration outside of the Bible. We may call it, 'satisfied with the best'.

'I was going down town in a Fourth Avenue car one day,' says a New York merchant, 'when I heard somebody cry out, "Holloa, Mr. Conductor, please stop your car a moment; I can't run very fast". The car stopped, and presently there hobbled into it a little lame boy, about ten or twelve years old. I saw from the nice clothes he wore that he was the son of wealthy parents; but oh! his face told such a tale of silent suffering! and yet he was bright and cheerful. He put his little crutch behind him, and placing his poor withered limb in a more easy position, he began to look round at his fellow passengers. A happy smile played over his pale face, and he seemed to take notice of everything. Presently I got a seat next to him, and as he looked around him I heard him humming in a low tone the words of the hymn—"Hark, I hear an angel sing."

Then I had a little talk with him, and found that he knew and loved the Saviour, and it was this which made him so contented and cheerful. He told me he was born with this withered limb, and that the doctor said it never would be any better.

"Well, my dear boy," I said, "under these circumstances, how can you be so happy and cheerful?" His reply was, "Jesus, my Saviour, has sent this trial for me to bear. Father tells me He would not have sent it, unless He knew it would be best for me. And don't you think, sir, that I ought to be satisfied with the best?" This touched my heart, and brought tears to my eyes. I was just going to get out of the car then. So I shook hands with the little fellow, and thanked him for the lesson he had taught me, which I told him I should never forget as long as I lived.'

Now this little boy had learned and was practising the Bible warning against discontent. And we see how well his example illustrates each of the three reasons for minding this warning of which we have been speaking. It brought comfort to himself—it gave comfort to others—and was pleasing to God.—RICHARD NEWTON, Bible Warnings: Addresses to Children, p. 285.

THE EPISTLE OF JAMES

A MISSIONARY ADDRESS

'Be ye doers of the word.'—JAMES I. 22.

Introduction.—Suppose a knife could see and think—one day its master sends it to the grindstone. What for? Perhaps it would think, 'to be brushed by machinery and see lovely fireworks!' But, really, to be sharpened up. Why do we come to a missionary meeting or service? To hear stories? sing hymns? have a little excitement? Yes, perhaps, but something more—to be sharpened up and made better workers! Think—

I. What the Work is.

1. Very great.—Three-quarters of the world, say 750 millions of people, to be made Christians. Take 12 days and 11 nights to count 1 million at one a second, and no time for eating, drinking, or sleeping! Take 25 years, day and night, to count 750 millions, and all of these need to be spoken to and taught. 'Can't do it,' but our Captain has told us to (Mark xvi. 15). [Illus.: Duke of Wellington to officer who said something could not be done. 'Can't be done, sir! It's in the order book, so it can be done, and it shall be.']

2. Terrible need.—What are all these doing without Christ? [Illustrate cruelty and degradation of the heathen by anecdotes.]

II. How can we Help.

Missionaries are sent out—perhaps we may not be able to go ourselves—at any rate not yet. Still—

1. We can pray for missionaries.

See how St. Paul—the great missionary—was helped by prayers. [Picture out from 2 Cor. i. 8-11.] So with others—one missionary saved from a bear, and found, when he got home, that a little boy had been praying for him. 'O God, save Mr. — from the bears.'

2. We can work for missionaries.

May be small, but the smallest can do something. Missionary boxes. The pleasure of giving. A great deal of money spent on sweets and nice things to eat, why not give a farthing out of every penny to missions? God gives us money to use for the best—not all for self. Would not like to be cannibals, but if we eat the money which should feed missionaries, it is very much like eating missionaries.

3. We can be missionaries.

Always take more interest in work of which we know something—a tailor, e.g. takes more interest in tailoring than in shoemaking. If not full missionaries we can be missionary apprentices. [Illus.: Some child near, never comes to church or Sunday-school—or perhaps some grown person. Cannot you ask them to come, and help to bring them? Perhaps some blind person, or old person who cannot read; cannot you find half an hour to read a chapter or some hymns to them?] Plenty of missionary work for all if only we are willing to undertake it, and nothing like being missionaries for giving us an interest in missions.—C. A. GOODHART, Hints and Outlines for Children's Services, p. 94.

SOME GENTLE DEEDS

'Gentle—easy to be entreated'.—JAMES III. 17.

It is said of the things done by Jesus that if they should be written every one, the world itself could not contain the books they should fill.

It is the same with deeds done by those who are like Jesus. They can never all be told. They are being done every day, every hour of the day, and in every country. Only one here, another there, is ever heard of. I am going to tell of two or three which I have read about or known myself.

I. It was a gentle deed which Rahab did hundreds of years ago in Jericho. She saved the lives of two servants of God. Rahab was a poor heathen woman. She had neither Bible nor church to tell her what to do. No prophet had ever told her of God. She only knew of Him by the talk of travellers, and by the rumours of the mighty works He had done for the children of Israel. What she knew of God, therefore, was a mere tiny spark of light, which any puff of wind might blow out. But she loved this light. She took it for her guide. And in the way it pointed out she walked.

One day God sent the two servants I have spoken of unto her house for shelter. They had come to see the land; and the king of Jericho was angry, and wanted to kill them. And he sent to Rahab, and said, 'Give these men up to me that I may kill them, for they are come to spy out our land'. But Rahab knew, by the light which God had kindled in her soul, that they were sent by God. And she said to herself, 'I will obey God rather than the king of Jericho'. So she hid the men in the roof of her house among stalks of flax which were heaped up there. Then, when night fell, she let them down by a cord from a window that looked over the wall of the city. 'Flee for your lives,' she said, 'flee to the mountains, and remain there three days, and you shall be safe.' So the men fled, as she told them, up to the mountains, and, hiding there three days, they escaped.

It was God who gave her this chance of serving Him by doing this good deed. And He also gave her the wisdom and the heart to do it well. That which she could do, she did. That is her praise to this day.

II. There is still living, in an English village, a venerable man who had spent his days in preaching the Gospel and doing other Christian works. When he came first to this village he found every summer, about the same time, that many of the people sickened, and some died. Of those who died, the greatest number were children. It went to his heart to see the grief which these deaths caused—mothers crying for the children, and children for the mothers who had died. At last God put the thought into his mind that there was some one evil thing which brought the sickness and the deaths. And looking into all things to find this out, he saw that in the hot months of summer the people had no water to drink except what lay foul and bad in the ditches by the roadside. He said to himself, 'The people are dying for want of pure water'. Now over against that village there is a mountain, and in the sides of this mountain, far up, are springs and streams of the purest water. The minister got workmen and went up to these streams. And across the bed of the largest stream he caused a strong wall to be built, and in this way made a deep lake behind. Then from this lake he caused pipes to be laid all the way to the streets of the village. And the villagers had wholesome water to drink. And they ceased to sicken and die as they had done.

That was a gentle and Christian deed. He brought health to his people, and a happier life into their homes.

III. One of the best and kindest servants of God I have ever known was my beloved friend Margaret. Her life has been one long outflow of gentle deeds. And she has done deeds which were brave as well as good, which needed courage and strength as well as kindness to do. It is one of these—one out of many—I am about to tell.

In the city where her home was is a district which is called 'the woods'. And in the heart of that district was an evil house, dark and dismal to look at, in which thieves and drunkards and other evil people lived, and which the neighbours in the district had named 'the den'.

One winter's day a simple country girl, not yet eighteen, in search of work, knocked at the door of this house. Her mother and she had seen in the newspaper that work was to be had in this house. And at the door, when it was opened, she asked for work. 'Yes!' said the master of the house; 'if you will stay here you shall have work.' But it was a very wicked man who said this, and it was very wicked work he intended her to do. He was like the wolf who met little Red Riding Hood; and this was a girl like Red Riding Hood herself.

Now on that same day it came to the ears of my friend Margaret that this guileless country girl had been entrapped into the den. She knew the wickedness of the evil man who was its master, and of the thieves and vile people who lived with him in his house. She knew also that this poor girl would never more get back to her home unless she could be got out of the den at once.

It was winter weather, as I have said. The air was thick with fog, the streets deep in slush. But Margaret, having first put herself in God's hand by prayer, set out and knocked at the door of the den. 'Could she see the girl who had come up from the country?' 'There was no such person there,' she was told. 'Could she see the master?' 'He had gone from home.' But these were lies which she had been told. She went to the police office, to magistrates, to ministers, to kind-hearted citizens. No one seemed able to help her. Two days in the bitter winter weather she toiled, going from street to street, from door to door, before she found the helper who cared to help. But this helper at last she found. And before the third day closed she had rescued the innocent country girl from the den of evil; had got work for her which she could do at her mother's side; and was with her in the late train on the way back to the village home, which, but for Margaret, she never would have seen again.

IV. The other day a poor man was brought—crushed by machinery—into a Manchester hospital. To save his life his leg had to be taken off. But when this was done, the blood rushed out so quickly that there was almost no life left in him. And the doctors said he had not strength to get better. There was but one chance for him. If new blood could be poured into his body he might still live. One of the students there said, 'Let blood be taken from me'. And blood was taken from him and made to pass into the body of the dying man. And the man recovered his strength and he lived. It was a great gift which this student made to the poor stranger. It was a gift of life. He had nobleness and strength to do this very thing. It was, in the best sense, a gentle deed. That is his praise for evermore for this deed, whatever else his life may bring forth.

V. A young mason, many years ago, had his hand crushed by a stone, and went to the Glasgow Infirmary to have it dressed. A student, unlike the one I told you of—an ungentle student—tore off the bandages hastily. That is a great cruelty when the hand is sore with open wounds. The pain was worse than having the hand crushed at first. And though the young lad kept down his crying when he was with the doctor, he no sooner got out than he turned into a court and sat on some steps inside where he could be out of sight, and burst into sobs. But on that stair dwelt a very gentle lady. She heard the sobbing and came down to see the sufferer. Then she brought him into her house, spoke kindly to him—like a mother—made some tea for him, and told him to come to her every day before he went to have his hand dressed. And day by day this mother-hearted lady soaked the bandages in warm water and made them easy to come off. And this she did to this perfect stranger till the hand was well. Perhaps it does not seem a very great thing to do, but it was a very kind thing. And it was all she was able to do. She did what she could. And the young mason never forgot her kindness. He became a life-long friend to her. And when she was old and lonely he often visited her and his visits cheered her till she died.

VI. I knew another doer of gentle deeds, the landlady of a country inn. She was very simple. Although she was the mother of grown-up sons and daughters, it was like listening to a baby to hear her speak. Almost the only words which passed her lips were, 'Aye, aye,' and 'No, no'. But she had a kind and motherly heart. Out of that came all the gentle deeds she did. One of these I will tell.

On the other side of the street from her inn lived a poor girl, a weaver, who had neither father nor mother, nor friend nor relative in the wide world. This girl was laid down by fever, and had a long and weary illness after. At first the neighbours were very kind. They lit her fire, tidied up her room, prepared her food, and made her bed. But weeks and months passed, and Ann was no better. And by and by the neighbours got weary of this well-doing. First one, then another, at last all except one forgot to visit poor Ann, or even to ask how she was getting on. This unforgetting one was the kind mistress of the little inn. Every day, as the clock struck four, this simple Christian woman might be seen coming out of her door with a small covered tray. Wet or dry, snow or sunshine, it was all the same. At the exact hour the lonesome Ann heard the welcome footstep on the stair, saw the latch lifted, and the gentle neighbour coming in with a pleasant smile on her face, and a large cup of hot tea and a buttered roll in her hand. She would have died but for this that her neighbour did. Many a day her only food was the tea and roll. And it was not always easy for this kind heart to do what she did. It was not easy to leave her house, which was often crowded with country people. But always she fulfilled her task of mercy. She did it cheerfully. She did it till Ann was able to come and thank her. That was her praise in God's sight.

VII. Yet one other gentle deed comes into my memory out of a story of school life. It was a school of black children in Jamaica. A friend of my own was master. He had made a law that every lie told in the school should be punished by seven strokes on the palm with a strap. One day Lottie Paul told a lie, and was called up to receive the seven strokes. Lottie was a poor little thing, and pain was terrible to her. But the master must enforce his law. Untruth is a very evil thing in a school, or in a child's life. So Lottie had to hold out her hand and receive the seven strokes. But her cry of pain when she had received the first went to the master's heart. He could not go on with her punishment. He could not pass by her sin. And this is what he did. He looked to the forms on which the boys were seated, and asked, 'Is there any boy will bear the rest of Lottie's punishment?' And as soon as the words were out of his lips, up started a bright little fellow called Jim, and said, 'Please, sir, I will!' And he stepped from his seat, stepped up to the desk and received, without a cry, the six remaining strokes.

What moved this brave boy to bear Lottie's punishment? It was the gentle heart. And it was the vision of a heart gentler still, but gentle with the same kind of gentleness which filled the master's eyes with tears that day, and made him close his books, and bring his scholars round about his desk, and tell them of the Gentle One, who long ago bore the punishment of us all.

It is pleasant to tell of gentle deeds. It is far more pleasant to be able to do them. But it is delightful to know that Christ the Lord is helping people every day to do them. And every day He is sending chances of doing them to our very doors. And the gentle deeds He gives us the chance of doing are not high and difficult things, which only great people and strong people can do, but humble, homely, little things which boys and girls, and even little children can do.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Gentle Heart, p. 23.

LET US PRAY

'Pray one for another.'—JAMES V. 16.

We do pray for one another when we kneel at our bedsides at night; but perhaps we do not pray for one another as much as we might, or as well as we might; and we want to help one another to 'pray one for another'.

But what does it mean?

I. It means, I think, that we should Pray for one Another by Name. If we say 'God bless everybody,' it means very little: if we pray for each other by name, it means much more.

Aaron was the High Priest of Israel, and it was his business to pray for the people, and so he wore a breast-plate on his heart, and the breast-plate had the names of the children of Israel upon it, and he prayed for the people by name. A minister I knew had a list of all his people, and he prayed for them by name. The list was a very long one, and it became longer and longer, but he used to pray for some on Monday, and others on Tuesday, and others on the other days of the week, and so he got through his list. That was his breast-plate.

Phyllis was a little friend of ours, about three years old. We made friends one day when she sat upon my shoulder, and watched the pigeons flying in and out of the church steeple, where they had their home. She wanted to hear them, but they were too far off. Suddenly she heard some pigeons quite near where she sat saying, 'T-r-r-r'. And looking down she moved away the moustache to see where the pigeons were. The pigeons inside a man were more interesting than the pigeons on the steeple. After that Phyllis one day said to her auntie, 'Auntie, may I pray for Mr. Wobinson?' 'Certainly, dear,' said her aunt. And from that time every night she prayed, 'God bless Mr. Wobinson'.

It is more than a year since I saw our little Phyllis, but her aunt wrote the other day to say that she still prays every night, 'God bless Mr. Wobinson'. That is the way to pray one for another.

II. It means too, I think, that we should Pray for Some Special Thing. If anyone is ill, we should pray that he may get well, or that his pain may be eased, or that he may bear it bravely, or that it may do him good. And if any are on the sea, we should pray that God will watch over them, and bring them safe home.

III. Now why should we pray for one another? Because It makes us have a Right Feeling towards Others.

If anyone has been unkind to us, said unkind things, or done unkind acts, we do not feel very pleased with them. We would like to hit them, or say something bitter. But that would not be right. What are we to do? Let us pray for them. Jesus said, 'Pray for them who despitefully use you and persecute you'. That means we should pray for those who treat us badly. Then all the hot feeling passes away, and we think of them as brothers and sisters.

Then too we can feel right towards God. Leonardo da Vinci was a great painter. One of his paintings is of 'The Last Supper'. Jesus is seated at a table, and the disciples are seated on either side of Him. Da Vinci had quarrelled with a friend, and he determined to put his friend into the picture. So he made the face of his friend do duty for the face of Judas, the man who betrayed Jesus with a kiss, and he made the face of Judas as ugly and as evil as he could. Then Da Vinci had to paint the face of Jesus. He tried again and again, but he found he could not put all the purity and sweetness into that face that it should have.

Soon afterwards he made it up with his friend, and then he painted out the face of Judas, and put another face in. And then he had a sweet vision of Jesus, and painted His face beautifully.

IV. Then, Praying for Each Other is the Easiest Way of Doing Good. We cannot always give money to people; we cannot nurse them when they are sick; we cannot help them when they are in trouble; but we can always pray one for another; and God will hear our prayers, and bless those for whom we pray. —W. VENIS ROBINSON, Sunbeams for Sundays, p. 154.

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF PETER

LIVING STONES

I PETER II. 4, 5.

BENEATH one of the hills on which Jerusalem stands, is a vast cavern hewn in the rock. This cavern was the quarry from which were cut out the huge foundation-stones for the Temple. In it are found great blocks partly cut out, with the marks of the mason's chisel as fresh on them as if King Solomon's or King Herod's stonemasons had been at work on them only yesterday. What does this mean? It means that those stones were intended to be used in building God's Temple; but it was found they were not wanted; there were enough without them. There was no room for them; and so there they lie in the dark cave to this day.

Now, only fancy that one of those stones had been alive, and could have thought, and spoken, and chosen for itself whether it would be built into God's Temple or not. Suppose that stone had said to the masons, 'It is of no use to go on cutting and chipping; I don't wish to be in the Temple. Here I am, and here you may leave me. I shall be wanted some day for a palace, or a castle, or a bridge, and then they will come and take me out into the sunshine. I am in no hurry.' Would you not have said, 'O foolish, ungrateful wicked stone! You are rightly punished by being left there in the dark for ever?'

Well, but take care you are not like those stones. The Apostle Peter speaks about 'living stones'. He says:—

'To whom coming (that is, to the Lord Jesus) as unto a living stone . . . chosen of God and precious, ye also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual temple.'—I Peter II. 4, 5.

In this text, 'a spiritual house' means a temple for God; not a church or chapel built of stone and wood, but a church made up of people—true Christians—in whose hearts God has promised to dwell. And by 'lively' is meant, not cheerful and frolicsome, but living. (And so in the revised version we read 'living'.) The Lord Jesus Christ is compared to 'a living stone'—the chief foundation-stone (vv. 6, 7); and all true Christians are compared to living stones built on Him, to make part of God's living Temple. If you wish to know more about this living Temple read Isaiah LXVI. 1, 2; John XIV. 23; 1 Corinthians II. 16, 17; Ephesians II. 19-22.

You remember that our Saviour gave to Simon his name 'Peter', or 'Cephas', which means 'a stone', and said to him, 'On this rock will I build My church'. No doubt Peter thought a great deal about his name, and the meaning of it, and about rocks and stones. And so it is no wonder that he compared the Lord Jesus to a 'living stone', and Christians to 'living stones' built on Him to make part of God's Temple.

Now, in what way are you to be one of these 'living stones'? St. Peter says, 'unto whom coming'. That is it. All depends on coming to the Lord Jesus; asking Him to be your Saviour, and yielding and trusting yourself to Him. The stones in the quarry, when the masons had finished hewing and shaping them, had to be hauled with ropes and moved on rollers, and hoisted with pulleys, and so laid in their appointed place in the Temple, because they were not 'living stones'. But the 'living stones' must come. You cannot be dragged to Christ, or carried to Him, whether you will or no. You must come.

Teachers, and parents, and ministers, are like God's masons, seeking to prepare you for a place in God's Temple. Every lesson taught you, every hymn and text you learn, every service in which you join, leaves its chisel-mark—a mark on your heart. There they are, those marks; some so deep that you can hardly forget them; some so tiny that only God's eye can see them. But all will be vain and thrown away unless you come. You must come of your own free will; and yet it must be by God's grace, and help, and teaching. How can this be? Because when God gives us His Holy Spirit, He works in us 'both to will and to do'. This is what we pray for in one of our hymns—

Make us willing to be Thine.

IMITATE THE LORD JESUS

I PETER II. 21.

THE Lord Jesus is a Saviour to trust, a Pattern to follow, a Friend to love, and a Master to serve. These are three steep steps for Tiny Folks. Do well, suffer for it, and be patient. Only Jesus can help us do this. This verse shows us Jesus as our Pattern. Example is better than precept. The Lord Jesus is our

I. Example of Love and Sympathy. Perfect Saviour.

II. Example of Loyalty and Obedience. Perfect Man.

III. Example of Life and Service. Perfect Servant. One writer reminds us that in order to follow Jesus fully we must tread in His steps, and for this we need His nature, His spirit, and His power, but this threefold grace is given to all who will sincerely follow Him.

Two persons were walking together one very dark night, when one said to the other who knew the road well, 'I shall follow you so as to be right'. He soon fell into a ditch, and accused the other with his fall. The other replied, 'Then you did not follow me exactly; for I have kept free'. A side step had caused the fall. There is like danger in following Christ. Let us follow Him fully.—CHARLES EDWARDS, Tin Tacks for Tiny Folks, p. 55.

A JEWEL OF PRICE

I PETER III. 4.

A CERTAIN thing is declared in Scripture to be 'in the sight of God of great price'. Everything, you know, is in God's sight; that is, God sees and knows all things. Not the tiniest atom in the very heart of the earth, not the faintest twinkle of the farthest star, not a passing smile or frown on your face, or a secret thought in your mind, can be hidden from God. He sees everything, knows everything, foresees everything, forgets nothing. But more than this is meant when a thing is said to be precious in God's sight. It means that He takes notice of it, is pleased with it, and wishes us to admire and count it precious.

Things often look very different to us from what they really are. Coloured glass may look like precious stones. Gilded paper or wood may look like gold. Artificial flowers may be so like real ones that at a little distance no one can tell which is which. But God sees things as they really are. When Jesse's sons passed before Samuel, and Eliab was so handsome and tall and strong that Samuel thought surely it must be he whom God had chosen to be king of Israel, the Lord said to Samuel, 'Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature, because I have refused him: for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart' (1 Sam. xvi. 7).

Even outward beauty is God's work, and He means it to be admired: but it is not this which He reckons 'of great price'; and for this reason, among others, that it so quickly perishes. The loveliest flowers soon wither, and all their beauty is gone. The fairest face may in a moment be made unsightly by a blow, or disfigured by disease. The most beautiful landscape may in a few minutes be darkened with tempest or blotted out with fog. The most precious kind of beauty must be inward, not only on the outside; durable, not withering; something which will grow more and more beautiful the older it grows.

Well, what is this precious thing—precious even in God's sight? Silver or gold, pearls or diamonds, rare and curious and costly works of art, such as princes treasure in their palaces? No; none of these things. Nothing of the sort. Something which the poorest peasant or the youngest child may have. And, strange to say, something which no one who really has it can be proud of. It is 'the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price' (1 Pet. iii. 4). This, you see, is beauty of mind, or, as we sometimes say, beauty of character. St. Peter calls it 'the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible'. And yet he calls it an 'adorning,' an 'ornament,' which means something beautiful to look at, because, you know, people cannot help showing what sort of temper and spirit they have—haughty or lowly, sour or sweet, cross or gentle, hasty or patient, selfish and spiteful, or generous and forgiving—by their words, and tones, and looks, as well as actions.

A certain statesman had once been a poor lad, but had raised himself by his talents and industry. A rich but vulgar-spirited man, who wished to mortify him, said to him very rudely, 'I remember when you blacked my father's boots!' Instead of losing his temper and answering this insult angrily, he simply said, 'And did I not black them well?' That was beautiful, was it not? That was the 'ornament of a meek and quiet spirit'.

And why is such a spirit 'of great price' in God's account? Because it is like the Lord Jesus, of whom the voice from heaven said, 'This is My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased'. 'Who when He was reviled, reviled not again; when He suffered, He threatened not.' When the people in a Samaritan village refused to give Him a supper or a night's lodging, His Apostles James and John were so angry that they wished to call down fire from heaven to burn up those rude villagers with their houses. But Jesus 'rebuked them and said, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. For the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them.'—E. R. CONDER, Drops and Rocks, p. 219.

COURTESY

'Be courteous.'—I PETER III. 8.

BE courteous. What does that mean? Perhaps you will understand it better if I tell you it means, be polite.

What is politeness? Can you tell me? Or what is being polite? Let me try to explain. We often see a road being made, or mended, with flints; these fill up the holes, and the cart wheels don't sink into the ruts or mud. You say it's a good road now, only a little rough. But supposing you go over it with a steam roller and press the flints down, there is a great difference—it's the same road, only you've taken off the roughness.

So the polite man is the one who's had the roughness taken off his manners.

Or again, you take off your boots at night and have them cleaned. They are just the same boots, but how different they look in the morning! How much nicer! You've had the polish put on.

Now being polite means simply having a little polish on our manners. To be polite is just the opposite of being rude. The rude person is the one who never says, 'Please,' when he wants a thing, or 'Thank you,' when he has got it. If you are in a little difficulty he won't trouble to help you out of it. If he is going through a gate with a lady he lets her open it, and doesn't even say 'Thank you,' when he passes through first. If he doesn't like the way you sing, or read, or preach, or if you spell badly, or make a mistake in pronunciation, the rude man will be almost sure to tell you of it; he calls that honesty, or sincerity, or plain speaking. We call it rudeness.

But we want to be just the opposite of this—to be polite. And we must remember to be polite to a man himself, not to his pocket, or to his clothes, or to his name. I'll tell you what I mean.

We all travel in a train sometimes, and have our tickets examined before setting off. Now let us suppose we are in a first-class carriage. Here's the collector coming; he opens the door, and says in a very nice way, 'Will you kindly show your ticket, ladies,' or 'gentlemen?' as the case may be. We do so; he says, 'Thank you,' and closes the door gently.

Let us suppose we are now in a second-class compartment. The man opens the door and calls out, 'Tickets, please'. He doesn't say, 'Thank you,' nor close the door quite so gently this time.

Once more we are in a third-class carriage. He opens the door, calls out, 'Tickets,' looks at them, bangs the door, and goes away.

Now if a man behaved like that we should say he was only polite to people's pockets, not to the people themselves. We should be just as polite to third-class people as first-class.

Of course we all know what a half-timer is, one who works half the day only. Don't let us be half-timers in politeness—half our time rude, half our time polite—polite to strangers or people outside our own homes; but impolite, rude, rough at home. Some young men are polite to everybody's sisters but their own, but that is a very poor, mean sort of politeness. Sometimes we meet people in the street, or shops, or in other people's houses, and we think, 'Oh! what nice polite people! What good manners!' Ah! but wait until they get home. In Eastern countries it is considered proper, if you mean to be polite, to leave your shoes or slippers outside when you go inside a man's door; so people in England think it is proper to leave their manners outside their own doors. They are rude and careless, disobliging to their mothers and sisters; any manners seem good enough for them.

If we, any of us, act like that, let us make a change. They say charity should begin at home, so should politeness, only we must not let it end there.

Our mothers and sisters might be rather astonished at first if we suddenly began to be a little polite—to say, 'If you please,' or 'Thank you,' and try to help them a little. But I think they would soon get used to it, and I am sure they would like it.

But people may say, what is the good of being polite? It isn't useful, like being honest, or industrious and punctual. Well it isn't necessary to have sugar in our tea, but I think most of us like it; it seems to make the tea taste nicer—so politeness sweetens our lives.

See, you go home and your mother is mangling. What a noise the wheels make! how they creak and rattle! and it seems hard work, too. You get a little oil and put it to them. It isn't necessary, but it makes them run smoothly and easily. So politeness makes the wheels of life run smoothly and easily.

We are told by Christ to love one another; politeness is love showing itself in trifles.

We are told in the Bible, you know, that Christ went down to Nazareth, and was obedient to Joseph and Mary, and grew in favour with man as well as God—that is to say, they liked Him more the older He grew. Why?

One reason, I am sure, is this; He was gentle and obliging to every one around Him. And so He has taught us all to be polite, or in other words, to be courteous.—R. G. SOANS, Sermons for the Young, p. 1.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PETER

THE WORLD TO BE BURNED UP

'The earth, and the works that are therein, shall be burned up.'—2 PETER III. 10.

FIRE is a good friend, but a terrible enemy. The cry of Fire! is always alarming. Even when mischievous boys imitate the fearful sound, shouting aloud, 'Where! where!' the nerves of the timid are disturbed.

The poet Gray, who wrote the beautiful Elegy in a Country Churchyard, had a dread of fire which amounted almost to a mania. When he became a student of St. Peter's College, Cambridge, his bedroom was on the second story, and he took it into his head that in case of a conflagration, his escape by the stairway would be cut off, and that he would certainly be burned to death. He therefore had an iron bar fixed by strong arms projecting from the outside of his window, to which a rope could be tied in any emergency, and he could thus descend safely to the ground. This excessive caution led his class-mates to play a practical joke upon him, by thundering at his door, one night, with loud cries of 'Fire! fire!' The excited poet started from his bed, rushed to the window, and slid down the rope, when he was greeted with such shouts of derision that he abandoned St. Peter's College, and made his way to another. The window with the iron arms is still shown to visitors at Cambridge.

A most touching incident in the life of John Wesley is the destruction of his father's house by fire. The venerable clergyman was roused from sleep by the alarm of fire on the street, and not supposing that the danger was in his own dwelling, he opened the bedroom door, and found the hall full of smoke, and the roof ready to fall in. Directing his wife and two daughters to rise and flee for their lives, he burst open the nursery door, where the maid-servant was sleeping with five children. She snatched up the youngest, and calling to the others to follow, she rushed forth into the yard. The three eldest did as they were told, but John, who was only six years old, was not disturbed in his slumbers, and in the universal panic was forgotten.

The rest of the family escaped, some through the windows, others by the garden door, and when all were congratulating themselves that, at least, their lives had been spared, they heard the piercing shrieks of a child, and on looking up, to their horror they saw poor John, who had mounted on a box by the upstairs window, gesticulating with his little arms, and trying to attract their notice.

The distracted father ran to the staircase, but it was so nearly consumed that it was impossible to ascend. Falling on his knees in utter despair, he commended the soul of his dear child to God.

There was no time to look for a ladder, but one man mounted on the shoulder of another, and just as the boy was safely handed down, the burning roof fell in.

'Come, neighbours!' exclaimed the good clergyman, in transports of joy, 'let us kneel down and thank God! He has given me all my eight children. Let the house go; I am rich enough.'

John Wesley gratefully remembered this escape through life, and years afterwards, when his portrait was painted in gown and bands, he had an emblem of a house in flames put under it, with the well-chosen motto, 'Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire?'

The burning of a single house is a terrible circumstance, as this interesting incident shows you; but how much more fearful when a whole town is laid in ashes.

On the evening of the 2nd of September, 1666, a fire broke out in London, which at first occasioned little alarm; but it spread from roof to roof, and from street to street until two-thirds of the great metropolis had been reduced to ashes, and two hundred thousand people were left without a shelter to cover them.

There was the burning of the grand city of Moscow in 1812, which was destroyed by the Russians to prevent the French from making it their winter-quarters, as they had hoped to do, that they might be ready to conquer the empire of the Czar on the return of summer.

The burning of hundreds and thousands of houses in a single town is an awful occurrence indeed, but there is something yet to happen, and we shall every one of us behold it, which will be infinitely more terrible. St. Peter mentions in the text: 'The earth, and the works that are therein, shall be burned up'.

Only think of it! The whole world will be destroyed by fire!

As such things have happened in other worlds, it is neither improbable nor absurd to say that it may be the fate of this earth which we inhabit. Scoffers and sceptics need not argue that this great rock-ribbed ball, covered with earth and water, could not be destroyed. God who made it can do with it what He pleases.

There is no need of forming conjectures as to what its fate will be. The Bible has settled the question. The world will assuredly be burned up.

To guard against dangers from fire, people have sometimes erected what are called 'fire-proof' buildings. The merchant has a 'safe' to keep his account-books in; and there are fire companies, with engines, and hook and ladders, which often render very essential service.

The old Greeks and Romans had a sort of insurance, especially on ships; and this system has been brought to much perfection in our time. When, however, the terrible day mentioned in the text shall come, all the fire companies in the world will be of no use, and every insurance agency will be bankrupt. The good Lord has graciously made arrangements for His people, by which they may make their escape. In general terms it might even be correct to say that in the due reception of the ordinances of the Gospel, He bestows on them something which corresponds to an insurance policy. I say that this, in general terms, would not be an improper view of the case. It should always be remembered, when such illustrations are used, that the mere fact of our having received Baptism and Confirmation and the Lord's Supper, will not of itself secure our salvation. Even if we allow that the Almighty does thus bestow His favour on us, and does grant to us, if you please, a policy, this will be utterly worthless unless it be taken care of. Denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, it must be our daily effort to live soberly and righteously in this evil world.

In case that one is enveloped in flames, instead of rushing forth into the open air, where the chances of being burned to death will be greatly increased, the safest course is to wrap up in a flannel garment, or a thick bit of carpet, which will soon stifle the fire. Is there any covering which will secure us from harm when the world is burned up? Thanks to God's mercy, there is. We may wrap ourselves in the robe of the Redeemer's righteousness, and be safe.

We may do it; but the question is, Shall we? Is the Lord Jesus Christ anything to us? Have we cast ourselves on His mercy? and are we striving to serve and please Him in newness of life? If we can say yes, then we need not be afraid, even though we know of a surety that this world will very soon be burned up.—JOHN N. NORTON, Milk and Honey p. 19.

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF JOHN

LOVING ONE ANOTHER

'My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth.'—1 JOHN III. 18.

Now I want you to think of two things about love. It must be wide, and it must be unselfish.

I. It must be wide. I don't call that true Christian love which dotes on some one beloved friend, and does not care at all for anybody else. That is not the least bit like the love of Jesus. A loving child will be loving to all, as He was. I don't mean that you can help liking one better than another, of course. But there will be no making others feel that you don't care for them. You must love some best, but you will have gentleness, kindness, friendliness to spare for all. You will like to make all others happy, if you can, and you will hate everything which annoys and teases another. In short, you will treat others just as you would like to be treated yourself. Now, suppose some day a number of you are going home from school together along the [Here name a road] road, and amongst you is a little timid boy or girl, and the big ones try to frighten him, and run after him, and pretend to be going to hurt him, or tease him, and make fun of him, because he is little and timid, is that like what is meant by love? Is that doing to others as you would be done by? But I will go further, and say that true love will not only be kind and thoughtful towards other people, or other children, but it will be kind and thoughtful even to dumb creatures. A loving heart cannot bear to see anything suffer, and cruelty towards animals, or carelessness as to their suffering, is a sure sign that there is little real love in the heart. True love, you see, is very wide.

II. It is also very unselfish. It will give up something, sacrifice self, for others. Think once more about going home from school. If you found some little child was very tired or ill, and wanted help, while you were very eager to get home, looking forward to some amusement perhaps, and if you were to give up your wish to get home quickly, and were to stay and help the poor child, taking it quietly home before thinking of your own pleasure, I should call that unselfish love. I have heard of children who, when asked to go on an errand, or to fetch some water for some poor sick neighbour, always expected to be paid for it. I don't call that unselfish love.

Now I will tell you two stories of love, showing how unselfish a thing true love is.

Two little boys at Bristol a short time ago, one of them six years old and the other three, rambled more than three miles from the city one cold wet evening, and night coming on, they lost their way, and being very tired went into a potato-field and lay down to sleep in one of the furrows. But it was so cold that the elder one took off all his clothes except his shirt and socks to make a bed for his little friend, and so saved his life, himself dying of the cold soon after they were found in the morning. We know of One, children, who made Himself poor that we, through His poverty, might be rich. I think that little boy did something of the sort too, though I don't suppose he thought of it, and perhaps he may one day hear with great surprise his Saviour say, 'I was naked, and ye clothed Me'. For you know He says, 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye have done it unto Me'.

My second story is this. There were seven boys in a boat at Forres in Scotland, and it was upset some way from shore. One only, a boy of thirteen, could swim, so while the others clung to the bottom of the boat he swam backwards and forwards from the boat to the shore, taking one with him each time, till he had saved five in this way. He was then dreadfully tired, but there was one still left holding on to the boat, so he plunged in again to try to save him. But alas! he was too much exhausted, and sank before he could get to him. The sixth one was saved by some men who happened to come by, so the little hero was the only one drowned. Was not his love unselfish? We know of One who gave His life for us. I think that brave boy did something like this in his own boyish way.

Now, when you want to feel and know what love is, the best way is to think of the love of Jesus. Oh! how wide and how unselfish His love is! Say to yourself often, 'Jesus loved me, and gave Himself for Me,' and then pray God that your love may be a little like His.—BISHOP WALSHAM HOW, Plain Words to Children, p. 120.

LOVE

'Beloved, let us love one another; for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God.'—1 JOHN IV. 7.

John.—'The disciple whom Jesus loved.' His old age—used to be carried into church—no sermon—only one message, 'Little children, love one another.'

I. What it Means to Love one Another. Cf. III. 18.

Contrast with false love 'in word and tongue'.

True love is in deed, and in truth.

Cf. Judas who kissed, and John who loved.

May illustrate by story of King Lear.

II. Why we Ought to Love one Another.

1. Should copy our Father, and 'God is Love'.

Can you remember where to find that text? Very easy. Comes twice in John's first Epistle, both times in fourth chapter, once in eighth, and once in sixteenth verse. Can't forget it if you know your two tables.

Twice one is two,
Twice two is four,
Twice four is eight,
Twice eight is sixteen.

2. We are brothers.

3. God so loved us.

Enlarge and illustrate.

III. How we may Learn to Love one Another.—

So hard to love some people! Can't pump up love all at once. How make dry pump draw? Pour water down it. So begin by doing little loving actions—then love begins to come—or—creeping plant may cover house, but begins on a stick.

Try to think loving thoughts—that will lead to kind acts, and so on more and more.

Ask God to help.

IV. Results.

1. Heaven on earth. Cf. text, 'Knoweth God,' and God is in heaven—so know heaven, and have the joy of heaven.

2. Those who love are loved.

3. Make us alive—really alive.—1 John iii. 14. [Frozen traveller—finds another more frozen—pities him—tries to warm him—so saves his own life too.] [Story of Abou Ben Adhem in Leigh Hunt's Poems.]

Let us try this week—children fond of new games. See how many kind things you can do each day—add them up—see which can do most. So may help one another, and learn how to be more like God.—C. A. GOODHART, Hints and Outlines for Children's Services, p. 43.

THE EPISTLE OF JUDE

THE COMMON SALVATION

JUDE 3.

THERE was a boy in Cromarty once called Hugh Miller. He was an apprentice mason, and was taken by his master to work in a quarry. One day he happened to see a little round rough stone on the ground, and he took his hammer and split it into two. To his surprise and joy he beheld inside a picture of the bones of a tiny fish, and a shadow of the very fish itself. It had once been a real fish, and this stone was its tomb. Once it lived and swam like other fish in some stream. And then, on an evil day, it was wrapped round by dust of lime, and shut in until the moment, hundreds, perhaps thousands of years after, when the Cromarty boy brought it out again into the light, its flesh all wasted away, its bones turned into stone, and only a shadow of its form remaining.

The boy felt as if he had suddenly passed into fairy land. He could not have been more astonished if he had found a king's palace. Here was a rough-looking pebble at his feet, and yet inside of it was this picture of the fish, silently telling the story of its life and death.

Now it is to a little heap of pebbles like that I should liken this Epistle of Jude, which we have read for our lesson to-day. It is a rough, hard to read, hard to understand part of the New Testament. It is not easy reading for grown-up people. It is far from easy reading to you; but it has many beautiful sayings in it. It has single verses which have been a comfort to the people of God ever since they were written. And it has one saying which even children should be able to understand. It is a saying in the verse in which Jude declares that he had given all diligence to write unto them of the Common Salvation.

'The Common Salvation'—that is the saying which a child may understand, and in which I wish to help you to be glad. It lies in the heart of this third verse as beautiful, as great a miracle, as the picture which Hugh Miller found in the heart of his pebble. And it has a far finer story to tell.

It tells the story of the good thing which Jesus brought down from heaven. And what it tells concerning that good thing is that it is 'common'—'the common salvation'. Will you try to understand what is meant when a good thing like salvation is described as common? Sometimes on the summer evenings I am so fortunate as to meet you walking like myself on the moor. Did you ever think of asking why the moor is called 'the common'? It is because it is common property. It is ground that belongs to everybody. All the people of the town have the use of it, to walk on, as if it were their own; and the poor cottagers living around the edge of it may bring their cows and donkeys, their sheep and geese, to feed on it. It is common to us all.

In the same way is this good thing which has come down from heaven common to us all. It is the common salvation; it is common to rich and poor, to black people and white. It is the one same salvation by which everybody who will may be saved. The saved who are now in heaven were saved by it. The saved who are still on the earth have been saved by it. It is salvation for the whole world—for whosoever will have it.

And that is the same thing with saying that Christ is a Saviour for everybody—for every soul who is willing to have Him. He is the common Saviour, the Saviour free to all the world, whom all the world may have. A Saviour not of good people only, nor of bad people only; but of good people and bad people in common: the Saviour in whom bad people will find salvation from their badness, in whom good people will find salvation goodness better than the goodness they have. The common Saviour. The Saviour whom everybody may have and be brought to heaven by. That is what is meant when it is said that the good thing brought down from heaven by Jesus is the common salvation. It is the same thing as is meant in that verse where it is said: 'Let him that is athirst come: and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely'.

Now to help you to understand how good for us it is that there is a common salvation, I will tell you one of the wonderful stories in the Acts of the Apostles. At the time when the things took place which are told in the Acts, a man was in Ethiopia who was very anxious to be saved. The wish to be saved was in him like a great thirst in his heart. But there were two things that stood like a wall in his way. He thought that it was only in Jerusalem salvation was to be found, and that it was only Jews who could find it. Now he was not a Jew, but a far-off Ethiopian. He had money; he had horses and chariots; he had friends; the Queen of Ethiopia was his friend; but he was without salvation. A great sorrow lay upon his soul. At last he resolved to go to Jerusalem and see whether it could not be got. He thought, 'If only I go near the Temple of the Jews I may be admitted among the saved'. But it was not so. He came to Jerusalem. He saw the Temple. He got a Bible. But he was not admitted among the saved. The wall was in Jerusalem too.

Salvation was only for the Jews, he thought; only for white people, and he was a Gentile and black. So with a heavy heart he turned his face to Ethiopia again; and he left Jerusalem, and was on the very road that led to his home. But God was watching over this earnest seeking soul; He sent Philip the Evangelist to him. And Philip told him all the new glad tidings about Christ. He told him that the wall which had divided Jews and Gentiles was broken down; that Christ had died for Ethiopians as well as for Jews, that He had brought down from heaven a salvation that was common, and that if he wished he might have the Saviour and salvation there and then. And there and then this Ethiopian accepted both, and in a river near by he was baptised. And then, with all his sadness gone, and with a heart filled with joy, he continued his journey home.

I want next to make plain to you that it is a very happy thing for yourselves that there is a common salvation. Sunday, I know, is sometimes a hard day for you, especially the part of it you spend in the church. Service and sermon seem long to you, and when you return to your homes you say, 'We did not understand what was said'. That will sometimes happen. What is plain and easy for the grown-up people will often be hard and dark for you.

But do not, for all that, allow yourselves to think that the Saviour is only for those who understand the sermon. He is the Saviour of children all the same as of grown-up people. He is the common Saviour—a Saviour for fathers and mothers, a Saviour for children as well.

I read not long since of a little girl of nine years old into whose heart came this very thought. She said to her mother one Sunday, 'Is Jesus a Saviour for children of nine years old?' 'But why do you ask such a question as that?' the mother said. 'Because our minister was offering salvation to the big people this morning; but he did not offer it to me.'

Christ is a Saviour for nine years old as much as for nineteen or ninety. He was nine years old Himself once. He is the common Saviour. He is the Saviour for people who have grey hairs, and for you who have still the flowing locks of youth. He has salvation for boys and girls of all ages. He has salvation for the baby in its mother's arms. And it is this very thing He meant when He said, 'Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not'.

But you will not always be children. Sooner than you can imagine you will be old and grey-haired. And it may come to be, as you rise in years, that you shall be in the good providence of God set over homes where you will have servants under you, or over work-places where you will have work-people to rule.

If such a lot should ever fall to you, I hope that God may give you grace to remember what has been said to you to-day. Do not fall into the evil way of thinking that there is a wall dividing you from the humble people who serve you. Christ has thrown down all such walls for ever. He is the Saviour for servants as well as for those who employ them. And the salvation He died to bring near is common to them and you, and as free to them as to you. Try even now to think of the servants that do you so many services in your father's house as people for whom Jesus died. For in Christ's kingdom there is no respect of persons, and what He offers to rich and poor alike is a common salvation.—A. MACLEOD, The Children's Portion, p. 125.

THE SPOTTED GARMENT

'Hating even the garment spotted by the flesh.'—JUDE 23.

I. Our Garment.—In studying the images of the Bible you must remember that in each you have two things: the image and the truth pictured by it. Begin by finding out what exactly the image is apart from the truth it represents. Then let the image be spread out and fixed before your mind's eye. Your eye is pained when you try to find out the exact shape of a shivering leaf, or the picture on a far-off quivering flag; and so your mind is distressed until the whole image grows quite plain to you. When the naked image stands out clearly before your mind, then ask, What is the truth this image brings to me? Moulders take great care lest the mould and the metal in it should run together; and you should be as careful that the image and the truth imaged are not confused in your mind, for that would pain you and spoil the lesson. The moulder wishes his metal to be shaped by the mould, but does not wish the mould to run into his casting; and so we must discover where the image ends and the lesson begins, and thus take the truth—quite clean and complete—out of the mould in which it lies. This is Christ's plan in the parables: He gives the parable by itself, and then its spiritual meaning. Our subject, therefore, raises two questions: What is a spotted garment? and what does it teach? My heart has a covering of bones, a covering of flesh, and a covering of skin. All these are God-given coverings, but my heart has also another, an outer covering of my own adding, which I can change at will. That is my garment. The Christian life may be said to have a heart, a body, and a garment. Your garment is that by which you touch the world and men; it is your way of acting, not in your closet, or in your hidden life before God, but in your open life among men; it signifies not your heart but your habits. Note that word habit. It means a lady's riding garment, and also a way of acting. It stands for both our image and the truth imaged. 'The apparel,' the poet says, 'oft proclaims the man.' A man's dress should be in keeping with the man's self. A prince in rags or a bankrupt in rich clothing offends us. And a Christian's garment or outer life should be of a piece with his inner life: the one part should not reproach the other. He was once a ragged prodigal among the swine. The hand of love took off his rags and washed him, and dressed him in beauty not his own. His life is now a Sabbath, a festival, and he has put on holiday apparel. Or as a priest he is clothed in robes of snowy white; but the earth he treads holds many vile things that may easily touch and stain his fair clothing. But as he has a cleansed heart, so he should have clean hands, and be clean every whit down to the very skirts of his garments. As a child of God he must be dressed in the fashion of the family, which is spotless white. The young communicants in the early Church were called candidates, that is, ones clothed in white. They were sometimes literally clothed in white, so that their garment might be a sermon to them. This practice perhaps explains the words, 'Thou hast a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments, and they shall walk with me in white, for they are worthy. He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment' (Rev. iii. 4). All God's children on earth and in heaven wear the same colour. Thus 'a little pilgrim must keep his garments clean'.

II. The Spots on the Garment.—What are they? They are made by the flesh, that is, fallen, sinful nature. This garment is only spotted. It has not been dragged in the mire, or steeped in and dyed with the flesh. Such a garment would be a fit image of the life of a reprobate. But Jude speaks to real Christians whose lives are pure in the main, but who, if they do not take care, may easily catch a taint from the wicked world. It would break his heart to find even small scattered spots on their garments.

But how do these dreaded spots come upon the soul's garment? They come from our carelessly touching defiling things. You may touch the wicked world by the eye, the ear, or the lips. Bad books, for instance, have an awful power to defile the soul. Books may leave a foul stain which memory will renew again and again as long as you live. One look ruined the world, and one book may pollute your heart. Do not think that you should 'see life,' and know what is going on in the world. You should know evil as little as possible, for by such knowledge you lose your paradise. Greatly blessed are the children who read none but pure and healthy books, and who shun all unholly sights.

The garment of the soul may also be foully stained through the eyes or the lips. You must close your ears against all words that should not be spoken. You must refuse to listen to oaths and lies, for the spreading spots that come from them may by and by make the soul's garment as foul as the rags beggars leave on the highway.

III. Our Hatred of the Fleshly Spots.—It is easy to smile or laugh at these spots, for they often have an amusing side. You may excuse them, or be silent about them. They often appear in people who have some fine qualities, and it is not easy to find the line where liking for fine qualities should yield to hatred of defiling sins. But you are to hate the smallest traces and outskirts of fleshly pollution, and your hatred is to go so far that you will hate even the whole garment for the sake of the ugly spots that spoil its beauty. Jude does not hate by halves. What vials of wrath he pours upon these sins! His verses fall upon us like thunderbolts. The exceeding hatredfulness of sin as a base blot is set forth some eight or nine times in this short letter. These filthy dreamers defile the flesh (ver. 8): they corrupt themselves, that is, are covered with loathsomeness like lepers (ver. 10): they are spots in the feasts of charity, trees whose fruit withereth—rotten, blasted trunks, emblems of God's judgments (ver. 12): raging waves of the sea, casting up a decaying wreck that taints the air (ver. 13). Jude hates sin because he knows it well. Its inmost essence lies bare to his eye in heaven's light. It is the worst foe of God and man; it cheats us out of happiness; its pleasures are short-lived, its torments enduring; it is a folly, an injury, and a crime; it has lighted the flames of hell; and how can he help hating it? Even its faintest spots defile the white garments of his best beloved, and he must hate it. These strange spots are not like leopard-spots; they are not even skin-deep; they are only on the clothes, and by God's grace you may have them all washed out, if you really hate them. The garment is the outermost part of your outer life, and this holy hatred is the strongest aversion to the least defilement of the outermost part of your outer man. And you are so to hate the spots that you will hate the whole garment which they defile. If a book contains some vile things, you are to fling the whole book away; if a clever companion uses nasty words, you are to quit his company if he won't give them up. Take an ancient and a modern instance. Apuleius was an early Christian, whose garment was deeply dyed with the flesh before his conversion. 'Apuleius,' the historian writes, 'not only shunned the heathen banquets he had formerly shared, but even at a distance he dreaded and shuddered at the mere sight of the house in which the banquets were held.' The spirit of this text entered into a country gentleman, who, upon beginning the Christian life, discovered that his garment was spotted by bad novels and too much wine. He carried out his bad books in armfuls, and made a bonfire of them in his garden.

God has given us an instinctive loathing of impurity. With shuddering we turn away from long-worn rags and from the sow wallowing in the mire. And we have pleasure in cleanliness, and set a high value upon it, believing that—

E'en from the body's purity the mind
Receives a secret, sympathetic aid.

Now we should carry all these feelings into the region of the soul. Our image suggests many strong reasons for doing so. The fabled Hercules put on by mistake a poisoned garment. As soon as it grew warm the poison entered his body and caused him fearful pain. He tried to tear off the garment, but lo! it had grown into his body. Maddened by the pain he wrenched off his flesh, and so died miserably. But we need not go to fables for illustrations. Fever entered a house, and the baby died. All its clothes were carefully gathered together and burned. But the doll, laid aside in the drawer, was forgotten. Two years afterwards it was brought out, and again fever seized the child, and it also grew sick and died. That mother had cause to hate the garment spotted by the flesh. Probably Jude has his eye on the plague-stricken garments of the leper, which awakened the utmost horror; and he wishes them to cherish equal horror at the hell-stains upon the garment of the soul. George Vickers, a tailor in the village of Eyam, in Derbyshire, got a box of clothes from London in 1665, the year of the great plague. Viewless plague-spots were upon the clothes, and of the 350 villagers, about 250 died. Vickers removed to another parish, but for years nobody would touch him from fear of infection—they hated even his garment.

You may say that it is very hard to keep your soul's garment unspotted. Yes, but you keep your dress clean. A spot upon it is a distress to you. What a shame to care for the soul as if it were only the body, while you care for the body as if it were the soul. 'The Dairyman's Daughter' went to church one day because she had got a new gown. The text was, 'Be clothed with humility'. The preacher showed the difference between the clothing of the body and the clothing of the soul. She felt ashamed of her vanity, cast off the filthy rags of her own righteousness, put on the Lord Jesus, and prayerfully did her best to keep her garment unspotted by the flesh. Her bright example has done good to thousands, and her grave has become a place of pilgrimage. A writer tells that he once saw a widow sitting on that gravestone and reading to her girl. The book in her hand was The Dairyman's Daughter, and her girl became Queen Victoria.

This is the sum of the whole matter: make sure that you have the true life in your soul, for God never clothes or adorns a spiritual corpse or mummy. He first makes it alive. Receive also the beautiful garment He gives. Be a lover of the beautiful, and believe that nothing is so beautiful as holiness. Hate every spot as men hate the plague, and feel every stain as you feel a wound. Pray that you may be like the daughter of the king, all glorious within, in raiment of needlework, with clothing of wrought gold. And be not discouraged. Jude is not discouraged about the Christians, though they have to keep their garments clean in a world filled with the vilest sins. He knows what the grace of God can do, and so he beautifully closes his letter in holy triumph.—JAMES WELLS, Bible Images, p. 33.

THE BOOK OF REVELATION

THE LORD JESUS CHRIST IS GOD

'I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty.'—REVELATION I. 8.

This being 'Trinity Sunday it is proper for us to dwell upon the nature and attributes of that Almighty One whom it is to be the business of our lives to worship and glorify.

At the close of the Psalms and hymns in the Prayer Book, are what we call Doxologies, to be sung after them as a fitting tribute to the Eternal God. Here is one of them:—

To God the Father, Son,
And Spirit, ever blessed,
Eternal Three in one,
All worship be addressed,
As heretofore
It was, is now,
And shall be so
For evermore.

This verse expresses exactly the truth as taught in Holy Scripture. There is only one God, and yet there are three Persons in the Godhead, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost—each of these Persons being equal in power and glory and in eternal existence.

Our minds are so weak and imperfect that we cannot explain this, neither is there any necessity for our doing so. All that is required of us is to believe in God, as He has revealed Himself to us. Hence in the Catechism, when the question is put to the child who has just recited the Apostles' Creed, 'What dost thou chiefly learn in these articles of thy belief?' the answer is given plainly and distinctly, because there is no doubt on the subject, 'First, I learn to believe in God the Father, who hath made me, and all the world. Secondly, in God the Son, who hath redeemed me, and all mankind. Thirdly, in God the Holy Ghost, who sanctifieth me, and all the people of God.'

A foolish, self-conceited man was once making mock at the doctrine of the Trinity, and declared it to be so supremely absurd that nothing could be found to illustrate it. At this moment a lighted candle was brought into the room where the company were seated, when a Christian, who had been shocked at his flippant irreverence, quietly remarked, 'Sir, there is a trinity—tallow, wick, and fire, three in one—in that candle. Suppose, now, that the tallow represents one Person of the adorable Trinity, the wick another, and the fire a third. If you will explain the philosophy of how these three unite to produce light I will undertake to explain the doctrine which you pronounce to be so absurd.' The scoffer had nothing more to say.

A still more striking reply was made to a similar objection by St. Patrick, the patron Saint of Ireland, who plucked a three-leaved clover growing on a single stalk, and held it up before the astonished eyes of one who denied the possibility of there being three Persons in the Godhead.

In discoursing further on the subject I shall confine myself to the single point brought before us in the text—that our Lord Jesus Christ is God. It seems impossible that anyone could venture to deny this after listening to His own words: 'I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty'.

Alpha and Omega are the first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, and denote the first and the last. It was the custom of the Jewish Rabbins to use the first and last letters of the Hebrew alphabet to represent the whole of anything, from beginning to end.

This is precisely what our adorable Saviour says of Himself in the text. Can He, then, be less than God? Can He who is 'the same yesterday, to-day, and forever,' and whose existence reaches from everlasting to everlasting, be only a man?

We know that our Lord Jesus Christ is God, because He has done and is now doing what far transcends the power of mortals.

I. Our blessed Lord must be God, Because He Made the World.—Hear what St. John says, in the opening words of his Gospel, when he is speaking of the Lord Jesus: 'All things were made by Him; and without Him was not anything made that was made'. The whole universe—earth, and sea, and sky, and stars, and animals, and plants—everything was made by the Son of God.

Some of you have been present at the beautiful ceremony of laying the corner-stone of a church, when the Bishop, or some clergyman appointed to do it, strikes the great stone with a hammer, after it has been lowered to its place, saying, 'In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, I lay the corner-stone of this church'. And so the Lord Jesus Christ, as the mighty Architect of all things, is described in the sublime language of the Bible: 'Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth; and the heavens are the works of Thy hands. They shall perish, but Thou remainest: and they all shall wax old as doth a garment; and as a vesture shalt Thou fold them up, and they shall be changed: but Thou art the same, and Thy years shall not fail.'

II. The Lord Jesus Christ is God, Because He Preserves all Things.—How very soon a fine house, or a beautiful garden, will get out of order, without constant and careful attention! And, so perfect as are the works of creation, they need a Preserver, who shall look after them day and night, and keep things in order and harmony. Hence it is said of our blessed Lord, 'He is before all things, and by Him all things consist'. 'He upholdeth all things by the word of His power.'

The myriads of creatures on earth, and in the waters, all turn to Him as the Preserver and Benefactor without whose gracious and tender care they must perish. Empires rise and fall as He pleases; yea, it is He who declares, in the text, 'I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty'.

III. The Lord Jesus Christ is proved to be God not only because He made all things in the beginning, and because He keeps the machinery of the universe in operation, but because when He pleases, He can turn Aside the Ordinary Course of Nature, and Work Miracles.

It is a great comfort to remember that what the Saviour has done in past ages, He can do now. He is the Almighty One, 'the beginning and the ending; which is, and which was, and which is to come'. We are all helpless sinners, and none but a Saviour who is God can be of any service to us.

Trinity Sunday will have taught us a lesson worth remembering, if it has helped us to sing with the understanding and the heart:—

Eternal praise be given,
And songs of highest worth,
By all the hosts of heaven,
And all the saints on earth,
To God, supreme confessed,
To Christ, His only Son,
And to the Spirit blessed,
Eternal Three in One.

—JOHN N. NORTON, Milk and Honey, p. 161.

ALPHA AND OMEGA

REVELATION I. 8.

WHAT is God like?

Who would have thought if it had not been told us that He was like the letters in the alphabet?—I am A and Z.

There is a little Chinese toy, which consists of five pieces of wood, shaped so as to fit each other in a variety of ways. And out of those five little bits of wood you can form two or three thousand different shapes; arrange the pieces differently, and you have a different shape.

But although that is a very wonderful toy, it is not to be compared to the alphabet. You can arrange the few letters of the alphabet in thousands upon thousands of different words. And no new word could arise for which, if we use the whole alphabet, we could not find a shape or word to express it.

All that we speak, then, all that we write, all that ever has been written, all that ever will be written, you will find enclosed in the twenty-six letters of the alphabet.

Now that is why this is the name of God. God says, 'I am like the alphabet; I am its first letter, I am its last letter, and I am all the letters between.'

As all language in all the world in the A, B, C, so all life, all power, and all goodness are to be found in God.

But here we have only this first and last letter.

He is the beginning and end of your life. He is the Maker of it. It is made for His glory. He is the beginning and end of all religion in the life. He is the Author and Finisher.

'Two thoughts come to us here: Where did my religion come from? It came from God. What did I receive my religion for? To serve God.

Now, another way to understand is this: What should be your first thought in the morning? It should be God! What your last thought at night? God!

What should be your first concern in life? To please God. What your last? Have I pleased God?

The happy life is the life that, looking back, sees God in childhood.

And the life that is closing, resting in God, goes home to God.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 88.

THE WHITE STONE AND THE NEW NAME

'And will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving (i.e. but) he that receiveth it.'—REVELATION II. 17.

I must first tell you something for your comfort before I explain the text. Who is it that is to have the 'white stone'? Who is it? If you look at the line just before my text in the same verse, you will see who it is that is to have the 'white stone'. 'To him that overcometh.' What does that mean?

Perhaps somebody says, 'Then I'm sure I shall not have it; I have not overcome; I have not conquered my temper; I have not conquered my evil habits yet, therefore I'm sure I shall not have it.'

Now it does not mean that. Look at it. It does not say, 'To him who has overcome'; but to him who overcometh'. There is a great difference. None of us have yet 'overcome'—not one of us—young or old—we have not conquered anything yet; but if we are God's children, we are conquering, though we have not yet conquered. Then God says He will give us a 'white stone'.

Do you think you are conquering a little bit every day, getting the mastery over yourselves?

I heard lately of a master of a school who, once a month, called up every boy to him, and he gave each boy a little bit of paper, and no one saw what was written on the paper but the master and the boy. On that piece of paper was written the fault that the boy was to conquer in the next month. Don't you think that he was a good man? If you had any kind person who would write upon a piece of paper the fault you were to conquer the next month—do you think a month would be long enough to conquer it in? Try—try!

Then, if you would conquer your fault, whatever it is, you are the person to whom God will give 'the white stone'. You have not 'overcome'—but you are 'overcoming'.

Those who are acquainted with their grammar will understand what I mean when I say it is in the present tense—those who are 'overcoming' shall have the 'white stone'. That is for your comfort.

Now we go on to speak about the text. What is it? What is a 'white stone'? I will tell you some persons' different opinions respecting it.

Some people think it means the 'white stone' which the ancient Greeks used to give to the people who conquered in the games played at Olympia—the gladiatorii ludi, as they were called. The people used to meet at certain periods to witness racing, boxing, jumping, and a great many other things, and the person who gained the victory had a 'white stone' given him, as a sign that he had done so. Therefore they think it means the prize. I do not think so, for then it would be to him who has 'overcome', whereas it is for him who is 'overcoming'.

Again, other people think it means a sort of ticket that will admit you in at the door by showing it, and that with it you can go in to the banquet—the feast; that therefore it is the ticket of admission to heaven. I don't think that it means that. I do not remember reading anywhere that people have 'white stones' for tickets to go in at feasts.

I will tell you another thing. Amongst the Greeks, when a man was tried for any offence he had committed, if he was found guilty and condemned, they gave to him a black stone; but if he was acquitted—found innocent—then he had a 'white stone'. So that the 'white stone' would signify that he was pardoned. I think it means that. That is the best thing. God says that He will give us a 'white stone' to show that we are forgiven.

Let us think on this. We have all the black stone: that is very bad. There is no black-and-white stone—half white and half black. I think some people imagine we may be half forgiven: they say, 'Well, I hope God will forgive me for that fault above all the rest'.

Let me tell you that if God forgives us a little, He forgives us quite. It is all 'white', if it is 'white' at all, never white-and-black; it is all 'white', no spot left.

Christ is that 'stone'; therefore the 'white stone' means Jesus! and the pardon which He gives us when we love Jesus makes our souls 'whiter than the snow,' or the sun.

Now I want you to think how we can get that 'stone'. God gives it. To whom does He give it?

There was once a king of France travelling about the southern part of that country, where was a castle in which were a great many prisoners—persons who had been condemned for their crimes to be sent thither and work hard, while bound in irons. This king visited the castle. When the news of his intended visit reached the prisoners, they began to think, 'Perhaps the king will pardon me, and let me loose'.

At length the king arrived, and walked amongst them; they all came round him and begged that he would forgive and let them loose. One of the men said, 'Oh, please, your majesty, I never did anything wrong; it was very unjust to put me here; I assure your majesty it is so, do let me go, it's quite a mistake'. Another said, 'Please, your majesty, I know I did wrong; but it was not so bad as people make out; I only did a little wrong. Do let me go.' Another came and said, 'Please, your majesty, I know I did very wrong; but I am not worse than the rest of your majesty's subjects. Do let me go.' Another said, 'Please, your majesty, I know I did very wrong, but then I did so many good things besides. I am sure that I did greater things to serve your majesty than I did offensive things; please let me go.' Another said, 'Please, your majesty, I know I deserve this punishment, and more; but I throw myself upon your majesty's mercy. I am a poor miserable wretch.' Then the king said, 'This is the one I pardon'. He gave him the 'white stone'.

If you want the 'white stone', i.e. if you want God to forgive you all your sins, and for your soul to be 'white' and beautiful, you must humble yourself. You are a poor miserable sinner, and require the 'white stone'.

I have read of an Arab who was travelling the desert of Arabia, when, after travelling a long time—very hungry and thirsty, with nothing to eat or drink—he came to one of those little wells or cisterns in the desert for camels to drink out of, and he found some water; and by the side of the water there was a little blue bag, and he looked at the bag and said, 'Now I have what I want. Surely in this bag there are some dates, some fruit, something for a traveller to eat.' He eagerly grasped the bag, opened it, and exclaimed, 'Oh, it is only pearls!' Ah! 'pearls' were of no use to him then. And so will it be with us. It is not the 'pearls' that we shall one day think of—but it will be of the 'white stone'. Then there will be no 'pearls' worth having.

And now I am going to say a little about 'the new name' written in the 'white stone'. Think of this 'new name'.

What is this 'new name'? Do you remember that it says in the Bible when God loves people very much He changes their name? Can you think of anybody whose name he changed? He changed Abram's name into Abraham, and he changed Sarai's name; He also changed Solomon's name, and do you not remember Daniel's name was changed? and a great many names in the New Testament God changed. Saul's name was changed; and many others.

It shows God loves them. It is like 'a new name' being given when we are adopted into a family. You know when we are taken into a new family, we have 'a new name'. When you are adopted into the family of God, you have 'a new name' given unto you.

You have a Christian name: I don't know all your names; but there are all kinds of them in this church: and whatever your Christian name is—whether John, Henry, Thomas, William, Peter, or whatever it is—you should think it is your 'new name,' and that it is to make you think of becoming a 'new creature'—a child of God—because you have this 'new name'. Will you think of that?

Every thing has something to mark it. There is the cockchafer, which has round wings; the butterfly, which has spotted wings; the hawk, which has a crooked beak. Now what is to mark you? Your 'new name' is to mark you. You have the 'new name'.

It says also of this happy thing—this 'new name'—that 'no one knows it, but he that receiveth it'. If you have not this 'new name,' you will not understand about it. There are some people in this church who do not understand anything at all about what I am saying: they don't love 'the name of Jesus'. Those who do love Jesus will understand it.—JAMES VAUGHAN.

WALKING IN WHITE

'And they shall walk with me in white: for they are worthy.'
—REVELATION III. 4.

I WONDER if you can think what is the whitest thing in all the world. Shall we think of some 'white' things? The manna was 'white' which came down from heaven: it was angels' food.

But there is a very beautiful 'white' thing spoken of in the 68th Psalm—let us look at the 14th verse, 'When the Almighty scattered kings in it, it was white as snow in Salmon'—that is, Jerusalem. All the houses therein were very 'white,' there being so much white marble there. David loved it very much; and he loved to praise it; and he said, 'It is as white as snow in Salmon'.

If you look at Matthew xxviii. 3, you will read of another 'white' thing. It is a description of an angel, and it says, 'His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow'. And if you look at Acts i. 10, you will see other angels described as 'white,' 'And while they looked stedfastly toward heaven, as He went up, behold, two men (i.e. angels) stood by them in white apparel'.

But there is something 'whiter' still. Look at Mark ix. 3; when Jesus was transfigured on the top of the mount, it says, 'And his raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow; so as no fuller on earth can white them'.

So that we find the manna was 'white'; angels' robes were 'white'; and Jesus' robe was 'white'; and seven times in the Revelation it says the same thing as my text, that the dress of the saints in heaven is 'white'—that they 'walk with God in white'.

These are some of the 'white' things. It seems as if everything that had to do with heaven is 'white'. But which is the whitest? The whitest is God—the whitest is Christ. But what is the whitest with us? What do you think is the whitest thing—next to God, next to Christ? Shall I tell you? The thing that was the blackest. And what is that? The heart. It was the dirtiest, blackest thing in the world; but God makes it the whitest.

I want you to think, then, that every one who is to 'walk in white' with Christ in heaven, must begin now. I want you to think that we are to 'walk in white' now. What is like 'walking in white' for we must begin now, if we are to 'walk in white' when we die. What does it make you think of when it says, 'walk in white'? I am going to mention four things which I think it means.

I. First, those who 'walk in white' are so very 'clean'. 'White' is so 'clean'. Perhaps you wonder that I should talk about you being 'clean,' but in the Revelation God twice notices that the saints are 'clean': He says they are 'clean and white'. He puts the two together. It is not too little for God to notice that we are 'clean'.

The first thing that must be 'clean' is our heart. Nothing will do but that. I have tried to explain what this is. Every day your heart must be made 'clean' in the blood of Christ, for you daily defile it. But not only your heart, everything must be clean, you must have clean face, clean hands, clean person, clean clothes, clean room, clean drawers, clean everything.

A Christian will wish everything to be 'clean'. Why? Because it looks nice? That is one reason. Because your father, and mother, and friends wish it? That is a good reason. But there is a higher reason by far, because you hope to 'walk in white' in heaven; and therefore you are determined to 'walk in white' now. To be 'clean' is a preparation for heaven. Oh, how 'clean' are they in heaven! Let this be your reason for trying always to be very nicely 'clean,' that you hope to go to heaven, and heaven is so beautifully 'clean'.

You know little things become great if there is a great reason; and common things become heavenly if done to please God. To be 'clean,' is to please God, because He wishes you to 'walk in white' with Him in heaven. That is one thing.

II. Another thing which to 'walk in white' means, is to be very clear, so that you can reflect everything. I must explain to you what I mean by that. When you look at your face in a looking-glass, what you see is called a reflection. The glass reflects you. God wishes, whenever he looks at you, to see a reflection of Himself in you. I have given you, as your subject, that you are to think how you can be like Christ. If you are like Christ you reflect Christ.

Now 'white' reflects most. I am going to tell you something that you do not all know. I will tell you how we see anything. A ray of light comes upon the thing we look at, and then a ray of light comes off the thing to our eye, and makes a picture of it to us. The way you see me, is, the light of the sun falls on me, that ray falls on your eye, and makes a picture of me to you. A ray is made up of various colours—violet, blue, indigo, orange, red, yellow, and so on. If a thing reflects all the rays it is 'white'. My surplice is 'white'. Therefore 'white' reflects most. We are to be 'white,' because we are to reflect all Christ. Not to be like Christ in one ray, or another ray, but to be all Christ—to be 'white'.

III. Now I am going to mention a third thing, 'white' is very pretty, most beautiful—and why? Because it is so simple. I dare say, when you were a little baby, and were baptised, you had a white frock on. Whit-Sunday was called White-Sunday, because all people who came to be baptised on that Sunday came in white. You are to 'walk in white,' and so you are dressed in it, because it is so beautiful, so simple.

I once knew a little girl who had a great many fine clothes; and, talking to me of one of the joys of heaven, she said, 'In heaven they would not be worried about fine clothes'. How simple! I hope you will always like to be very simple in your dress. If you are asked, 'Why do you like the simplest dress?' say, 'Because it is like heaven'. They do not wear fine things in heaven—they are not wanted there. There is no beauty like simplicity. Anything that is not natural is never really beautiful. True simplicity is always beautiful. Therefore, in heaven they 'walk in white'. Try to be simple in everything, because you hope to 'walk in white' for ever.

IV. 'One more thing. 'White' is a very happy colour. People generally put on 'white' when they are very happy.

In ancient times the great officers and magistrates used to wear 'white,' and the high priests always wore 'white'. One reason was because it was holy, and another because it was happy. People put on 'white' during holidays because it is a happy colour.

The ancient Persians always used to put on 'white' when anybody died, because they thought it a happy thing; but black when any were born, because they thought they were born into a world of trouble. I do not know that they were not the wisest, because to die is a very happy thing.

In Ecclesiastes ix. 7, 8, happiness is represented by 'white' apparel—it reads, 'Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; For God now accepteth thy works. Let thy garments be always white.' Therefore, if we are to be prepared for heaven, we must be happy there.

'Walk in white.' Will you think of the four things we must be to be 'worthy'—to be prepared and fit to go to heaven? We must have a clean heart, and clean everything; We must be clear—be like Christ and reflect Him—be very true: we must be simple, very simple in everything—simple in our tastes, because true simplicity is true beauty; and we must be happy, very happy in the thought that God loves us, and we are going to heaven. This is 'walking in white'.—JAMES VAUGHAN.

THE DOOR OF THE HEART

REVELATION III. 20.

ONE morning, many years ago, I had to leave home early. It was still dark. East and west, north and south, it was dark. Above me rose the night sky covered with clouds, like some great cathedral roof, all dark—almost black with darkness—except one little chink of deep blue in the east.

On the lower edge of that chink of blue stood the morning star. I remember thinking it was a great sight that solitary star, flaming there within that chink of blue. It looked to me like an angel, standing behind the darkness, knocking at the dark clouds, and saying, 'Break up, ye dark clouds, and let me through, that I may shed my light upon the earth'.

While I was still admiring the great sight the words flashed into my mind: 'Behold, I stand at the door and knock'. And instantly I seemed to be walking under a still more solemn sky, and looking at a far greater sight. In the words which came into my mind I saw One greater than an angel, 'the Bright and Morning Star' of God, standing at a door and knocking. In the morning stillness I seemed to hear a voice inviting me to look at this greater sight. 'Behold,' the voice said, 'I stand at the door and knock.' I remembered that these were Christ's own words. And I found myself thinking of Christ, the King of Glory, and thinking of Him in the form of One Who is standing knocking at a door.

And it is this touching figure of our Lord I wish to set before you to-day. I want you to look with me for a little at this great sight of Christ at the door.

I ask myself, I hear you asking: At what door we are to look for the Blessed Jesus standing and knocking?

The answer is: At all doors. At all kinds of doors. At house doors, and shop doors, and school doors, and church doors. At every door which has not opened to let Him in. At every door which shuts in a bad man or naughty child. At the doors of houses where there is no love between father and mother, between brother and sister, between parent and child. At the doors of schools where the scholars are idle, or wicked, or thoughtless. At the doors of work-places, where workers are unfaithful and masters unkind. At the doors of churches where God is not truly worshipped. At the doors of courts of justice where men are unjustly judged. And at the doors of kings' houses where nations are unjustly ruled. At all such doors the Lord Jesus stands and knocks. And besides these, at another door, a very little door, but a very, very precious door, the door that opens into the house within the heart.

When God made the world He built in it many houses. 'In my Father's house are many mansions.' 'The stars are mansions built by God.' The deep sea, and the lofty mountains, and the leafy woods are all mansions built by God. He made houses for beasts, and houses for birds, and houses for fishes. He made a house for the sea, and a house for the clouds, and for man he made the earth. But among all these houses there is one more precious than the rest, one little, rich, unseen mansion, which He built for Himself, for Himself alone, and in which He desires to dwell. This unseen mansion, this rich, royal house of God, is the heart. It is your heart, my heart, every heart. It is at the door of this house that the Lord Jesus stands and knocks.

Think of it. It is worth thinking about. A house for the Great Creator in the heart of a little child! How fearfully and wonderfully we are made! When you look at the body of another child you might think there is nothing more. The body is the house. Yet the body is only the outer wall, the mere outside of the house. Within this fair outside, in you, in every one, stands the real house. 'Eye hath not seen it.' It lies far in, deep down, where love lies, where dreams live. Your heart is this house. It is at the door of your heart that Jesus knocks. Behold, O child, the gentle Jesus! He stands at the door of your heart, and knocks.

I have said that He made this house for himself. But I have also to say that although He made it for Himself, and desires to dwell in it, He does not always dwell in it. He is often kept standing without. 'Behold,' He says, 'I stand at the door and knock.' At the door! Outside of the door! He has not yet got in through the door! It is Jesus at the outside of the heart-door we have to look at. Jesus kept standing and knocking there to get in! Oh, amazing sight! The great Saviour whose hands were pierced for us, who came with blessings in those very hands to bless us, whose own house the heart is, kept standing without! Shut out, and left to knock there, at the door of His house!

How is it with the children I am addressing to-day? Have you heard Christ knocking? And if you have, have you opened and let Him in?

Children who have let Christ into their hearts are like the beautiful temple King Solomon built, which had its innermost best room set apart for God.

Children who leave Him outside are like the inn at Bethlehem, which had no room for the infant Jesus. But that is an unblest state to have no room for Jesus. To leave Him—the best friend we have—the loving Saviour, outside, knocking at the door, that would be such a sad thing for any child of man to do, and I desire so earnestly that you should not do it that I will take up the rest of the time, which remains to-day, in stating some reasons why you should open your hearts and let Him in.

One reason is, because He will bring heaven with Him into your heart. Young people like you, and some old people as well, find a great difficulty in beginning to be good. They resolve to be good. They try to be good; but always their badness gets the better of them, and they are sad. If they would only admit Jesus into their hearts this difficulty would disappear. He brings goodness with Him into the heart. He brings a new heart, new love, new truth, new holiness; best of all He brings Himself. Oh, that is goodness and heaven itself to have Jesus in the heart!

A second reason why you should let Jesus into the heart is that He will cast out the bad things which are in the heart. And there are many bad things which need to be cast out—bad thoughts, bad wishes, bad feelings, lies, anger, malice, hatred, envy, selfishness, pride—these should all be cast out. We are told in the history of Jesus that he cast out evil spirits from some Jewish children. There are evil spirits to be cast out from the children of this country too. The Bible tells us about 'plagues of the heart'. The heart of a Christless child is full of plagues; plagues that will be plagues through all eternity if they are not cast out. Jesus is waiting at the door to come in and cast every one of them out. Lift up the door of your heart and let Him in that He may cast out every plague and evil thing in your life.

A third reason why you should let Him in is, that it is easier to let Him in when you are young than after. The door at which He stands knocking grows thicker and harder to open the longer he is kept outside. The knocking comes more faintly every day. Jesus is still there; but the spirit that should hear is growing deaf as it grows old. At last it does not hear at all.

I saw a sad story in the newspapers not long ago. A poor woman lived all alone in a dark cellar. She was very, very poor. But one day the neighbours missed her. They went to the door and listened, and there was no sound. They knocked and got no answer. They knocked again, and still there was no reply. Then they forced the door and went in. She was dead. She was seated on the floor, her body leaning against the wall. There was neither fire, nor furniture, nor bedclothes, nor food in the house. In a great rich city she had died of want. Ah, sad though that was, the way many souls die is sadder still! They shut out Jesus in the days of youth. They keep Him out when they grow old, and then when he comes knocking at the door of the heart with bread of truth, they cannot hear. Their bodies are living; their souls are dead. If you could break open the door of that inner house where the soul is, and see what God sees there, you would find a heart without truth, or love, or faith, or prayer; and in it a soul that has died of want.

Another reason why you should open to Jesus is that He will not always knock. He will not knock after you die. If you die before He is let in, He will remain outside for ever. Eternity will flow on, and over you, for ever; but no hour can come when He will enter. There is no Saviour knocking at the door of any heart in hell.

He may go away from the door before you die, Ephraim had idols and kept Jesus out, and Jesus said, 'Ephraim is joined to his idols, let him alone'. An awful word! An awful thing to have Jesus say to food and Bibles, and friends, and Providence: 'Let him alone; knock no more'.

I was coming home late one night. The long street was silent. Just as I reached my own door I heard a loud knocking at the far end of the street. I heard it an hour after when I was in bed. Then it stopped. Then I heard quick footsteps tramping along the street. Then all was silent. Just so it is with the knocking of Jesus at the doors of men's hearts. But no ear can hear the departing footsteps of Christ.

Some people are able to tell you when they first heard the knocks of Jesus. These are first knocks. But Mr. McCheyne once said to a little girl in Kelso: 'Remember also there are last knocks'. When the heart becomes hard and careless, then be afraid. Be afraid lest Christ should knock for the last time. Oh you, at whose hearts He is still knocking; you, whose hearts are still fresh and young; oh, children, in the days of youth, open the doors of your hearts and let the King of Glory in.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, Talking to the Children, p. 131.

THE VOICE OF GOD

REVELATION III, 20.

I. ONE of the most wonderful things in our life is that God speaks to us. Although we cannot see Him we can hear His voice. Adam and Eve heard it in the garden, Moses heard it at the hurning bush, the children of Israel heard it in the wilderness.

In an old Jewish book there is a story which helps us to see how great a wonder the voice was to the children of Israel. They were at the foot of Mount Sinai when they heard it. The mountain was covered with smoke. Lightning flashed out of the darkness; great peals of thunder shook the air; the ground trembled; the priests blew terrible blasts through their trumpets; the people were crying out in fear. In the midst of their terror there rose quietly above the roaring of the storm a still, clear sound. It was the voice of God. Everybody heard it. It seemed to come from everywhere. 'It is coming from the south,' cried some; 'It is coming from the north,' cried others. When they turned to the south, they heard it sounding in the north; when they turned to the north, they heard it coming from the south. 'It is in the east!' 'It is in the west!' cried others. When the people turned to the east, they heard it sounding in the west; when they bent their ears to the west, they heard it in the east. As they were turning to every side to hear it, some cried out, 'It is coming down from the sky'. Then they looked upward and as they looked they heard it rising out of the ground. It was everywhere—east and west, above and beneath, behind, before. It is everywhere still. Shepherds hear it in the lone fields when they are watching their flocks by night; sailors hear it when they are keeping their outlook far out at sea; it talks to soldiers on the evening before a battle; it talks next day to those who are lying wounded on the battle-field. I know mothers who hear it as they are rocking their baby's cradle; I have known students who hear it as they read their books. It is to be heard in the songs of birds and the murmur of bees, and there are friends of mine who tell me they hear it amid the crowds of great cities, in the unending tramp of the weary and the heavy-laden, and in the cries of the little arabs on the street. And always when it is heard it is a wonder. It is like some one speaking to us out of another world.

One good thing in that voice is that it always speaks to us in speech we know; not in speech of foreign lands, or of nations long since dead, or of angels in the sky. It speaks to us in our mother tongue, in the speech of human beings, and for the most part in the speech of the human beings who have loved us and cared for us long. As often as otherwise it speaks to us in words which a mother has used.

That is how it spoke to a young man in San Francisco, of whom I read the other day. It was forty years ago, when San Francisco was a wilder place than it is now. He was then hardly twenty years of age, and he was newly out from Scotland. His mother and he had been great friends; in some things she was more like a sister to him than a mother. Often in the evenings she would sing to him the simple songs she loved, and the songs sank into his heart and became a treasure to him there. He could not go where his mother's songs did not go with him. They were music to him all the way on the long voyage to San Francisco, and they did not forsake him there. A kind young fellow, who had come out two years before, took him in hand to show him the sights of the city. One evening he took him to the door of a gambling saloon; it was a horrible place to look into. Ill-faced men sat at long tables in little groups, drinking, smoking, and playing cards. Nobody seemed to be speaking, yet there was a low murmur of sound floating over the room. 'Come in,' said the guide, 'let us for once try our luck at the cards.' He was about to enter, when there came up into his memory the lines of one of his mother's songs:—

Ye banks and braes o' bonnie Doon,
How can ye bloom sae fresh and fair?

It was as if his mother spoke to him. It was the voice of God in the memory of his mother's song. He thought of the grief to her if she knew of his being present in such a place, or in such company. He took his friend's arm in his own and said, 'Let us leave this place'. A place of that kind was a temptation to him never more.

I do not know anything better worth learning about this voice than the times when it speaks to us. It speaks before and after our deeds. But it is its beforehand speaking we should set ourselves to regard.

In the land of Greece long ago there lived a wise and good man named Socrates. He was one of the first of the wise men who took an interest in young people. In the city of Athens, in which he lived, he went up and down the streets offering his wisdom to all who would hear. The young men loved him, and liked to be in his company, and often spoke to him of the wonder his wisdom was. But Socrates never thought himself wise. He told them that what he said was only what his good angel, the voice of God in his heart, told him to say. It was always speaking to him. Especially it spoke to him when he was tempted to do evil things, or speak evil words, or neglect duties. It was a voice of warning. And he lived a noble life because he listened to this voice and obeyed it. When it told him not to do a thing he never did it.

But it happened to Socrates as to One who was greater than Socrates. There were evil men in the city who could not bear that he should speak with the voice of God. And they brought him before the judges, and said, 'Either he must give up speaking at the bidding of that voice or die'. But he said, 'To escape death, ye judges and men of Athens, can never be the great object of human beings. The great object is to flee from ba-eness and wickedness. I can die. I cannot cease to speak as my good angel bids me.' So he chose to die. And the judges sent him to prison and to death.

It was noble to die in that way. But there are many who never listen to the voice when it is a voice of warning and speaks beforehand. They are tempted to do some evil thing, or, like Socrates, to leave off some good thing. The voice cries from within, 'Do not leave off the good thing; do not do this evil thing'. They shut their ears. They will not hear. Or there are other voices and other sounds in their hearts which keep them from hearing, and they give way to the evil. And, oh! there comes back to them once more the voice they refused to hear; but it comes back all changed, and not now a voice of warning, but of blaming and remorse.

There is a picture in our Gallery of Art which shows the awful difference of listening to the voice after instead of before. It is the picture of a wild heath. A lonesome place it is—no house, no road, no bridge to be seen in it all. There is only the dark, waving grass, the low brushwood in the forest, and behind, the far-stretching heath, black with the shadows of heavy clouds. To the left of the picture a man is running, as if for his life. He is turning half round to see that nobody is pursuing him. A look of horror is in his face, and there, straight before you in the picture, is the cause of his terror. There, under the dark sky, half hidden in the brushwood, is the dead body of a man. The man who is running away is his murderer. He is hearing the voice of God, but it is after instead of before his evil deed. The voice of warning has become a voice of accusing. It is crying to him out of the depth of his soul, 'Where is the living man who came with thee into the heath?' It will go on calling for that man as long as he lives. It will follow him like an avenging angel. In the dark and in the sunlight it will speak to him. He will have rest from that awful voice never and never more.

II. Listen to some further words concerning God's voice.

One of the best things connected with the voice is that when it speaks it is always near at hand. It is not a voice away up in heaven, so that we have to say, Who shall go up and bring it down to us? It is not far away over the sea, so that we have to say, Who shall go over the sea and bring it home to us? It is near to us. It is in our very hearts.

You have been born in a country in which the voice is sounding on every side, in which it speaks in almost everybody you know. It speaks to you in your mother's and your father's words. It speaks to you in the lessons of your school-books, and in the words of your teachers. And what you hear when you enter a church is just the wisdom and music of this voice. And because you have been listening to it since your birth, it is near to you and in your very hearts.

Now, this voice which is sounding everywhere round about you, which seems somehow as if it came down to us from heaven, and yet is all the while in our own hearts, which speaks to you often in the words and tones of your mother, and all the while and in every form is the voice of God—this voice utters its best and sweetest call to us when it comes to us from the lips of the dear Lord who died for us.

And this is what I want to speak to you about now. The voice of God is Christ's voice. What we call the Gospel is just this voice telling us of the Father's love. The Bible is the book of the words which this voice has uttered. The Gospels tell us how children liked to hear His Son.

You remember the words and where it is said by the Saviour: 'Behold, I stand at the door and knock; if any man hear My voice and open the door, I will come in'. It is at the door of your hearts He is knocking. He is knocking to see if you will open your hearts, and let Him in to be a voice of God, a good angel to you there. To every one who admits that voice it will be like a pleasant song in the heart, like an angel of God always singing within you of righteousness and of God. It will be always with you: when you lie down at night, when you awake in the morning, when you are happy, when you are sad. Where you go it will go; where you dwell it will dwell.

Like the good angel of Socrates it will warn you when an evil way is near. And if at any time you should come to a difficult place in your life, and do not know which way to turn, it will speak to you and say, 'This is the way, walk you in it'.

In the village of Lilliesden, a few years since, a brother and sister had to bid each other farewell in the afternoon of the day on which their father was buried. He had been a very saintly man, but his saintliness did not pass on to his children. They loved him, but could never feel just as he felt when the things of the soul were spoken about. But now to those two, brother and sister, on this afternoon of the day of their father's burial, when their hearts were tender with sorrow, and they thought back over all they had seen in their father, it seemed as if they had somehow missed their life, since they had missed feeling as their father did. And they agreed together to ask the Lord to enable them to feel as he did, and to walk in his ways. And they agreed further that whoever first felt the change should come right off and tell the other. More than four years passed before the change they longed for came. And it was to the brother it first came. It was a Sunday evening just like this, near the close of the year. He was listening, as he had listened many a time before, to the minister preaching. And as he listened, without warning of any kind, a new life seemed to rise up in his soul. He felt as if Christ had entered into his life, and was speaking to him from within and comforting him, and stirring him up to come nearer to God. Suddenly he was in a new world. Everything spoke to him of God and of heaven. The change long prayed for had come. The Saviour had come into his heart, and was speaking glad words to him there. He saddled his horse next morning, and rode the thirty miles between his sister's home and his own and told her the joyful news. She saw by his manner that he had found the secret of their father's life. She saw the father's saintliness in everything he did. He was as a voice of God to her. It entered into her heart and became a good angel, singing of God all the day. It made her whole life a sermon for God. And he till he died and she till the last time I heard of her were voices for God, calling on all around them by the simple calling of their daily lives.

And that is the wish my heart is wishing for you this evening. From my heart I wish that not only might the voice of Jesus in the Gospel enter into you, but that you yourselves might become, in a way, by your daily lives, voices of God. John the Baptist was a voice speaking in the wilderness in an evil time. There is not one of you, however young, but may be a voice speaking for God in the time on which your young lives have fallen.

That is the work missionaries abroad and preachers at home are doing. They are calling on the dead to rise from the dead.

And those who hear the call become themselves voices joining in the call, and by their lives, their deeds, their words, they take part in this greatest work of God, and are helpers in this first resurrection of the dead.

And my best wish for each of you is that you may have a part in that voice which is going through all the world, and calling on dead souls and saying to them, 'Arise from the dead, and Christ will give you light'.

III. I should be so glad now if I could tell you something of the joy that springs up in the heart when God's voice is listened to, and the light He has kindled is followed. It is a joy like that of the angels.

This autumn, you will remember, we had some heavy storms at sea. And one of these storms came, unlooked-for, after a beautiful day. It was a

Wednesday, in August. Hundreds of northern fishing-boats went out to sea, and many of them were far at sea when the storm burst forth. It was a fearful night; the rain came down in torrents, the wind blew a hurricane. At sea the fishermen were driven helpless before the wind; on shore the fisher-folk went up and down, wondering what was going on with those dear to them at sea. On the morning that followed—the storm still raging—a telegram came from Burghhead to the crew of the lifeboat at Nairn to say that a vessel had been wrecked on an old sand-bar about seven miles away. The men of the lifeboat were themselves at sea battling for their own lives. But as many brave fellows as were needed offered to man the boat and go to the wreck. Everything seemed to be against them. The tide was out. It was a long and heavy pull over the sands before the boat could be launched. It was a task heavier still to row the seven miles to where the vessel was wrecked. But the heaviest toil of all awaited them when they came where the wreck was caught. The waves rose high as hills, and dashed upon the wreck, and then, sucking backwards for many yards, came on again with fiercer blows. The crew in the lifeboat had to catch their chance in the brief moments when the waves were rushing towards the vessel. In those brief moments, bringing their boat near, they saved nine men. A moment only was possible each time. In that moment the lifeboat drew near, a man jumped on board, and, one by one, all who were on the wrecked vessel were saved. Only brave men could have done the work; only men with skilful hands and loyal hearts. But now they turned their prow back towards Nairn with their precious load. What a pull that was back over the seven miles—the wind beating fiercely, the waves terrible for size! The brave men never lost heart. On they came, nearer to safety by every stroke of their oars—nearer and nearer still. At last they turned the corner at Culbin Sands, and the harbour was in view. There, on the pier and along the shore, great crowds were watching. Although they could not share the brave labour of the lifeboat, they shared the sympathy of its heroic men. And when the lifeboat was sighted coming round the coast, a great shout of joy burst from the entire crowd. Louder and louder it rose, as, peering into the distance, the people discovered that there were saved people on board. But when the boat swept into the harbour, and it became known that every man of the wrecked crew had been saved, and when the very men, one by one, rescued from death, stepped ashore, shouting could no longer express the joy that was felt. Many burst into tears, others seized the strangers and embraced them as if they had been sons and brothers.

It was the joy of angels, the joy that is in the presence of God over the saving of the lost. And a beautiful thing in this joy is, that the greater the deliverance has been, the higher and gladsomer is the joy. It is very high when sailors are saved from a wrecked ship ; but it is as high as heaven when the salvation is from a wrecked life.

IV. I have told you of the joy which rises in the hearts of the angels when the lost are saved. But fully to know the greatness of this joy I must now tell you how it works, and how high it rises, when people are saved who did not know they were lost. There are whole tribes of lost people who do not know they are lost, and who do not want to be saved, just because they do not know they are lost. They are worse, far worse than sailors on wrecked ships, only they do not feel their lostness.

Far away from this, near the southernmost point of South America, is a land called Tierra del Fuego, and the people who lived in that land fifty years ago were in this very case. They were lost and did not know they were lost. About that time they were visited by a young man called Charles Darwin, who had seen many lands and many tribes, and he said they were the poorest, the most miserable, the least like human beings of any he had seen. 'Poor wretches!' he called them. They had neither houses to live in nor clothes to wear; their speech was more like the cries of birds and beasts than the speech of human beings. They seemed to him to be without thought of almost any kind. Never, surely, was a people more lost than these. They had lost the likeness of God, in which God had made man; they had lost knowledge of God; church and school and home were lost. Instead of clothes they daubed themselves over with white paint. They were more like beasts of the field than men and women. But now to this race which had lost the very memory of better or other times, and was itself lost in ignorance and beast-like ways, a way of salvation was opened up through the mercy of God. And here is the story of their salvation, as it was told by Dr. Parker at a great church meeting in Hanley. There was found in the city of Bristol, between two bridges, a poor infant, thrown out there to perish. He was found on St. Thomas's Day. Because he was found between the bridges he was called Bridges for surname, and because he was found on St. Thomas's Day he was called Thomas for Christian name. And by and by this deserted child became the Rev. Thomas Bridges, and set his heart on going out into the heathen world to save souls. And to this very land of Tierra del Fuego, of which I have been speaking, he was sent. He listened to the strange speech of the wretched people; he caught the tones; he compared one with another; he made an alphabet of them. Then he made the letters into words; he wrote them down; he came to understand their speech, came to be able to speak to them. He told them the story of the love of God, told them all about Jesus. He translated the Gospels into their language, and taught them to read them for themselves. Through his ministry they were lifted up out of their poor, wretched, lost condition. A new life entered into them; they became human beings again; they became Christian worshippers; they built houses and dwelt in them; they were clothed and in their right mind. And it could be truly said of them, as of the prodigal in the parable, they were dead and came to life again; they were lost, and were found.

When Charles Darwin heard of the change, something of the joy which angels feel entered into his heart, and he sent a gift of money to the society which had sent Mr. Bridges out. Every lover of mankind must have felt in the same way. Over that work the angels in the presence of God, let us be sure, had a great joy.

Now I will tell you why I have spoken to you about the joy of the angels. It is because this is a joy which God wishes you to share. It is really the joy of God; it is joy in the presence of the angels; God's joy first, then the joy of the angels. And it is this joy which God is offering to His children when He invites them to take an interest and a part in the work of missions to the heathen, in the helping of the poor, and in the saving of the souls of the lost.

V. Very fair to see are your shapely bodies, your faces glowing with health, your eyes gleaming with life; and very wonderful to think of is that something within you which no eye can see, which listens to the words I am speaking, and understands the thoughts that are passing from my mind to yours.

But more wonderful still and more fair is that other something which listens to God and understands His thoughts; which catches the light that comes from His face and makes it a light in your lives.

This other something is what the Bible calls 'the candle of the Lord'. It is given to every one. It is shining in your hearts now, in some brightly, in some less brightly. I have seen its light many a time in the happy gleam of a child's eye. If I knew you, as you are known in your homes, I might see it in your words and deeds. It is the lamp or torch of God within your hearts; it is one of God's greatest gifts; it is a light to give light to you on the way to heaven; it is a light God expects you to bring still burning when at last you come into His presence.

In that city of Athens where Paul saw the altar to the unknown God, it was once, in the old days, the custom to have games in honour of their gods and heroes. Among the games that were held was the race of the torch-bearers. Each runner received a lighted torch at the beginning of the race, and the runner who came first to the goal with his torch burning received the prize.

This race was held in honour of Prometheus, a hero of whom Athens and other cities in the old time were justly proud. He was the likeliest to Christ of any of their heroes, and he did a service to man that was only second to Christ's. It was he who first brought fire to men. The people then living believed that in his love and pity he went up to heaven and carried away the fire and brought it down to them. It was one of the greatest kindnesses any hero could do. Winter was made less wintry. Darkness was shut out of the home. Hearthstones were laid. Log-fires were kindled. The labourers coming in from the fields cold and hungry had a warm place to come to, and food well cooked. And in the long winter evenings the family gathered about the fireside, and mothers spun, and daughters knitted, and little boys watched the shadows flickering on the wall, or listened to the stories that were told till it was time to go to bed.

No wonder people held torch races in honour of the hero who gave them blessings like these! The race itself was a splendid sight. The winning-post was in the city; the starting-place a mile and a half distant, among the groves of olive and cypress, where the great Plato kept his school. It was night when the runners started. How their torches must have flared in the night air as they came rushing up the hill! How sad for the runners whose torches flickered out! How joyous for the swift, strong youth who came first to the goal with his torch still burning!

The days when this race was run are long since past. The nations who kept it up are dead and gone. But to something like that race, only grander, we are still called by God. We are called to run with patience the race that is set before us. Our very life is a kind of race, and every one born has to be a runner in it. I have seen this grander race, I have seen the runners, but in other cities than Athens and with other torches than those the Athenian runners bore. I know men and women in this very land who are running it, and striving to keep their torches burning as they run. I know boys and girls who have begun to run it. I am sure there are some of you now reading these words. It is to encourage you in this race, and to help you to keep your torches burning to the end, that I am speaking to you now.

I sometimes look back upon the years of my childhood. As often as I do, I see again the bright young faces which were around me then, bright faces, bright lives, eager young spirits preparing, although they knew it not, to run this very race.

I can say truly of many of those companions that the candle of the Lord, the torch for God's runner, had begun to shine in their hearts. They were believers in God, in heaven, in the resurrection of the dead. They knew the story of Jesus, they believed in His love. Happy hearts! Happy children! I can say of them as I recall their forms, 'The angels of God visited them in their dreams'. Those young hearts were touched with the feeling of the nearness and goodness of God. I have heard them sing the twenty-third Psalm with voices filled with joy. And I have seen the tears running down their cheeks when the story of the Cross was told in their hearing.

Many of those young runners have long since finished their race. I have watched the careers of some through all the years of their life. I have seen the light burning in their words, in their deeds, in their very eyes. I have watched them at their tasks, when they looked to me like the servants of the Lord mentioned in the Gospel, whose loins were girded, and whose lights were burning. I have seen among them saintly runners who came to the goal of their life their outward strength all spent, but their inner light freshly burning.

Ah! and I have also seen some of them coming to the end of their day whose lights had ceased to burn for years, and who had to lie down in the darkness they brought on themselves. I recall one who finished his race before he was twenty, and another who went on till forty, and both came to the end in darkness. Not one ray of the early faith or joy in God burning! All the light of the soul gone clean out through evil thoughts and ways!

You are just setting out in this race, your torches are fresh and bright and brightly burning. God has kindled the light of the knowledge of His love in your hearts. That is His torch. Do you think it can be anything but a sorrow to Him, if any of you, if even a single one of you, should come into His presence at the end with this light of love gone out? He is very earnest in wishing that you try all you can by His help to keep the light burning. —ALEXANDER MACLEOD, The Child Jesus, p. 147.

JESUS KNOCKING AT THE DOOR

'Behold, I stand at the door, and knock.'—REVELATION III. 20

THERE is one door before which, I think, Jesus loves above all others to stand—it is the door of your young hearts. Yes! I think I am right in saying so that this gracious Saviour, though He pleads with all hearts, delights specially to plead with those which, like yours, are yet tender. Let us inquire into one or two reasons for this.

I. Jesus loves specially to knock at the door of young hearts, because He knows He will more readily get admission there. Other and older doors have often a number of bolts and locks put upon them to keep Him out. They are often covered with rust and weatherbeaten. They either refuse to move on their hinges, or else, as in that beautiful picture you may have seen, called 'The Light of the World,' nettles and thistles, the nettles and thistles of bad habits and confirmed sins, so cover them and bar the way, that it seems wellnigh impossible for Him to approach.

But it is different, in most cases, with you. The footroad to your souls is open. The rust of those vicious habits has not yet tarnished the fresh locks and hinges. Conscience, God's servant within, is not, as often is the case with others, asleep or drowsy, but vigilant and wakeful. While many an old heart, like the deaf adder, refuses to hear Jesus knocking, but knocking in vain, He loves the ring of your young voices, saying, 'Come in, Thou blessed of the Lord, wherefore standest Thou without?' Old Eli heard no voice. But the child's ear heard it, saying, 'Samuel, Samuel,' and he said, 'Speak, Lord, for Thy servant heareth'. They are young ears which most readily listen, and young hearts which are most readily opened!

II. A second reason why Jesus loves specially to knock at the door of young hearts is, that He can knock there gently. Your hymn calls Him 'Gentle Jesus, meek and mild'. When an old Prophet describes the future Saviour's character, he says of Him, in contrast with the earthly warrior who comes 'with confused noise, and garments rolled in blood'—'He shall not cry, nor lift up, nor cause His voice to be heard in the streets. A bruised reed shall He not break, and the smoking flax shall He not quench' (Isa. xlii. 3). That is to say, He loves to speak gently and to act gently. His royal name is, Prince of Peace. The illustrious Napoleon said, 'Cæsar and Alexander fought and conquered by arms, Jesus Christ fights and conquers by love'. Oh! how many on their thrones in glory, won by His kindness and tenderness, can testify in the words of the Psalmist, 'Thy gentleness hath made me great' (Ps. xviii. 35).

III. Another reason why Jesus loves specially to knock at the door of young hearts is, Because childhood is the choicest season to welcome Him in. No one likes to stand out in winter, or at midnight, amid cold and frost and snow. Jesus indeed, so loving and compassionate is He, is willing to come even in the winter of old age, and knock at doors covered with icicles, or whose overgrown pathway is drenched with slush or bristling with thorns. But undoubtedly He loves best the early spring, when the sun is rising, and the birds are singing, and the flowers are budding. He loves best to come in the morning of young life. The opening sermon of this book recalls the day of His triumphal entrance into Jerusalem; when, in Royal majesty, He knocked at so many heart-doors, and when so many seemed to welcome Him as 'Blessed' (Mark xi. 9). Yet, as we have there seen, the answer to these pleadings which He appears to have prized most of all was, when 'the Children in the Temple' were seen opening the Temple-gates of their young affections, and when their youthful voices were heard singing 'Hosanna to the Son of David!' Older hearts, at which He knocked on that occasion, might be closed again; around them, the nettles and thistles might grow again; those crying 'Hosanna' to-day, might be shouting 'Crucify Him' to-morrow. But young eyes would not so readily forget the palm-covered way. Young voices would not so readily forget the infant song of welcome. Yes, those children in Jerusalem who thus early opened their souls to Jesus, would in all likelihood turn out His best and most faithful followers and disciples. Perhaps He would say of them and to them, in another sense, what He afterwards said to His Apostles, 'And ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with Me from the beginning' (John xv. 27).

Listen to this heavenly Visitor. He may be knocking now. He may be saying (He is saying), 'My son, My daughter, give Me thine heart'. Ponder, once more, the beautiful story-picture of the text. See this Divine Merchantman unpacking His priceless treasures! He speaks to you, yes, to each of you individually. And how does He address you? 'Here' (we may imagine Him saying) 'is My gold! Here is a golden vesture, a clothing of wrought gold: it is the robe of My righteousness! Here is a golden ring: it is the jewelled ring of adoption. Here are the two golden bracelets of faith and love. Here is a golden necklace set with diamonds and rubies; the precious stones of kindness and gentleness, forgiveness and charity. Here is a golden crown: it is "the crown of glory which fadeth not away" (1 Pet. v. 4).—J. R. MACDUFF, Hosannas of the Children, p. 92.

HEAVEN

'And one of the elders answered, saying unto me, What are these which are arrayed in white robes? and where came they?'

'And I said unto him, Sir, thou knowest. And he said to me, These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.'

'Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve Him day and night in His temple: and He that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them.'

'They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat.'

'For the Lamb, which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.'

REVELATION VII. 13-17.

I do not think there is a more lovely picture in all the Bible picture-gallery than this. I do not think there are more beautiful words among all the Bible's beautiful sayings. It is said of a famous poet that he never read them without tears. May you now ponder them; earnestly desiring that with God's blessing they may be one day a real picture and a joyful description of yourselves. They speak of four things:—

A bright company. An honoured company. A holy company. A happy company.

I. A Bright Company.—St. John was asked the question, 'Who are these arrayed in white robes?'

His reply tells how these robes came to be bright and shining. 'They have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.' All these robes were once black, and soiled with sin. But the blood of Jesus Christ has washed out every guilty stain, and they are now 'without fault before the throne' (Rev. xiv.). Oh, how completely and fully does Jesus take away sin! You remember Isaiah's golden verse: 'Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool' (Isa. i. 18). I read the other day of one who dreamt on his death-bed that his sins were like a great mountain, but that a drop of blood fell upon that mountain and dissolved it in a moment. I have heard of a dying boy who was asked, 'What verse of all your hymns do you like best?' The instant reply was given:—

Because the Saviour shed His blood

To wash away my sin;

Bathed in that pure and precious flood,

Behold me white and clean!

Have you got this white robe? And will you wear it for ever as one of this bright multitude?

II. The text speaks of an Honoured Company.—If you look at the whole passage you will see that they occupy the place nearest the presence of the great King. There are various circles of adoring worshippers described. 'All the angels' in their glittering ranks 'stood round about the throne.' But these angels, again, are represented as standing 'round about the elders' (that is, the redeemed from the earth). In other words, the redeemed occupy the innermost circle of all. Wondrous thought! that even the angel and archangel in heaven seem to give way to the ransomed sinner, wearing the white robe and bearing the ever-green palm! It is specially noted that their greatest privilege and honour is, not that they have their abode in a very beautiful and glorious place—a city with gates of pearl and streets of gold, but because they are thus near God, and because that Great God is to them their all in all. Are they spoken of as kings? They are 'before the throne of God, and He that sitteth on the throne dwells among them'. Are they spoken of as priests? They 'serve Him day and night in His temple'. Are they spoken of as sheep reposing on the green meadows and pastures of heaven—an eternal Summer on the hills of glory? The chief part of their bliss consists in having the presence and love of the great Shepherd. It is the Lamb who 'leads' them there, and 'feeds' them there. Yes, God is their 'chiefest joy'. Other joys of heaven are like the bright stars, but He is the glorious Central Sun: they have no glory by reason of the glory which excelleteth.

It was a beautiful saying of a poor blind Syrian boy in the schools of Beyrout, 'The first object these eyes of mine will ever see will be Jesus'.

III. The text speaks of a Holy Company.—They are described as 'serving God'. And not serving Him only at brief times, or in a half-hearted way, by fits and starts, but they 'serve Him day and night in His temple'.

The redeemed in glory will delight to serve their Heavenly Master and Heavenly Parent. Here they cannot obey Him perfectly. God has too often reason to say, 'If I, then, be a Father, where has been mine honour? and if I be a Master, where has been my fear?' (Mal. 1. 6). But in yonder bright world, we read in the last chapter of this Book of Revelation, 'His servants shall serve Him, and His name shall be in their foreheads'. Just as slaves or servants, in ancient times, had the names or initials of their master branded on their brows to betoken that they were his property, so will Christ's redeemed and ransomed people in glory have His name engraven on their foreheads, and their song through eternity will be, 'O Lord, truly we are Thy servants': 'We are not our own, we are bought with a price!'

IV. The text speaks of a Happy Company.—There is a great deal of happiness in this happy world. God has not hung His creation in curtains of black, or made its sounds to be sounds of mourning. No, He has draped it in garments of beauty. He has a nted His heavens, not with the colour of ashes, but with bright blue. The sun rises from a couch of gold, and pillows his head on a couch of amber. The groves are melodious with sweetest music. The very streams go singing all the way down the mountain-clefts to their ocean home. While this, however, is true, alas! sin has done its best to mar and wreck the world's happiness—to spoil its glad music and drown its song. Sin has done its best to tear down these draperies of gladness and joy, and to hang it round and round in weeds and sackcloth. Sin (to use the Apostle's words) has brought the creation under 'the bondage of corruption'. Think of its pains and sorrows, its sick-beds and death-beds, its bereavements and broken hearts, its famines and pestilences, its hunger and thirst and nakedness; its hatreds and variances; its strifes and jealousies; its wars, and slavery, and bloodshed, and cruel wrongs. But whatever be the evils and sufferings of earth, on the gate of the celestial city there shall be written, regarding these, the words—'No more!' Hunger, thirst, sickness, sorrow, pain, death, the grave—the Redeemed shall know of all these 'No more!' They shall then have entered a holy place, and therefore a happy place. The curse of sin is stamped on 'this present evil world'; but of that blessed 'world to come' it is specially said, 'And there shall be no more curse' (Rev. xxii. 3). The white robe will never again be exchanged for mourning; for 'God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes'. You may have seen bushes, and trees, and flowers so drenched with the night-dew that it hangs like tear-drops upon them; but the sun rises, his beams shine, these dewy tears vanish—they have what is called 'evaporated'; they are dried up by the warming rays. So if believers—plants and 'trees of righteousness'—are from various causes full of tears now, God, the great Sun of heaven, will shine upon them and disperse them for ever!—J. R. MACDUFF, Hosannas of the Children, p. 245.

HEAVEN

'The Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.'—REVELATION VII. 17.

LIGH HUNT, in his autobiography, in speaking of his dear mother's death, tells us, 'Her greatest pleasure during her decay (she died of a slow consumption) was to lie on a sofa, looking at the setting sun. She used to liken it to the door of heaven, and fancy her lost children there, waiting for her.'

A beautiful door, indeed, to a beautiful world!

The remark of the little boy was certainly a very striking one, who, one night, after looking up in wonder at the shining stars, cried out to his father, 'If the outside of heaven be so glorious, how grand the inside must be!'

Did it ever come into your minds to ask why that better land is called heaven? The origin of the name is curious. The old English word heave means to throw or to cast up; and so the sky which seems heaved, or heaven up came to be spoken of as heaven.

'That better world, beyond the cold and troubled waters of death, is sometimes called in the Bible, 'life,' and 'eternal life'; 'the glory of God'; 'peace'; an 'eternal weight of glory'; 'the heavenly Jerusalem'; 'the kingdom of heaven'; and an 'eternal inheritance'. Poets have always pictured it as the land of flowers, and perpetual sunshine.

There, everlasting spring abides,
And never fading flowers;
Death, like a narrow sea, divides
This heavenly land from ours.

Bright fields, beyond the swelling flood,
Stand dress'd in living green;
So to the Jews fair Canaan stood,
While Jordan rolled between.

How it casts a radiance even on the gloomy grave, this remembrance of our heavenly home!

On the bright December day when Washington Irving was laid down to his peaceful rest, on the shore of the river which he loved, the beautiful Indian summer sent back one balmy breath to temper the frosty air, and the unclouded sky was soft with serenest sunshine. 'I could not but remember his last words to me,' writes an admiring friend, 'more than a year ago, when his book was finished, and his health was failing: "I am getting ready to go; I am shutting up my door and windows". And I could not but feel that they were all open now, and bright with the light of eternal morning.'

The Lamb spoken of in the text, and who is represented as leading forth His people unto 'living fountains of waters,' is our Blessed Lord and Saviour.

It was as the spotless Lamb, that He was typified in the sacrifices of the Mosaic law.

'Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world!' exclaimed St. John the Baptist, as he directed the attention of his disciples to the great Prophet who had lately arisen in Galilee.

As a gentle and uncomplaining Lamb our Blessed Lord was led to the sacrifice on Good Friday; and, at the last day, when we shall behold Him in His exaltation and glory, we shall still speak of Him with adoring gratitude and love, as the Lamb Who has redeemed us to God by His blood.

As here on the earth the Lord Jesus was the Saviour of His people, so in the better land, He shall be the dispenser of their happiness.

The imagery of the text is certainly very striking and beautiful, and Robert Burns, the Scotch poet, says that from his early childhood he was never able to read it with eyes undimmed by tears. The Saviour is always, and everywhere, the Good Shepherd to His redeemed children.

'He shall lead them unto living fountains of waters.'

The happiness of heaven is described as fresh and ever flowing, like streams in the desert. The 'fountains' are called 'living' because they will never be dried up nor exhausted.

When Cynæus, the ambassador of Pyrrhus, came back from Rome, his master asked him what he thought of the city. He answered, that it seemed to be a commonwealth of kings. And such is heaven. Every child of God who gains admission there will have his robes of honour, his sceptre of power, and his crown of glory.

There is not one person reading this sermon who does not hope to go to heaven when he dies. I say, hopes to do so. He must, however, do something besides hope. Those happy and blessed ones whom the Lamb shall feed, and lead to the living fountains of waters, in the better land, will be the very persons who have allowed the Lamb, even the Lord Jesus Christ, to lead them here. Do you ask, how? The answer is easy enough; those who permit the Saviour to lead them in the way of God's law, and in the works of His commandments. The language of heaven, and a taste for goodness and purity, must be gained here upon the earth.

There are two things essential to one's enjoying a grand musical celebration; one must have a ticket of admission, and must have a taste for music. One of these would be useless without the other. So those who are admitted to heaven, at the last day, will have two qualifications; a title to the better inheritance, and a meetness for it. Have you and I secured both of these qualifications?—If not, have we any time to throw away?—JOHN N. NORRIS, Milk and Honey, p. 106.

HOW CHRIST DRIES UP OUR TEARS

REVELATION VII. 17.

I USED to wonder why the Bible says so much about tears. At that time I did not understand tears. I could not imagine a life of which the drying up of tears should be a sign; nor a Saviour to whom it should be a work.

I suppose the same wonder is in boys still. Children know laughter better than weeping. They have not learned how full our life is of tears. And consequently they do not yet feel the need of a Saviour who shall be a drier up of tears. That may be the case with some of you. You may be saying to yourselves at this moment: 'Tears! What have we to do with tears? We have no tears to be dried up.' Well, I am going to tell you how Christ dries up our tears, and I will begin by telling a story about tears.

Many hundred years ago, in a village a thousand miles and more away from this, there lived a little girl not older than some of you. It is not unlikely that she said just what you are saying about tears. I can fancy her stopping in the midst of her romping some bright day and saying to herself, 'What a happy, joyous time this is! What a happy world! How nice to go whirling and singing and laughing under the sunlight as we children do!' And even years after, when she was no longer a little girl, I can fancy her still thinking that she lived in a happy world. She saw the streams of people as they went past on the Sabbath day to worship. She saw happy fathers, happy mothers, happy children. And her young heart might sometimes rise on tiptoe, and look forward two, three, four years, and see the sweetest visions of a beautiful home in the future, and dear forms glancing out and in, and herself the queen of it all.

Well, this girl grew up to be a woman; and God gave her a beautiful home, and He made her queen of it all. He gave her a husband and one little son. Her visions of the future had come true. And you might think she was still happy, and, like you, had no tears to be dried up. My own opinion is that she ought to have been happy. Thinking of her life in that beautiful home, I can believe that she was very happy. But a day came—a sad day for her—when, if you or I could have looked in through her window, we should have seen her standing by the bed-side wringing her hands, and turning away her face to hide her tears. There, upon that bed, lies her sick husband about to die. His face is pale; his hands are thin and cold. He makes a feeble movement with his lips. She stoops down and kisses him—for the last time. Then his eyelids close, and his breathing ceases, and he is dead. She that was the happy wife—and before that the happy, happy little girl—has become a widow. She has tears now to be dried up.

I dare say there are girls who do not know how sorry and tear-filled the heart of a widow is. The day may come when they will know it only too well. On that sorrowful day, if ever it darken on any of you, I pray God you may remember what I am telling to-day; and you will find strength in the thought that Jesus can dry up your tears.

The poor widow of whom I am speaking could not find that comfort. She had never heard of Jesus. But she turned to her little boy, and said in her heart, 'This boy will dry up my tears'. And it is very sweet for a widow to have a little boy. When her heart is sad and weary she can look to him and say, 'That is his child'. And when the child grows up she is pleased with the thought that he has his father's eyes, and hair, and voice, and walk. And she says, and she is very happy when she says it, 'He is the very image of his father'.

This boy grew older and taller, and the widow loved him more and more. God had taken away her husband, but her son was left. Perhaps she said to herself, 'I shall be happy once again. My boy speaks kindly to me when I am sad; he helps me when I am wearied; he will work for me when I am old; he will sit beside me when I am sick; and he will bury me when I am dead.'

The poor old widow! I think I see her sitting by her door some summer evening, looking at her boy as he comes up the street, recalling a form that twenty years before was just like his, and very glad that a living picture of that form was with her still. I should not be surprised if the pleased mother thought she had no more tears to be dried up.

But one day there was a great stir of people about her house. Some, with sad faces, were going in; others were gathering before the door. Inside, the poor widow was weeping again. Where is that brave son who was to have cheered her in her sorrow? Ah! you may search for him, but you will not find him. He is neither in the field nor about the village. But if you listen you will hear a shuffling of feet within the door. And see! there is an open coffin coming forth; and behind it walks the poor widow. Her boy is there—on that coffin—dead. 'He was the only son of his mother, and she was a widow.'

In the country where this happened the graveyards are outside of the town. I think it would be very sad for the mourners to pace along the streets with that coffin; but sadder still when they had to leave the streets behind and go out into the open country. Something of this sadness you may have felt yourselves. Perhaps you have seen a funeral going from your own house; and you went to the window and watched it slowly fading down the streets; and so long as you could still see it you felt that you had not taken the last farewell. There was one little tie between it and you still. But when it turned into another street, and you could see it no more, then the tie which bound you to the dead was utterly broken. This very sadness, I am sure, the old widow must have felt. When the little procession of mourners passed out from among the houses, and out through the gate, although she was with them, she would feel that the tie which bound her to her beloved boy was fast snapping asunder. She did not speak. It is a heavy grief which cannot speak. But if there had been a window in her breast, you might have seen her soul toiling for utterance, as if she wanted to say, 'Oh, my son, thou hast left the village for ever! Thou art drawing near to the place of graves. I shall never see thee more. Thou fruit of my early love! thou image of thy buried father! thou hope of my old age! my staff and stay! my green and flourishing tree! how art thou cast down and withered! The grave has opened its mouth for thee. My son, my son; would to God I had died for thee, oh, my son!'

That was a touching sorrow. And it seemed as hopeless as it was touching, for there was no one left to lighten her sorrow. Her husband was in the grave; her son was now to be laid by his side; and who then would dry up her tears? There are people who say, 'Time will dry up sorrow'; and there are people who say, 'Friendship will dry up sorrow'. And time with its changes can do much, and friends with their love can do much; but neither time nor friendship can dry up such tears as that widow was that day shedding. Death holds what he has gotten with a hand of iron, and who is he who can unloose its grasp?

But I have a wonderful thing to tell you next. This widow's son died when the blessed Saviour was upon the earth; and help was coming near of which she did not even dream. For at that very moment, when her dead boy was being carried out of the town, Jesus was about to enter! Death going in that direction! The Lord of life coming in this! His disciples were with Him, and He was teaching them by the way. They were drawing life from His words.

And yet if you had seen Him, you would have seen nothing to tell you that He was the Lord of life. He had neither a crown upon His head, nor a sceptre in His hand. To appearance He was but a poor and toilworn man. 'But when He saw the widow, He had compassion on her, and said unto her, Weep not. And He came and touched the coffin: and they that bare it stood still. And He said, Young man, I say unto thee, Arise. And he that was dead sat up and began to speak. And he delivered him to his mother. And there came a fear on all: and they glorified God, saying, That a great prophet is risen up among us; and, That God hath visited His people.'

There was a great emperor living at Rome when that took place; and in this land of ours there was a people who lived in dens and caves instead of houses, and for clothing had skins of beasts. Here, a wild, strange people, with strange, wild looks and ways! There, a great emperor, with gold crowns and purple robes, and silver couches and marble palaces! But if you could bring back that old time to the earth, and look at it with your own eyes, I think I know what you would most wish to see at the close of the day which saw that wonder done. Not the wild people of this land in their dismal caves—not the great emperor of Rome in his marble palaces—but that widow of Nain at her fireside with her son. You would wish to see how she looked at her risen, living son, and how her son looked at her. And you would wish to hear the Psalm which they sang together to Him who had unlocked the hand of death, and given back to the childless son she had lost.

Christ dried up the tears of the widow by giving back to her the son she had lost. He has many ways of drying up tears, but none that He uses oftener than this.

He dried up the tears of Martha and Mary the same way: He gave them back their brother. He dried up the tears of Jairus the same way: He gave him back his daughter. He dried up the nobleman's tears the same way: He gave him back his son. What he did to these bereaved ones was a promise to them and us. When you see the buds on the trees in spring, you know that the buds will yet be leaves, and that under the leaves will be clusters of fruit. The raising of Lazarus, of the widow's son, of Jairus' daughter, of the nobleman's son by the Lord, and His kindness in giving back, to those who were weeping, the beloved ones they had lost, were so many buds on the tree of life. They were promises of still better things.

These better things began to appear when Jesus Himself rose from the dead. The others were promises: that was fulfilment. The others were buds: that was the fruit. For He rose from the dead that all might rise. And His resurrection morning was the dawn of the resurrection morning of the whole world.

The tears of the nobleman, of the widow of Nain, of Jairus, of Martha and Mary would all break out anew. They and their beloved ones would one day be again sundered by death. But on the resurrection morning the dead shall be given back never more to be taken away. There shall be no more death, no more parting of friends, no more crying. All who have fallen asleep in Him shall then be given back to their friends. Mothers shall receive their children, and children their parents, and their brothers and sisters. It will be a glorious day. The gate of heaven on that day will be crowded with scenes like that which the disciples saw at the gate of Nain. Sorrow will give place to joy. Tears will be dried up for ever. And friends who were parted by death will be given to each other again:—

Kindred joyous kindred greeting
Pain and grief behind them cast.

Even now, Jesus is saying to those who have lost their beloved ones 'Weep not'. If some dear brother or sister, or if your godly father or mother has been taken from you by death, do not sorrow as those who have no hope. You have this hope: Christ will give back to you the dear one you have lost. Wait patiently on Him. The resurrection morning is sure to come. And then the trumpet shall sound, and the graves shall give up their dead, and the long-parted ones shall rush together, and they shall be for ever with the Lord, and all their tears shall be dried up.—ALEXANDER MACLEOD, Talking to the Children, p. 81.

THE GREAT RED DRAGON AND THE LAMB ON MOUNT ZION

- 'And there appeared another wonder in heaven; and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads.
- 'And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven, and did cast them to the earth.'—REVELATION XII. 3, 4.
- 'And I looked, and, lo, a Lamb stood on the Mount Zion, and with Him an hundred and forty-four thousand, having His Father's name written in their foreheads.
- 'And they sung as it were a new song before the throne.'—REVELATION XIV. 3.

In the verses of our text we have two very different pictures brought before us from this closing book of Holy Scripture. We have a picture of Satan and his gloomy abode, and of Christ and His glorious, happy heaven.

I. We have in the first of the two verses just read a picture of Satan. He is likened to 'a Great Red Dragon'. I know I need hardly tell you that the dragon is altogether a fabulous creature. It is curious, however, that most pagan nations of old believed in the existence of this huge winged serpent or crocodile. Many of their heroes made it the object of their lives to destroy the supposed monster, and prevent it from doing mischief. One of the 'labours,' as they were called, in the life of Hercules, the giant-god of the heathen world, was the slaying of the dragon. On many ancient shields and banners of England may be seen, to this day, St. George on horseback with the dragon under his horse's hoofs: he in the act of piercing it with his spear. The Christians and martyrs of the early Church and the Middle Ages were also sometimes represented as trampling the dragon beneath their feet.

But if the wild beast of the ancients be a fabulous and unreal creation, not so is the evil spirit spoken of in the text, of which the dragon is the symbol. The great red dragon is here pictured lashing his tail backwards and forwards and upwards. It reaches as high as the stars (ver. 4). These stars mean the bright angels. Some of these he caused to fall from their lofty estate. His tail reached their glorious thrones and swept them down to the earth. It is the same monster foe who to this hour tempts mankind—alike old and young—to sin. He tempts some to lie, some to steal, some to be cruel, some to be dishonest, some to be quarrelsome, some to be impure. There is another verse of Scripture which says, 'The whole world lieth in wickedness'—or, as that rather means, 'lieth in the Wicked One' (1 John v. 19). It is a terrible description of the devil's power. It reminds one of a mother with her child on her knee hushing it asleep. 'The whole world' is as it were in the lap of Satan, and he is singing the lullaby, 'Peace, peace; when there is no peace' (Jer. vi. 14). He sings unwary souls into the sleep of death. He sings asleep only to destroy. He is like Jael the Kenite, who with flattering promises decoyed Sisera into her tent. You remember when she had, with false tongue, assured him of safety, giving him 'milk and butter out of a lordly dish,' and covered him over with the tent carpet, and the wearied man sank in slumber; she took a nail and hammer and drove the iron into his temples.

So Satan deceives and hushes many into the sleep of self-security, and then he comes out in his true character as 'Apollyon,' which means 'Destroyer!' 'Oh, this dreadful dragon!' are you not ready to exclaim? If he has swept down angel-thrones; if he has tried to overcome with his wicked devices the Lord of Glory Himself; how can I escape his power?

II. The second picture of the text is one of Jesus and heaven.

On the lofty Mount Zion, Jesus is seen 'standing' in the form of a Lamb.

It is well worth noting, as I did once before regarding another passage of the Gospels, that the word of St. John here translated 'Lamb,' is in the original Greek 'a little Lamb'. What a picture is thus given us of the 'Gentle Jesus, meek and mild'! It is His own description—His own picture of Himself. He had perhaps you in His thoughts, when He thus revealed Himself to His servant, as 'a little Lamb!' As He had just before appeared to the exile in Patmos under the symbol of a Lion, 'the Lion of the tribe of Judah' (Rev. v. 5), He might say, 'Little children may be afraid when they think of My power, and greatness, and strength as a Lion. I will give them another symbol to attract them to Me and cause them to love Me. I will appear as "a little Lamb". I will thus show them that, as a Lion,

I can protect the strong; and as "a little Lamb" I can guard and tend and love the weak and young and helpless. I used the same word in speaking to Peter on the shores of the lake, when I said to him, "Feed My little Lambs"; and I have not forgotten you, "Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom!"'

This little Lamb on the Heavenly Zion is represented as surrounded with 144,000 saints. These saints sing together 'a new song'. No wonder they sing, for they are now safe; they are now for ever happy and blessed. Do you ask, how are they thus safe and happy? I think they would themselves reply in the words of St. Paul, 'We are more than conquerors through Him that loved us'. 'Thanks be to God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ.'

But this Lamb on Mount Zion is not only surrounded by those who have reached their crowns and their thrones; He is the glorious Head of His Church still on earth—those who are still battling with sin and temptation. While now speaking to you who are young pilgrims, I like to apply to Him the words of Daniel, 'The Great Prince that standeth for the children of Thy people' (Dan. xii. 1). He is standing for you on Mount Zion as a Kingly Intercessor. He is like Moses and Joshua together at Rephidim of old (Exod. xvii. 8). He is Joshua, fighting for you in the plains: He is Moses, pleading for you on the Mount. Only unlike Moses in this that His hands never 'grow weary'.

When Satan tempts, keep near to Jesus. When Satan tempts, do as Jesus did. Go to the Word of God for weapons to fight him with. To three different assaults Jesus answered three different times—'It is written'. You may remember when I preached to you many Sundays ago a sermon on the Bible, I reminded you that when Christian smote Apollyon with the sword (the Sword of God), the Adversary sprang forth his dragon wings and sped away; 'and Christian saw him no more'!—J. R. MACDEFF, Hosannas of the Children, p. 199.

SMALL AND GREAT STANDING BEFORE GOD

'I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened.'—REVELATION XX. 12.

A CHRISTIAN King of Hungary, being low-spirited and silent one day, his rattle-brained and giddy brother inquired the cause.

'The truth is,' the good man answered, 'I have been a great sinner against God, and am afraid to die and to appear before Him in the judgment.'

'Nonsense!' exclaimed the younger brother, in a sneering tone; 'these are nothing but gloomy thoughts.'

The king made no reply, but he quietly resolved to teach the thoughtless young man a lesson. It was then the custom in Hungary that if the executioner came and blew a loud blast of a trumpet before any person's door, it was a signal that he would, in a short time, be led forth to execution. The king accordingly commanded the officer of justice to sound the trumpet before his brother's door at midnight. This was done, and the young man rushed forth amazed and terrified, and seeing the messenger of death he expected that his doom was sealed. Hastening to the royal palace, he cried aloud to the king, 'Alas! brother, what have I done which has so grievously offended you?'

'Nothing,' answered the king. 'You have never offended me. Is the sight of my executioner so dreadful to you? And shall not I, who have grievously offended against God, fear to be brought before His judgment-seat?'

As the trumpet of the executioner startled that foolish young man, so will multitudes be dismayed, at the last, when the trumpet of the archangel shall wake the slumbering dead, and summon us all to the bar of judgment.

This is the subject which is so vividly brought before us in the solemn services of the Advent season.

Advent, as you know, means coming. There are two Advents: the first, the coming of our dear Saviour, in great humility, as the gentle Babe of Bethlehem; the second, His coming with power and glory, to judge the quick and the dead. The most important event which will ever happen is that referred to in the text: 'I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God: and the books were opened.'

We are accustomed to speak of grand occasions, now, such as the inauguration of a president, or the celebration of some popular anniversary, as 'great days!'

Such pageants as these, however, are as nothing compared with what our eyes shall behold when the Lord Jesus comes, attended by the angelic hosts, to set up His judgment-seat.

It is so much easier to remember sermons which are arranged according to method and order, that I shall drive down a few stakes, as it were, and fasten the thread of the discourse around them. There will be three such stakes in this sermon. Who? Why? When?

I. Who?—This is the first stake. Who shall make up the assembly spoken of in the text? St. John answers the question: 'Small and great'. In other words, he means the whole human family; all who have ever lived upon the earth.

When obscure people mingle in a crowd they generally escape observation. No one seems to notice them, or to care about them. Not so at the day of final account.

'Small and great'. Children will be there, children of the rich and of the poor; children of the wise and of the ignorant; children of the good and of the bad.

The 'small,' no matter how humble or insignificant—none will be able to hide from God's sight.

I once saw a poor, friendless woman carrying the coffin of her own little babe to the potter's field. I knew not who she was, and I doubt whether her child ever had any name at all. Not a person in town gave a single thought to the circumstance. The neglected woman had one person in the procession—for I turned about and went with her, and offered a prayer over the lowly grave. When the trump of the second Advent shall sound, even that poor, unknown child shall stand up before God.

The 'great,' also, will be there. Just think, for a moment, of all the wonderful men you ever read or heard of: some of them so grand and powerful that it seems incredible that any Being would be able to control them. Cæsar, with his insatiable ambition; Xerxes, casting fetters into the sea to curb its rage; Alexander the Great, lamenting that there was only one world for him to conquer; Bonaparte, with hands folded behind his back, and strutting up and down, impatient at the least opposition or restraint; Wellington, the mighty hero of his age, who went down to his grave crowned with laurels which will be unfading so long as earthly glories last—great all these, in their way, but there is One far greater and mightier than they; even the King of kings, before whose judgment-seat 'small and great' shall all appear.

II. Why?—St. John tells us in the text. It was a vision which he had of the terrible events of the judgment. 'The books were opened.'

Do you ask 'what books?' I answer, God's account-books.

You have often noticed the large books in which merchants write down the amount which people owe them. Ah! how fast such columns of debts count up! Just so the Almighty is represented as keeping a record of the deeds which we are doing now. He has what business men call a debtor and a credit account. If you have a doubt of this, listen to what our Blessed Saviour says concerning it: 'When the Son of Man shall come in His glory; and all the holy angels with Him, then shall He sit upon the throne of His glory; and before Him shall be gathered all nations; and He shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats.'

Turning with a gracious welcome to those on His right hand, He will bid them enter upon the blessedness of His kingdom, assigning as the reason for the favour thus shown them, the faithful records in the book of His remembrance. Every time that His believing people had fed the hungry, clothed the naked, visited the prisoners, or bestowed even a cup of cold water on a suffering disciple, out of love to the Master, they were really rendering service unto Him.

I must beg you to read the grand passage for yourselves in the twenty-fifth chapter of St. Matthew, from the thirty-first verse to the end.

St. Paul tells us, in plain words, that 'Every one of us shall give account of himself to God' (Rom. xiv. 12).

The 'great' must do it, no matter how high they may have held their haughty heads, and snubbed those below them; and laughed at goodness; and made a mock at sin; and joked about death; they must all stand up to be judged.

And remember, it will be no general outline of what they have been about which will satisfy the Judge. I say a general outline, because this would present no correct view of the case. A father, we will suppose, has been absent from home for some time, and when he comes back he calls his little son to him, and asks, 'Have you been a good boy? and ought I to give you the present which I promised you, in case you obeyed your mother, and behaved properly to your sisters, and others about you?'

Very likely the little fellow will answer out boldly, 'Yes,' and be sincere in the belief that he is telling the truth.

We will grant that in the main he has done tolerably well; but, alas! some things have escaped his memory which ought to be taken into the account. He has quite forgotten the time that he threw stones at the crazy woman; and the sugar which he stole from the pantry; and his thoughtless cruelty in fastening a rope across the foot-path, one dark night, to trip up anybody who might be passing along. All these wrong things have been forgotten, and he looks back upon the weeks of his father's absence as having been spent very properly—and the father, in all likelihood, will never be the wiser. Not so when the All-seeing One calls small and great to give in their account.

III. When?—This was the third stake we drove down at the opening of the sermon. When will small and great stand before God, and the books be opened? Much sooner than we think. Aye, it will be just when our minds are least occupied about it.

The day of judgment will be like any common day. The sun will rise as usual. The sky will be as blue and beautiful as ever, and the earth as calm and quiet. Men will be seen going to their labour in the field, or hurrying to their stores, and offices, and shops. Gay and frolicsome children, with satchels of books, and bags of marbles, will be wending their way to school. Stages and railroad cars, and steamboats will all be in motion; millions of letters and papers on the way to those who will never have time to open them. Lawyers entering the door of the court-house, who will have no more causes to plead; frivolous and fashionable people will be hurrying their tailors and milliners for finery which they will never put on; sharp speculators will be planning some new insurance company, or some tempting arrangement of city lots in a distant State still covered with its primeval forest, to empty the pockets of the credulous; some jolly, blustering souls, red and swollen with hard drinking, will be swearing shocking oaths; when suddenly a fearful blast of a trumpet will be heard which will arouse even the dead from their graves, and the business, and folly, and wickedness of living men will stop, and the Lord Jesus Christ will take His place on the throne of judgment, and the books will be opened.—JOHN N. NORRIS, Milk and Honey, p. 9.

WINNING WORDS OF WELCOME

'Take the water of life freely.'—REVELATION XXII. 17.

THE testimony of Mr. Joseph Hart, the hymn writer in the last century, was very striking, and will be helpful to us. 'Joseph Hart was, by the free and sovereign grace and Spirit of God, raised up from the depths of sin and delivered from the bonds of mere profession and self-righteousness, and led to rest entirely for salvation in the finished atonement and perfect obedience of Christ.'

O! bring no price;
God's grace is free
To Paul, to Magdalene, to me.

There are seven wonderful W's in this verse, and if we place one word on each day of the week the Little Folks will remember them. We have the—

- I. Witnesses.—The Spirit and the Bride (Rev. XXII. 17).
- II. Want.—Thirst (Matt. v. 6).
- III. Word.—Come (Matt. xi. 28).
- IV. Whosoever.—All (Acts xiii. 39).
- V. Willingness.—Take (Ps. cxvi. 13).
- VI. Water.—Life (John iv. 14).
- VII. Welcome.—Freely (Is. lv. 1).

Mercy is welcome news indeed
To those who guilty stand;
Sinners who feel what help they need
Will bless the helping hand.

—CHARLES EDWARDS, Tin Tacks for Tiny Folks, p. 97.

THE LOVING 'COME!'

'And the Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.'—REVELATION XXII. 17.

God is very fond of the word 'Come!' I have been trying to count in the Bible how many times God says 'Come'. I have found a great many. I wonder how many you could find. Very many times God says to us 'Come!' I believe that the very first word—as far as we know—that was ever said in all the world, was 'Come!'

Can you think of what I am thinking of? It is something in the fortieth Psalm. It is about Jesus Christ, and He is speaking of some time, it may have been millions and millions of years ago, 'Then said I, Lo, I come'. That was before the world was made. 'Then said I, Lo, I come.'

I think it is perhaps the oldest word we ever read of, 'Come! come!'

When we say 'Come' our 'Come' is the echo of God saying 'Come!' Do you know what an echo is? Did you ever hear an echo? Did you ever stand before a large rock, or a large building, and say something, and then find the sound come back to you? You might stand before a large rock, and say 'Come!' and it repeats 'Come! come!' God says 'Come!' then you say 'Come!' It is the echo. We are echoing God. All we can do is to echo God.

There are two beautiful echoes in the Bible. One is in the twenty-seventh Psalm and the eighth verse. 'When Thou saidst, Seek ye My face; my heart said unto Thee, Thy face, Lord, will I seek.' 'Seek!' 'seek!' Thou saidst, 'Seek My face!' I echo, 'Thy face will I seek!'

I will tell you of another beautiful echo, it is almost the last verse in the Bible; it is the last verse but one in the last chapter of the Revelation. Jesus saith, 'Surely I come quickly'. Then the echo, 'Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus.' 'Come!' 'come!' We echo it. God says, 'I come!' We say, 'Come, Lord, come!'

There are three very beautiful 'Comes' in the Bible. I should like you to look at each. One is to wicked people. It is in Isaiah i. 18. 'Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord: though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson they shall be as wool.' That is a 'Come' to the wicked.

Now there is a 'Come' to the good, to those who have come to God, and who love Him, and have got their troubles and their sorrows; they feel their sins and they are unhappy. It is what Christ says to them; it is to those who are weary and heavy laden! Do you remember the passage? it is in the eleventh of St. Matthew and the twenty-eighth verse: 'Come unto Me, all ye that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest'.

Then there is a third 'Come' which He will say at the last day, the day of judgment, to His people, to those on His right hand; it is in Matthew xxv. 34, 'Come, ye blessed of My Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world'.

There are three beautiful 'comes'. A 'come' to the wicked; they come; then when they have come, a 'come' to them in their trouble; then when all is over God calls them to heaven. 'Come, and inherit the kingdom.' Whoever you are, you may 'come'. If you are a wicked one, there is a 'Come' to you; if you are a Christian in trouble, there is a 'come' to you; if you are dying there is a 'come' to you—'Come to heaven!' Three 'comes'.

I want to speak a little about the advents: the comings. Do you know how many there are, how many advents?

I. There is one now. I will tell you what I mean. You will understand me better if you look at Revelation ii. 20. Will you read it with me? 'Behold, I stand at the door, and knock: if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him and he with Me.' Then Jesus stands at the door, and knocks, and speaks; and if anyone listens, and opens the door, and lets Him in, He will come and sup with that one. He is standing at the door now; He is speaking now. Let us try if we can hear Him. Can you hear Him? Listen—in your heart—can you hear Him. Is there anything in your heart which seems to say, 'Come in to me!' I think I hear it. 'He stands at the door, and knocks.' He speaks! He wants to come in. Will you let Him come?

Little Caroline's mother was showing little Caroline a picture, and the picture was Jesus with a little baby in His arms; and there were a great many mothers all around Him, and they were pushing forward their little boys and girls to go to Jesus. That was the picture. Little Carrie said, 'Mother! I should not want to be pushed. I would go without pushing.' Will you go to Jesus without pushing?

Jesus comes now, and 'knocks at our door,' and says, 'Let Me in!' and if we let Him in now, He will make us so happy; we shall like to have Him in our heart always after that.

II. Now I am going to speak of another advent—what is called The Second Advent. We generally mean by that when Jesus shall come again in His glory to judge the world. I am not quite sure whether that is the second advent, but we generally call it so. I think when the Holy Ghost came down, that was Christ's second coming, because He called it so—'I will come to you'. And when He 'comes' to our hearts that is another 'coming'; but we will call it 'the second coming' when Jesus comes again. We'll think a little about that.

Which would you rather—die before He comes, and go to heaven that way? or would you rather live on till He comes, and be found here living when He comes? which would you rather? Which is best? To put it into the language of the Creed, would you rather be one of 'the quick' or one of 'the dead'? 'The quick' means those who are alive when He comes; 'the dead' those who die before He comes. Which would you rather? Be alive when He comes? It is a very very happy thing to die. If we love Jesus it is an exceedingly happy thing to die!

I have read of a painter who was painting 'Death,' and the stupid fellow painted Death—as we generally see Death painted—a skeleton and a scythe! That is a horrid way of painting it! A skeleton—to show only our bones will be left, our flesh will go; and the scythe, to show as we cut down the grass, so we are all cut down. A good man coming by said, 'That is not the way to paint Death: you should paint him a beautiful bright angel with a golden key in his hand to open the door and let us into heaven.' That's death. It is a very happy thing to die.

When Bishop Beveridge was dying that good man said, 'If this be dying, I wish I could die for ever'. It is so happy.

But I think to be here on earth when Jesus Christ comes will be happier. One reason why I think so, is, because we know that then there will be no parting. When we come to die it will be very happy to be going to heaven, and to be with Him, and with those we love who have gone before, and all the angels, and so on; but then there will be some still in the body whom we shall have to leave, so we cannot be perfectly happy at that moment, as we should be leaving some behind us.

A lady who was dying a little time ago, said, 'I think going to heaven is something like when I left school for good. I was very happy to come home; but it was rather a trial to leave those I loved, my companions, behind me. That is something like dying. It is very happy, but I have got so many to leave behind me.

But when Jesus Christ comes there will be no partings. We shall all go together then.

When Demosthenes was expelled from Greece, and when Tully was expelled from Italy many years afterwards, we read they both did the same thing in their banishment—they were continually going out looking toward their own native country. They could not see it, it lay far across the sea. Tears ran down their faces as they thought of their dear native country.

Should not we be thinking of the land from which we have been banished?—the beautiful world it will be then, the beautiful garden from which Adam and Eve were turned out! And our own home, our beautiful land, shall not we turn to think about it?

A little girl I read of had been talking to her mother, and her mother had been talking to her about heaven, and the little girl looked at the picture of an angel on the wall, and said to her mother, 'Mother! when shall I get my wings?'

'When shall I get my wings?' When will you get your wings? You will have 'wings' some day, or something like them, and go about flying away from star to star, flying amongst the stars perhaps, I do not know. But when shall I get my wings to soar away? Think of it. Are you ready? Are you ready for it?

A nobleman had 'a fool' in his household, as noblemen used to have in olden times in their service; these half fools, or those who pretended to be such, oftentimes were very clever men, and said very odd and witty things.

This nobleman gave his fool a stick, and said to him, 'Keep this stick till you can find a greater fool than yourself. When you have found one, give this stick to him.'

A long time passed on, the nobleman became very sick, and he said to his fool, 'Fool, I am going into a far country'. 'Are you, my lord?' asked the fool. 'Yes, I am,' replied the nobleman. 'And when shall you come back, my lord?' asked the fool again. 'Never!' was the reply. 'Never come back!' Then what preparation have you made for yourself in that land, my lord, whither you are going?' 'None!' was the reply. 'Take the stick, my lord,' said the fool, 'You are a greater fool than anybody I know. Going into a far country, and made no preparation for the journey you are going to perform.'

Who could be a greater fool than that nobleman? Now be prepared! Quite seriously I ask you, 'Have you got your ticket?' There is a ticket necessary for the journey. Have you got your ticket? You cannot get into heaven without a ticket. Do you know where it says so? I will tell you what the ticket is. It is 'the white stone, with the new name written on it, which no man knows, saving he who receives it' (Rev. ii. 17). Ask God to show you what it means. I believe it means something like this.

Amongst the Greeks when anybody was tried, if acquitted, he had 'the white stone'. Also, 'the white stone' was used as a ticket to admit to a feast. You must have your ticket.

And you must be dressed for the heavenly banquet. There is a particular dress required. You must have your dress on. I will tell you what it is. It is a white dress. You must have on a white dress. It says so in the Bible. Do you know what it is? What is the white dress you must have on? The righteousness of Jesus. You must be in Jesus, Jesus must be all to you; you must be covered with Jesus; your sins must be covered. Just as if you were to put a beautiful robe around a person in rags and tatters, and you do not see their poverty, so if the robe of Christ is on you, God does not see your rags and tatters. Have you got on your dress? Is your ticket ready? Then you will be ready to go in at any moment.—JAMES VAUGHAN.

THE FIVE 'COMES'

'Even so, come, Lord Jesus.'—REVELATION XXII. 20.

You all know that this is Advent Sunday, and I think you all know what the word 'advent' means, that it means 'coming'. Therefore we might call it 'Come-Sunday'. I am very glad (aren't you?) that there is no 'Go-away Sunday!' What a dreadful thing it would be if, instead of 'Come-Sunday,' there were 'Go-away Sunday'. We hope some day there will be! I do not suppose it will be a Sunday, but there may come a day which will be 'Go-away'. 'Go-away!' I hope that won't be said to any of us here, 'Go away!' Now it is 'Come-Sunday!' 'Come!' 'COME!'

If you love Jesus, you will love advent; but if you don't care about Jesus, you won't care about advent. Do you care about Jesus?

About six hundred years ago there lived in Italy a very wise, good man; his name was Thomas Aquinas. He wrote some very beautiful books, and when some one said to him, 'Where did you get all that eloquence to speak so beautifully, and to write such beautiful books?' what do you think he said? He replied, 'I got it all from the Cross'. Now, I do not think that you will understand that. Why did he say, 'I got it all from the Cross'? Think of it, boys and girls at school, where this great man got all his learning. He wrote a beautiful book, called The Sacrament of the Altar, and when he had finished the book he went to a church, and when there, he heard or thought he heard, Christ say to him, 'You have written very well. I will give you now anything you ask because you have written so well about Me.'

Thomas Aquinas said, 'Lord, give me Thyself, I want nothing else'. If you love Jesus, you will love advent.

Now I want to tell of Five Beautiful 'Comings,' and then, when I have told you of all the five, I shall ask you which you like best. Will you be ready, please, to tell me which you like best of 'The Five Comings' that I am going to tell you of?

I. I shall call the first the Grand 'Come!' You will find it in the fortieth Psalm, and the seventh verse: 'Then said I, Lo, I Come!' Jesus said it when He was up in heaven. 'Then.' When, I do not know. Thousands and thousands and thousands of years ago. 'Then said I, Lo, I come!'

Jesus was up in heaven, and He saw that we were going to be in this world, and He saw that we should be unhappy, because we were lost; and He saw that there would be a great many sacrifices, but they would not do any good, and the poor people would not be able to save themselves and help themselves; so He said to God the Father—He said it then, 'Then said I, Lo, I come. I will go and save them. I will go to that world and save them. I will go. How the angels must have wondered! I should think there was a perfect silence. I should think all heaven was silent when the Son of God said, 'I will go to that world'. 'Lo, I come!'

I am so glad He came. He might have had us all up in heaven without coming here first. Then we should not have had Him as a little baby in a cradle. Then we should not have had Jesus as the boy of twelve years old, or the young man as the pattern for us. It was so kind that He said, 'Lo, I come!'—better than if He did it all up in heaven.

II. Now, the next 'Come' I will call the Gracious 'Come!' It is in the first chapter of Isaiah, and the eighteenth verse: 'Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord: though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool.' Now, stop! Perhaps there is a boy or girl in this church who has been naughty—who knows that he or she has done something very wrong. I don't know what it is. You know. God knows. Now, God sends me to you, my dear child, this day, and the message God gives to you is this: 'Come now, and let us talk about it. Come now, and let us reason about it. You have been very naughty, and you cannot be happy. Come to Me!' God says, 'Listen to Me. I am willing to forgive you. And though your sins be as red as scarlet, though they make you blush, though you know all the waters in the world cannot wash them out, I will do it. Come to Me—really come to Me. Let us reason together about it. I will pardon all. I will forgive all, and you shall have peace!' That is God's message to the lost child. Do not think that when you come, God will not receive you. Do you only 'come'.

III. Now I must give you a third 'Come,' and that is a Tender 'Come'. It is in Matthew xi. 28: 'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest'. Now, I may be speaking to some boy who is very tired, tired in a great many ways. I do not suppose he is yet very tired of this life, though life is very hard work, and some little boys even have said, 'I am tired of my life'. It is not so with you, perhaps. But possibly you are tired with your work or your lessons; perhaps somebody is teasing you very much; perhaps you have some burden on your mind, something you are always thinking of, so you are always 'weary and heavy laden'. Now Jesus says to you, by me, 'Come to Me, with that poor, tired, burdened feeling—come to Me, and I will give you rest'. It is so tender. Have you had a tender mother? He is more tender. 'A mother may forget.' He will never forget!

Now, when you are in trouble, say, 'Jesus!' You need say no more; if you do not say any more, it will do. Don't say it as that poor woman first did, 'Jesus!' but with all your heart and soul, with loving tears, if you can, say, 'Jesus!' You try, and you will find that that will do it all. Say, 'Jesus!' lovingly.

IV. Now I come to my fourth 'Come,' and I will call it the Echoing 'Come!' You will find it at the end of the twenty-second chapter of the Revelation, the chapter we read, 'Even so come, Lord Jesus'. That is the echoing 'come!' because it is man saying it back to God. God said, 'Come now!' and man says back to God, 'Come, Lord Jesus!'

There was a little boy who had a little room—a little bedroom to himself. It looked toward the east, where the sun rises, and this little boy, almost immediately he got out of his bed in the morning, before he took off his nightshirt, used to run to the window and open it, and look out of the window. And why do you think he did this? To see whether Jesus was coming! He had heard that Jesus was coming from the east—and I think He will. And this little boy loved Jesus, and longed for Him to come, so he was always looking for His advent.

V. Now I come to my fifth and last 'Come,' that I shall call the Crowning 'Come!' You will find it in the twenty-fifth chapter of St. Matthew: 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world!' Oh, what a glorious 'come' that will be! Do you ever think of Jesus coming? Do you think He will be alone? No. Do you know anybody who has gone to heaven—any dear friends, relations, or anybody else? I will tell you what it will be when Jesus comes. They will come with Him; you will see them. It says so in the fourth chapter of the first Epistle to the Thessalonians: 'Them also which sleep in Jesus'—the good ones who are gone to Jesus—God will take, and 'bring with Him'. Whenever you read that verse always pay great attention to the last words, 'with Him'—Him, not God, but Jesus. God will 'bring with Jesus!' 'With Him!' That is, when Jesus comes, God will take care those dear ones gone to heaven will come 'with Him'. If you are there, you will see them.

Shall we say there are three great comings of Christ to us, and three comings of us to Christ? I think we may. What are they? When He was born at Bethlehem. That was a great coming! Then, He is coming now; He is coming at this moment. It is not I who say it, but God says it, to you, through me. He is always coming to the heart, coming now. And then He will come by and by in His glorious advent. That is the last. And I think we may have three comings. We come now. Will you come now? Jesus is knocking at the door, won't you let Him in? Only try. He is coming to your hearts. Love Him; and let Him in. Well, then, presently, you will die; that will be coming to Jesus. I hope you will go to 'sleep in Jesus'. Then, at the last day, when He comes in His glory, you will rise from your grave, and will go to Him; then you will be caught up to meet that beautiful assembly, that grand procession, all with their palms, their music, their beauty, and their glory. You will be caught up to go in with them to heaven.—JAMES VAUGHAN.

THE EXPOSITOR'S DICTIONARY OF TEXTS

Complete in two Volumes.      Nearly 2,000 Pages.
Over Two-and-a-half Million Words.      Each 25s. net.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK: "The most useful EXPOSITOR'S DICTIONARY OF TEXTS".

THE BISHOP OF BIRMINGHAM: "It is most suggestive and helpful, and it enables one to get quickly knowledge of the views of Scholars and Divines of various schools of thought. I dip into it at spare moments with great benefit.

"It ought to be very useful not only to those who teach, but to devout students of the Bible who love to 'launch out into the deep' and discover the greater meanings even of simple texts."

DR. DAVID SMITH: "It seems to me even more serviceable than the first volume. It is a good idea well executed."

DR. W. B. SELBIE: "Quite equal to the first volume".

REV. G. H. MORRISON: "What a helpful, suggestive and illuminating volume it is! I find in it all the striking and inspiring features which, to my thinking, made the first volume stand alone among all such books, and I can only marvel at the intimate knowledge of the preacher's actual needs which every page displays."

REV. W. L. WATKINSON: "Rich in material, variety, and suggestion, it must prove a treasure to thousands of preachers with a passion for efficiency. It is ideal for its purpose."

DR. J. G. SIMPSON: "Very interesting as a record of modern preaching, revealing the gaps in the choice of texts no less than the varied treatment of texts that are more popular."

"SCOTSMAN": "A remarkable monument of learning in exegetical divinity and of studious care and skill in rendering far-reaching erudition quickly accessible to the uses of particular occasions".

"EXPOSITORY TIMES": "So far as the season has gone, the most important volume of sermon literature is the second volume of THE EXPOSITOR'S DICTIONARY OF TEXTS. . . . There is the same surpassing skill in the condensing of the sermons, and there is the same surprising accuracy in the references."
